

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

PREFACE.

EIGHTEEN years have now passed since this Commentary on the Holy Scriptures was undertaken. Its publication was commenced ten years ago, and the concluding volume is now presented to the public. Its conception was due to the late Lord Ossington, then Speaker of the House of Commons, and to that circumstance it owes its familiar title of "The Speaker's Commentary"—a title, however, which derives a further justification from the warm interest he maintained in the progress of the work, and the constant encouragement it received from him.

The course of thought during those eighteen years has abundantly shown the opportuneness of such an undertaking, and, it may be hoped, has vindicated the general wisdom of the plan on which it was designed. In consequence of ever-accumulating discoveries, antiquarian and philological, public attention has been concentrated to an unprecedented extent upon the Holy Scriptures, upon the origin and history of their several books, upon their text and their interpretation, and this attention has, for the great mass of English readers, given a new interest and importance to the Authorized Version, in which, by the use of nearly three centuries, those Scriptures have become enshrined for them. The first anxiety of the public at large was to know how the new discoveries in philology and history bore upon that venerated translation, what corrections of its text they rendered necessary, and what elucidations of its meaning they afforded. To meet this want was the simple and practical purpose with which our Commentary was designed, and from first to last this purpose has been kept steadily in view. In publishing the final volume a few observations seem desirable on the method with which these objects have been pursued.

In the first place, as stated on the title-page, it was from the outset a primary purpose of the Commentary to furnish in the Notes corrected translations of all passages in which the old version required revision. These emendations of the Authorized Version, when deemed certain, have throughout the work been printed in a distinctive type, darker than the rest of the Note; and the reader is thus enabled to see at a glance every correction in rendering which modern scholarship has made really necessary. The work thus presents substantially the advantages of a Revised Version—a circumstance on which it is desirable to insist, in view of the scheme for providing such a version which about eight years afterwards was set on foot and has since been partially executed.

While, however, the present work has thus, for a large class of readers, anticipated, both in conception and execution, the purpose of the Revised Version now in progress, it presents one marked difference from that undertaking. It was deemed preferable, after mature consideration, to present in our Text the Authorized Version intact. As was stated in the Preface to the first volume, “it was thought that in this way might be reconciled the claims “of accuracy and truth with that devout reverence, which has “made the present text of the English Bible so dear to all “Christians that speak the English tongue.” Our design was not to supersede the Authorized Version, but to furnish the reader of it with the requisite corrections and elucidations, so that the Book which has been the life of English religion, and to a great extent of English literature, might continue to be studied in its old familiar form, while at the same time all danger of mis-reading “the pure Word of God” might be avoided.

It is, however, a fact which must give general satisfaction, and for which we feel exceedingly thankful, that on comparing the corrections adopted in the Notes to this work with the corresponding alterations in the Revised Version of the New Testament, we find a close approach to agreement in passages which affect the sense and have any bearing on doctrine. To appreciate the value of this result, it must be borne in mind that whereas the Revised Version of the New Testament was published in May, 1881, the three volumes of this Commentary which extend to the end of the Pastoral Epistles were completed in 1878, 1879 and 1880; while it is due to the contributors to this last volume to add that the Commentary on the remaining portion, from the Epistle to the Hebrews to the Revelation, was not only printed, but for the most part stereotyped and ready for publication, long before the appearance of the New Version. Any coincidence, therefore, between our corrections and those of the Revisers is the more valuable, as being undesigned and completely independent. In our Commentary, the reader has for every such correction the authority of a scholar who for many years had given special attention to the portion of Scripture in which it occurs, and whose judgment has generally been confirmed by his fellow-labourers, to whom as a rule the proofs of each portion were sent, and by many of whom singular care has been bestowed upon them.

When the conclusions in the two works are identical in substance, if not in form, there can be little doubt that they express positive results of Biblical Scholarship, and will probably command the consent of competent judges. When the corrections or alterations differ, the difference seldom, if ever, occurs in reference to questions of pure scholarship. It generally depends on the greater or less importance attached by either party to the testimony of early Versions, or of the great Fathers, and to the general judgment of the Churches. To such considerations great weight is, indeed, on all hands attached. But a different estimate of their influence from that adopted by the Revisers has undoubtedly determined some of the results presented in this Commentary on questions of considerable importance, especially as affecting the integrity of Holy Scripture as hitherto generally received.

Such has been the nature of our labours as respects the correction of the text of the Scriptures. In respect to the explanatory matter in the Notes, great pains have been taken to present the results of laborious investigations in a condensed form. As a rule, but little space has been allowed to the discussion of interpretations dismissed as untenable by our contributors. Our object has been to put the reader at once in possession of the results of our enquiries, and to spare him the task of comparing conflicting views, especially those which appeared merely speculative¹.

Where subjects required fuller discussion than could conveniently be afforded in notes of this character, they are dealt with separately in Essays at the close of a Book or Chapter. Our object has been simply to afford the reader the necessary materials for understanding the text; and the limits of our space precluded us, for the most part, from admitting observations which did not bear directly on this purpose. The extent of the Commentary was expected not to exceed eight or ten volumes; and it has been found practicable to complete the Old Testament in six volumes, and the New Testament in four. The volumes are, indeed, somewhat larger than was at first contemplated; but the enlargement was rendered inevitable by the constant accumulation of materials, and by the growing demand for full and precise information on points of exegetical interest.

It remains to give some account of the general conduct of the undertaking. Its conception, as has been stated, was due to the late Lord Ossington; but that the idea was carried into effect is due in the first instance to the present Archbishop of York. On the of recognized position and authority. As a necessary result of this decision, in which the Editor reluctantly acquiesced, the Commentary on the Revelation considerably exceeds the average length. But it may be hoped that the reader will, on the whole, welcome what may be regarded as an exhaustive commentary on a peculiarly difficult and obscure portion of Scripture.

suggestion being made to the Archbishop, he at once proceeded to call a meeting for forming a Committee, and took an active part in its formation. By that Committee, which comprised many Prelates and distinguished laymen, with the Regius Professors of Divinity in Oxford and Cambridge, the plan of the work was settled, and the selection of the Contributors and of the general Editor was finally approved. The Archbishop of York of course became Chairman, and the practical direction of the work was entrusted to the Editor. Both in the constitution of the original Committee and in the choice of contributors, care was taken that all parties should be represented by whom the fundamental principles of the Anglican Church are recognized. For some years, meetings of the original Committee were held frequently, at which points not definitely determined, or open to question, were fully considered. These meetings were attended by all the members, generally at the residence of the Speaker; but when questions respecting the form and character of the work had been unanimously and finally decided, and when the list of contributors was completed, the execution was left to them, and to the Editor, whose responsibility extends to every part. Had questions of principle arisen, reference would have been made to the Regius Professors of Divinity and the Archbishop; but no such intervention has been called for. From first to last the work has proceeded without any clash or danger of disruption; and, as now presented to the public, it affords an attestation to the substantial unity of principles which underlies all superficial divergences of opinion within our Church.

The duty of the Editor has necessarily involved a vigilant and laborious supervision of the work of his colleagues, particularly in ensuring that no important investigations on their respective subjects were accidentally unnoticed, but the contributors have enjoyed practical independence. More particularly, in points not of primary or doctrinal importance, whether affecting the comparative value of differing expositions, or the results of archæological or philological investigations, the Editor has not attempted to interfere with the liberty or discretion of the contributors, and each of them is strictly responsible for his own statements. It may be admitted that thorough uniformity, such as marks the production of a single mind or the labours of colleagues under complete control, is not attainable under such a system. But it will probably be felt that this disadvantage is more than compensated by the greater freedom and independence, and by the wider scope of research, which are rendered possible when each scholar follows his own course, and is himself mainly responsible for the elucidation of the portion of Scripture specially entrusted to his care.

The original list of contributors is necessarily somewhat different from that which is presented by the successive volumes. But it differs far less than might be supposed. In the Old Testament, the gaps occasioned by the deaths of three contributors were supplied from the general list without calling in new hands, except for the Book of Daniel. Thus the Editor, who originally undertook the Book of Job only, had to write the Commentary and Essays on the first part of Exodus, the Introduction and part of the Commentary on the Psalms, and that on Habakkuk; but with few exceptions, the other books have been treated by the writers to whom they were originally assigned. In the New Testament, the portion of the Gospels left incomplete by the death of Dean Mansel devolved upon the Editor. Some portions of St Paul's Epistles, from Ephesians to Philemon, surrendered by Bishops Lightfoot and Benson, were undertaken by the Bishop of Derry, aided by the Dean of Raphoe, and by other contributors originally connected with the work. In this last volume, with the exception of the Second Epistle of St Peter, and that of St Jude, every portion was written by the contributor to whom it was first allotted¹.

¹ The two Epistles of St Peter, together with that of St Jude, were originally assigned to the Editor. They were willingly transferred, however, by the Editor to Bishop, then Professor, Lightfoot, in substitution for the Pauline Epistles which he had undertaken, as he desired to be relieved from the latter, on the ground that he was producing a Commentary of his own upon them. Dr Lightfoot then engaged Professor Lumby for the Second Epistle of St Peter and for that of St Jude; and some time afterwards, on his elevation to the Bishopric of Durham, he gave up also the First Epistle of St Peter, which thus reverted to the Editor. This statement seems necessary to account for the withdrawal of so distinguished a name from the list of contributors.

The Editor cannot but express his deep thankfulness that a work involving so many difficulties, and liable to so many unforeseen disturbances, should thus have been brought to its conclusion without any substantial deviation either from the principles or the form adopted and explained at its commencement.

I. THE TITLE OF THE EPISTLE.

IT is certain that the Title which stands in our Authorised Version (adopted from the Received Greek Text and the Vulgate) is not the primitive one.

In the most ancient existing Greek Manuscripts (A, B, and κ) the heading is simply, TO THE HEBREWS. The same must have been the case in the Alexandrian manuscripts at the end of the second century, since we find Origen speaking of "the Epistle which bears the superscription, To the Hebrews." The Peshito Syriac Version, also, which was made not long after the middle of the second century, has "The Epistle to the Hebrews."

It is scarcely necessary, however, to appeal to documentary evidence. All the most ancient traditions relative to this Epistle (see III. Sect. 1) imply that the oldest copies had no author's name prefixed. The writer had seen fit, for whatever reason, not to place his name at the head of the Epistle; and, although the persons to whom it was sent knew well from whom it came (see xiii. 18—24), yet those who first transcribed it imitated the writer's reticence.

Under these circumstances, it seems obviously proper that we should inquire into the evidence for the Canonicity of the Epistle prior to making any attempt to determine (if possible) its authorship.

II. THE CANONICITY OF THE EPISTLE.

The inquiry on this point is of a strictly historical kind.—Have we good ground for affirming that this Epistle stood, in primitive times, among the books which had authority in determining the Church's faith? and have later ages of the Church ratified, by their mature decisions, the view that had prevailed in the first age?

1. As regards the Eastern Church, the answers to these questions can be soon given. All the evidence we possess tends to prove that the Epistle was received as canonical from the earliest times by the churches of Asia Minor, Syria, and Egypt. The fact, already alluded to, of its insertion in the Peshito Version is a very weighty one. Justin Martyr (A.D. 145) quoted it as a Scriptural authority of equal rank with the book of Genesis¹. The language of the Epistle is clearly reflected in a fragment of Pinytus of Crete (A.D. 170) and in a passage of Theophilus of Antioch² (A.D. 180). Irenæus, also (whose testimony belongs properly to the Eastern Church), has at least two manifest allusions to this Epistle³. Clement of Alexandria (A.D. 165—220) quotes it frequently, and always as of apostolic authority. Origen does the same (A.D. 186—253). We need mention no later names. It is undeniable that in the third century the Epistle was received as canonical by all the churches of the East⁴; and that it has continued to be so received down to the present day.

2. On turning to the Western Church we find that we have a somewhat complicated problem to deal with.

(a) On the one hand, we have clear proof that the Epistle was already looked upon as authoritative by the Roman Church in the later part of the first century. This proof is supplied by a Letter which St Clement wrote, as Bishop of Rome and in the name of the Roman Church, to the Church of Corinth⁵. In this Letter the Epistle to the Hebrews is frequently referred to⁶ in precisely the same way as the other Epistles; besides which it is evident that the writer's whole way of viewing and expounding religious truth had been largely influenced by this Epistle. The fact is unquestionable. It was observed by Eusebius; who says,

³ Compare 'c. Hær.' ii. xxx. 9 with Hebr. i. 3, and iii. xix. 1 with Hebr. iv. 2.

⁵ The date of the letter cannot well be later than A.D. 96. It may, however, be much earlier. Irenæus speaks of Clement as embodying in his Letter "the teaching (παράδοσις) which he had recently (νέωτον) received from the Apostles" (iii. iii. 3).

"He not only borrows many thoughts from the Epistle to the Hebrews, but uses its very words¹."

It is certain, then, that, before the end of the first century, this Epistle was held in the highest honour by the Roman Church, and was used with at least as much deference as was accorded to Epistles of confessedly apostolical origin. This is a fact of primary importance, which must never be lost sight of in the present inquiry. No other Epistle can be more distinctly proved to have had a place in the primitive canon of the Roman Church.

(b) On the other hand, from about the end of the second century down to the close of the fourth, we find many traces, in different parts of the Western Church, of the Epistle's not being regarded as, in the full sense of the word, canonical. It had a place assigned it in the sacred volume which contained the books of the New Testament; but, not being held to be apostolical, was not allowed to be of binding cogency for the settlement of controversy, and, in some cases, was not publicly read in the Churches.

Notwithstanding this, however, the testimony of the Western Church, as a whole, is not doubtful. For, Firstly:—We have already seen that the Roman Christians, who lived at the time when the Epistle was written, received it into their canon. It is inconceivable that they should have done this, if they had not had clear and positive knowledge of the author. If, therefore, apostolicity was a necessary condition (as the doubters maintained) of canonicity, then it followed that, in the judgment of those who had the means of knowing, the Epistle had been written by an apostle; and their unhesitating reception of it cannot be set aside because persons, who lived one or two or three hundred years later, thought that it was not apostolic. Secondly:—Whatever may have been the extent, to which an opinion adverse to the canonicity of the Epistle prevailed for a time², or whatever may have been its origin¹, thus much is certain, that by the end of the fourth century the Epistle was firmly established in the Canon of the Western Church. The ground, on which this settlement was effected, is set forth by St. Jérôme in very memorable words. After remarking that the Epistle to the Hebrews was not included in the Latin Canon, nor the Apocalypse in the Greek, he continues: "and yet we receive both; following by no means the usage of the present time, but the authority of ancient writers, who for the most part freely refer to passages of both as canonical." Both Jerome and Augustine, we may add, were careful to explain that they did not consider it possible to determine the authorship with absolute certainty.

² It should be borne in mind that (1) Much of the evidence which is brought for-

The position thus assigned to the Epistle was undisturbed for the next eleven hundred years. In the early part of the sixteenth century, when the question of its authorship was again raised, and freely discussed by both Roman and Reformed divines, by far the greater part of those, who had doubts as to its being St. Paul's, steadily upheld its canonicity². Luther, however, led by ward is negative; that is, drawn from the silence of Latin writers. But this is a very precarious ground of inference. For instance:—we know that early in the Fifth Century the Epistle was admitted at Rome to be St. Paul's. Yet it is not quoted by Innocent, Zosimus, Boniface, Siricius, Celestine, nor (in what are held to be his genuine works) by Leo the Great;—the six successive Bishops of Rome between A.D. 402 and 461.

(1) No weight can be attached to the fact that Muratori's Canon does not mention the Epistle. It also omits the Epistle to St. James and both the Epistles of St. Peter. In all likelihood, it is only a fragment (see Dr Westcott, p. 198).

(3) When St. Jerome says, that "the Latin custom does not receive it among the canonical Scriptures" (on Isaiah ch. viii), he must be employing the term "Latin" in a limited sense. It did not, for instance (see III. 1. 7), include the churches of Milan and Brescia. Indeed, in another place he himself says; "though many of the Latins doubt concerning it" (on Matt. xxvi).

² Erasmus, who argued vehemently against the Pauline authorship (see III. 3, § v. 3) wrote: "I do not think that the faith is exposed to peril, if the whole Church be mistaken in regard to the title of this Epistle, so long as it is settled that the Holy Ghost is its principal author; and on this point we are agreed."

Calvin wrote: "I, indeed, embrace it without controversy among the Apostolical Epistles... As to the question, Who composed it, we need not trouble ourselves much."

mistaken views of some passages in the Epistle, gave it only a secondary rank among the writings of the New Testament; and was followed in this by many German divines of his own and the next age. But soon after the beginning of the seventeenth century its authority in the German Church was restored, chiefly through the labours of John Gerhard; who contended that the term "deutero-canonical" should be held to mean simply, "of uncertain authorship," without in any way derogating from the canonical dignity of the book to which it was applied.

May we not say, then, that the emergent testimony of the Western Church, though it differ so widely in character from that of the Eastern, cannot be looked upon as less valuable? In the East there was a general acceptance of the Epistle from the first; which has continued without variation to the present time. In the West its authority had been most distinctly recognized in the first century¹; then in the course of the third and fourth centuries it passed through a severe ordeal of doubt; from which, however, it came forth uninjured, and therefore (must we not say?) with added lustre. After 1100 years it was a second time subjected to the crucible of doubt; and once

It will be seen that the principle on which these two writers proceeded, when they accepted the Epistle as canonical, was far inferior to that which had guided St. Jerome. He went on historical and objective grounds; they on critical and subjective.

It is, at the same time, interesting to notice, how cordially, both in ancient and modern times, persons who had doubts regarding the authorship of the Epistle have confessed its worthiness of standing in the Canon.

Thus Origen: "The thoughts (νοήματα) of the Epistle are wonderful, and no way inferior to those of the writings which are acknowledged as the Apostle's."

Dean Alford ('Prol.' Sect. VI. § 31): "Nowhere are the main doctrines of the faith more purely or more majestically set forth; nowhere Holy Scripture urged with greater authority and cogency; nowhere those marks, in short, which distinguish the first rank of primitive Christian writings from the second, more unequivocally and continuously present."

Delitzsch speaks of the Epistle as "marching forth in lonely royal and sacerdotal dignity, like the great Melchizedek, of whom its central portion treats, and like him, ἀγενεαλόγητος."

more the conscience of the Church decided that the Epistle had an incontrovertible claim to stand in the Canon of the New Testament.

III. THE AUTHORSHIP OF THE EPISTLE.

Since the canonicity of the Epistle has been established apart from the question of its authorship, and since the author himself saw fit to withhold his name, it might appear to some that there is no need to entertain this question; especially when so many have held that it is one to which no answer can be given with any approach to certainty.

We are unable to adopt this conclusion.

The controversy respecting the authorship of this Epistle has been one of the most remarkable in the whole range of biblical criticism; and therefore its history is, in any case, of deep interest. But, besides this, the inquiry is one which may contribute, in no slight degree, to illustrate the Epistle itself. For, if any certainty is to be attained as to the authorship, it must be chiefly by means of the Internal Evidence; and a diligent examination of this may be expected to throw light on the contents of the Epistle, even if it should fail to reveal its author.

Before, however, we enter on this investigation, we must take a brief survey of

SECT. I. THE EXTERNAL EVIDENCE.

1. First of all, a strong presumption respecting the author is supplied by the early reception of the Epistle among the Gentile churches of both the East and the West. It was addressed specially, "To the Hebrews;" and it entered with laboured minuteness into matters connected with the Jewish Ritual; nowhere speaking of the Gentiles as fellow-heirs of God's promises. Yet, as far as we know, no Epistle laid so firm hold on the mind of the Roman Church in the first century as this did; and by the middle of the second century it had struck its roots in the Churches of Syria, Crete, Palestine, and Egypt. The only adequate explanation of all this appears to be, that the Roman Church knew the Epistle to be the work of an Apostle, and that the "Hebrews," to whom it was sent (and to whom the writer was undoubtedly known), gave a like account of its authorship in different parts of the East. If now we ask, what apostle united in himself the many diverging qualifications, which alone could have gained for the Epistle so immediate and so wide a circulation, the most obvious answer, certainly, is—St Paul.

2. The earliest traditions we possess on this subject, do actually assign the Epistle to St Paul.

Clement of Alexandria¹ (A. D. 165—220) relates that "the blessed presbyter" (by whom it is agreed that he meant Pantænus) used to say: "Since the Lord, being the Apostle² of the Almighty, was sent to the Hebrews, Paul out of modesty, as having been sent to the Gentiles, avoids inscribing himself Apostle of the Hebrews: both because of the reverence due to the Lord, and because it was a supererogatory work in him to write to the Hebrews, when he was preacher and apostle to the Gentiles³."

This tradition takes us nearly up to the apostolic age.

Again, a little later, we find Origen (A. D. 186—253) writing thus: "If, then, any Church holds this Epistle to be Paul's, let it have credit on this account also; for not without good reason have *the men of old time*⁴ handed it down as Paul's." Coming from one who was born about A. D. 186, this expression, "men of old time," takes us back to the age of those who might have conversed with Apostles.

3. The Alexandrian Church, as a whole, distinctly assigned the Epistle to St Paul. Both Clement and Origen frequently refer to the Epistle as "the Apostle's," or "St Paul's;" showing what the prevalent church-tradition there was. Their testimony on this point is rather strengthened than weakened by the fact

³ Clement himself supposed that the reason, why St Paul had not prefixed his name to the Epistle, was, "that he might not at the outset repel the Hebrews, who were prejudiced against him and viewed him with distrust." (Euseb., as above.) Plainly, both he and Pantænus would have thought it, a priori, unlikely that Paul should have written to the Hebrews: a circumstance, which gives additional force to their historical testimony.

that each of them had a theory of his own about the composition of the Epistle¹; on which point some remarks will have to be made when we consider the Internal Evidence². The witness borne by succeeding Alexandrian writers is free from all trace of vacillation or doubt. Dionysius († 264, 5), Peter, and Alexander, quote the Epistle as Paul's; and Athanasius mentions fourteen Epistles of St Paul among those which had been "placed in the Canon, and handed down, and believed to be divine."

4. That the same view prevailed in the Churches of Palestine, Syria, and Asia Minor, is not questioned. We need only mention that Eusebius speaks of "fourteen Epistles of St Paul" as "plainly and clearly"³ belonging to the Canon. At the same time he states that there were some who refused to admit the Pauline authorship of the Epistle to the Hebrews, because the Roman Church did not admit it:—which may fairly warrant the inference that they found no eastern Church to appeal to.

There appears to be one, and only one, way of accounting for so general an agreement as to the authorship of an anonymous Epistle. It is this. When the Christians, who had escaped to Pella before the Siege of Jerusalem, found themselves precluded from returning to the captured city, they would be likely to go and settle, some of them, in Palestine and Egypt, others, in Syria and Asia Minor (cp. Acts vi. 5, 9, viii. 1, xi. 19, 20); carrying with them their copies of this

Origen also maintained that the style was unlike St Paul's; but he preferred supposing that the "thoughts" were Paul's, and that these were embodied in language by one who had attended his teaching; though it was impossible to say, who this was. "As to who wrote the Epistle, the truth is known to God: but the information that has reached us (ἡ εἰς ἡμᾶς φθάσασα ἱστορία) is from some, who say that Clement, who became Bp of Rome, was the writer, and from others, who say that it was Luke, the writer of the Gospel and the Acts." That this "information" did not mean ancient tradition is evident from the context. It probably refers to what he had heard stated by Clement and others.

Epistle,—now, after the overthrow of the Temple, more precious to them than ever. Their statements as to the authorship would, of course, be accepted everywhere.

5. Before we leave the East, there is one more testimony that ought to be noticed. It is of an indirect kind, but this in no way lessens its interest.

In the Alexandrian, Vatican, and Sinaitic Manuscripts (as also in C, H¹ and many cursives) the Epistle to the Hebrews stands immediately after the Epistles to the Thessalonians; and this is also the place which it occupies in the lists put forth by St Athanasius and by the Council of Laodicea (A.D. 365)²: proving that there was a wide-spread consensus among the learned, at any rate, in favour of the Pauline authorship.

The testimony of the Eastern Church, then, is consistent and clear.

6. That of the Western Church is of a different character.

We saw above (II. 2. b) that the Epistle, which had been recognized as authoritative at Rome in the first century, came at a later period to be treated by many as of only secondary value. The reason which they alleged for this was, that the Epistle was "not St Paul's:"—clearly implying, that as many as held it to be canonical did believe it to be St Paul's; and consequently, that the Roman Church of the first century had done so.

The question, then, is: Shall the positive testimony of men, who, knowing St Paul intimately, were qualified to give witness on such a point, be outweighed by the doubts of those who lived some hundred years later, and therefore were not so qualified? To allow this would be to violate a fundamental rule of evidence.

If it be demanded, that some explanation be given of the change of opinion which is thus supposed to have occurred in the Western Church, we may point in reply to the following considerations:

(1) Philastrius († about 387) speaks of some who denied that it was St Paul's, because they thought the passage vi. 4—6 favoured the Novatians. It seems probable that this had been from the first the chief cause of stumbling. During the severer persecutions which broke out in the second and third centuries, many of those, who had fallen away for a time, confessed their error and begged to be re-admitted to church privileges. This was refused them by some rigid sectarians, especially the Novatians. We can readily imagine how natural it would be for men, under such circumstances, to shrink from those solemn words, and to wish that the Epistle which contained them were not of obligatory authority. Why, indeed (it might be argued), should it be, when it had not on it the apostle's name? In any case, the Epistle did not itself claim to be Paul's; why, then, should this point be insisted upon by any?

It may help us to realize, in some degree, the force of what is here alleged, if we remember, that this very passage (Hebr. vi. 4—6) was one of the chief causes of Luther's being unwilling to receive the Epistle as St Paul's. How much stronger would the reluctance against it be in the minds of those who heard the text quoted by Novatians as a proof that broken-hearted penitents must be excluded for ever—at least from communion with the Church upon earth—if not also from hope of salvation¹!

(2) Such persons could scarcely fail to be confirmed in their doubts, if they heard that eminent Greek scholars like the Alexandrian Clement and Origen had expressed an opinion that the style was unlike St Paul's; or again, that so illustrious a man as Tertullian had actually spoken of it as the work of *Barnabas*².

² It is noticeable that in the very chapter, from which we derive this information ('de Pudic.', c. 20), Tertullian is quoting Hebr. vi. 4f. Of course, his known Montanistic leanings would give additional weight to any admission of this kind coming from him.

St Jerome speaks of Tertullian's opinion as if Neither would they be indisposed to lay stress on the circumstance that, as the apostle St John had been directed by Christ to write to seven Churches, so the Apostle of the Gentiles had written by name to seven Churches; seven being the mystical number, in which (as the Muratorian Canon says) the Catholic Church is represented¹. Some effect, also, must have been produced by the style of the translation of the Epistle; the "old Latin" form of which (according to Dr Westcott²) "exhibits more marked peculiarities than are found in any of the Pauline Epistles;" while even the Vulgate translation exhibits "numerous singularities of language and inaccuracies of translation."

7. On the whole, then, we are able to account sufficiently for the altered position which the Epistle occupied in some parts of the West for about two centuries; and to affirm that the testimony of the Eastern Church and of the early Roman Church is no way shaken by anything that occurred during that interval³. That this was the judgment of the Western Church itself, is certain. By about the middle of the fourth century we find many Latin writers using the Epistle unhesitatingly as St Paul's. So Hilary of Poitiers († 368), Lucifer of Cagliari († 371), Victorinus at Rome, Philastrius of Brescia († 387), S. Ambrose of Milan († 397). The Council of Hippo (A.D. 393) and the Third Council of Carthage definitely ascribed the Epistle to St Paul. In A.D. 405 Pope Innocent I, in a letter which he wrote to the Bishop of Toulouse, spoke of the "fourteen Epistles of the Apostle Paul."

it were peculiar to him, "vel Barnabæ juxta Tertullianum" ('Catal. Scr. E.', c. 5); and we find no traces of such a view in St Augustine. Yet we can scarcely doubt (as Bishop Wordsworth has remarked) that Tertullian's statement exerted much influence on the course which opinion took in the Western Church on this subject during the two following centuries.

There can be little doubt that the final settlement of the question was largely due to the wisdom and candour of the two great Church teachers, Jerome and Augustine. Both of these stated clearly their own conviction that the Epistle was St Paul's; yet they frequently contented themselves with referring to it as "the Epistle to the Hebrews;" or, "which is inscribed to the Hebrews¹."

From their time downward, for about 1100 years, the Eastern and Western Churches were in accord on this point.

As the objections, which have been urged against the Pauline authorship of the Epistle during the last four centuries, rest almost entirely on grounds of internal evidence, we reserve further notice of them till we reach the end of the next section².

SECT. 2. THE INTERNAL EVIDENCE.

We now come to the ground on which the main arguments against the Pauline authorship of the Epistle have rested both in ancient and in modern times. We shall endeavour, therefore, to examine this branch of the evidence, concisely indeed (as our limits require), but with thoroughness; taking note not only of words, phrases, modes of expression, and whatever else comes under the head of style, but also of quotations from the Old Testament, characteristic metaphors, modes of viewing and stating theological truth, and the like³.

It is important to bear in mind what the two fields of comparison are: namely, on the one side, this Epistle; on the other, not only St Paul's Epistles, but his speeches also, as recorded in the Acts⁴.

³ Valuable help has been derived, in some of these branches, from Mr Forster's 'Apostolical Authority of the Ep. to the Hebrews.'

⁴ Acts xiii. 16—41; xiv. 15—17; xvii. 22—31; xx. 18—35; xxii. 1—21; xxiv. 10—21; xxvi. 1—19. Many of the words noted by Delitzsch

The fidelity with which St Luke reproduced these is unquestionable¹. Some of them, in all probability, he had from the Apostle himself². The difference of style observable in these speeches—Hebraic, Hellenistic, and Hellenic—is itself no slight guarantee of their historical accuracy.

αἰδώς, ἀναθεωρέω, ἀνυπότακτος, ἀπειθεία, ἀπόλαυσις, ἀφιλάργυρος, ἔνδικος, ἐνεργής, ἐφάπαξ, ἰσημι, κοσμικός, μιμητής³, νεκρῶν, ὀρέγομαι, παρακοή, πληροφορία, φιλοξενία.

That seventeen words answering to the above description should be found in our Epistle, is, of itself, a striking fact. But the significance of this fact is vastly enlarged, when we look at the words in situ, and mark their surroundings.

1. In both ch. xi. 12 and Rom. iv. 19 we have the participle νεκρωμένος; and in both it is used to describe Abraham's bodily condition at the time when a child was promised him; while in the context of each passage reference is made to the promise that Abraham's seed should be as the stars of heaven.

Note, moreover, that the noun, νέκρωσις, is twice used by St Paul (Rom. iv. 19, 2 Cor. iv. 10), though it is found nowhere else in the New Testament or the Septuagint, and is of rare occurrence in secular writers.

2. In ch. vii. 27, ἐφάπαξ is used of Christ's "offering Himself a sacrifice for sins once:" and in Rom. vi. 10, of His "dying unto sin once."

3. The ἀπειθεία of ch. iv. 6 follows as characteristic of St Luke belong to these speeches; so that they are really indications of St Paul's hand. See Appendix II.

² So Dr Farrar ('Life of St P.,' i. 157) in regard to St Stephen's speech: "We find little difficulty in adopting the conjecture that its preservation was due to him [St Paul]."

³ That is, if we follow the later editors; who read ἡλιων in 1 Pet. iii. 13. If we follow the Received Text of 1 Pet. iii. 13, 20, μιμητής will be transferred from § 1 to § 3; but on the other hand ἀπεκδέχομαι will have to be transferred from § 3 to § 1. The word μιμητής occurs in St Paul five times.

upon the ἀπιστία of iii. 19. We have the like sequence in Rom. xi. 20—30.

4. Two of the words in the list given above, ἐνδικος and παρακοή, occur together in the same verse, ii. 2, along with another word, παράβασις, which is found in the New Testament only in this Epistle and in St Paul. All the three words occur in Rom. iii—v.

5. Other two of the words in this list, φιλοξενία and ἀφιλάργυρος, are found in ch. xiii. 2—5, only six lines apart.

The former of these had been preceded by φιλαδελφία (in v. 1); as it is also in Rom. xii. 10—13. The latter, ἀφιλάργυρος, occurs also in 1 Tim. iii. 3 (following upon φιλόξενος in v. 2), but nowhere else in the whole range of Greek literature.

6. The argument supplied by the term ἐνεργής is greatly strengthened, when it is remembered that ἐνέργεια is used by St Paul eight times and ἐνέργημα twice, though neither of them is found elsewhere in the New Testament, or the Canonical books of the Old Testament; and that he uses ἐνεργέω, which occurs only thrice in the rest of the New Testament, no fewer than seventeen times.

7. The word πληροφορία occurs in two places in our Epistle:—

vi. 10—12, “your work and love;... to the assurance of hope;...through faith and patience.”

x. 22—24, “In assurance of faith;... the profession of our hope...to provoke unto love and to good works.”

In St Paul, also, it occurs in two places:—

1 Thess. i. 3—5, “your work of faith and labour of love, and patience of hope... in much assurance.”

Col. i. 27—ii. 5, “The hope of glory;...knit together in love;...the assurance of understanding;...the steadfastness of your faith.”

Let it be observed, that

(1) In each of these pairs we have a passage which contains these six words, —“work,” “faith,” “patience,” “hope,” “love,” “assurance.”

(2) In all four passages we have what has been called “the Pauline triad of Christian graces” (Delitzsch);—compare 1 Cor. xiii. 13, Col. i. 4, 1 Thess. v. 8.

(3) Another of the words in our list, μνηστής, is found in the first of the four passages (Hebr. vi. 12), and in the verse which follows the third passage (1 Thess. i. 6).

(4) The like sequence of thought and language (laborious work being set forth as a model for imitation) is found also in 1 Thess. ii. 9, 14, 1 Cor. iv. 12—16.

(5) The word πληροφορία occurs nowhere else in Greek literature.

When we remember that 1 Thess. i. 3—5, the passage which has presented so many striking resemblances to ch. vi. 10—12, lies in the first paragraph of what is believed to be the earliest of the Pauline Epistles, may we not affirm that here, in the heart of our anonymous Epistle, we have the very signature of St Paul, engraven in the clearest characters?

ἀγών, ἀγιότης, ἀδόκιμος, αἰρέομαι, ἄκακος, ἀνωφελής, ἀόρατος, βεβαίωσις, βέβηλος, διάκρισις, δουλεία, ἐκβασις, ἐκτρέπομαι, ἔλεγχος, ἐνδείκνυμι, ἐπισυναγωγή, εὐάρεστος, θαρρέω, ἱλαστήριον, καύχημα, μεσίτης, μετέχω, οἰκτιρμοί, ὁμολογία, ὀνειδισμός, παιδευτής, παράβασις, πρόδηλος, συγκεράννυμι, τελειότης, ὑπεναντίος, ὑπεράνω, ὑπόστασις, ὑποστέλλομαι.

Here, as in § i, if we are to appreciate the force of the evidence, we must examine the context.

1. In ch. ii. 15 the term δουλεία stands contrasted with the freedom of those who through Christ have been made children of God. So it does in the three places where it is used by St Paul, Rom. viii. 15, Gal. iv. 24, v. 1.

In both Rom. viii. 15 and ch. ii. 15 the badge of this servitude is “fear.”

2. In ch. iii. 6 καύχημα is coupled

(2) The frequency with which several of the words are used by St Paul is not taken account of; whereas four of them are used by him four times, three five times, παράβασις six, ἀδόκιμος seven, εὐάρεστος eight, ἐνδείκνυμι nine, and καύχημα no fewer than ten times.

with "hope." So καυχᾶσθαι in Rom. v. 2¹.

3. The word ὑπόστασις in ch. iii. 14 represents the καύχημα τῆς ἐλπίδος of v. 6: and in 2 Cor. ix. 4, xi. 17 we have, τῇ ὑποστάσει τῆς καυχήσεως.

4. Ἐπισυναγωγή occurs in the New Testament only in ch. x. 25, and 2 Thess. ii. 1. (It is not found in classical Greek, and only once in the LXX., 2 Macc. ii. 7.) In each case it is followed by a reference to the "day" of God's visitation.

5. In ch. vi. 10 we have "the love which ye showed (ἐνεδείξασθε)...in that ye ministered to the saints." So in 2 Cor. viii. 24, ix. 1 (consecutive verses); "the proof (ἐνδείξιν) of your love...For, as touching the ministering to the saints."

6. The word παράβασις occurs in ch. ii. 2 and ix. 15.

In ii. 2 we have "the word spoken by (διὰ) angels;" and in Gal. iii. 19, where also παράβασις occurs, "(the law) ordained by (διὰ) angels:"—while a little above this (v. 14) we have, ἵνα τὴν ἐπαγγελίαν...λάβωμεν; as in ch. ix. 15, ὅπως...τὴν ἐπαγγελίαν λάβωσιν.

7. In ch. xiii. 13—15 the Hebrews are exhorted to "bear the reproach (ὀνειδισμόν)" which Jesus bore; and then "through Him" to "offer unto God the sacrifice of praise (αἰνέσεως), that is, the fruit of lips that give thanks (ὁμολογούντων) to God." Similarly in Rom. xv. 2—11, Christ is first set forth as our pattern in the endurance of "reproaches" (ὀνειδισμοί), and then as having accomplished the promises, which spoke of the Gentiles as giving "praise" and "thanks" to God (ἐξομολογήσομαι...αἰνεῖτε).

In ch. x. 33—36 the mention of "reproaches" is followed by an encouragement to "patient endurance" (ὑπομονή). So it is in Rom. xv. 3—5.

8. In xi. 27 we have the oxymoron, "as seeing Him that is invisible" (ἀόρατον). So too in Rom. i. 20.

9. In ch. xiii. 21 we read, "make you perfect in every good work to do His will, working in you that which is acceptable (εὐάρεστον) in His sight;" and in Rom. xii. 2, "that good and perfect and acceptable (εὐάρεστον) will of God."

10. The word μεσίτης, which occurs in ch. viii. 6, ix. 15, xii. 24, is found elsewhere in the New Testament only in Gal. iii. 19, 20, 1 Tim. ii. 5. (In the Old Testament only in Job ix. 33.)

Now observe, that

(1) In all the three places of this Epistle the Mediator introduces a "new," or "better" Covenant, in which "better promises" are embodied, and especially (ix. 15) the "promise of an eternal inheritance." So in Gal. iii. 14—19 (cp. 29) a contrast is drawn between the old Covenant and one that is established in God's promise of a future inheritance.

(2) In both ix. 15 and Gal. iii. 17—19 the elder Covenant is represented as a temporary provision made for "transgressions" (παραβάσεων).

(3) In ix. 15, Gal. iii. 13, 1 Tim. ii. 6, the Mediator gives Himself as a ransom for sinful men.

§ iii. Words in this Epistle which are seldom used in the New Testament by any except St Paul, but which he uses frequently or with some peculiarity of manner.

1. κλήσις, iii. 1. In St Paul nine times; elsewhere only in 2 Pet. i. 10. In ch. iii. 1 we have κλήσεως ἐπουρανίου, in Phil. iii. 14, τῆς ἁνω κλήσεως; the equivalence of the two expressions becoming evident, when we compare ch. xii. 22, Ἱερουσαλὴμ ἐπουρανίῳ, with Gal. iv. 26, ἡ ἁνω Ἱερουσαλήμ.

2. ἐπουράνιος is found six times in this Epistle; in St Paul twelve; elsewhere, once in St Matthew, and once in St John.

3. ἁγιασμός, xii. 14. In St Paul eight times; elsewhere only in 1 Pet. i. 2.

In 1 Thess. iv. 3 it is contrasted with πορνεία. The same contrast is found in ch. xii. 14—16 (πόρνος).

4. νήπιος, v. 13. In St Paul ten times; els. thrice. In ch. v. 12, 13, it is used of an infantile state, which needs "teaching," as in Rom. ii. 20, 21; and is opposed to "perfection," ch. vi. 1, as in Eph. iv. 13, 14. See also § v. 1.

5. στοιχεία, v. 12. In St Paul four times; els. only in 2 Pet. iii. 10, 12 (in a different application).

In ch. v. 12, as in Gal. iv. 1—3, the word is associated with νήπιος.

6. σκία, used in viii. 5, x. 1, of the adumbrations of truth which were supplied by the Law. The word is so used in Col. ii. 17; but not elsewhere in the Old Testament or the New.

In both ch. x. 1 and Col. ii. 17 we have σκία τῶν μελλόντων.

7. σαρκικός, vii. 16. In St Paul eight times; els. only in 1 Pet. ii. 11.

8. ἀπεκδέχομαι, ix. 28. In St Paul six times; els. only in 1 Pet. iii. 20 (see on § i. footnote 3, p. 7).

In ch. ix. 28 it is used of waiting for Christ's Second Coming. So it is in 1 Cor. i. 7, Phil. iii. 20, expressly; and virtually in Rom. viii. 19, 23, 25, Gal. v. 5.

In Phil. iii. 20 Christ is waited for as σωτήρ; in ch. ix. 28 as bringing σωτηρία.

9. περισσότερος, ii. 1, xiii. 19. In St Paul nine times; els. only in Mark xv. 14 (where the later edd. have περισσῶς).

10. ἐνδυναμόω, xi. 34. In St Paul six times; els. only in Acts ix. 22 (where, however, St Luke was almost certainly making use of the word he had heard from St Paul's own lips; see 1 Tim. i. 12, 13). In ch. xi. 34 it refers to Divine power received through faith, and is contrasted with man's natural "weakness." So it is in Rom. iv. 19, 20; cp. 2 Cor. xii. 9, 10, xiii. 3, 4.

11. ἀπολύτρωσις, ix. 15, xi. 35. In St Paul seven times; els. only in St Luke xxi. 28.

In ch. ix. 15 the ἀπολύτρωσις is effected through the blood of Christ. So in Eph. i. 7.

12. ἐπαγγελία. In the Epistle to the Hebrews it occurs fourteen times; in the Epp. to the Rom., Gal., and Eph., twenty-two times; in St Paul's speeches (Acts xiii. 23, 32, xxvi. 6) three times:—in the Gospels and non-Pauline Epp. five. Cp. above, § ii. 10.

Obs. In ch. iv. 1, 2, the terms ἐπαγγελία and εὐαγγελίζω are co-ordinated; and in Acts xiii. 32 we have, εὐαγγελιζόμεθα τὴν ἐπαγγελίαν.

13. καταργέω, ii. 14. In St Paul twenty-five times; els. only in Luke xiii. 7 (in a different sense). In the LXX. the word occurs nowhere outside Ezra iv—vi. Only two instances are given of its use in classical Greek. It is, therefore, pre-eminently a Pauline term.

In 1 Cor. xv. 26 and 2 Tim. i. 10 it is used of abolishing death; and in ch. ii. 14, of bringing to nought "him that had the power of death."

In ch. ii. 8—14 the writer is commenting upon Ps. viii. 6; so he is likewise in 1 Cor. xv. 25—28.

14. συνείδησις, ix. 9, 14, x. 2, 22, xiii. 18. In St Paul twenty-three times; els. only in John viii. 9, 1 Pet. ii. 19, iii. 16, 21. (In the LXX. twice.)

In ch. ix. 14 we have, "purify your conscience...to serve (λατρεύειν) the living God." In 2 Tim. i. 3, "I thank God, whom I serve (λατρεύω) with pure conscience." Cp. also Acts xxiii. 1, 1 Tim. iii. 9.

In ch. xiii. 18 the allusion to "conscience" is introduced in an apologetic way;—as in Acts xxiii. 1, xxiv. 16. Cp. Rom. ix. 1.

(1) Phrases and modes of expression.

i. 1, "the fathers;" as in Acts xiii. 32, xxvi. 6; Rom. ix. 5, xi. 28, xv. 8.

ii. 4, "signs, wonders, and miracles," mentioned as confirmations of apostolic authority. So in 2 Cor. xii. 12.

ii. 14, διὰ τοῦ θανάτου; employed absolutely, as in Col. i. 22, in speaking of the efficacy of the death of Christ.

ii. 17 and v. 1, τὰ πρὸς τὸν Θεόν; as in Rom. xv. 17. Not elsewhere.

iii. 1, "holy brethren;" as in 1 Thess. v. 27 (cp. Col. i. 2). Not elsewhere.

iii. 12, ix. 14, x. 31, xii. 22, "the living God;" as in St Paul's speech, Acts xiv. 15 (nowhere else in St Luke's Gospel or in the Acts), and seven times in his Epp. Elsewhere in the New Testament five times.

iv. 2, ὁ λόγος τῆς ἀκοῆς. So in 1 Thess. ii. 13, λόγος ἀκοῆς. Not elsewhere.

In 1 Thess. ii. 13 this "word" is described as "the word of God which worketh effectively (ἐνεργεῖται) in" them "that believe." In ch. iv. 2, faith is required as the condition of profiting by the word; while in iv. 12 it is said, "the word of God is living and effective (ἐνεργής)."

iv. 11, σπουδάσωμεν...εἰσελθεῖν. The expression gains more of vivid reality, when we call to mind the σπουδάσον ἔλθεῖν of 2 Tim. iv. 9, Tit. iii. 12.

iv. 14, x. 19, ἔχοντες οὖν...; in gathering up the result of a previous argument. So in 2 Cor. iii. 12 (only).

vi. 3, ἐάνπερ ἐπιτρέπη ὁ Θεός. In 1 Cor. xvi. 7, ἐὰν ἐπιτρέπη ὁ Κύριος. Not elsewhere.

vi. 8, ἥς τὸ τέλος. Similarly, ὧν τὸ τέλος, in 2 Cor. xi. 15, Phil. iii. 19 (cp. Rom. vi. 21).

vi. 9, πεποισμεθα δὲ περὶ ὑμῶν, ἀγαπητοί; cp. Rom. xv. 14, *πέπεισμαι δὲ, ἀδελφοί μου, περὶ ὑμῶν*¹.

ix. 12, and xiii. 12, διὰ τοῦ ἰδίου αἵματος. So in Acts xx. 28. Not elsewhere.

ix. 14, λατρεύειν Θεῷ ζῶντι. In 1 Thess. i. 9, δουλεῖν Θεῷ ζῶντι. Cp. § iii. 14 above; and note on ch. iii. 12.

ix. 26, νῦν δὲ (recent edd. νυνὶ δὲ)... πεφανέρωται. In Rom. iii. 21, νυνὶ δὲ... πεφανέρωται; Col. i. 26, νυνὶ δὲ ἐφανερώθη; 2 Tim. i. 10, φανερωθεῖσαν δὲ νῦν; Rom. xvi. 26, φανερωθέντος δὲ νῦν: cp. Tit. i. 2, 3.

Obs. The "now" in ch. ix. 26 is in contrast with antecedent "ages" (αἰῶνες). So in Col. i. 26 (αἰῶνες); cp. Rom. xvi. 26, 2 Tim. i. 10 (χρόνοι αἰῶνιοι).

x. 5, εἰσερχόμενος εἰς τὸν κόσμον; so in Rom. v. 12 (only).

x. 19—22, ἔχοντες...παρρησίαν...ἐν τῷ αἵματι Ἰησοῦ...προσερχόμεθα. So in Eph. iii. 12, ἐν ᾧ ἔχομεν τὴν παρρησίαν καὶ τὴν προσεγγίην. Cp. Rom. v. 2; Eph. ii. 18.

x. 26, ἐπίγνωσιν ἀληθείας. So in 1 Tim. ii. 4, 2 Tim. ii. 25, iii. 7, Tit. i. 1.

xi. 1, 3, 7, βλεπόμενα; denoting "things visible." So in 2 Cor. iv. 18, four times.

xi. 3, νοοῦμεν; of "discerning" the relation in which the created universe stands to the Creator. Similarly in Rom. i. 20.

xii. 4, μέχρις αἵματος. Cp. μέχρι θανάτου, Phil. ii. 8; μέχρι δεσμῶν, 2 Tim. ii. 9.

xiii. 7, "who spake unto you the word of God." In Acts xiii. 46, "that the word of God should be spoken unto you."

xiii. 17, ὑπὲρ τῶν ψυχῶν ὑμῶν. So in 2 Cor. xii. 15.

xiii. 18, "Pray for us;" as in 1 Thess. v. 25, 2 Thess. iii. 1 (cp. Eph. vi. 19, Col. iv. 3)¹.

xiii. 20, "The God of peace," only in St Paul; Rom. xv. 33, xvi. 20, Phil. iv. 9, 1 Thess. v. 23 (in each case, in the way of a parting benediction). Cp. 2 Cor. xiii. 11.

Obs. In Rom. xv. 33, as here, the writer had been asking those whom he addressed to pray that he might be enabled to visit them.

xiii. 20, "that brought up (ἀναγαγόν) from the dead...our Lord Jesus;" cp. Rom. x. 7, "to bring up (ἀναγαγεῖν) Christ from the dead."

xiii. 21, "every good work." So in 2 Cor. ix. 8; Col. i. 10; 1 Tim. v. 10; 2 Tim. ii. 21; Tit. i. 16, iii. 1. Cp. 2 Thess. ii. 17; 2 Tim. iii. 17.

xiii. 22, παρακαλῶ δὲ ὑμᾶς, ἀδελφοί, as in Rom. xv. 30, xvi. 17; 1 Cor. xvi. 15.

xiii. 22, ἀνέχεσθε; used in asking for the forbearance of his readers, as in 2 Cor. xi. 1 (cp. vv. 4, 19, 20).

xiii. 23, "Our brother Timothy," as in 2 Cor. i. 1; Col. i. 1; Philem. 1.

xiii. 23, ἐὰν τάχιον ἔρχηται. For the phrase see 1 Tim. iii. 14; and for the subject-matter comp. 1 Cor. xvi. 10, Phil. ii. 19—24, 2 Tim. iv. 9.

xiii. 24, "all the saints," 2 Cor. xiii. 13; Phil. iv. 22.

xiii. 25, "Grace be with you all," as in Tit. iii. 15; cp. Col. iv. 18, 1 Tim. vi. 21, 2 Tim. iv. 22. All St Paul's Epistles close with some form of this salutation; and his only.

(2) Connective particles, grammatical forms, rhetorical manner, rhythm of sentences, &c.

The resemblances which have been hitherto pointed out are, for the most part, as weighty as they are plain. It may be well to add a few which, if of less intrinsic value, possess a special argumentative force of their own; since they show that the farther our analysis of the language of this Epistle goes, the more manifestly does its likeness to that of St Paul's writings stand out to view.

1. τοιγαροῦν, xii. 1. Elsewhere (in New Test.) only in 1 Thess. iv. 8.

2. καθάπερ, iv. 2 (and v. 4, R.T.). In St Paul ten times. Not elsewhere.

In both iv. 2 and v. 4 it is followed by καί; as it is in Rom. iv. 6, 2 Cor. i. 14, 1 Thess. iii. 6, iv. 5.

3. νυνὶ δὲ, viii. 6, xi. 16 (and in recent edd., ix. 26). In St Paul's Epp. eighteen times. The only other places, where νυνὶ occurs, are in St Paul's speeches, Acts xxii. 1, xxiv. 13.

4. δι' ἣν αἰτίαν (as a connective), ii. 11. In St Paul three times. Not elsewhere.

5. ἐπεὶ followed by a question (= "for otherwise"), x. 2. So in Rom. iii. 6, 1 Cor. xiv. 16, xv. 29 (only).

A corresponding use of ἐπεὶ without a question occurs in ch. ix. 26; as it does in Rom. xi. 6, 22, 1 Cor. v. 10, vii. 14 (only).

6. In iv. 8 and viii. 7 we have the sequence, εἰ γὰρ..., οὐκ ἂν...

The same occurs three times in St Paul's Epp. (1 Cor. ii. 8, xi. 31; Gal. i. 10), but not elsewhere.

7. In viii. 4 we have εἰ μὲν γάρ; a combination found in 2 Cor. xi. 4 and in St Paul's speech, Acts xxv. 11, but not elsewhere.

8. In iii. 7 we have a quotation from the O. T. introduced by a καθὼς..., with an ellipsis preceding it. The same very marked peculiarity is found in Rom. xv. 3, 21 and 1 Cor. i. 31, ii. 9 (only).

9. In vi. 17, vii. 18, we have a neuter adjective (with the article) used as an abstract noun, with a dependent genitive. The same is found in Rom. ii. 4, viii. 3, ix. 22; 2 Cor. iv. 17, viii. 8; Phil. iv. 5.

More particularly; with ch. vii. 18, τὸ αὐτῆς (= τῆς σαρκικῆς ἐντολῆς, v. 16) ἀσθενές, compare Rom. viii. 3, τὸ ἀδύνατον τοῦ νόμου, ἐν ᾧ ἡσθένει διὰ τῆς σαρκός.

10. In xiii. 5, ἀφιλάργυρος ὁ τρόπος ἀρκούμενοι τοῖς παρούσιν (an apparently categorical clause, followed by a participial one; both being, in fact, hortatory); remarkably parallel to Rom. xii. 9, ἡ ἀγάπη ἀνυπόκριτος ἀποστυγούντες τὸ πονηρόν.

11. In v. 11, xiii. 18, ἡμεῖς refers to the writer singly; as it very frequently does in St Paul.

12. In iv. 13 there is an unusual construction; the relative ὅς taking up an antecedent αὐτὸς with a slight break intervening. The same is found in Eph. iv. 15, 16, Col. ii. 10.

13. In ii. 9, iv. 14, xii. 2, 24 (cp. xiii. 20) the sacred name, Ἰησοῦς, is made (with marked emphasis) to follow a descriptive clause. So it is in Acts xiii. 23 and 1 Thess. i. 10 (cp. Rom. i. 3, 4, 1 Cor. v. 7).

14. In vi. 10, 11, διακονήσαντες...καὶ διακονοῦντες ἐπιθυμοῦμεν δὲ...ἄχρι τέλους, the rapid combination of past, present, and future recalls that of 2 Cor. i. 13, 14, ἐπιγινώσκετε, ἐλπίζω δὲ ὅτι καὶ ἕως τέλους ἐπιγνώσεσθε, καθὼς καὶ ἐπεγνώκατε.

15. The use of τινες in iii. 16, to minimise the statement of Israel's guilt, is strikingly similar to that in Rom. iii. 1—4 and 1 Cor. x. 7—10.

16. In some cases we seem to have the very structure (and even the rhythm) of St Paul's sentences reproduced. Thus:

(a) The balanced clauses of x. 39, ὑποστολῆς εἰς ἀπώλειαν and πίστεως εἰς περιποίησιν ψυχῆς, resemble those of Rom. vi. 16, ἁμαρτίας εἰς θάνατον and ὑπακοῆς εἰς δικαιοσύνην: while the general structure of the verse, οὐκ...εἰς ἀπώλειαν, ἀλλὰ εἰς περιποίησιν ψυχῆς, has a close parallel in 1 Thess. v. 9, οὐκ...εἰς ὀργήν, ἀλλ' εἰς περιποίησιν σωτηρίας.

(b) In v. 5 we have, οὕτω καὶ ὁ Χριστὸς οὐχ ἑαυτὸν ἐδόξασε...ἀλλ' (followed by a text from the O. T.); strikingly parallel to Rom. xv. 3, καὶ γὰρ ὁ Χριστὸς οὐχ ἑαυτῷ ἤρεσεν, ἀλλὰ (followed by a text from the O. T.).

17. In manner, again, how forcibly does the παροξυσμὸς ἀγάπης of x. 24 recall to memory the φιλοτιμείσθαι ἡσυχάζειν of 1 Thess. iv. 11, and the τῇ τιμῇ ἀλλήλους προηγούμενοι of Rom. xii. 10!

How similar, too, the paradox in x. 34, "Ye took joyfully (μετὰ χαρᾶς) the spoiling of your goods," to that in 1 Thess. i. 6, "having received the word in much affliction with joy (μετὰ χαρᾶς) of the Holy Ghost," and in Col. i. 11, "unto all patience and long-suffering with joyfulness (μετὰ χαρᾶς)!" Cp. also St Paul's words in Acts xx. 24.

§ v. The use of Metaphors.

1. In v. 12—14 persons of low religious attainments are spoken of as being in an infantile state, unfit to partake of solid food. Similarly in 1 Cor. iii. 1, 2. Cp. § iii. 4.

2. In each of these passages this domestic metaphor is followed by two others; one taken from architecture, the other from agriculture. See ch. vi. 1, 7, 8; 1 Cor. iii. 6—11.

3. In xii. 1 life is compared to a race. This is one of St Paul's characteristic metaphors¹. See 1 Cor. ix. 24; Gal. v. 7; Phil. iii. 14; 2 Tim. iv. 7; Acts xiii. 25, xl. 24.

4. Following upon this, in xii. 4, there is a metaphor taken from the pugilistic games; "the metaphor changing here," Delitzsch observes, "exactly as it does in 1 Cor. ix. 24—27."

5. In x. 33 the suffering Christians are spoken of as "made a spectacle" (θεατριζόμενοι); so they are in 1 Cor. iv. 9 (θέατρον...ἐγενήθημεν).

6. In xiii. 9 we have a nautical metaphor, "carried away (παραφερόμενοι) by various and strange teachings" (cp. ch. vi. 19). Similarly in Eph. iv. 14, "carried about (περιφερόμενοι) by every wind of doctrine."

7. In iv. 12 we have a metaphor such as might be used by one who was conversant with medical subjects. It has been pointed out² that metaphors of this kind are found in St Paul's Epistles (as 1 Tim. iv. 2, κεκαυτηριασμένοι, 2 Tim. ii. 17).

(1) Texts made use of in this Epistle and by St Paul.

1. Ps. ii. 7. Quoted in ch. i. 5, v. 5, and by St Paul in Acts xiii. 33; cp. Rom. i. 4.

The statements made by St Paul, that Ps. ii. 7 had its fulfilment when Christ was raised from the dead (Acts xiii. 33), and that by His resurrection He was "declared to be the Son of God" (Rom. i. 4), throw much light on the use that is made of this passage in ch. i. 5, v. 5. They also illustrate the meaning of the term "First-begotten" (namely, "from the dead," Col. i. 18) which occurs in ch. i. 6.

² See a paper by Dr Plumptre, in 'The Expositor' for August, 1876.

2. Ps. xcvi. 7 is quoted in i. 6. The prefatory words, "When, again, He bringeth His first-begotten into the world (εἰς τὴν οἰκουμένην)," point to verses in the adjacent Psalms, xcvi. 13 and xcvi. 9; the language of which is applied by St Paul in Acts xvii. 31 (see on i. 6) to Christ's Second Coming (coupled, as in ch. i. 5, 6, with mention of His resurrection).

3. Ps. cx. 1 is quoted in i. 13, and referred to in i. 3, viii. 1, x. 12, xii. 2. St Paul quotes it in 1 Cor. xv. 25, and refers to it in Rom. viii. 34, Eph. i. 20, Col. iii. 1.

In Rom. viii. 34 it is said that Christ, "at the right hand of God...ἐντυγχάνει ὑπὲρ ἡμῶν." The only place outside Rom. viii. in which the expression ἐντυγχάνει ὑπὲρ occurs, is ch. vii. 25; where it is used of Him who is set forth as the "priest for ever" of Ps. cx.

4. Ps. viii. 6 is quoted in ii. 8. So it is in 1 Cor. xv. 27, Eph. i. 22; cp. also Phil. iii. 21.

In 1 Cor. xv. 27, 28 the same logical stress is laid on the "all things" of Ps. viii. 6 as here in ch. ii. 8.

In both 1 Cor. xv. 27 and Eph. i. 22 this quotation follows upon a reference to Ps. cx. 1; as it does in ch. ii. 8.

5. Gen. xxii. 16 is quoted in vi. 13—17, as supplying a ground on which the "heirs of promise" might securely rest their hope. The same use is made of Gen. xxii. 16—18 in Gal. iii. 8—29.

6. Jer. xxxi. 31—34 is quoted in viii. 8—12 and x. 16, 17. The same passage is plainly referred to in 2 Cor. iii. 3—6 (cp. also vi. 16).

7. Deut. xxxii. 35 is quoted in x. 30 and in Rom. xii. 19. The rendering, which differs widely from that of the Septuagint, is exactly the same in the two passages; and in each case the words, "saith the Lord," are added. Cp. below, (2). 5.

The noun ἐκδίκησις and the verb ἀνταποδοῦναι, contained in this quotation, occur also in 2 Thess. i. 6—8¹.

8. Hab. ii. 4 is quoted in x. 38. So it is in Rom. i. 17 and Gal. iii. 11².

² The denunciation of unbelief in Hab. i is quoted by St Paul in Acts xiii. 41.

In Rom. iv. 16—22, where the πίστεως of the quotation is specially dwelt upon¹, Abraham's example is brought forward to illustrate the nature of faith; and the language which is used concerning him bears a close resemblance to that of ch. xi. 8—19 (see above, § i. 1).

In Gal. iii, also, Abraham's faith has equal prominence given to it.

In chh. x, xi, Rom. iv, Gal. iii, faith is represented as a firm reliance on God's promise (ἐπαγγελία; see ch. x. 36, xi. 9, 11, 13, 17; Rom. iv. 13, 14, 16, 20, 21; Gal. iii. 14, 16, 17, 18, 19, 21, 22, 29²).

9. Gen. xxi. 12 is quoted in xi. 18 and in Rom. ix. 7.

A verse in the immediate context, Gen. xxi. 10, is quoted in Gal. iv. 30; the narrative in Gen. xxi. 1—12 being, indeed, the basis of Gal. iv. 22—31.

A similar oracle in Gen. xxv. 23 is quoted in Rom. ix. 12.

(2) Remarkable coincidences in the mode of citing the O. T.

1. In iii. 7, "as the Holy Ghost saith³." Cp. Acts xxviii. 25, "Well spake the Holy Ghost...saying." Not elsewhere.

2. With iv. 7, "saying in David." Cp. Rom. ix. 25, "saying in Hosea." See also Acts xiii. 40.

3. In v. 6 we have καθὼς καὶ ἐν ἑτέρῳ λέγει; and in Acts xiii. 35, διὸ καὶ ἐν ἑτέρῳ λέγει.

4. In viii. 5, ὅρα γὰρ, φησί. In 1 Cor. vi. 16, ἴσονται γὰρ, φησί.

5. In x. 30 λέγει κύριος is added. So in Rom. xii. 19, xiv. 11, 2 Cor. vi. 17.

6. In xii. 5 the O. T. text is introduced by a bold personification: "The exhortation, which converseth with you as with sons; My son, despise not thou...." Similarly in Rom. x. 6, "The righteousness which is of faith speaketh on this wise; Say not thou....:" and in Gal. iii.

³ The ellipsis in διὸ, καθὼς has been noticed above, § iv. (2). 8.

8, "The Scripture, foreseeing..., preached the Gospel beforehand to Abraham."

7. In i. 5, ii. 12, 13, x. 30 we have several quotations connected by "And again:?" so in Rom. xv. 10, 11, 12; 1 Cor. iii. 20.

It has, indeed, been objected that the quotations in this Epistle are introduced by λέγει, εἶρηκε, &c.; while St Paul (it is alleged) uses the forms, "it is written," "the Scripture saith," &c.

The objection proceeds on the fallacious assumption that, if St Paul sent a letter to the Hebrews, he must needs write as if he were addressing Gentile Christians. But, in fact, there is no difficulty whatever in the case.

1. St Paul often uses the form λέγει. In Rom. x. 16—21, for instance, it occurs four times within the space of six verses. In the Epistle to the Ephesians the only two citations that are made are introduced by διὸ λέγει (iv. 8, v. 14).

2. The form "saith" is more usual in addressing *Jews*¹. Hence in Acts xiii. 16—43 "saith" or "said" occurs four times, and "written" only once. In speaking to the Roman Felix, Paul says, "All things written in the Law and the Prophets" (xxiv. 14); but to Agrippa the Jew his words are, "Nothing but what the Prophets did say" (xxvi. 22).

This latter form is obviously most in harmony with the whole tenor of an Epistle which begins, "God, who of old... spake unto the fathers by the prophets;" and which views the word of God as "living and operative" (iv. 12), addressing the same warning, age after age, to the successive generations of men (iii. 7).

Many parallelisms to St Paul's teaching have been introduced incidentally under the preceding heads². In addition to these the following (which are, however, but a sample) deserve to be noticed:

1. In i. 2—6 a remarkable description of Christ, as Son of God, stands in immediate connexion with mention of His sacrificial work.

² See especially § i. 2, 6; § ii. 1, 5, 9; § iii. 6, 10, 11, 13; § iv. (1) freq.; § vi. throughout.

position occupied by the Law in the history of Redemption, the following points deserve to be noticed :

(a) It was only temporary and provisional, ix. 9, 10 ; so Gal. iii. 19 :

(b) with carnal ordinances, vii. 16, ix. 10 ; comp. Gal. iii. 3, Col. ii. 20—23 :

(c) in the nature of rudimental discipline (στοιχεῖα) suited to infants, v. 12—14, vi. 1 ; comp. Gal. iv. 1, 3, 9 (στοιχεῖα, which occurs also in Col. ii. 20) :

(d) bringing the fact of man's sinfulness more clearly before the mind, x. 3 (ἀνάμνησις ἁμαρτιῶν) ; comp. Rom. iii. 20 (ἐπίγνωσις ἁμαρτίας), vii. 7¹ :

(e) weak and unprofitable, as regarded deliverance from sin, vii. 18 (ἀσθενὲς καὶ ἀνωφελές) ; comp. Gal. iii. 21, iv. 9 (ἀσθενῇ καὶ πτωχᾷ), Rom. viii. 3 (ἡσθένει) :

(f) leaving men in a state of bondage and alarm, ii. 15 ; comp. Rom. viii. 15, Gal. iv. 3, 9, 30 :

(g) "a shadow of good things to come," x. 1 ; so in Col. ii. 17 "a shadow of things to come."

(h) the atoning blood of the sacrifices being a type of the blood of Christ, whereby He "obtained eternal redemption (ἀπολύτρωσις) for us," ix. 12 ; comp. Rom. iii. 24, 25, Eph. i. 7, Col. i. 14 (ἀπολύτρωσις, in each case) :

(i) Christ, the antitype, being both offerer and offering, ix. 12, 14 ; comp. Eph. v. 2, Gal. i. 4, ii. 20, 1 Tim. ii. 6, Tit. ii. 14.

(k) When Christ came, the office of the Law was abrogated, vii. 18 ; comp. Gal. iii. 23, 24 :

(l) and God's law was written on men's hearts, viii. 10, x. 16 ; cp. 2 Cor. iii. 11, 13.

18. The argument of the Epistle to the Hebrews culminates in the thought of Christ, the Son of God, seated at the right hand of God, interceding for us, vii. 25 (ἐντυγχάνειν), viii. 1 : so does that of the Epistle to the Romans, Rom. viii. 34 (ἐντυγχάνει).

¹ In the Epistle to the Romans, the Law is dealt with chiefly as a rule of action ; in that to the Hebrews, as a system by which Israel was to be preserved in communion with God. Each of the above expressions, therefore, is appropriate to the persons addressed. The primary aim of the Law is in each case represented as being to quicken the sense of sin.

It is not easy to express in words the value of the above numerous positive lines of evidence. The coincidences which have been pointed out, in the use of words and phrases, in modes of enunciating or illustrating religious truth, in the subject-matter of the Epistle,—would be most remarkable, if they were simply looked at, one by one, in succession. But, in fact, they are so interwoven with each other, as (from the nature of convergent evidence) to preclude all possibility of doubt. The supposition that St Luke or Clement of Rome, Barnabas or Apollos, should, first of all, have so analysed the Apostle's writings as to gain command over this vast array of characteristic words, turns of expression, associations of thought, and modes of Scriptural exposition ; then, have set to work to recombine these into an Epistle which he meant should pass for his own ; and lastly, should have succeeded so perfectly that the Epistle reads like a grand original composition, the product of one powerful mind : this must, surely, appear absolutely incredible. Consequently, on internal grounds, it is nothing less than certain that St Paul was the writer.

We are warranted, therefore, in asserting that the external and the internal evidence conspire in establishing the Pauline authorship of this Epistle.

Since, however, from the earliest times there have been various arguments urged, by men of real eminence, against this view, it seems right that the chief of these objections should be here briefly noticed.

SECT. 3. EXAMINATION OF LEADING OBJECTIONS.

§ i. Undoubtedly, one of the earliest difficulties was the fact that the Epistle had not St Paul's name prefixed.

1. We have seen above, how Panætius and Clement attempted to explain this fact. Panætius thought that as the writer meant to exhibit our Lord as "the Apostle of our profession," he reverentially refrained from speaking of himself as an apostle ; more especially, since he himself had been appointed "the Apostle of the Gentiles."

Clement, again, accounted for it by supposing that the Apostle prudently refrained from obtruding on the Hebrews a name which, he knew, was unwelcome to many of them.

There may be a residuum of truth in each of these explanations¹.

2. A more important consideration, however, is the following:

St Paul had just reached the end of an imprisonment which had lasted four years. The cause of this detention had been a charge, brought against him by the Jews of Jerusalem, that "he taught men everywhere against the people, and the Law, and this place" (Acts xxi. 28).

If then, at such time, he felt bound to write to the Hebrews a discourse like the present², in which he boldly and clearly maintained the abolition of the legal ordinances, how must he proceed? Was it not a plain duty in him to abstain, as far as was possible, from everything that might furnish his opponents with grounds for bringing a fresh charge against him³?

3. The full account of the matter, however, appears to be this. The Apostle's intention was to ground his appeal throughout upon the word of God Himself. Therefore he strikes the keynote of his discourse at the outset thus:—

God, who had spoken to them in old times by the prophets, now spoke by the Son to whom the prophets had given witness.

Then follows a string of testimonies; taken especially from the Psalms, which were continually sung in the Temple. One of these, the cxth, which runs through the whole discussion, contains the most emphatic oracle of the Old Testament,—

¹ As regards the latter, note the apologetic character of ch. xiii. 18. It should be borne in mind, that his name "Saul" had long fallen into disuse, even in Jerusalem (Acts xv. 25); and that the name "Paul" specially marked him out as the apostle of the Gentiles (see note on Acts xiii. 9).

² See the note on ch. xiii. 22.

³ The severity of proceedings against persons who wrote on public matters, under the Empire, is rightly urged by Dr Biesenthal, 'Das Trostschreiben,' ss. 3—19. He adds, "What did Paul lose by writing the Epistle anonymously? His friends would recognize the author and lovingly welcome it, as the poet says,

Ut titulo careas, ipso noscere colore;

Dissimulare velis, te liquet esse meum.

New Test.—VOL. IV.

the word of the Divine oath which constituted the everlasting Priest. Another, the xcvith, furnishes the trumpet-like summons (thrice repeated, iii. 7, 15, iv. 7), "To day, if ye will hear His voice." He, whose voice once filled even Moses with fear, now speaks to us "from heaven" (xii. 25). What reason, then, was there for concentrating their attention on Jesus, their "Apostle and High-priest," their "Mediator," the "Author and Perfecter of faith"!

This sustained concentration of mental gaze on the "faithful Witness" in heaven may well be held to explain, what it abundantly justifies, the withdrawal of the writer's personality into the background¹.

§ ii. Again; it was thought, that St Paul, the Apostle of the Gentiles, would not be likely to write to the Hebrews.

Yet he was most anxious to preach at Jerusalem (Acts ix. 29, xxii. 19); and always, wherever he came, addressed himself to "the Jew first" (cp. Rom. i. 16). For a whole year before his visit to Jerusalem he had been engaged in working out a plan, by which he hoped to show his love to the mother Church (2 Cor. ix. 2). For his brethren's sake he would even have been content to be "anathema from Christ." Of his willingness, then, to undertake the task we may be certain; and, that in actually undertaking it he would not be overstepping the limits of his apostolical commission, is evident from Acts ix. 15. (See below, v. 6.)

§ iii. An objection which had great weight in ancient times, as it has also had in modern², rests on ch. ii. 3. It is said, that St Paul never could have written, "and was confirmed unto us by them that heard it." But this assertion is altogether a mistake. In addressing the Christians of Judea, St Paul could not have selected a more correct way of representing the facts of the case. He had not supplied them with the historical evidence of the death and resurrection-life of Jesus. In speaking to the Jews of Pisidian Antioch,

² It is noticed by Euthalius in the Fifth Century, and by Primasius in the Sixth. It had much influence with Calvin, and has been pronounced by a recent writer to be "decisive."

Paul prefaced his own declaration of the Gospel to them by saying, that Jesus was "seen many days of them which came up with Him from Galilee, who are His witnesses unto the people" (Acts xiii. 31, 32; compare Luke xxiv. 48; Acts i. 22, ii. 32). The passage, therefore, which has caused so many to stumble, is in full accordance with St Paul's known mode of address¹.

§ iv. Another objection, which has had no little influence both in ancient and modern times², was drawn from ch. vi. 4—6, x. 26, 27, xii. 17. None who weigh these passages soberly, remembering, (1) what was implied by men's apostatizing from a Church which had received those Pentecostal gifts, (2) how intensely fanatical the unbelieving Jews had by this time become, will feel any difficulty in them. The utterance of severe truths was, in such a case, a proof of the tenderest compassion.

§ v. It is objected that Clement of Alexandria and Origen pronounced the style to be unlike Paul's; and that so learned and acute a scholar as Erasmus spoke yet more strongly on this point. The influence exercised by these really eminent men has been so great in the matter before us, that it is necessary to examine the grounds on which they proceeded in forming their judgment.

1. Clement supposed that the Epistle had been written in Hebrew, and translated into Greek by St Luke; "whence," he says, "there is found the same complexion of style in this Epistle and the Acts." On this it is to be observed

(a) That almost all in modern times allow the evidence of the language itself to be fatal to Clement's conjecture of a Hebrew original³; which, indeed, even Origen passed over without notice.

(b) St Luke's general style is much more Hebraic than that of St Paul or of this Epistle, and the book of Acts becomes less Hebraic in its second half; that is, when the narrative begins to record the doings and speeches of St Paul⁴. When so accomplished a critic as Delitzsch⁵ has argued in favour of the Lucan authorship of this Epistle from words found in those speeches, it is no disrespect to Clement to suppose that he may have been alike inadvertent.

(c) That there are some noticeable verbal coincidences between St Luke's writings and this Epistle, is true. But so there are between those writings and St Paul's Epistles⁶. The fact was noticed by Chrysostom; who ascribed it to the influence which St Paul's master-mind had exerted on his fellow-labourer.

2. We are able to deal more definitely with Origen's decision; for he has told us the ground on which his opinion rested. He appealed to 2 Cor. xi. 6, εἰ δὲ καὶ ἰδιώτης λόγῳ, ἀλλ' οὐ γνώσει; and he inferred from this passage that St Paul was unable to write pure Greek. Whereas

(a) The words only imply that Paul was willing to concede, for the time, what his opponents had said of him (x. 10): "His speech (λόγος) is contemptible." Throughout the chapter he is writing with a calm and loving, but dignified, irony⁷.

(b) He could well afford to grant that he had given them occasion to think him ἰδιώτην λόγῳ, "unversed in the art of speech"—in their sense of the term. We know that, when St Paul came to Corinth, he deliberately resolved to avoid "excellency of speech (λόγον) or of wisdom" (1 Cor. ii. 1); not to employ the "persuasive words of man's wisdom" (ii. 4); but to "speak in words which the Holy Spirit taught" (ii. 13). In a corresponding sense of the term, we may allow that Paul was ἰδιώτης λόγῳ in the Epistle to the Hebrews; abstaining here from Rabbinic lore (not, certainly, that he was

⁶ See Appendix III.

⁷ So St Augustine and St Chrysostom understood the Apostle's language.

without it), as at Corinth he had abstained from Hellenic philosophy and rhetoric.

(c) If it be needful to bring forward a counterpoise to Origen's great name, we have it in St Chrysostom. He, the pupil of Libanius, and the greatest of Christian Greek orators, spoke with admiration of St Paul's style, and accepted the Epistle to the Hebrews as undoubtedly his.

3. Erasmus,—a man, like Origen, of immense learning,—whose opinion, probably, influenced a large number of both Roman Catholic and Protestant divines, wrote thus of the Epistle to the Hebrews: "There still remains an argument of the most conclusive kind, the style and character of its diction; which has no affinity with St Paul's...The divergence is not only in words or figures of speech; it differs in all features (omnibus notis dissidet)." After the evidence which has been produced above, no comment on this can be thought necessary.

§ vi. In recent times, those who object to the Pauline authorship on the ground of style have greatly modified their position. It is allowed that there is a very striking similarity between the language of this Epistle and that of St Paul; but it is urged (1) that words not used by St Paul occur in this Epistle, while some which he uses frequently do not occur; (2) that the language indicates familiarity with the writings of Philo of Alexandria; (3) that a more rhetorical form of writing is found in this than in St Paul's Epistles.

A few words will suffice regarding each of these points.

1. When Paul was writing to the Hebrew Christians on the relation between the Legal Constitution and the Gospel, it could not fail that his topics, and consequently the terms he employed, would differ materially from those which formed the staple of letters written to Gentile Churches. It is surely very idle, then, to rest any argument as to style on the fact that St Paul nowhere uses the words "priest" or "high-priest," or that the word "justify" does not occur in our Epistle.

In the Epistle to the Romans St Paul uses the word "Law" seventy-five times, because he wanted it; in the Second Epistle to the Corinthians not once, because his subject did not require it. No one supposes that this furnishes the faintest presumption against the Pauline authorship of either of these Epistles.

If the word δικαιόω does not occur in this Epistle, its absence has no bearing whatever on the authorship of the Epistle; for it is alike absent from 2nd Corinthians, Ephesians, Philippians, Colossians, 1st and 2nd Thessalonians, and 2nd Timothy. The term was needed by the writer in the Epistle to the Romans; but in the Epistle to the Hebrews his standpoint was different, and he used the more appropriate words καθαρίζω, *τελειόω*¹.

2. That St Paul was not likely to have been familiar with Philo's writings, is assumed without any warrant. Facts point plainly the other way.

(a) Before his conversion, Paul had been a zealous associate of the opponents of Stephen; among whom were included "Alexandrians" (Acts vi. 9).

(b) During his fortnight's sojourn at Jerusalem, in A.D. 37, "he disputed against the Hellenists" (Acts ix. 29) single-handed. This implies that he was well acquainted with Hellenistic modes of theologizing; among which Philo's was at that time pre-eminent².

(c) Tarsus, to which he next retired, was reckoned inferior neither to Alexandria nor to Athens as a school of philosophy³. He had thus a further opportunity of preparing for future labour by surveying afresh the whole field of Hellenistic thought.

(d) When he was summoned away from Tarsus, it was that he might instruct the Hellenists who had joined the Church at Antioch.

(e) Many noticeable points of contact with Philo's writings, similar to those which are found in our Epistle, occur in the Pauline Epistles¹.

² Philo was an old man, when he headed the deputation to Caligula in A. D. 39, 40.

³ See the passage of Strabo in Howson and Conybe., I. p. 103.

If, then, the second generation of Christians at Jerusalem were in danger of having their faith weakened by an infusion of Alexandrian mysticism, and St Paul saw fit to write an admonitory Letter to them, what could be more probable than that his language would exhibit some coincidences² with that of the writer, who had done most to shape and to consolidate that subtle system of error?

Philo's teaching was, in fact, opposed to the whole tenor of Divine Revelation. He nowhere recognized the need of an Atonement for sin. With him the true High-priest is the Divine Reason (λόγος), which he speaks of as the Son of God; in which the ideal Universe is contained; and which mediates between God and the material Universe. With him Melchizedek is a type of "right reason" (ὀρθὸς λόγος); and sacrifices have efficacy just so far as they are expressions of moral virtues in the offerers. The Levitical system and the temple, as witnessing to such sacrifices, will, he declares, be preserved so long as the race of men continues; being co-eval with the world.

St Paul deals with these erroneous views, as he did with those of the Stoics and Epicureans on Mars' Hill; that is, he supplies the positive truth, which they denied or misapprehended.

3. If there be a somewhat more stately and elaborated style observable in this Epistle, this is only what might be expected from the nature of the case. Many of St Paul's Epistles were written rapidly, to meet emergent needs, while he was "daily" burdened with "the care of all the churches." We are not surprised at finding some difference of style between these and the other Epistles which were written in the comparative leisure and seclusion of the Captivity. But when he addressed the Hebrews there was abundant reason why his writing should exhibit a yet more marked diversity.

He was now putting into form his ripest thoughts on a subject which could never have been absent from his mind for thirty years,—the relation of the Legal to the Evangelical Dispensation. Some aspects of the question had been dealt with in other Epistles; but he was now called upon to supply an answer to the central question, "On what grounds do you require us, Jews, to relinquish that Levitical system, which was ordained by God Himself to be the key-stone of Israel's national constitution, and which has now lasted 1500 years?" We know well with what deep reverence St Paul would in any case approach this subject¹; and the first verse of the Epistle tells us that he meant to look the difficulty full in the face. We cannot doubt, therefore, that he would bring the whole energy of his mind to bear upon so important a work.

He was not only seeking to re-animate the faith of the Hebrew Christians;—though that, unquestionably, was his primary aim, and a very momentous one he would feel it to be²;—but his task was one of still greater solemnity. For, while he addressed himself exclusively to the Hebrews, he was in fact vindicating his conduct as Apostle of the Gentiles; showing that the Gospel which he had preached, instead of derogating from the honour of the elder Dispensation, reflected rays of glory upon it; filling its histories and types, its psalms and prophecies, with a mysterious and wide-reaching significance, which conferred upon them an unimagined worth and dignity³. Nor was this all. For,

³ "Here," says Mr Dale, "in the Epistle to in laying this "Apology for the Gospel" before the Hebrews, he was also providing a store of most precious theological truth for the Catholic Church of all ages; supplying it with an Organon for the interpretation of the Old Testament; and showing how firmly its foundations had been laid in the Divine purpose, which had worked onward in gradual self-revelation from the beginning of human history.

Is it in any way strange,—is it not rather most natural,—that an Epistle, whose aims were so lofty, should have had extraordinary pains bestowed on its composition¹?

the Hebrews, I see an ancient faith, out of which the life has gone, being carried to its sepulchre; and a Christian writer stops the funeral procession, touches the bier, and the lips of the dead religion open and bear testimony to the greatness and glory of the Lord Jesus Christ." ('The Jewish Temple,' &c., 1865.)

² I may be allowed to refer on this point to one or two witnesses.

Dr Farrar speaks of St Paul's address on Mars' Hill as exhibiting "a power of reasoning and eloquence to which they [the Athenians] could not be insensible," and notices "the consummate skill with which it was framed," and "the pregnant meanings infused into its noble and powerful sentences." ('L. of St Paul,' I. 544, 6.) He also observes that St Paul "could, when he chose, wield a style of remarkable finish and eloquence" (p. 623).

Dean Alford says of the 1st Ep. to the Corinthians, that it "ranks, perhaps, the foremost of all as to sublimity, and earnest and impassioned eloquence." He describes 1 Cor. xiii as "a pure and perfect gem; perhaps, the noblest assemblage of beautiful thoughts in beautiful language extant in this our world." "About the whole Epistle," he adds, "there is a character of lofty and sustained solemnity." ('Proleg.' Sect. VII.) Yet this Epistle, it should be observed, was written in the midst of many and pressing engagements (xvi. 9).

Dr Davidson speaks of the great variety of style and diction in St Paul's Epistles, as what "might be expected from the many-sided man, who stands before us. The Epistles," he says, "are wonderfully adapted, in tone and contents," to the circumstances of the individuals or communities to whom they were sent. ('Introduct. to N.T.,' Vol. III.)

We see, then, that the things which have been urged against the hypothesis of the Pauline authorship of this Epistle, are, on the contrary, in perfect harmony with it; some of them, indeed, supplying confirmatory proofs of it. There is, therefore, nothing to set against what has been alleged in the way of Internal Evidence (under which head all these objections fall).

IV. WHERE, AND WHEN, THE EPISTLE WAS WRITTEN.

The expression used in xiii. 24, "They of Italy salute you," suggests to us, where the writer was. For, just as, when St Paul was writing from Ephesus (1 Cor. xvi. 8), he forwarded greetings from the churches of the Asian province, of which Ephesus was the chief city,—“the churches of Asia salute you” (v. 19);—so, if he were writing from Rome, it would be natural for him to send greetings from those who represented the churches of Italy¹.

But, if he wrote from Rome, the obvious inference from xiii. 23 is, that the Epistle was finished shortly before the close of the Apostle's first imprisonment; that is, in A. D. 65.

It is a wonderful sight, which is thus brought before us. Paul, who has been above four years a Roman prisoner, sits surrounded by proofs of the greatness of the city which called itself "Eternal;" but the eye of his faith penetrates far beyond the range of all that visible grandeur, and sees it scattered "like chaff from the summer threshing-floor" (see the notes on ch. xii. 28); while in its stead there is established "an immovable kingdom," of which he and his suffering fellow-Christians are the possessors.

V. TO WHOM IT WAS WRITTEN.

The most prevalent opinion has been, that the Hebrews addressed in this Epistle were the Christians of Palestine; especially, therefore, those of Jerusalem².

¹ The expression οἱ ἀπὸ τῆς Ἰταλίας corresponds in form to the οἱ ἀπὸ τῆς Ἰόππης of Acts x. 23.

² The references to the theatre and the games (x. 32, xii. 1—3) are no way inconsistent with this view. Few intelligent Jews could be ignorant of what went on at Cesarea.

This view is supported by the following considerations :—

1. The whole tenor of the Epistle implies that the persons, to whom it was written, lived under the shadow of the Temple services.

2. To none, so well as to them, would the words in ii. 3 apply. The Apostles remained in Jerusalem for several years ; and James the Just had continued to reside there for thirty-two years. (His martyrdom took place A.D. 62.)

3. These "Hebrews" had suffered persecution at an early period (x. 32—34). So had the Jerusalem Christians : Acts viii. 1—3, xii. 1—5 ; cp. 1 Thess. ii. 14.

4. They were in danger of relapsing into Judaism (ch. iii. 12—15, iv. 11, vi. 4—6, x. 28, 29). Nowhere was this danger so great as at Jerusalem (see note on xiii. 9). The nature of the "zeal," which prevailed among the Christians there, is shown by the fact that they spoke of Paul as one who "taught all the Jews, which were among the Gentiles, apostasy from Moses"¹ (Acts xxi. 21). On such men the deepening fanaticism of the Jerusalem Jews could scarcely fail to exert a perilous influence. The elder generation of Christians was fast passing away (cp. ch. xiii. 7). The younger generation looked around them, and saw no signs of Christ's coming. The Temple yet stood in its glory. Might it not, after all, be the Divine purpose to continue it, for some time to come, as the visible centre of Messiah's kingdom ? If so, instead of provoking the furious bigotry which had lately put to death so holy a man as James, would it not be better to look out for some way of effecting a fusion of the Law and the Gospel ? While the latter contributed the inward spiritual life, might not the former supply the bodily framework ?

No other Church was thus tempted to fall away into an adoption of the Levitical system.

5. The expression, "That I may be restored to you" (see the note on xiii. 19), implies that something had occurred, which had broken off the connexion between the writer of the Epistle and these "Hebrews." Such had been the case with St Paul. When, after long and careful preparation, he had brought up to Jerusalem the offerings by which the Gentile Churches testified their loyal regard for the parent Church,—just as his purpose seemed to have been attained, he was suddenly swept away from the scene, and handed over to an imprisonment which was to last for more than four years. But his deep affection for the mother Church remained unchanged ; nor can we doubt that the warmest desire of his heart was to establish a solid union between the Gentile and Hebrew Christians.

6. There are many special circumstances in St Paul's character and history which make it highly probable that he would wish to write such an Epistle as this to the Christians of Jerusalem.

(a) He could never forget how he had once "devastated" the Church there. Up to the last, when his memory reverted to those days, he felt himself to be "the chief of sinners" (1 Tim. i. 12—15). He could not but long to make some amends for the injuries he had inflicted on the Churches of Judea.

(c) The prophetic words uttered by the Lord Himself concerning him (Acts ix. 15) gave him an assured hope that he should yet be able to perform some great work for Israel's edification :—"He is a chosen vessel unto me to bear My name before nations, and kings, and the sons of Israel." Would it not have been surprising, if he who had written so much for the instruction of the Gentile Churches had had no "word of exhortation" to send to "the Hebrews"?—none, even now when the "pillar" of the Church had been removed and "the enemy was pouring in like a flood" upon it ?

(d) Must not the Apostle's spirit have been stirred to its very depths when he reflected on the circumstances of St James's death? James, the Just, had been put to death by the High-priest, as a violator of the Law;—he, the man who had been so anxious to conciliate his countrymen by observing the Law! Was not the thought of this, joined with the memory of all that had issued from his own attempts at conciliation, sufficient to persuade Paul, that it was high time for him, the Apostle of Christ, to put forth all his powers in an endeavour to set forth fully and clearly the true relation in which Christians stood to the Law¹?

We conclude, then, that the view, which has been most generally entertained, has also the strongest grounds of probability in its favour;—that the "Hebrews," to whom this Epistle was in the first instance addressed, were the Christian Jews of Jerusalem.

St Paul's imprisonment had seemed to frustrate all the loving plans he had formed for the edification of the Hebrew Church. But his enforced seclusion was over-ruled, in fact, to a higher good. He was thus enabled to bestow on them the most precious of gifts; an Epistle, which, taking them by the hand and leading them through the various parts of the Old Testament scriptures, showed them everywhere "visions of God,"—the heavens opened, and Jesus, the Son of God, at the right hand of God;—and then urged them to abandon their reliance on shadows, and to live as befitted priests of the Living God, who already by faith possessed a share in the Kingdom of eternal realities.

About five years after the date of this Epistle, the Temple was burnt, and the Levitical service "vanished away." How inestimably precious a treasure would this Epistle then become to the scattered Hebrew Christians!

APPENDICES.

I. ON 2 PET. III. 15, 16.

As it cannot be affirmed that the writing spoken of in v. 15 is certainly the Epistle to the Hebrews, it has been thought most consistent with reverence not to use this passage at all in the way of evidence. Now, however, when that Epistle has been proved on other grounds to be St Paul's, we not only may, but are bound to, ask, whether it be not the one which is referred to in that striking testimony of St Peter.

The following reasons are strongly in favour of such a view.

1. St Peter, writing to Israelites, speaks of one special Epistle addressed to them by St Paul, and contrasts this with "all his (other) Epistles." Undoubtedly this cannot be understood of any other Epistle so naturally as of this "to the Hebrews."

2. The description, "according to the wisdom given to him," falls in exactly with this supposition. Nowhere else do we meet with so large an outpouring of that "wisdom," which St Paul uttered among Christians of ripe attainments (τέλειοι, 1 Cor. ii. 6; cp. Heb. vi. 1). The very word, δυσνόητα, here used by St Peter, reminds us of the δυσερμήνευτος of Heb. v. 11.

3. Passages like ch. vi. 4—6 and x. 26—31, were obviously liable to be misunderstood, and "wrested" by the "ignorant and unstable to their own destruction."

4. No other Epistle of St Paul supplies so forcible an exhortation to "count the long-suffering of God to be salvation." This thought runs through the admonitory portion of the Epistle. From the beginning (it says) God, "the rock of their salvation" (Ps. xcv. 1), had been inviting His people to "hear His voice." Age after age the call had been renewed with unwearied patience. It still spoke to them from heaven in tones of the tenderest loving-kindness (xii. 25); and He who so spoke would, after "a little while" (x. 37), bring "salvation" to "them that wait for Him" (ix. 28).

The objection that St Peter wrote to Israelites of the Dispersion, while the Hebrews to whom this Epistle was written were probably those of Judæa, is of no material weight. We cannot doubt that a letter written by St Paul to the Judæan churches would soon be circulated among the Jewish Christians of Asia Minor.

The facts, which thus emerge to view, are of great interest.

On the one hand, St Paul writing, towards the close of his career, to the "Hebrews," suppresses his own name, and pointedly refers to St Peter and the Eleven as Christ's chosen "witnesses" (ii. 3). On the other hand, St Peter, knowing that he was soon to depart this life (2 Pet. i. 14), commends the wisdom of his "beloved brother Paul," as shown in his Epistles:—one of which Epistles recorded Peter's own faulty conduct at Antioch (Gal. ii. 11 f.) and Paul's reproof of him.

II. WORDS IN ST PAUL'S SPEECHES WHICH HAVE BEEN REFERRED TO AS CHARACTERISTIC OF ST LUKE.

The following instances are taken from a commentary written by a German critic,—Dr Delitzsch,—who is second to none of his countrymen in learning, acuteness, candour, and piety.

1. In vol. I. p. 104 (E. Transl.) we read, "διαμαρτύρεσθαι, of specially frequent occurrence in St Luke, e.g. Acts xx. 23, xxiii. 11." —But xx. 23 is part of St Paul's address at Miletus. The word occurs in that address three times (vv. 21, 23, 24), as well as in 1 Thess. iv. 6; 1 Tim. v. 21; 2 Tim. ii. 14, iv. 1. The other passage, xxiii. 11, contains the words spoken by our Lord to Paul in the night-vision at Jerusalem; the account of which St Luke must certainly have received from St Paul.

2. At p. 140, ὅθεν, "six times in Hebrews, and in Acts xvi. 19; nowhere in St Paul's Epistles." —ὅθεν xvi. 19 is part of St Paul's speech before Festus.

3. At p. 231, the "construction of περικεῖσθαι," in ch. v. 2, is "found nowhere else in New Testament, except in Acts xxviii. 20." —But these are St Paul's words.

4. In vol. II. p. 31, Acts xxvi. 7 is quoted in support of the statement that λατρεύω is "of special frequency in the writings of St Luke."—But these are St Paul's words; as are also Acts xxiv. 14, xxvii. 23, where the verb occurs. A comparison of these two last passages with Rom. i. 9 and 2 Tim. i. 3, supplies an excellent illustration of the accuracy with which St Luke reported St Paul's speeches.

Acts xxiv. 14, λατρεύω τῷ πατρί Θεῷ (followed in v. 16 by ἀπρόσκοπον συνειδήσιν).

2 Tim. i. 3, τῷ Θεῷ, ᾧ λατρεύω ἀπὸ προγόνων ἐν καθαρᾷ συνειδήσει.

Acts xxvii. 23, τοῦ Θεοῦ, οὗ εἰμι, ᾧ καὶ λατρεύω.

Rom. i. 9, ὁ Θεός, ᾧ καὶ λατρεύω.

5. II. 81, χειροποίητος "is used by St Luke in two places and in a similar connexion, Acts vii. 48 and xvii. 24."—But xvii. 24 is in St Paul's speech at Athens; and vii. 48 is in St Stephen's speech, the report of which is thought by many (see above, p. 7) to have been furnished by St Paul himself.

6. II. 121, ἀφesis is "a term of frequent occurrence in St Luke." Yet St Luke uses it only in places where he is reporting the words of others; and two of these, Acts xiii. 38, xxvi. 18, are in St Paul's speeches. The word is also found in Eph. i. 7, Col. i. 14.

7. II. 188. On the τιμωρία of x. 29 reference is made to the τιμωρεῖσθαι of Acts xxii. 5, xxvi. 11;—both of which are St Paul's words.

8. II. 214. The use of μαρτυρεῖσθαι in xi. 2 is said to be "characteristic of St Luke;" one of the places quoted in support of this statement being Acts xxii. 12;—which belongs to St Paul. The same use is found in Rom. iii. 21, 1 Tim. v. 10.

9. II. 242, Acts xiii. 35, part of St Paul's speech, is referred to as showing that διὸ καὶ is characteristic of St Luke.

10. II. 396. In comparing the two readings in ch. xiii. 18, it is said that πειθόμεθα is "more in St Luke's style" than in St Paul's; the proof of this assertion being Acts xxvi. 26:—which belongs to St Paul.

III. VERBAL RESEMBLANCES BETWEEN THE (ACKNOWLEDGED) WRITINGS OF ST PAUL AND THOSE OF ST LUKE.

The following words used by St Paul are found also in St Luke's writings, but not elsewhere in the New Testament.

ἀδελός, αἰφνίδιος, αἰχμαλωτίζειν, ἀνακρίνειν, ἀναλίσκειν, ἀναστατοῦν, ἀνατίθесθαι, ἀνεις, ἀνοήτος, ἀνοια, ἀνταποδίδοναι, ἀνταποκρίνεσθαι, ἀντικείμεναι, ἀπειθής, ἀπειλή, ἀποστασία, ἀροτριῶν, ἀτερίζειν, ἀχάριστος, βάρβαρος, *βιωτικός, βυθίζειν, διαιρεῖν, διαπορεύεσθαι, διερμηνεύειν, διψάσσης, ἐγκακεῖν (οἱ, ἐκκακεῖν), ἐκδιώκειν, ἐνδοξος, ἐννομος, ἐξαποστέλλω, ἐξαρτίσω, ἐξουθενεῖν, ἐξουσιάζειν, ἐπαναπαύεσθαι, ἐπέχω, ἐπιμελεῖσθαι, ἐφίσταναι, ζωγρεῖν, ἡσυχάζειν, ἡσυχία, ἡχεῖν, *ἰδιώτης, κακοῦργος, καταγγέλλειν, καταξιοῦν, κατευθύνειν, *κατηχεῖν, κινδυνεύω, κραταιοῦσθαι, κυριεύειν, μέθη, μεθιστάσκειν, μεθύσκεσθαι, μερίς, μεταδίδοναι, *νομοδιδάσκαλος, νοσφίζεσθαι, *ξενία, οἰκονομία, ὁμοθυμαδόν, ὁπτασία, ὁσιότης, παγίς, πανοπλία, πανουργία, *παραγγελία, *παραχειμάζω, παροξύνεσθαι, παρρησιάζεσθαι, *περίεργος, πληροφορεῖν, πορθεῖν, *προειπεῖν, προῖδεῖν, προκαταγγέλλειν, προκόπτειν, *προορίζειν, προπετής, πυκνός, σπουδαίως, στοιχεῖν, συγκαθίζω, συγκλείειν, συγχαίρειν, συμπαραγίνεσθαι, συμπαραλαμβάνειν, συναντιλαμβάνεσθαι, σύνδεσμος, *συνέκδημος, συνειδέναι, συνευδοκεῖν, συνοχή, ὕβρις, ὑπήκοος, *ὑπωπιάζειν, ὑστέρημα, φιλανθρωπία, φιλάργυρος, φόρος, χαρίζεσθαι, χαριστὸν, *χειροτονεῖν¹.

we have remarkable coincidences of expression, such as the following:

1. ζέων τῷ πνεύματι, in Rom. xii. 11, and Acts xviii. 25.

2. πληροῦν τὴν διακονίαν, in Col. iv. 17 (cp. 2 Tim. iv. 5), and Acts xii. 25.

3. αἰφνίδιος ἐπιστῇ, Luke xxi. 34, αἰφνίδιος ἐφίσταται, 1 Thess. v. 3.

4. φοβούμενοι μήπως..., in St Paul three times; elsewhere only in Acts xxvii. 29.

5. The expression ἀποβαίνειν τι εἰς τι used in Phil. i. 19 (cp. Job xiii. 16, LXX.) occurs elsewhere in the New Testament only in Luke xxi. 13.

6. πορθέω is used in Gal. i. 13, 23, of Saul's devastating the Church; and so it is in Acts ix. 21.

7. Compare also Phil. iv. 3, 4 with Luke x. 20; 1 Cor. xvi. 9, 2 Cor. ii. 12, Col. iv. 3, with Acts xiv. 27; 2 Cor. viii. 13 with Luke xxi. 4; &c.¹

We are not called upon to explain these resemblances in detail. In general, they are sufficiently accounted for by the long and intimate companionship of the Apostle and the "beloved physician".

¹ St Chrysostom ('in Matth.' H. iv.) assumed that St Luke "imitated his master." Doubtless, two such minds would in some degree influence each other; but St Paul's was the more original and energetic intellect, St Luke's the more receptive.

With regard to 1 Cor. xi. 23 f., Alford remarks: "The similarity between this account of the Institution and that in St Luke's Gospel is only what might be expected on the supposition

The important point is, that the fact of there being a certain resemblance between the language of the Epistle to the Hebrews and the writings of St Luke is no way opposed to a belief in the Pauline authorship of that Epistle. Rather, the evidence of this authorship would be less clear, if such resemblance were wanting.

of a special revelation made to Paul, of which that Evangelist, being Paul's companion, in certain parts of his history availed himself."

IV. ON SOME DIVERGENCIES ALLEGED BY DR RIEHM TO EXIST BETWEEN THIS EPISTLE AND THOSE OF ST PAUL.

1. "St Paul regards Judaism almost exclusively as a Law which man has to fulfil; while this Epistle views it as a system provided by God for maintaining communion between Himself and the Covenant people." 'Lehrb. d. Hebr.,' S. 225.

Ans. It is evident that the term Judaism, as here used, is ambiguous; the Jews of the Dispersion putting forward widely different views from those which were most prominent at Jerusalem. The Jews at Rome, for instance, were not likely to obtrude on their neighbours the claims of the Levitical priesthood and sacrifices; as those at Jerusalem did. Their contention was that through the moral and religious training of the Law they had attained to a state of "righteousness" before God.

The Apostle was aware of this difference, and framed his Letters to the Romans and to the Hebrews accordingly.

2. "St Paul treats the [Moral] Law as 'holy, and just, and good;' but failing through man's sinfulness. This Epistle represents the [Levitical] Law itself as defective; because unable to remove the sins which hindered men from communion with God." S. 226.

Ans. The ambiguity here is patent. There is no opposition whatever between the two views. Neither the Moral, nor the Levitical, Law could "give life" (Gal. iii. 21). Both of them tended to deepen men's sense of sin (Rom. iii. 20, vii. 7; Hebr. x. 3).

3. "St Paul speaks of the Law as placing men under 'bondage' (Gal. v. 1); from which Christ delivers them into a state of 'freedom.' But this idea of 'freedom' is nowhere found in the Epistle to the Hebrews." S. 231.

Ans. It is represented in this Epistle by the term παρρησία; which in Levit. xxvi. 13 stands in antithesis to "bondmen" and "bands of your yoke," and in 2 Cor. iii. 12 corresponds to the ἐλευθερία of v. 17. In ch. iii. 6 this παρρησία is antithetic to the δουλεία of ch. ii. 15. In ch. x. 19 it proceeds from the ἄφεσις, which was procured by the death of Christ.

4. "Paul urges that the Promise was given before the Law and could not be invalidated by it (Gal. iii. 17). This Epistle, on the contrary, says, that the Promise was given after the Law (Heb. vii. 28)." S. 232.

Ans. This rests entirely on a misconception. Our Epistle (ch. vi. 13—18) dwells, no less strongly than Gal. iii. 14—17, on the "immutability" of the promise made to Abraham. The "word of the oath," in ch. vii. 28, refers to the publication of the great oracle, Ps. cx; which took place after the Legal Dispensation had been ages in existence. Consequently, ch. vii. 28, instead of reversing the argument of Gal. iii. 17, supplements and confirms it¹.

5. "St Paul lays great stress on the Resurrection of Christ, while he makes express mention of the Ascension only in Eph. iv. 10 and 1 Tim. iii. 16. In our Epistle the Resurrection of Christ is mentioned only in ch. xiii. 20, while the Ascension is several times spoken of (vi. 20; ix. 11, 24)." S. 397.

Ans. The prominence given in this Epistle to our Lord's high-priestly work naturally led the writer to speak of His session in glory; the thought of which, moreover, was the best antidote to that "offence of the Cross," which continually beset the Jew.

The language of 1 Cor. xv. 25—27, Eph. i. 20—22, is derived from the very same passages, Ps. viii. 6, cx. 1, that are so much dwelt upon in this Epistle.

6. "Christ's offering of Himself is not represented by St Paul specifically as a sin-offering; not even in Eph. v. 2, since the phrase εἰς ὁσμὴν εὐωδίας is never used of a sin-offering." S. 635.

Ans. If the allegation had been true, the more specific reference would have been only what was natural in writing to the Hebrews. But it is not true. The term εἰς ὁσμὴν εὐωδίας is used of the sin-offering in Lev. iv. 31.

¹ This it does in any case; but more especially, if what is suggested in the note on vi. 17 (Obs. 2) be correct.

7. "St Paul frequently sets forth Christ's death as a vicarious endurance of the penalty of sin;—a view which is only alluded to in our Epistle." S. 638.

Ans. The Hebrews knew well that the root-idea of sacrificial atonement (of which this Epistle is full) was a vicarious death. There was no need to enunciate that truth in writing to them.

In ch. ix. 28 we read, "Christ was once offered, to bear the sins of many;" the latter clause being a quotation from Isai. liii. 12. Did any Jew require to be expressly told that that chapter gave a picture of vicarious suffering?

8. "The idea of καταλλαγή is absent from our Epistle; which does not view the death of Christ as a vicarious enduring of the wrath of God." S. 638.

Ans. St Paul's statements are that "we shall be saved from wrath through Christ" (Rom. v. 9); and that "Jesus delivereth us from the wrath to come" (1 Thess. i. 10). This is identical with the teaching of our Epistle; which is, that the sacrifice of Christ is the only means by which any can escape the "fiery jealousy, which shall consume the adversaries" (ch. x. 27). Indeed, the thought of deliverance from wrath is implied in the very word Δάσκεισθαι (ch. ii. 17); see Num. xvi. 46 (= xvii. 11), "make atonement (ἐξιλάσαι) for them, for there is wrath gone out from the Lord."

9. "According to our Epistle Christ's oblation was completed only when He entered heaven;—a representation wholly alien to St Paul." S. 639.

Ans. And also alien to our Epistle; which teaches that "we are sanctified through the offering of the body of Jesus Christ once for all" (ch. x. 10). If this Epistle represents the saving efficacy of that one oblation as being now dispensed by the ascended Saviour, so does St Paul (Rom. v. 10, viii. 34; Col. iii. 3, 4).

10. "The idea of τελειοῦν [as used in Hebrews] is sought in vain in the Pauline Epistles." S. 641.

Ans. Naturally; for it is correlated to the idea of the high-priestly work of Christ (τελειωσις being used by the LXX., where A. V. has "consecration," in Exod. xxix. 22, 26, 27, 31, 34; Lev. vii. 37, viii. 22, 28, 29, 31, 33).

With the Hebrew Christians the great question of all did not present itself in this form, "May we hope through Christ to be accepted as righteous at the bar of Divine Justice?" but rather in this; "Are we enabled by Christ to approach the throne of Divine Holiness as duly consecrated worshippers?" (Cp. ch. xii. 28, 29.)

11. "St Paul [in writing to Gentile churches]

associates the idea of 'vocation' with the ideas contained in πρόθεσις, προγινώσκειν, προορίζειν, ἐκλέγεσθαι, αἱρεῖσθαι, ἐξαιρεῖσθαι, &c.; which are absent from this Epistle." S. 823.

Ans. The explanation is easy. The calling of the Gentiles was a surprising "mystery" (Eph. iii. 3—6), which had been hid in God's "eternal purpose" (πρόθεσις, ib. v. 11); while the Hebrews were familiar with the thought that God had "chosen" their fathers (ἐξελέξατο, Deut. iv. 37, vii. 7, xiv. 2, &c.).

12. "We have not in this Epistle the Pauline contrast between 'faith' and 'the Law,' or, 'the works of the Law;' nor yet the Pauline connexion between faith and righteousness (ἡ ἐκ πίστεως δικαιοσύνη)." Ss. 832—840.

Ans. (1) Since the very same may be said of 1 and 2 Cor., Eph., Coloss., 1 and 2 Thess., 1 and 2 Tim., there is obviously a fallacy lurking under the term "Pauline," as here employed. The fact, that St Paul used the above terms when he needed them, no way obliged him to use them when his subject did not require them.

(2) The fault of the Hebrew Christians does not appear to have been in the way of seeking to justify themselves by their own moral efforts. On the contrary, they were rather in danger of falling into lassitude and νωθρότης (cp. ch. vi. 12, x. 35, 36, xii. 1, 2); and this, because they had allowed their "zeal for the Law," as a ceremonial system (Acts xxi. 20), to obscure their view of the grandeur and absolute completeness of Christ's mediatorial work.

(3) Different, however, as the specific form of their spiritual malady was, the means of recovery is sought in an application of the same principle, which was appealed to in the Epistles to the Romans and Galatians. The prophetic text, from which the oft-repeated ἐκ πίστεως of those Epistles was derived, is quoted in this Epistle also¹ (see above, p. 13); and faith is set forth prominently as that by which all "the righteous men" from the beginning, whose "spirits are now made perfect" (xii. 23), were enabled to "please God" (xi. 6).

13. "According to St Paul, believers are placed in an inward, mystical, vital, connexion with Christ; of which few traces occur in this Epistle. Indeed the expressions ἐν Χριστῷ, ἐν Κυρίῳ, which are so frequent in St Paul, nowhere occur in it." S. 841 f.

Ans. The thought of this mystical connexion of believers with Christ pervades our Epistle; for it is part of its fundamental idea—the high-priestly relation of Christ to His people.

On the day of Atonement the Levitical high-priest confessed the sins of the people. When he put on his usual ministerial robes, the names of the twelve tribes, engraven on his breast-plate and on the shoulder-pieces of the ephod, signified that in his person all Israel was viewed as standing before the Lord; privileged to draw near to Him as His accepted and sanctified people.

What was set forth figuratively in the case of the typical high-priest became a reality in Christ. Accordingly, in our Epistle believers are spoken of as “partakers of Christ” (iii. 14). He is to them the author and cause (αἰτιος) of salvation. By His one offering of Himself they are perfected for ever (x. 14). “In virtue of His blood” they “have boldness to enter into the holiest” (x. 19).—All this involves (for it wholly depends upon) their “inward, mystical, vital, union with Him.”

THE EPISTLE OF PAUL THE APOSTLE

TO THE HEBREWS.

CHAPTER I.

1 Christ in these last times coming to us from the Father, 4 is preferred above the angels, both in person and office.

GOD, who at sundry times and in divers manners spake in time past unto the fathers by the prophets,
2 Hath in these last days spoken

TITLE. In the oldest MSS. the Title is simply "TO THE HEBREWS." See Introd. ch. I.

CHAP. I. In the introductory verses (1—3) a foundation is laid for all the arguments and exhortations which are to follow. God has now spoken to us by His Son, who

(1) Is higher than the angels (i. 4—13), and has exalted our human nature above the angelic (ii. 5—18):

(2) Is more glorious than Moses or Joshua (iii. 1—iv. 13):

(3) Is the one eternal High-priest, in whom the great oracle of Ps. cx. 4 is fulfilled (ch. vii), and the blessings figuratively suggested by the Levitical priesthood are realized (viii. 1—x. 25).

Therefore how attentively ought we to listen to His voice (ii. 1—4, iii. 7—15, iv. 1, 2, 11, xii. 5—29); waiting in patient faith for the fulfilment of His promises (vi. 12—20, x. 36—xii. 3, xiii. 7, 8); assured of His compassion (ii. 17, 18, iv. 14—16, v. 7—9, vi. 20, vii. 25, x. 22, xii. 2, 24), and diligently improving the grace which He bestows (vi. 1—12, x. 23—35, xii. 3—17, 28, 29, xiii. 1—17)!

1. at sundry times] This is only an approximation to the meaning of the expressive, but quite inimitable, adverb used in the original (lit. "many-portion-wise"). The revelations of God's mind and will which were made through the prophets, from Moses to Malachi, were limited and partial; presenting the "manifold wisdom of God" (Eph. iii. 10) in fragments. In Christ these imperfect, and sometimes not easily reconcileable, portions were gathered up into unity. The blessings of the Abrahamic Covenant and the curses of the Law; the Aaronic High-priest and the Priest after the order of Melchizedek; the Righteous Servant of God in His suffering and in His exaltation; these all became intelligible for the first time when they found in divers manners] In various forms, or by various methods; the Moral Law spoke to the conscience directly, the Ceremonial Law indirectly, saying, "Be ye holy;" "Hear my voice, and I will be your God" (Jer. vii. 22, 23). The numerous "visions" and "dark speeches" (Num. xii. 6, 8) of prophecy, and the more explicit teaching of the Psalms, were evidences of the unwearied versatility with which Divine mercy devised expedients for keeping Israel in the paths of obedience.

in time past] Rather, of old. Four centuries and a half had now elapsed since the latest of the prophetic books was written.

the fathers] Absolutely; a respectful way of speaking: as in John vii. 22, Acts xiii. 32, xxvi. 6, Rom. ix. 5, xi. 28, xv. 8, 2 Pet. iii. 4. The writer wishes it to be understood from the outset how entirely he is in accord with the ancient Church.

by the prophets] Lit. "in the prophets" (and so in v. 2, "in His Son"); in and through their personality.

In 2 S. xxiii. 2 the LXX. has, "the Spirit of the Lord spake in me." Cp. 2 Cor. xiii. 3, "a proof of Christ speaking in me."

2. in these last days] In these our days, which are what prophecy styled "the last days" (Gen. xlix. 1; Deut. xxxi. 29; Isai. ii. 2; Dan. ii. 28). Another reading, "at the end of these days," would seem to mean "at the end of this present dispensation;" the Legal period not being formally brought to an end so long as the Levitical priesthood and the Temple continued to exist.

by his Son] Here, as in ch. v. 8, vii. 28, the noun is used without the article, as being virtually a proper name; "by Him who is SON" (cp. the Hebrew of Ps. ii. 12); who by His identity of nature with the Father is qualified to be a perfect expounder of the unto us by his Son, whom he hath appointed heir of all things, by whom also he made the worlds;

3 ^a Who being the brightness of his glory, and the express image of his person, and upholding all things by the word of his power, when he had by himself purged our sins, sat down on the right hand of the Majesty on high;

4 Being made so much better than the angels, as he hath by inheritance obtained a more excellent name than they.

5 For unto which of the angels said he at any time, Thou art my Father's will. Cp. Matt. xi. 27; John i. 18, xiv. 10.

bath appointed] Rather, "appointed;" in His pre-mundane counsel. All things were created "for" Christ—that He should be their proprietor—as well as "by Him" (Col. i. 16). The first clause thus stands in co-ordination with the three which follow; all of them referring to Christ's eternal Sonship.

heir] Sole proprietor and lord.

by whom] Or, "through whom;" by whose agency. Cp. John i. 2, 3; 1 Cor. viii. 6; Col. i. 16.

also] This marks an advance; from the purpose to its realization. He who, in His eternal purpose, had constituted the Son "heir of all things," put forth His creative power in forming the universe through the agency of His Son.

the worlds] The word properly denotes "ages," or long periods of time. Here, and in xi. 3 (cp. Wisdom xiii. 9), it is more fitly rendered "worlds;" without, however, eliminating the idea of time. Whatever of creative power the various portions of the universe needed to be put forth during the long ages of their duration resided in the Son.

3. being] In His essential nature; irrespectively of time. Similarly, in Phil. ii. 6, when the Apostle is preparing to speak of the humiliation of Christ, he begins; "who, being in the form of God." Compare also Col. i. 14—17 (where the order of the contrasted terms is different).

the brightness] Or, "effulgence;" issuing from "the Father's glory," as "Light from Light." (See Additional Note.) The glory must here be the uncreated glory, in which the Godhead has its eternal self-manifestation.

the express image] Or, "the exact impress." Cp. 2 Cor. iv. 4; Col. i. 15.

his person] Rather, His substance (or "subsistence");—His essential nature; in contrast with the "glory" of the preceding clause.

upholding all things] Sustaining all the parts of the universe, or even "bearing them along" in their several courses. (See note below.) Cp. Col. i. 17.

the word] The "uttered word." The personal WORD upholds the universe by the power of His spoken word, which is the continuous utterance of His will.

by himself] For the Word, made flesh, offered up Himself; being priest and victim in one (ix. 12, 14, 26). The words "by Himself" have good MS. and patristic authority, and are in both the Syriac versions as well as the Itala; but are omitted by most recent editors. (Delitzsch, however, retains them.) Anyhow, the sequence of the clauses implies that the work of "taking away the sin of the world" was one to which no creature was equal. He effected it, by whom the universe was at first formed and has all along been upheld.

purged our sins] or (better reading), "made purification of sins;" so as to do away with the pollution which the sins of men had brought into the world. The same noun is used in Exod. xxix. 36, "a sin-offering for atonement." The corresponding verb is used in Lev. xvi. 19, 30.

sat down] As one who was invested with sovereign power, Ps. cx. 1. See v. 13, viii. 1, x. 12.

on high] The words are the same as in Ps. xciii. 4 LXX. (cp. Ps. lxxviii. 18).

4. Being made] Or, "Having become;"—through the exaltation which followed on the completion of His atoning work.

better than] Or, "superior to." Compare Eph. i. 20, 21. "He does not say, 'greater,' or 'more honoured;' in order that none might think he was speaking of Him and them as beings of the same kind" (Athanasius).

bath by inheritance obtained] Rather, hath for his inheritance; in sole and perpetual possession. The word is frequently used of Israel's holding the land of Canaan under the indefeasible title of God's gift.

a more excellent name] This Name includes not only the "Son" and "First-born" of vv. 5, 6, but also the "God" and "Lord" of vv. 8, 10. Comp. Phil. ii. 9.

The comparison instituted between Christ and the angels (i. 4—ii. 18) enables the writer to meet the two most rooted of Jewish prejudices; which led them to rebel (1) against the idea of the Incarnation, and (2) against that of a suffering Messiah. The former of these points is dealt with in vv. 5—13, the latter in ii. 5—16.

5. The angels, as a class, are designated "sons of God" in Job xxxviii. 7 (and so the Israelites, Deut. xxxii. 19, Ps. lxxxii. 6).

Son, this day have I begotten thee?
And again, I will be to him a Father, and he shall be to me a Son?

6 And again, when he bringeth in the first-begotten into the world, he saith, And let all the angels of God worship him.

7 And of the angels he saith,

Who maketh his angels spirits, and his ministers a flame of fire.

8 But unto the Son he saith, Thy throne, O God, is for ever and ever:
a sceptre of ^{† Gr, righteousness,} righteousness ^{or,} is the ^{straight-} sceptre of thy kingdom.

9 Thou hast loved righteousness, and hated iniquity; therefore God,

But in Ps. ii. 7 the title is assigned to one person as His special prerogative. That the person so addressed was Messiah (not David), was admitted by the Jews. Indeed, both the name "Messiah" and the title "Son of God" were originally derived from this Psalm. That the "Son" spoken of in Ps. ii. 12 was Divine, is plain from the last words, "Blessed are all they that put their trust in Him." It is evident from Matt. xxvi. 63—66, John v. 18 (cp. ix. 35—38, x. 33), that the Jews understood the "Son of God" to be Himself God.

this day] According to Acts xiii. 33, the day of Christ's Resurrection is referred to in this passage; as being the day on which Jesus was definitively "declared" to be the "Son of God" (Rom. i. 4), and constituted "the first-begotten from the dead" (Col. i. 18; Rev. i. 5).

And again] The promises in 2 S. vii. 12—16, 1 Chro. xvii. 11—14, are in their nature absolute (cp. Ps. lxxxix. 30—33; cxxxii. 12), and far transcend anything that was, or could be, realized by Solomon; as when it is said, "I will settle him in my house and in my kingdom for ever" (1 Chro. xvii. 14). The overthrow of Solomon's temple and royalty showed that he was no more than a historical foreshadowing of the rightful Heir (Ezek. xxi. 26, 27), who should be both "Son of David" and "Son of God" (Rom. i. 3, 4). Compare 2 S. vii. 25—29 with Isai. ix. 6, 7.

6. And again, when he] Rather, But when, again, He; the "but" having a distinctly adversative power. Not only is it true that no angel can be thought of as holding the sovereignty which was promised to the "Son," but, on the contrary, they are bidden to worship Him. The word "again" thus becomes practically equivalent to "on the other hand."

bringeth...into] The reference is to the future introduction of the Divine King (His "firstborn," Ps. lxxxix. 27) into actual possession of His earthly kingdom. It is the word used, in Exod. xiii. 5, 11 and Deut. vi. 10, xi. 29, of God's bringing Israel into possession of the Promised Land (as their inheritance, Deut. ix. 4—6). This of itself decides against translating (with Chrys., Ambrose, and many moderns)

the world] the habitable earth. The word is the same as in ii. 5, but not as in x. 5, John i. 9. The word is also used by St Paul in Acts xvii. 31, and in a way that throws much light upon the present verse. For, when he says, "God will judge the world in righteousness by that man whom He hath ordained; whereof He hath given assurance to all men in that He raised Him from the dead," he clearly (1) quotes Ps. xcvi. 13, xcvi. 9 of Christ's second Advent, and also (2) places this fact in the closest connexion with Christ's resurrection (which in the text is pointed to by the term "firstborn," see on v. 5). We may infer, therefore, that the quotation, which follows, is substantially a reference to Ps. xcvi. 7; though in form it agrees with the words inserted by the LXX. in Deut. xxxii. 43 (see Additional Note).

7. of the] Rather, in regard to the (and so in v. 8, "in regard to the Son").

spirits] So in v. 14. But the parallelism ("a flame of fire") requires here the rendering, "winds;" which also harmonises best with the Psalm itself. The angels, in performing God's commands, wield mighty natural agencies, the storm-wind or the "flame of fire" (the words used in Acts vii. 30, of the angel at Sinai). They are as the scorching "fire that goeth before Him" (Ps. xcvi. 3), when He comes forth to judge the world. (See Additional Note.)

8. the Son] The characteristics of the "King" addressed in Ps. xlv show that He can be none other than the "Son" of Ps. ii and 2 S. vii; for He (1) is anointed by God (cp. Ps. ii. 2); (2) is exalted above "His fellows" (cp. Ps. ii. 10—12); (3) has an eternal throne (cp. 2 S. vii. 13); (4) is Himself Divine (cp. Ps. ii. 12). Such a throne had been all along set before the mind of the Israelite; see Exod. xv. 18; 1 S. viii. 7; Ps. lxxxix. 36, 37; Isai. vi. 1—5; Lam. v. 16—19; Ezek. i. 26—28.

Thy throne, O God] See note on Ps. xlv. 6.

of righteousness] Befitting Him whose style was to be "King of righteousness" (vii. 2).

9. therefore] Cp. Phil. ii. 9, "Wherefore also God hath highly exalted Him" (lit. "super-exalted;" the word used in Ps. xcvi. 9).

even thy God, hath anointed thee with the oil of gladness above thy fellows.

¹⁰ And, ¹¹Thou, Lord, in the beginning hast laid the foundation of the earth; and the heavens are the works of thine hands:

11 They shall perish; but thou remainest; and they all shall wax old as doth a garment;

12 And as a vesture shalt thou fold them up, and they shall be changed: but thou art the same, and thy years shall not fail.

13 But to which of the angels said he at any time, ^cSit on my right hand, until I make thine enemies thy footstool? ^cPsalm 110:1, Matt. 22:44 thy God] On the day of His resurrection, Jesus said, "I ascend unto my Father and your Father, to my God and your God" (John xx. 17). And St Peter, when about to speak of the power of Christ's resurrection, begins (1 Ep. i. 3) "Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ."

14 Are they not all ministering spirits, sent forth to minister for them who shall be heirs of salvation?

the oil of gladness] By which the Priestly King was consecrated, and which He in turn was to pour out upon His people (Isai. lxi. 1—3). Comp. note on Ps. xlv. 7.

thy fellows] Whom He condescended to associate with Himself by "partaking" of their nature (compare ii. 14). Among them He stood pre-eminent, "fairer than the children of men" (Ps. xlv. 2), "filled" with the joy of God's countenance (Acts ii. 28), as befitted the one everlasting High-priest. (Compare note on x. 21.)

10. Ps. cii is the prayer of one who, amidst the overthrow of the Davidic kingdom, longed for the great event to which Pss. xcvi—xcviii refer;—the coming in of Messiah's kingdom, when He should "appear in His glory" (v. 16), and kings and nations should serve Him (vv. 15, 22). Before, however, that kingdom, in which righteousness should have an abiding home (cp. 2 Pet. iii. 13), could be inaugurated, the heavens and earth, which had been framed to be the scene of man's probation, should "wax old" and be "changed" (vv. 11, 12). His kingdom, on the contrary, should be immovable (cp. ch. xii. 26—28, Isai. li. 5—8, Dan. vii. 14). Though heaven and earth passed away, His word of promise should stand; "the children of His servants should continue, and their seed should be established before Him" (v. 28). To "appear" thus "in glory," to "create" a people for His praise (v. 18), and to receive the homage of the nations, belonged, according to the whole analogy of the Old Testament scriptures, to Messiah. Comp. Matt. xxiv. 35.

Thou, Lord] So the LXX.; inserting the word "Lord," in accordance with vv. 1, 12 of the Psalm. The whole Psalm (as the title says), was "poured out before the Lord;" and the name "Lord" occurs in vv. 15, 16, 18, 19, 21, 22. He, who would manifest Himself in glory upon earth,—of whom, when thus manifested, it might be said, "Thy years are throughout all generations" (v. 24), "Thy years shall have no end" (v. 27),—was the very same that had "laid the foundation of the earth," and had "made the heavens." Cp. v. 2 above.

11. They shall perish] The material world is only as the scaffolding used during the building up of God's eternal temple. When this shall be complete, the scaffolding, being no longer needed, shall pass away.

12. fold them up] So the LXX. (borrowing, probably, from Isai. xxxiv. 4). The Hebrew has, "change them;" pointing to a work similar to that by which, when "this corruptible shall put on incorruption," we shall "be changed" (1 Cor. xv. 51, 52).

13. to which] Rather (as in vv. 7, 8, in contrast with v. 5), in regard to which.

Sit on] Ps. cx. 1; quoted again in x. 12, 13 (cp. i. 3, viii. 1, xii. 2). No created being could thus share the throne of the Eternal. By this verse our Lord finally silenced His Jewish adversaries (Matt. xxii. 41—46). It is quoted by St Paul, 1 Cor. xv. 25; and by St Peter, Acts ii. 34. A later verse in this Psalm is the basis on which the main argument of our Epistle rests. (See ch. v. 6, 10, vi. 20, vii. 1—24.)

until I make] Rather, "until I have made."

sent forth] Continually—ever afresh—sent forth (pres. part.) on His errands (cp. Gen. xxiv. 7; Exod. xxiii. 20).

to minister for] Rather, unto service, on account of. Their office is to act as God's ministers. In the discharge of this their office they are ever performing deeds of lowly, diligent, service on behalf of men who, to the end of their days on earth, are only "waiting for" God's "salvation" (cp. Gen. xxviii. 12, xlix. 18). The words rendered, "unto service," are used in Acts xi. 29 and 1 Cor. xvi. 15, of ministering to the temporal needs of "the saints" at Jerusalem (cp. 2 Cor. viii. 4, ix. 1, 12). So then,—the Angels are God's almoners to His poor human children.

who shall be heirs] "who are hereafter to inherit," or, to obtain lasting possession of (see on v. 4).

salvation] The all-including term, under which prophecy had spoken of the blessings of Messiah's kingdom (see Ps. xcvi. 2, xcvi. 3).

2, 3; cp. 1 Pet. i. 10, 11). This "salvation" would endure after the heavens had "vanished away" (Isai. li. 6, 8).

The emphatic word "salvation" (with which ch. ix also terminates) furnishes the key-note to the following chapter (v. 3, "so great salvation;" v. 10, "captain of their salvation").

ADDITIONAL NOTES on CHAP. I. 3, 6, 7.

3. The word ἀπαύγασμα, which is here used, occurs in Wisd. vii. 26; where wisdom is spoken of as "the brightness (or, radiance) of the eternal light."

3. Schöttgen quotes the Rabbinic treatise, Sohar-Chadash, as saying "The blessed Creator by His strength sustains (or carries, סבל) the worlds" (העולמות, = τοὺς αἰῶνας).

6. The language used of our Lord's first Advent is, that He came into the world (τὸν κόσμον, ch. x. 5); not that He was introduced into possession of the earth (τὴν οἰκουμένην). This latter is to take place at His second Advent, which is the subject of Ps. xcvi. 1, 5, 6; cp. xcvi. 2, 4. The word οἰκουμένη is the one used in Ps. xcvi. 10, xcvi. 4, xcvi. 7, 9. Cp. Introd. III. Sect. 2, § vi.

The word ὑπερύψωσε is used in Phil. ii. 9 to describe the exaltation of Jesus; and in Ps. xcvi. 9 we have ὑπερυψώθη ὑπὲρ πάντας τοὺς θεούς.

6. The words quoted in the text are identical with the second clause of Deut.

xxxii. 43, as given in the Vatican MS. of the Septuagint. (The Alexandrine has υἱοὶ for ἄγγελοι.) The Seventy, by inserting this clause (adapted from Ps. xcvi. 7), meant, no doubt, to indicate that they took the concluding verse of the great prophetic ode to refer to the establishment of Messiah's kingdom. That they were right in so doing, we know from St Paul's quoting the verse in Rom. xv. 10, as well as from his here adopting their modification of Ps. xcvi. 7.

Observe that, in the Seventy's paraphrase of Deut. xxxii. 43, while the commencing words, εὐφράνθητε οὐρανοὶ, are exactly as in Isai. xlv. 23 (cp. xlix. 13), they yet correspond to the εὐφρανθήτωσαν οἱ οὐρανοὶ of Ps. xcvi. 11.

7. Thus the expression "flaming fire" serves to link together the Psalms that are quoted in vv. 6, 7 (Ps. xcvi. 3, מִלֵּהֶם . . . שֶׁשׁ; civ. 4, מִלֵּהֶם שֶׁשׁ). Another phrase in verse 1 of Ps. civ, וְהָיָה הַיּוֹד, is found also in Ps. xlv. 4 (as well as in Ps. xcvi. 6);—supplying a link between the quotations in vv. 6—9.

CHAPTER II.

1 We ought to be obedient to Christ Jesus, & that because he vouchsafed to take our nature upon him, 14 as it was necessary.

THEREFORE we ought to give the more earnest heed to the things which we have heard, lest at any time we should ^{† Gr. run out as leaking vessels.} let them slip.

CHAP. II. Salvation achieved by the Son of God, who is incomparably superior to the angels,—that has been set forth in ch. i. The point next to be expounded (see on i. 4) will be, that, in order to accomplish this work, the Saviour became truly Son of man, and for a while was "made lower than the angels;" humbled even to the "suffering of death." Before, however, he speaks on this topic (vv. 5—18), the writer inserts a practical reflexion:—How diligently ought we to listen to the words of such a Saviour (vv. 1—4)!

1. Therefore] Since He, by whom God has spoken to us (i. 1), is so immeasurably exalted.

the more earnest heed] Or, "more abundant heed." The Hebrews knew how solemnly Moses had entreated Israel to obey the law; far more weighty was the obligation that was now laid on them by the Gospel.

the things which we have heard] Lit. "the things that have been heard;" which God has "spoken to us by His Son" (i. 1). Cp. 2 Tim. iv. 17, "that all the Gentiles might bear" (the Gospel message). So in iv. 2, "the word of hearing" is parallel to "glad tidings."

lest at any time...] Rather, "lest peradventure we drift away (from them)." The verb occurs in Prov. iii. 21: where it seems to mean, to let oneself drift away from an object so as to lose sight of it; as a careless boatman might float past his destination,—perhaps, to fall into rapids.

2 For if the word spoken by angels was stedfast, and every transgression and disobedience received a just recompence of reward ;

3 How shall we escape, if we neglect so great salvation ; which at the first began to be spoken by the Lord, and was confirmed unto us by them that heard him ; with divers miracles, and ¹ gifts of ¹ Or, distribution the Holy Ghost, according to his own will ?

5 For unto the angels hath he not put in subjection the world to come, whereof we speak.

6 But one in a certain place testified, saying, "What is man, that ^a Psal. 8 4 thou art mindful of him ? or the son of man, that thou visitest him ?" ¹ Or, a little while in

7 Thou madest him ¹ a little lower ¹ Or, a little while in

2. by angels] through angels, as agents (see on Acts vii. 53 ; Gal. iii. 19). Similarly in v. 3 ; "through the Lord."

was stedfast] Rather, was found stedfast. It was proved, in actual experience, to be so, by the punishments which overtook the men who violated it (as in Num. xiv, xvi, xxv).

disobedience] Or, "refusal to obey ;" a term which implies high-handed, contumacious, disobedience (cp. Deut. xvii. 12 ; Isai. lxv. 12 ; Matt. xviii. 17). The term "transgression" is more general.

3. escape]—the penalty which must fall on those who refuse to hear God's word. Man cannot be neutral in the presence of God's word. Comp. xii. 25 ; Rom. ii. 3.

so great] If the state of mankind was such that only the Son of God could save them, what hope can there be for any who neglect the salvation which He effected ? Cp. on i. 14.

began to be spoken] He, who was the sole "author of salvation" (ch. v. 9), was also its first preacher ; announcing it both during His earthly ministry (Matt. ix. 35, Luke viii. 1, John vi. 39—58), and more formally after His resurrection (Mark xvi. 16, Luke xxiv. 46, 47).

confirmed] On the Day of Pentecost the Apostles were enabled to testify of Christ in such a way that thousands in Jerusalem believed on Him.

unto us] the Hebrews. The writer had already associated himself with his readers in vv. 1, 2 ; as he does also in vi. 1, x. 25, xii. 1. Probably some of those to whom he was writing had been present when Peter spoke of the things which he "had seen and heard" (Acts iv. 20). Paul himself, the pupil of Gamaliel, was very likely to have been so.

Obs. St Paul at Antioch of Pisidia, in addressing Jews, makes a similar appeal to the testimony of those who "came up with Jesus from Galilee to Jerusalem :—who are His witnesses," he says, "unto the people" (Acts xiii. 31). Cp. Introd. III. Sect. 3, § iii.

4. bearing them witness] Or, "bearing witness with them ;" cp. Mark xvi. 20.

signs...wonders...miracles] As in Acts ii.

22 (cp. 2 Cor. xii. 12). The "wonders" may, perhaps, refer to such cases as the deaths of Ananias and Sapphira, and the infliction of blindness on Simon Magus.

gifts] Lit. (as marg.) "distributions ;" referring to the variety of the spiritual gifts that were imparted (1 Cor. xii. 11 ; cp. Rom. xii. 3).

according to his own will] This clause points to the wonderful nature of the fact here spoken of ; that God should thus have taken men to be fellow-workers with Himself (cp. 1 Cor. i. 1, &c.). Strange indeed ; but He had so willed it,—in pursuance of His "eternal purpose" regarding mankind (Eph. iii. 10, 11).

5. For unto...] Rather, "For not unto angels did He subject." God had employed angels to propound His Law ; but after the Incarnation the angels stood in a different relation to men. Men were now associated with the Lord of Glory as the angels could not be. Such has been His will :—For not to angels did He, in His revealed word, subject that future world, of which we are now speaking ;—that new earth, to which Ps. xcvi refers (see on i. 6), in which God will "make known," in its full development, His great "salvation" (Ps. xcvi. 2). Comp. 1 Cor. vi. 3.

to come] "that shall be ;" the same word as in i. 14 ("shall be"), vi. 5, ix. 11, x. 1, xiii. 14.

6. But] God has not subjected the world to come to angels ; But, on the contrary, to man : as appears from Ps. viii, which speaks of all as subordinated to man ;—to man, who had become inferior to angels, but should eventually surpass them ; being "crowned with glory and honour."

testified] The Psalmist bore witness to the great revealed truth, that here on our earth, and by means of that human nature which is now so humiliated, God would manifest His glory in a higher way than it had been exhibited in the heavens or among the hosts of heaven. Is this future exaltation of man incredible ? No ; for we already see One, who wears our nature,—who endured the deepest suffering of

than the angels; thou crownedst him with glory and honour, and didst set him over the works of thy hands:

8 Thou hast put all things in subjection under his feet. For in that he put all in subjection under him, he left nothing that is not put under him. But now we see not yet all things put under him.

9 But we see Jesus, who was made a little lower than the angels ¹for the suffering of death, crowned ¹Or, by with glory and honour; that he by the grace of God should taste death for every man.

which that nature is capable,—“crowned with glory and honour.” What has been accomplished in Him is a pledge that God’s purpose regarding our race shall not miscarry. As Jesus is already exalted above the angels, so in due time shall they be, whose nature He has assumed.—The argument drawn from the Psalm holds good whatever meaning be given to the fifth verse, “Thou madest him a little lower...;” but is much the more forcible when the proper meaning of humiliation is given to the verb which is rendered “made lower.” (See Additional Note.)

7. the works of thy hands] Including, as v. 3 of the Psalm expressly says, the heavens (cp. Ps. cii. 25, quoted in ch. i. 10); so that the “all” of the next clause is unlimited.

8. For] This looks back to vv. 5, 6. Not to angels is that future world to be subjected, but, on the contrary, as Ps. viii testifies, to man. For, in that (according to the Psalm) God “subjected all” to man, “He left nothing unsubjected to him.” Thus the holy angels will be of lower rank than the beings whose nature has been so glorified by the Incarnation; and the evil angels will no longer be left at large, unrestrained and “insubordinate” (which is the strict meaning of the word here rendered “unsubjected;” see 1 Tim. i. 9, “disobedient,” Tit. i. 6, 10, “unruly”). The “enemy,” who had so long held the children of men in “bondage” (v. 15), will then be “quelled” (Ps. viii. 2), “bruised under the feet” of God’s elect (Rom. xvi. 20; 1 Cor. xv. 26, 27).

But now...] Such had been the prospect held out by the Psalm. But what do we actually see, when we look at man’s present condition? So far as visible facts go, man is yet in a state of degradation. The “enemy and self-avenger” (Ps. viii. 2) is not yet quelled. With the eye of faith, however (v. 9), “we behold Jesus,” the Son of man, already possessed of the universal dominion which in this Psalm is attributed to man.

9. made...lower] Clearly the word here denotes the obscuration of a prior dignity,—the transcendent dignity of the “Son of God.”

for the suffering] Rather, because of the suffering. This clause is to be read with what follows (so Theophylact, Estius, Luther, Calvin, and nearly all recent commentators). The first half of the verse may be rendered thus: But Him that was for a short time made lower than the angels, (even) Jesus, (Him) we behold crowned, because of the suffering of death, with glory and honour. The words of the Psalm which spoke of man’s being “made lower than the angels,” were eminently, and in the most pathetic sense, applicable to Jesus; but in Him (most joyful paradox!) the “diminution” formed the very ground of His exaltation. Compare Phil. ii. 9: “Wherefore also (because He had emptied Himself of glory, v. 7) God hath highly exalted Him.” The position of the Name, “Jesus” (cp. iii. 1, vi. 20, xii. 2, 24, xiii. 20) gives it great emphasis; “Jesus,”—the Nazarene (Acts ii. 22), “whom Israel crucified” (ib. v. 36).

the suffering of death]—that kind of suffering, which belongs to death, which is involved in the act of dying (the noun “suffering” being here intransitive, as in the next verse). The same contrast of “glory” and “suffering” occurs in Rom. viii. 17, 18, 1 Pet. i. 11, iv. 13, v. 1.

that he...] This is to be taken as a comment on the whole scene which has just been presented to the eye of faith. The Son of God had been humbled even to death-suffering, and then on that very account had been crowned with glory. What was the purpose of this great mystery? It was, that so, by the grace of God, He might taste death on behalf of every man. This was the explanation of that strange fact. The arrangement had its origin in the spontaneous action of Eternal Love,—“the grace of God” (Rom. v. 15; Tit. ii. 11). To work out that purpose of Eternal Love,—“the will of God” (ch. x. 7, 9),—was the end for which Jesus became man. In Him the “grace of God” was manifested (John i. 14, 17). Not, therefore, in consequence of some arbitrary decree, hurling against an innocent being the punishment which was due to the guilty, but in pursuance of the “grace” of which He Himself was the exponent, did Jesus “taste death for every man.” (On a various reading here, see Additional Note.)

taste death] Drinking that mysterious cup of bitter agony, which at length issued in death.

for every man] Rather, on behalf of 10 For it became him, for whom are all things, and by whom are all things, in bringing many sons unto glory, to make the captain of their salvation perfect through sufferings.

11 For both he that sanctifieth and every man; so that His death-suffering had beneficial consequences, which were available for every individual of the race. Comp. John xi. 50, 2 Cor. v. 15; where the same preposition is used (see Additional Note).

10. In saying that God permitted Christ to die on behalf of man, do we attribute to Him anything that is unseemly or unfitting? No. If He, who is the Final, as He is the Efficient, Cause of "all things,"—for whom and by whom they exist,—determined to raise many (Rom. v. 19) from among mankind to be His sons, partakers of His own glory (comp. Ps. viii. 1, 5), it became Him, it befitted His wisdom and goodness, to provide, that He who was to be "the Captain (or, Author) of their salvation" should be qualified for His high office "by means of sufferings." The salvation, which He was to bestow on them, was not to be accomplished by an exercise of power merely. The ability, which He would give them to become "sons of God" (John i. 12), was of a spiritual kind; carrying along with it filial obedience. Was it not "fitting," then, that He should exhibit in His own person the type of character to which they were to be conformed (Rom. viii. 29)? Only in virtue of His absolute perfection of obedience could He win salvation for men (cp. ch. v. 8); was it not "fitting" that such obedience should be exhibited in His endurance of that death which was the penalty of man's disobedience? How otherwise could He be in a complete sense "the First-born among many brethren" (Rom. viii. 29)? To secure this end, then, the infinitely wise and good God "withheld not His own Son" from suffering, "but gave Him up for us all" (ib. v. 32). There was no reason, therefore, why the Jew should shrink, as he did, from the thought of a "suffering Messiah" (Acts xxvi. 23).

in bringing] Or, "seeing that He brought." His purpose of bringing many to "glory" had been already intimated in Ps. viii.

to make...perfect] To raise Him to that glorious completeness, which would fully qualify Him for His work (v. 9); and so, to consecrate Him, as the same word is rendered in vii. 28 ("the Son, who is consecrated," and invested with plenary authority as High-priest, "for evermore"). So the word is used in Lev. xxi. 10, "He that is HIGH-PRIEST among his brethren (see on x. 21), upon whose head the holy oil was poured, and that was consecrated to put on the garments" (which were "for honour and glory," Exod. xxviii. 2, LXX.). Cp. Lev. viii. 33, xvi. 32. That we are to attach this idea of "consecration" to the word in the present passage seems evident from the "sanctify" of v. 11. In ch. v. 9, also, there is an immediate transition from the mention of His "being made perfect," to His being viewed as High-priest.

captain] The same word occurs in xii. 2 ("Author"), Acts iii. 15 ("Prince of life"), v. 31 ("Prince and Saviour"). He opens the way, by which His people march to salvation. He advances before them as their High-priest; they follow Him, a priestly host, clad in the "beauties of holiness" (Ps. cx. 1—4).

through sufferings] Through them, because in the endurance of them He exhibited that perfect obedience, by which God was for ever glorified (cp. John x. 17, xvii. 4, 5). Had He ascended at once to heaven from the Mount of Transfiguration, there would have been no such vindication of God's wisdom in creating man or of His holiness in saving man.

11. Wonderful as this Divine arrangement was, yet it was fitting. "For both He that sanctifieth and they who are sanctified are all of one," or "from one;" from one Father (cp. John xx. 17). Infinitely as the Son of God—in His whole Divine-human personality—is exalted above the "many sons," yet is this title "sons of God" no mere figure of speech. They are really "born of God" (John i. 13); really to share in "His eternal glory" (1 Pet. v. 10; cp. 2 Thess. ii. 14). The Consecration Prayer offered by our Lord, before He went forth to "taste death for every man," is addressed to the Father (John xvii. 1, 5, 11, 21, 24, 25; in v. 11, "Holy Father;" in v. 25, "Righteous Father"). In it, speaking of His disciples, He says, "Thine they were, and Thou gavest them Me... And for their sakes I sanctify Myself that they also may be truly sanctified." Compare 1 Pet. i. 3: "The God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ... hath begotten us again to a lively hope by the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead."

sanctifieth] through the efficacy of His all-perfect self-oblation (cp. x. 10, 14). In chh. x. 29, xiii. 12, this sanctification is spoken of as effected by "the blood" of Jesus; so that it might be thought to refer simply to the removal of the guilt of sin, which shut men out from communion with God. But that we are not to take this narrow view is evident from ix. 13, 14; where the "sanctifieth to the purifying of the flesh" has for its correlate, "cleanse your conscience from dead works to serve the living God." Real sanctification implies admission to real communion with God; which can be only through the Holy Ghost imparted by Christ to His people.

they who are sanctified are all of one: for which cause he is not ashamed to call them brethren, 12 Saying, I will declare thy name unto my brethren, in the midst of the church will I sing praise unto thee.

13 And again, ^b I will put my ^b Psal. 18. trust in him. And again, ^c Behold I ^c Isai. 8. and the children which God hath ^c 8. given me.

14 Forasmuch then as the children are partakers of flesh and blood, he for which cause] Because those whom He is sanctifying and leading to salvation are "from one" Father with Himself. The expression, "He is not ashamed to call them brethren," points (as in xi. 16) to the infinite disparity there is between them and Him in regard of His Divine nature.

12. Saying] Ps. xxii. 22. Our Lord appropriated this Psalm to Himself, while He was sounding the lowest depths of suffering (Matt. xxvii. 46). The verse here quoted occurs immediately after the Sufferer has been delivered. In it He claims the "great congregation" (cp. v. 10, "many sons") as His brethren. So the risen Saviour at once on Easter Morning said, "Go, tell My brethren" (Matt. xxviii. 10); "Go to My brethren, and say unto them, I ascend unto My Father and your Father" (John xx. 17). He nowhere so addressed His disciples until He had become "the First-born from the dead." Then, and not before, they were made "sons," "heirs of God through Christ" (Gal. iv. 5, 7).

I will declare thy name] So in John xvii. 26, "I have made known unto them Thy Name, and will make it known;" even that Name, which He had used in His suffering, My God (Ps. xxii. 1, 2, 10); which it was said God's "First-born" would use: "He shall call me, Thou art My Father, My God, and My strong salvation" (Ps. lxxxix. 25, 26). That "Name" had been His support, as it is the support of every one who obeys His voice (Isai. l. 10, "let him trust in the Name of the Lord").

will I sing praise unto thee] Returning thanks to God now, as truly as before He had offered supplication to Him. So fully did He manifest the spirit of filial dependence.

13. And again] The two next passages refer, not to the special statement at the end of v. 11, which has been substantiated by the first quotation; but to the general assertion, "He that sanctifieth and they that are sanctified are all of One." They exhibit (in prophetic type) the "Captain of salvation" standing among those whom God had given him, and professing His entire dependence on God.

I will put my trust in him] The words occur in three places (in the LXX.): 2 S. xxii. 3, Isai. viii. 17, xii. 2. Many commentators suppose the reference to be to Ps. xviii., which is certainly Messianic (see Rom. xv. 8, 9), and in many ways strongly resembles Ps.

xxii (see below). It is more probable, however, that the words are taken from Isai. viii. 17; so that here, as in x. 30, we have quotations from two consecutive verses separated by "And again." It should be borne in mind, that from ch. vi onward Isaiah is to be viewed as the "Apostle," or Envoy, of "the Lord of Hosts" to Israel; and not only so, but as specially consecrated to the office by an act in which he was "purged" from sin (vi. 6—9), as the high-priest was, symbolically, on the Day of Atonement. He stands, then, as the Apostle and High-priest of the new Israel; of those who are God's "disciples" (viii. 16, cp. liv. 13), who worship Him in holy fear, and find Him "a sanctuary," or fountain of sanctification, to them, when both the houses of Israel stumble through unbelief (ib. 13—15). He whose name, Isaiah, signifies "the salvation of the Lord," confesses in the midst of this new community, of which he is commissioned to be the leader, that he is supported wholly by faith in his God. He uses the same language of dependence which is employed by the Church a little afterwards (xii. 2).

Obs. 1. In the hour of deepest darkness He who was to be "the Lord's salvation to the whole earth" (Isai. xlix. 6) received, from those who were putting Him to death because He said "I am the Son of God," this testimony: "He trusted in God that He would deliver Him" (Matt. xxvii. 43).

Obs. 2. In John vi. 37—46 the union of Divine, saving, power in Jesus with creaturely dependence is made singularly clear; and the ideas represented by the two passages quoted here from Isai. viii are both distinctly insisted on: (1) Jesus is the Author of "everlasting life," but it is to those who are taught of God, who have learned of the Father, v. 45; (2) He is the "bread of life" to all who come to Him; but it is added, "all that the Father giveth me shall come to me" (vv. 35, 37).

Behold...] See the note on Isai. viii. 18. In His consecration-prayer (cp. on v. 11) Jesus repeatedly speaks of those who believed on Him, as "given" Him by the Father (St John xvii. 6, 9, 11, 12, 24),—who had also given to Him "power over all flesh" (v. 2; cp. v. 28).

14. the children] Those to whom God promised to be "a sanctuary" (Isai. viii. 14); and for whom the mysterious names of Isaiah's sons predicted a "return" from captivity and also himself likewise took part of the same; that through death he might destroy him that had the power of death, that is, the devil;

15 And deliver them who through fear of death were all their lifetime subject to bondage.

16 For verily ^{† Gr. he taketh not hold of angels, but of the seed of Abraham he taketh hold.} he took not on him the spoiling of their enemies. How was this promise of deliverance and sanctification to be made good? The prophetic word supplied an answer (ix. 4—6). The oppressor's yoke should be broken by one, who should be bestowed upon Israel;—"a child" and yet "the Mighty God."

Already, therefore, in mystic scene, it had been declared that a spiritual Israel should be raised up, to whom, after the sanctuary at Jerusalem was laid desolate, "the Lord Himself" would be a fountain of sanctification. Seven centuries and a half before the birth of Christ, Isaiah had spoken of that "holy seed" as already "given" to him. God's promise, then, was clear;—a sanctified Israel was to spring forth from the carnal Israel. The "children given by God" were "partakers of" human nature; forasmuch, then, as this nature must be sanctified, He Himself, the Sanctifier, "became flesh and dwelt among us;"—"Son" of God, yet "given" by God for man's salvation (John iii. 16).

are partakers...took part] Two different verbs. They were sharers of blood and flesh (corr. R.), which belonged in common to the race. He, of His free choice, took part in these; so making mankind His brethren. He was thus able to perform towards them a brother's part,—redeeming them from bondage to the great oppressor (Lev. xxv. 47—49).

he also himself likewise] Rather, he also in like manner;—with such close correspondence that in all substantial points He was made like unto "His brethren" (for sin is not of the substance of human nature); and so, although He was not, like them, subject to death, yet He was capable of dying.

destroy] Rather, bring to nought; frustrating his policy and utterly disabling him (the verb is the same that is used in 1 Cor. i. 28, xv. 26, 2 Tim. i. 10, 1 John iii. 8). When Jesus by His "obedience unto death" had made reparation to the majesty of the Divine Law for man's sin, the devil lost his power as accuser (Rev. xii. 10), and death, instead of being terrible, became to the faithful a messenger of peace. Sin, the sting of death, being "taken away" (John i. 29), death was no longer able to injure such as were in Christ.

had the power of death] or, "held the empire of death;" seeming to be absolute ruler over this earth, which by his malice he had turned into a "region of death-shade" (Isai. ix. 2). Was not every human being who died, or who, while living, cowered before the thought of death, a proof of Satan's triumph? When Jesus Himself died on the cross, did not the empire of death appear to be definitively and irreversibly established? Yet by that very death Satan was for ever disabled and his triumph proved to be illusory. From that moment "grace reigned through righteousness unto eternal life" (Rom. v. 21). "Jesus Christ the Righteous" was man's "advocate with the Father" (1 John ii. 1);—who could "lay anything to the charge" of those, whom He claimed as His own (Rom. viii. 33), who through Him were "sanctified" (v. 11)?

15. And deliver them who] Rather, and might release all those, who (lit. those, as many as).

all their lifetime] The expression in the original (a very unusual one) appears to mean "throughout the whole of their (so-called) living." (See Additional Note.)

subject to bondage] liable to that bondage, which follows from the sense of unforgiven sin. This description was applicable to many even of the Old Testament saints. They did not as yet possess the "spirit of adoption" (Gal. iv. 3—7, 24).

16. he took not on him...] Rather, He layeth not hold of angels, but He layeth hold of Abraham's seed. The verb is the same that is used in Matt. xiv. 31; where "Jesus stretched forth His hand and laid hold of" Peter, to save him from perishing in the waters. In ch. viii. 9 (= Jer. xxxi. 32) it is used of God's laying hold of Israel's hand, reclaiming him out of the bondage of Egypt. (Additional Note.) The connexion between this and the two preceding verses will, therefore, be of this kind. Jesus took part in blood and flesh, thus becoming capable of death; His purpose being that by death He might atone for man's sin, and so liberate those who were in continual fear of death. This was fitting; "for verily," if we refer to Scripture (to which the present tense points, as in v. 11), we find that such is the character of those, on whom the Divine Saviour lays His hand, claiming them as His own. Those, whom He rescues, are not angels; whose simply spiritual nature allowed of no such penalty as death, and therefore of no such redemption as is effected by a payment of that penalty. Not angels, but "Abraham's seed," does He "lay hold of" (Isai. xli. 8, 9, see the note there); and says to them "Fear not; for I am with thee" (ib. 10, 13, 14). This "laying hold of" Abraham's seed was signified by that typical drama on Mount Moriah, in the nature of angels; but he took on him the seed of Abraham.

17 Wherefore in all things it behoved him to be made like unto his brethren, that he might be a merciful and faithful high priest in things pertaining to God, to make reconciliation for the sins of the people.

18 For in that he himself hath suffered being tempted, he is able to succour them that are tempted.

which God interposed to rescue Isaac from death by means of a substituted victim.

Obs. 1. Thus the very thing in which men were "made lower than the angels," their mortality (see Additional Note on v. 7), was that which made their salvation possible.

Obs. 2. As in Abraham's seed "all the nations of the earth were to be blessed," so He who "laid His" redeeming "hand" on Abraham's seed did thereby, virtually, rescue from bondage all mankind (cp. Gal. iii. 7, 29).

17. Wherefore] Lit. "Whence;" showing that vv. 17, 18 flow from v. 16 in the way of consequence. Since He claims a right to rescue Abraham's seed,—to redeem them as His brethren,—it behoved Him, for the full and effective discharge of the work He had undertaken, to be made in all things (iv. 15) like unto them; not only taking upon Him "the form of a servant," but also submitting "to death" (Phil. ii. 7, 8).

&] or, "become;" through the process of trial to which He was subjected (ch. v. 8).

merciful and faithful] A double qualification: (1) having compassion for the weaknesses of men; (2) and yet faithful (or, "trustworthy") in regard to all that was requisite for procuring reconciliation between the holy God and sinful men. His faithfulness to God, which had been proved by His enduring the extremity of suffering, also assured men that they might rely on Him as faithful to their interests. In Him "mercy and truth met together" (Ps. lxxxv. 10; cp. lxxxix. 1, 2, 14).

high priest] The Greek word occurs only once in the O.T., in Levit. iv. 3 (the Hebrew word there being simply "priest"). Comp. on x. 21. The idea of His high-priestly functions had been already presented in v. 11;

the sacrifice being Himself (vv. 9, 14).

in things pertaining to God] As in ch. v. 1, Exod. xviii. 19, LXX. ("Be thou for the people to God-ward, that thou mayest bring the causes unto God").

to make reconciliation for] In the original, one word; the same that occurs in Ps. lxxv. 3; where it stands for the Hebrew word which is commonly rendered "make an atonement for," but in Dan. ix. 24, "make reconciliation for." (See Note below.) Only by atoning for sin could He restore man to his proper relation to God.

of the people] Levit. xvi. 24 (on the Day of Atonement); comp. ch. vii. 27.

18. He is qualified to be both "merciful and faithful;" for He is able both to pity those that are tempted and to give them real help:—the ground of each qualification being given in the clause, "in that He hath suffered, being Himself tempted." In that He Himself was subjected to temptation, He can sympathize. In that He continued firm under the utmost pressure of temptation, and "suffered" (in the same absolute sense as in ix. 26, xiii. 12), He is "perfected" as the "Captain of our salvation" (v. 10). Comp. 1 Pet. iii. 18; "Christ hath once suffered for sins...to bring us to God." We are not, therefore, to dilute "He is able to succour" into "He has learnt to succour," but to give the word "able" its full force; as in vii. 25, "He is able to save to the uttermost." Compare iv. 15.

them that are tempted] A description of mankind at large; who are all undergoing probation. Yet the thought was one that would be specially welcome to the Hebrew Christians in their existing trials.

ADDITIONAL NOTES on CHAP. II. 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 13, 15, 16, 17.

7. "Madest him a little lower than the angels." The two principal questions are, (1) whether βραχύ τι here denotes "a little (in degree)," or, "a little time:" and (2) what is the nature of the humiliation (ἐλάττωσις) here spoken of.

I. Although βραχύ τι is capable of either meaning, yet it more frequently signifies "for a short time." So it is used in a passage which well illustrates the text,—1 Pet. v. 10, "The God of all grace, who hath called us to His eternal glory by Christ Jesus, after that ye have suffered a while, make you perfect."

The Hebrew word also (נָחַס) often has this meaning (e.g. Ps. xxxvii. 10, Hos. i. 4).

II. The humiliation, or privation, or diminution (compare the strikingly similar 'diminutio capitis' of Roman Law), would seem to refer to man's mortality. This holds good, whether we look to the Septuagintal "madest him lower than the angels," or to the Hebrew, "Thou madest him fall short of God." For (1) in Luke xx. 35, 36 the "children of the resurrection" are described as "equal to the angels" because they "can no more die;" and (2) in Rom. iii. 23 it is said of fallen men that they all "come short of (ὑστεροῦνται) the glory of God" (ὑστερέω in the LXX. frequently representing the word רָחַץ, which is used in Ps. viii. 5). In v. 9 of this chapter it is plain that the "being made lower" must signify humiliation;—a humiliation which involved "the suffering of death."

Both the Hebrew and the Greek verbs are privative in meaning, and therefore not suited to be used of God's forming man originally in an inferior state. But they entirely fall in with the thought of his sinking into an abnormal and degraded state.

8. Two different verbs in vv. 8, 9 are both rendered by "see," in A. V. The verb in v. 8 (ὁρῶμεν) is the common verb for seeing with the eye. That in v. 9 (βλέπομεν) is often used of mental perception (as in iii. 19, x. 25; Rom. vii. 23).

9. Instead of χάριτι Θεοῦ, "by the grace of God," Origen and other early writers, both Greek and Latin, read χωρὶς Θεοῦ, "apart from God." To this various senses have been given—as, "deserted of God;" or, "without affecting the Godhead;" or, "(for all,) God alone except." Theodore of Mopsuestia went so far as to declare the reading χάριτι Θεοῦ to be unmeaning. Yet it is now accepted by almost all the critical editors.

9. The controversy as to whether ὑπέρ, in cases like this, be equivalent to ἀντί, may be fairly solved thus. The prepositions of themselves suggest different ideas; but to die "on behalf of a person" readily suggests the idea of dying "in his stead." This is evident from the use of the verbs ὑπερβλήσκω and ὑπεραποθνήσκω in classical Greek. Thus in Eurip. 'Alc.' 698 we have ὑπερβλήσκειν σέθεν to represent the same act which in 446 had been described by τέθνηκεν ἀντ' ἐμοῦ.

When we hear of "one man's dying for (ὑπέρ) the people, that the whole nation perish not" (John xi. 50, cp. xviii. 14), it is difficult to avoid the thought of a vicarious death.

When it is urged, "that, if He died for (ὑπέρ) all, then all died" (2 Cor. v. 15), we naturally add, "yes, died representatively in Him their substitute."

Yet a comparison of two such passages as 2 S. xviii. 33 and John xiii. 37 may show that each preposition still retains its own distinct phase of meaning.

10. It is observable that

(1) In ch. v. 7—9 Christ's "being made perfect" is antithetic to "in the days of His flesh" (which itself is meant to illustrate His ability to "sympathise with our infirmities," ch. iv. 15).

(2) In vii. 28 it is antithetic to "men that have infirmities."

It is probable, therefore, that the τελείωσις of ii. 10 is antithetic to the ἐλάττωσις of v. 9; and so, as the latter consisted in His assuming a nature that was capable of dying, the former must consist in that nature being transfused with "the power of an endless life,"—the basis of His priesthood (ch. vii. 16).

11. The preposition (ἐκ) is the one used in John i. 13 ("born...of God"), vi. 46 ("save He that is of God"), 1 Cor. i. 30 ("of Him are ye in Christ Jesus"), 1 John iv. 4 ("ye are of God, little children").

13. Psalm xviii speaks of One who was raised out of the depths of suffering, from the midst of the "snares" of death and Hades, to be the "head of the nations" (v. 44);—One, who was righteous and pure before God (vv. 20, 24) and in whom God "had delight" (v. 19); but who ascribed His "salvation" to God (vv. 2, 35, 46), calling Him "My God" (vv. 2, 6, 21, 28, 29), and professing that He would "give thanks" to Him "among the nations" (v. 49).

15. Τὸ ζῆν has this phase of meaning in the well-known τίς δ' οἶδεν, εἰ τὸ ζῆν κ.τ.λ.; "Who knows if that we call living be not in truth death, and that we call death be not in truth living?" Compare also 2 Macc. vii. 9; where τὸ παρὸν ζῆν is in contrast with the ζωή of eternity.

16. The view here taken of the word ἐπιλαμβάνεσθαι may be confirmed both from classical Greek, and by means of the LXX. (assisted by the Hebrew).

I. In Plato, 'Legg.' xii. § 7, the word is used in the sense of claiming as one's own (Liddell and Scott), and in Lysias, 'in Timon.' p. 98 (as is pointed out to me by Rev. J. P. Tweed), it is used in the sense of "laying one's hand on a person in the way of claiming a right to rescue him from violence or imprisonment" (in the words of the editor of the 'Oratt. Att.' "aliquem injectâ manu vindicare et raptori ereptum ire"). It is evident that this technical sense gives a greatly increased force to the ἐνοχοὶ δουλείας of v. 15.

II. The Hebrew verb, for which the LXX. uses ἐπιλαμβάνεσθαι in Jer. xxxi. 32 (Hebr. viii. 9), is רָצַח. This is used in Lev. xxv. 35, where the Israelite is bidden to "relieve" or lay a strengthening hand on, the poor brother (cp. Hebr. ii. 11, 17), whose "hand faileth,"—who is too feeble to help himself. But here the LXX. has ἀντιλήψη, the same word as in Isai. xli. 9. (Observe too that ἐβοήθησα occurs twice immediately afterwards, vv. 10, 13; as βοηθήσαι does in Hebr. ii. 18.)

Inferentially, indeed, the expression contains the thought of "taking on Him the nature" of those whom He would rescue:—for only thus could He be so identified with them, that He could claim them as His own.

17. The word used of the Levitical priest's "making reconciliation" is ἐξιλάσκεσθαι. The word here used is λάσκεσθαι; which elsewhere is used only of God's "showing mercy" or "forgiving," but never (as here) with an accusative after it. In Dan. ix. 24, however, we have the expression ἐξιλῆσθαι ἀδικίας in the description of Messiah's work. It would seem, therefore, that the Apostle had employed a form of words, which befitted only the Mediator between God and man;—on man's part seeking for, on God's part bestowing, expiation of sins.

CHAPTER III.

1 Christ is more worthy than Moses, & therefore if we believe not in him, we shall be more worthy punishment than hardhearted Israel.

WHEREFORE, holy brethren, partakers of the heavenly calling, consider the Apostle and High Priest of our profession, Christ Jesus;

2 Who was faithful to him that ^{† Gr. made.} appointed him, as also Moses ^{‡ Sam. 12. 6.} was faithful in all his house.

CHAP. III. In chh. i and ii it has been shown from the O. T., first, that Messiah was immeasurably superior in dignity to the angels, through whom the law was given; and secondly, that He was to take part in man's nature and suffer in it for man's salvation. Thus He is qualified to stand between God and man; making atonement to God for the sin of man, and sanctifying man that He may draw near to God. In other words, man has in Him precisely what he needed, a "merciful and faithful High-priest" (ii. 17).

Here, then, we have reached the principal topic of the Epistle, the High-priesthood of Christ. Before this, however, is discussed, another preliminary remark must be made. The thought might occur to a Hebrew; "But, granting all that has been urged concerning Christ, must we not still recognize the authority of the Law, given by Moses as God's envoy,—which Law is, in fact, our title-deed to the possession of the Holy Land?" This is disposed of in chh. iii, iv; where it is shown that Moses was but "a servant in God's house," bearing witness to One who should come after him; and that Canaan was only a type of the Rest which is in reserve for the people of God. If they who disbelieved God's word as given by Moses were excluded from Canaan, how careful should we be not to neglect the Gospel message! how earnest in "holding fast our (covenant) profession" (iv. 14)! looking to Christ not only as God's High-priest, to procure forgiveness of sins, but also as God's Envoy, whose voice we are to obey.

1. holy brethren...] members of the family, which Christ, the firstborn from the dead, has sanctified (ii. 10, 11); and who are "called" to be heirs of a heavenly inheritance (ix. 15; cp. Eph. i. 18; Phil. iii. 14).

consider] or "contemplate;"—fix your minds on Him.

Apostle and High Priest]—in one. Moses had been God's "apostle" (Exod. iii. 10—16), to lead Israel out of Egypt and to give them God's covenant; but the maintenance of the covenant was provided for through the high-priesthood, which was for the "sanctification" of the people. The "heavenly" covenant was mediated by Christ; who was not only "Apostle" (John x. 36, xvii. 3), to offer to men the terms of eternal life, but "High-priest" also, to sanctify His redeemed people, and in such wise to maintain their communion with God, that the Covenant of Life should be perpetual.

profession] As in iv. 14, x. 23. It is the correlative of "covenant." God of His own grace establishes His immutable Covenant; but man on his side must assent to, and accept, the terms of the Covenant. At Sinai God had said "If ye will bear my voice, ye shall be to me a special people" (Exod. xix. 5). The people's "profession" (by which they "passed into the covenant," Deut. xxix. 12) was, "All that the Lord saith we will do, and we will bear" (Exod. xxiv. 7). In the baptismal covenant the act that ratifies our "profession" is, the "answer of a good conscience towards God;" which was made possible for us "through the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead" (1 Pet. iii. 21).

Christ Jesus] The correct reading appears to be, JESUS (alone, as in iv. 14, vi. 20, vii. 22, x. 19, xii. 2, 24, xiii. 12).

2. Who was] Rather, Who is; or, "As being."

faithful] Both in revealing, and in performing, His Father's will (John x. 18, xii. 49, 50, xvii. 4, 8).

appointed] Lit. "made;" as in 1 S. xii. 6, "The Lord that made Moses and Aaron." Neither an envoy nor a high-priest can be self-constituted (comp. ch. v. 4).

in all his house] God's house (or household). Quoted from Num. xii. 7; where Moses is spoken of as superior to any of the prophets. They had only subordinate parts of God's will made known to them, and that obscurely; but with Moses God spake "face to face," so that he "beheld the similitude of the Lord," and had a pattern of the true House and Temple of God shown to him on mount Sinai. That pattern he reproduced faithfully in the Tabernacle, which he con-

3 For this man was counted worthy of more glory than Moses, inasmuch as he who hath builded the house hath more honour than the house.

4 For every house is builded by some man; but he that built all things is God.

5 And Moses verily was faithful in all his house, as a servant, for a testimony of those things which were to be spoken after;

structed and fitted up;—"according to all that the Lord commanded, so did he" (Exod. xl. 16—29). The two ideas, "house" and "household," so run into one another, that we may say, the Tabernacle built by Moses symbolized the congregation of Israel. Compare Exod. xxv. 8, where God says, "Let them make me a sanctuary, that I may dwell [not, in it, but] among them." In all the arrangements respecting this household, Moses acted as a faithful steward of God's mysteries (cp. viii. 5, ix. 19). Jesus likewise was faithful in regard of "all God's House;" but this House was the spiritual, "heavenly," Temple, which He built, which He sanctified, over which He is set as High-priest (ch. x. 21).

Obs. 1. In Exod. xxix. 42—46 God's "dwelling" among Israel is closely connected with Aaron's entering upon his priestly functions. So the Church of God, in which He dwells by His Spirit, was not constituted, until Jesus had been consecrated High-priest (Acts ii. 33).

Obs. 2. The history of Israel's "call" to occupy Canaan and of their disobedience (the subject of vv. 7—19) follows immediately after the narrative which is here referred to (see Num. xiii, xiv).

3. For] Consider Him; "for" well does He deserve all your attention.

For this man...] "For He hath been accounted;" both in the prophecies concerning Him, and in God's actual exaltation of Him (ii. 9). (1) In prophecy, it was foretold, that He should build the Temple of the Lord, and should bear the glory, and should "sit and rule upon His throne," and should be "a Priest upon His throne" (Zech. vi. 12, 13). (2) Actually, He has been seated "at the right hand of the majesty on high" (i. 3), in the glory which He had "with the Father before the world was" (John xvii. 5); and this as the reward of His work (ch. xii. 2).

Obs. In Rev. v. 12 millions of angels are heard saying, "Worthy is the Lamb that was slain to receive...honour and glory and blessing." more glory] Rather, "a higher glory" (Vulg. "amplioris gloriæ"); comp. xi. 4 (more excellent), Luke xi. 31, 32 (greater).

than Moses] So in 2 Cor. iii. 7—iv. 6 we have a contrast between the "glory" of Moses and that of Christ. After his descent from the Mount temporary rays of light shone from the face of Moses; but Christ is "the image of God," and "in His face" is given "the light of the knowledge of the glory of God."

inasmuch as] Or, "according as." The difference between Jesus and Moses is not one of degree merely, but of kind. Moses was, indeed, faithful in regard to the whole of that house, which he erected, by God's command, to be the outward means by which God would "dwell" among Israel. But that house was, confessedly, typical only. The true "House of God" was "the Church of the Living God" (1 Tim. iii. 15), built of "living stones" (1 Pet. ii. 5). He who is "the Wisdom of God" (1 Cor. i. 24) had long before constructed that house ideally (Prov. ix. 1); and His human nature was "the Rock," on which He, "the Christ, the Son of the Living God," actually built His Church (Matt. xvi. 16—18). How vast the difference, then, between Moses and Christ!

builded] constructed and furnished:—the same word as in ix. 2 ("made"), 6 ("ordained," or, arranged), xi. 7 ("prepared"). Cp. Isai. xl. 28; Wisd. xiii. 4.

more honour] Whatever glory the house may have, the "honour" of it belongs to the builder.

than the house] Moses was, after all, but one of God's household; though he was so highly honoured in the kind of service that was entrusted to him.

4. For every...] "I say, he that hath builded the house; for"—where you have a house, material or spiritual, you must needs have a builder.

by some man] Rather, by some one.

all things] For that universal Temple which Christ has built, and to which by our "heavenly calling" (v. 1) we belong, embraces all things (ii. 8; cp. Eph. i. 10). The builder of such a Temple must be God. He only, who was "constituted heir of all things" (i. 2), and who "upholdeth all things by the word of His power," could have designed and built that House.

5. to be spoken after]—by the great Prophet of the Church. The "house" built by Moses is called in Num. ix. 15 "the tent of testimony," and in x. 11 "the tabernacle of testimony." This title represented the character of the work, which Moses did as "a servant" in God's house and family. The whole dispensation was ministerial, bearing witness to the future Christ (Gal. iii. 24). Moses, when 6 But Christ as a son over his own house; whose house are we, if we hold fast the confidence and the rejoicing of the hope firm unto the end.

7 Wherefore (as the Holy Ghost saith, "To day if ye will hear his ^{Psalm 95.} voice,

8 Harden not your hearts, as in the provocation, in the day of temptation in the wilderness:

9 When your fathers tempted me, he was preparing to die, foretold the coming of a Prophet to whom they were to "hearken in all things" (Deut. xviii. 15—19, Acts iii. 22); and, after death, he was present "in glory" on the Holy Mount, when a voice came forth from the cloud of light, "saying, This is my beloved Son...; hear ye Him."

6. Christ as] Rather, Christ (is faithful) as son over His house:—the "His" still referring to the "Son;" as "whose" in the next clause evidently does. Christ could say; "All things are delivered unto me of my Father" (Matt. xi. 27). That trust He administered faithfully; being "Head over all things for the Church which is His body" (Eph. i. 22, 23). In ch. x. 21, where He is spoken of (not as "Son," but) as "High-priest," we have "over the house of God;" because as High-priest He represents the people in their relation to God (ch. ii. 17). (See Additional Note.)

whose house are we, if] We are so; and so shall continue, if... Compare the "If" of v. 14, of Col. i. 23, and of the Psalm quoted in the next verse; "He is our God, and we are the people of His pasture and the sheep of His hands: To-day,—if ye will hear His voice." In Zech. vi. 15, after the vision of the "Priest upon His throne" (see on v. 3), it is added; "and it shall be, if ye will hear His voice." the confidence] Rather, "our confidence." It is the same word as in x. 35 (but not as in v. 14 below). In x. 19 the word is rendered "boldness" (marg. "liberty"). It denotes "freedom of speech;" here the freedom which befits children in addressing a father. The Syriac uses the same words (modified) as in 2 Cor. iii. 18, "We all with open face beholding the glory of the Lord;" thus furnishing an excellent comment on the passage. Cp. 2 Cor. iii. 12, "Seeing we have this hope, we use great boldness." rejoicing of the hope] Rather, "rejoicing of our hope;" the hope of the future inheritance in glory. Comp. Rom. v. 2, "We rejoice in hope of the glory of God."

unto the end] Not satisfied with having been brought out of the house of bondage and admitted into covenant with God; but advancing with steady perseverance, through trial and conflict, till we enter the promised rest.

7. Wherefore] The A. V. makes what follows down to v. 11 to be parenthetical. This is in itself unlikely; and v. 12 has every sign of being an independent sentence (the word for "Take heed" being the same as in xii. 25, "See"). It is better, therefore, to suppose an ellipsis (as in 1 Cor. i. 31, cp. ii. 9; Rom. xv. 3, 21); "Wherefore (the case stands with us) as the Holy Ghost saith."—In the Hebrew the clause "To-day...voice" belongs to v. 7; and that this is the right connexion, is shown by the change of person in vv. 8—11: "His voice," but, "tempted me," &c.; the verses 8—11 being, in fact, His voice. The last clause of v. 7, then, is an emphatic statement, at once, of the present privilege of those whom the Psalm addresses, and of the condition under which alone the privilege would be permanent (cp. on v. 6). It re-echoes the words spoken at Sinai, "Now, therefore, if ye will hearken unto my voice" (Exod. xix. 5; cp. xxiii. 22).

Obs. The words quoted from the xcvith Psalm follow naturally on the reference which was made in v. 5 to Deut. xviii. 15—19. Christ is that prophet, of whom Moses spake; hear Him. His household ye are, if ye stedfastly adhere to His promises.

To day] A slight pause is to be made between this and what follows (cp. iv. 7). "To-day" you may claim your inheritance as God's people; "to-day" you may rest by the "still waters" of God's pasture. "To-day;"—though it is so long since Moses said to the generation that was to enter Canaan, "Hear, O Israel, thou art this day to go over Jordan... Understand, therefore, this day, that the Lord thy God is He which goeth over before thee." (Deut. ix. 1, 3; cp. xxix. 10, 12.)

8. in the day] Rather, "as in the day." The names "Massah" (temptation) and "Meribah" (provocation) both occur in Exod. xvii. 7. But the name "Meribah" here probably (as in Deut. xxxiii. 8) refers to the incident mentioned in Num. xx. 13. Since this occurred in the 39th year after the Exodus, the combination of the two names shows that Israel's hardness of heart lasted throughout their sojourn in the wilderness (cp. Deut. ix. 7). It was this "hardening of the heart" against the past evidence of God's love to them which led to their "tempting God," that is, asking for new and arbitrarily chosen proofs of His presence (Exod. xvii. 7; cp. Num. xiv. 11).

9. When] Rather, Where (as in Deut. viii. 15, LXX.).

forty years] In the Psalm these words stand proved me, and saw my works forty years.

10 Wherefore I was grieved with that generation, and said, They do alway err in their heart; and they have not known my ways.

11 So I swear in my wrath, † They shall not enter into my rest.)

12 Take heed, brethren, lest there be in any of you an evil heart of unbelief, in departing from the living God.

13 But exhort one another daily, while it is called To day; lest any of you be hardened through the deceitfulness of sin.

14 For we are made partakers of Christ, if we hold the beginning of our confidence stedfast unto the end;

15 While it is said, To day if ye at the beginning of the next verse. So, indeed, they are quoted below in v. 17; which proves that the transposition was here made intentionally. In effect, this variation supplies a commentary on vv. 9 and 10 of the Psalm:—"as they put Me to the proof continually throughout the forty years (cp. Amos v. 25); so throughout the forty years My displeasure with them abated not."

Obs. It has been often remarked that a probationary period of forty years occurred between the Crucifixion and the "days" foretold in Luke xix. 43. At the probable date of this Epistle (A.D. 64), thirty-five of those years had already elapsed. Cp. x. 25.

10. grieved] Rather, sore displeased. and they] Rather, "but they." They wander, after their own imaginations, in search of happiness: but they have not known (or regarded) my ways, which would have conducted them to true rest and peace. So in Isai. lix. 8 (Rom. iii. 17), "the way of peace have they not known." Cp. Luke xix. 42, "Oh that thou hadst known, at least in this thy day, the things of thy peace."

11. So] Rather, And (iv. 3). The old Psalters, Gallican and Roman, have "sicut" (Estius), and similarly the Syriac. During these forty years, though they hardened their heart against My discipline (cp. Jer. v. 3, 4), yet they found My sentence against them come true. It was even "as I swear unto them" at the beginning.

my rest] The place where He caused the tokens of His gracious presence to abide (Ps. cxxxii. 14; Isai. xi. 10). There the people were to find their rest (Num. x. 33; cp. Deut. xii. 9). Not as though exclusion from Canaan involved deprivation of God's higher rest to such as loved Him; as was made plain by the sentence on Moses (cp. Deut. iii. 23—27); any more than the entrance into Canaan conferred ipso facto the enjoyment of that rest.

12. Take heed] Cp. Deut. xi. 16.

in any of you] Cp. xii. 15; Deut. xxix. 18.

an evil heart] The phrase is used in Jer. iii. 17, vii. 24, xi. 8, xvi. 12, xviii. 12; in speaking of apostatizing Judah. In all five passages it is preceded by the word, which of unbelief] swayed by unbelief. So we read in Num. xiv. 11, "How long will it be ere they believe me?" The word, however, contains in it the notion of "unfaithfulness" or disloyalty; which agrees with the next words, "in departing (or revolting, see Deut. xxxii. 15; cp. Num. xiv. 9) from the living God (x. 31);" from Him who "lives for ever" (Deut. xxxii. 40), so that His promises and threatenings are alike certain. Comp. Num. xiv. 21, "As truly as I live" (LXX. "I live, and Living is My Name"). The Living God had now manifested Himself in His Son. To go back from faith in "the Son of the Living God" (John vi. 69), to trust in the effete symbols of the Law, was to revive in a subtler form the idolatry of former ages.

13. exhort] Or, "encourage;" as Joshua and Caleb endeavoured to cheer the desponding Israelites (Num. xiv. 7—9).

while it is called To day] Or, "so long as the name, To-day, is used;"—so long, therefore, as our probation on earth lasts. Cp. 2 Cor. vi. 2.

the deceitfulness] The wiliness with which it makes its serpent-like approaches (cp. 2 Thess. ii. 10).

of sin] Especially, the sin of unbelief; clothing itself under the garb of a reasonable regard to probabilities as set against God's express command (Num. xiii. 28—33).

14. are made] Rather, "have been made." Take heed to yourselves (v. 12) and encourage one another (v. 13); for we have been already constituted "partakers (see v. 1) of Christ" (lit. "the Christ"), and have a share in the privileges which belong to His body, the Church, if only (cp. 1 K. viii. 25, marg., 2 Chro. vi. 16) we do not sever the relation between Him and ourselves.

bold...stedfast...] Or, "bold fast the beginning of our confidence firm unto the end" (as in v. 6 above). The "beginning of" their "confidence" was, that which they exhibited in the early days of the Church. The word here rendered "confidence" (as it is in will hear his voice, harden not your hearts, as in the provocation.

16 For some, when they had heard, did provoke: howbeit not all that came out of Egypt by Moses.

17 But with whom was he grieved forty years? was it not with them that had sinned, whose carcasses fell in the wilderness?

18 And to whom sware he that they should not enter into his rest, but to them that believed not?

19 So we see that they could not enter in because of unbelief.

2 Cor. ix. 4, xi. 17; cp. Ps. xxxix. 7) is used of that which supplies a solid foundation, and hence, of the realizing power of faith (xi. 1, "substance"). Here it is in contrast with the "unbelief" of v. 12.

15. While it is said] Rather, In that it is said (as in viii. 13, cp. ii. 8). The "if only" of v. 14 is justified by a renewed appeal to the conditional clause of Ps. xcv. 7. Comp. on v. 6.

16—19. The exposition of these verses has been obscured from its not being borne in mind that, although the Apostle is cautioning the Hebrews, yet the basis of his exhortation (as addressed to men under temptation, ii. 18, iv. 15) is of an encouraging kind: "Consider your merciful and faithful High-priest. Hold fast your filial boldness and the rejoicing of your hope. For you are fellow-members of Christ; you have a promise of entering into rest; you have had glad tidings brought you. Only," he urges, "remember that Israel's example proves how unavailing your privileges will be, unless you obey the voice that speaks to you."

For some, of those Israelites, after they had heard, did provoke: but not all they who came out of Egypt by Moses; for in Num. xiv. 29—33 there is a strong and vivid contrast drawn between those who "murmured against" God and the "little ones" whom God would bring into the land of promise. "Not all:" for then God's promise would have been made void: whereas (cp. iv. 6) "some must enter in." But (v. 17) if "not all" provoked, who were they that did? with whom was He grieved forty years? was it not with them that sinned (Num. xiv. 19, 40) whose carcasses fell in the wilderness (ib. 29, 32)? and to whom sware He..., but to them that were disobedient (see Num. xiv. 43, Josh. v. 6, LXX.)? That some fell, was sufficient for the admonition of the Hebrews; yet they needed

Thus vv. 16—19 are in unison with vv. 12—14.

(1) The cautionary, any one of you, in vv. 12, 13 is abundantly justified by the indefinite "some" of v. 16; while the restrictive "but not all" showed that none of "the little ones who believed in Christ" need be discouraged. And

(2) The causes of danger mentioned in vv. 12, 13, "unbelief," "rebellion," and "sin," are reproduced in vv. 17—19.

For a further examination of the passage, see Additional Note.

17. carcasses] Lit. "limbs;" as though referring to the bones that lay scattered about in the desert.

18. believed not] disobeyed; see above.

19. So we see] Rather, "And we see;" or, "We see also." We "perceive" it from the sequel of the history. From what follows in the chapter which records the sentence of wandering, we see clearly that they "were unable to enter in;" were incapacitated for doing so. They made the attempt, but were driven back "discomfited" (Num. xiv. 40—45). This self-willed invasion was no less the fruit of infidelity than their former withdrawal had been. In each case, instead of believing God, they acted in defiance of Him (v. 41). We see, then, that their unbelief not only at first hindered them from attempting to enter, but also afterwards made them unable to enter when they made the attempt.

because of unbelief] This is the emphatic term on which the exhortation in ch. iv hangs. They were not excluded (observes Dr Owen) for their sin in making the golden calf at Horeb, great as that was; but for a sin "that men are very unapt to charge themselves withal," the sin of unbelief.

ADDITIONAL NOTES ON CHAP. III. 6, 16.

6. The reference of αὐτοῦ in v. 6 has been a matter of doubt from very early times. Jerome, who left the Vulg., "tanquam filius in domo suā," gives it, in his Ep. ad Damasum, § 5, "ut filius in domo ejus."—It has been objected that the Church is nowhere called "Christ's house;" but, since He is its builder (Matt. xvi. 18), it may certainly be spoken of as His. The sequence of the clauses in v. 6 seems to require us to refer οὗ to Χριστός.

16. Most modern commentators follow the Syriac version, and read τίνας γὰρ interrogatively, but this involves some very serious difficulties.

1. The natural meaning of "For, who did, after hearing, provoke?" would be, that none had done so (cp. Rom. ix. 19).

2. Some, therefore, have proposed to make a new sentence begin with v. 15, and to render τίνας γάρ as "who then?" Such a use of γάρ, however, in introducing an apodosis, appears to be unexampled.

3. The ἀλλ' οὐ has to be taken in a sense equally without parallel. The passages quoted in support of it are in reality quite different. To resemble them the sentence ought to be of this kind: "For who did provoke? Nay, did not all rather cheerfully obey?"

4. The δέ of v. 17, which has its usual force if the preceding verse be affirmative, is unexplained.

But indeed there is no reason whatever for making the change. The supposed objection to saying "some provoked," arises from the assumption that "all who came out of Egypt did provoke;" which is not only untrue in fact, but would be adverse to the whole tenor of the context. The questions in vv. 17, 18 are equivalent to saying, "It was only those who sinned,—only those who disobeyed,—that were excluded." Compare 1 Cor. x. 1—18; "All our fathers were...baptized unto Moses (cp. Heb. iii. 16 b), and "all drank of that spiritual Rock, which...was Christ" (ὁ Χριστός, cp. Heb. iii. 14, τοῦ Χριστοῦ); "but with the greater part of them God was not well pleased, for they were overthrown in the wilderness." The use of "some" here, and of "the greater part" there, is only in accordance with the design of the writer in each case. The danger of the Corinthians was from over-boldness; that of the Hebrews from timidity. "Some" was sufficient for his purpose here; and his willingness to minimise the charge brought against Israel would help to conciliate his readers, as showing plainly that he had no wish to disparage the work achieved by Moses. We have parallel instances in "What if some did not believe?" (Rom. iii. 3), and "Not all obeyed the Gospel" (ib. x. 16);—those who believed and obeyed being, in fact, only a "remnant" (ib. xi. 5).

Obs. The writer's delicacy and economy of statement are evident throughout this section. How easy, for instance, would it have been for him to have noticed the fact that Moses and Aaron were not allowed to enter Canaan, and this "because they believed not" God (Num. xx. 12); or again, that the commendation given to Moses, the Apostle, involved a reproof of Aaron the High-priest (ib. xii. 8, 9).

CHAPTER IV.

- 1 The rest of Christians is attained by faith.
12 The power of God's word. 14 By our high priest Jesus the Son of God, subject to infirmities, but not sin, 16 we must and may go boldly to the throne of grace.

LET us therefore fear, lest, a promise being left us of entering into his rest, any of you should seem to come short of it.

2 For unto us was the gospel preached, as well as unto them: but ^{Gr. ἡ} the word preached did not profit ^{word} them, ^{heard} not being mixed with faith in ^{Or, ὅτι} them that heard it. ^{cause} ^{were} ^{united} ^{faith}

CHAP. IV. 1. This verse is in closest union with iii. 12—19; from which it is an inference.

Let us...fear] For there is a salutary fear, which springs from faith (Phil. ii. 12, 1 Pet. i. 17—19);—which is the safeguard of hope, and an incentive to diligence.

a promise being...] Rather, while there (still) remaineth a promise. So long as the period of probation lasted, the promise continued in force. All who would might avail themselves of its offers.

his rest] When the xcvith Psalm used these words (instead of saying "the land of promise"), it made provision for a higher application of Israel's early history. They, who were "partakers of the heavenly calling" (iii. 1), knew well what that rest was. They looked forward to the "heavenly Jerusalem" (xii. 22).

should seem] He would not have any of them (through loss of active love or neglect of Christian communion, vi. 12, x. 25) give reason for its being thought that they had "fallen short of" (cp. xii. 15) that promise.

to come short] "to have fallen short."

2. For...] Rather, For indeed we have received glad tidings;—as they also did. A slight pause should be made after "tidings." Let us fear lest any miss that Rest, even while the way to it is still open. For certainly we are in the position of men to whom a joyful message has been brought; as they also were; but (their example shows that a passive reception of God's promises is not enough, for) the word which they heard proved to them unavailing. Compare Acts xiii. 32: "We declare unto you (or, bring you glad tidings regarding) the promise made to our fathers; that God hath fulfilled the same to us their children, in that he raised up Jesus from the dead."

not being mixed...] Or, "seeing that it was not mixed" (so the Syriac). The message entered their ears, but there was no inward faith to appropriate and assimilate it (see Note below). It was no better than food put into the mouth of a man whose vital powers were insufficient for turning it into life-blood.

in them] Lit. "to them;" in their case.

3 For we which have believed do enter into rest, as he said, As I have sworn in my wrath, if they shall enter into my rest: although the works were finished from the foundation of the world.

4 For he spake in a certain place of the seventh day on this wise, And God did rest the seventh day from all his works.

5 And in this place again, If they shall enter into my rest.

6 Seeing therefore it remaineth that some must enter therein, and they to whom ¹it was first preached ¹Or, the gospel was first preached. entered not in because of unbelief:

7 Again, he limiteth a certain day, saying in David, To day, after so long a time; as it is said, To day if

3. For] This looks back to the whole of vv. 1, 2. Let none of us come short of that promised rest (v. 1); for the gladdening invitation to enter it has been sent to us, and only needs that we receive it in faith (v. 2). For we, which have believed, do enter into (His) rest; not, "have entered;" yet "are entering;" as it was said; "Hear, O Israel; thou art passing over this day" (Deut. ix. 1). The "Captain of their Salvation" has already entered; and has opened a way by which they may follow. That is what they are intent upon. By faith they already enter into rest. For both the Old and the New Testament teach, that "salvation" begins in this present life. God spoke of Himself as being already Abraham's "great reward" (Gen. xv. 1); and to all who walked in the "old paths" of Abraham's faith and obedience there was given the promise "ye shall find rest unto your souls" (Jer. vi. 16);—a promise which afterwards received so great an accession of glory from being published afresh by the Son of God (Matt. xi. 28, 29). Indeed, Ps. xcv implied that this rest was attained (in some sense) by all who obeyed God's voice; since God was "their God," and they "the people of His pasture" (v. 7) whom He led by the "rest-giving waters" (Ps. xxiii. 2).

as he said] The words quoted ("as I swore, &c.," see iii. 11) show, that the rest spoken of was one which had to be reached through obedient faith by the men of later times; and it was denominated "God's rest," although His own "rest" had been complete from the time when the world was formed (Gen. ii. 1—3). But if man is to "enter into" God's rest, it must be by his being brought into conformity with the mind and will of Him, who made all things, at the first, "very good;" and who will again "rejoice in His works," when sin shall no longer mar the face of the earth (Ps. civ. 30—35). God's sabbatical rest made it certain that such a period should at length come; for He then blest all His earthly creation, man included. But God's blessing cannot be inefficacious. Therefore a time shall arrive when the curse which fell on our earth shall be removed (Rev. xii. 3). Indeed, they who are "partakers of Christ" (iii. 14), being "redeemed from the curse" (Gal. iii. 13), do already possess "an earnest" and pledge of that final rest in the gift of the Holy Spirit.

4. spake in a certain place] Or, "hath spoken somewhere."

from all his works] From the works which He had made; yet not from working (John v. 17),—especially, not from carrying on that work of "blessing" and "sanctification," of which the Sabbath was a means, as well as a type.

5. again] Almost (as in Matt. iv. 7), "on the other hand." Comp. on i. 6.

6. it remaineth] Or (for clearness), "it still remaineth;" as a future thing, apart from that Rest which followed the work of Creation (cp. v. 9, x. 26).

must] Rather, should. The rendering "must" appears to give to "remaineth" too much of the logical sense, "it results from these premises."

to whom it was first preached] Rather, who first received the glad tidings.

unbelief] Rather, disobedience (cp. iii. 18); the disposition which springs from unbelief, as obedience does from faith (xi. 8).

7. Again, he] Rather, He again (putting a comma at the end of v. 6).

limiteth] Rather, marketh out (ὀρίζει);—moving forward the horizon of His invitation so as to include a later generation in it.

in David] The Holy Spirit (iii. 7) spoke "in" or "by" David. Cp. i. 1; 2 S. xxiii. 3, "The Spirit of the Lord spake by me" (LXX. "in me"). Others take "in David" to be the same as, "in the Book of Psalms" (see Introd. to Ps. xcv).

after so long a time]—when Israel had been 400 years in occupation of Canaan. The promises made to David, after the ark had been brought up to Sion, were like the dawning of a new day in Israel's history. A fresh appeal was made to their faith. Now, after so long a period of failure, they might enter into the full realization of their privileges, as "the people of God's pasture."

as it is said] Rather, "as hath been before said" (namely, in iii. 7, 15).

8 For if ¹ Jesus had given them rest, then would he not afterward have spoken of another day.

¹ Or, keeping of a sabbath.

9 There remaineth therefore a ¹ rest to the people of God.

10 For he that is entered into his rest, he also hath ceased from his own works, as God did from his.

11 Let us labour therefore to enter into that rest, lest any man fall after the same example of ¹ unbelief.

12 For the word of God is quick,

* 8. For] David "after so long a time" addressed the men of his generation in language like that which Moses had used to those who were "passing over Jordan" under Joshua (see on iii. 7). This is not surprising: For Israel's occupation of Canaan did not bestow on them "that Rest" of God which is in reserve for the faithful.

Jesus] Rather, Joshua (cp. Acts vii. 45). It was true that under Joshua the Lord had given Israel "rest" from all their enemies round about (Josh. xi. 23, xxi. 44). But it was plain that this was not the chief aim set before Israel; or we should not find David, four centuries later, warning the people against forfeiting the "rest" which was offered to them. That must have been a further and higher rest.

9. There remaineth] Or (v. 6), "There still remaineth;"—is still to be looked for hereafter, over and above that rest in the land of Canaan. This inference follows, since the Holy Ghost speaks in the Psalm (cp. iii. 7) to us. "For the word of God is living," and has present relation to us (vv. 12, 13).

a rest] Rather, a sabbath-rest; lit. "a keeping of sabbath;" when the "people of God" (cp. Ps. xcv. 7, c. 3; ch. xi. 16, 25), the "Israel of God" (Gal. vi. 16), shall obtain rest from all that trouble them (2 Thess. i. 7), and when "all enemies shall be put under the feet of" Jesus (i. 13), the "Captain" of the Lord's Host (cp. ii. 8, 9). Then, at last, the faithful shall "enter into the joy of their Lord" (Matt. xxv. 21, 23).

Obs. 1. The word "Sabbath-rest" may contain a reference to the first Sabbatical year, which was kept by Joshua after his six years of war (Josh. xiv. 10); when the "land had rest from war" (ib. 15).

Obs. 2. The group of Psalms, to which Ps. xcv belongs (xcii—civ), appears to have a Sabbatical character. The first of them is expressly headed "A Song for the Sabbath-Day;" and a Jewish treatise (Eliyahu Rabba quoted here by Delitzsch) says of this title: "The Sabbath pointed to is that which will give rest from the sin which now rules in the world, the world's Seventh Day [a Sabbatical millennium]; which shall be followed by the after-Sabbath of the world to come, wherein is no more death, nor sin, nor punishment of sin; but only enjoyment of the wisdom and knowledge of God."

10. For] The rest which awaits the people of God is rightly called a Sabbath-keeping; For he that (=every one that, Rom. vi. 7) is entered into His (God's) rest, hath rested (as in v. 4) from his works, even as God did from His own. Such a one "rests from his labours" (Rev. xiv. 3). "Thenceforth there is laid up for him the crown of righteousness" (2 Tim. iv. 8). The "good works" of God's new creation (in working which the believer's will was in accord with the grace of God, Phil. ii. 12, 13) are then completed. He ceases from working, even as God did when His works were finished (Gen. ii. 1, 2).

Obs. So He, from whom the "many sons" derive their sanctification (ii. 10, 11), and to whom they are conformed (Rom. viii. 29), before He entered into His brief sabbath-day rest, said, "It is finished" (John xix. 30, cp. xvii. 4).

11. labour] Rather, give diligence (as in 2 Pet. i. 10).

fall] Used absolutely, as in Rom. xi. 11, 1 Cor. x. 12.

example] Or, "pattern;" typical form. Though the revelation given us be so much more glorious, yet our probation is analogous to theirs.

unbelief] Rather, disobedience (v. 6).

12. For] I say, the same typical form; For the word of God, which tries us, as it tried them (v. 2), has to do with the interior principles of action; searching into men's hearts to see whether they are truly obeying God.

the word of God] Not (as in Rev. xix. 13) the personal Word; to whom, indeed, the description, "sharper than any two-edged sword," is not appropriate (see Rev. i. 16, xix. 15; cp. Wisd. xviii. 15); but, as in John xii. 48, that word which is the abiding expression of the mind and will of God (Isai. xl. 8, 1 Pet. i. 25, Tit. i. 2, 3; cp. note on v. 2); and in particular the word of promise (v. 2). The promise of "good things to come" searched out the motives of men in old times; it does so still.

quick] Rather, living. That word did not speak to one generation and then die out. The "word" of the "living God" could not become a dead letter. As His creative word continues immanent in the natural world from age to age, so does His word of Promise in and powerful, and sharper than any twoedged sword, piercing even to the dividing asunder of soul and spirit, and of the joints and marrow, and is a discerner of the thoughts and intents of the heart.

13 Neither is there any creature that is not manifest in his sight: but all things are naked and opened unto the eyes of him with whom we have to do.

14 Seeing then that we have a great high priest, that is passed into the heavens, Jesus the Son of God, let us hold fast our profession.

15 For we have not an high priest which cannot be touched with the feeling of our infirmities; but was in powerful] Rather, active; effective in operation (cp. 1 Thess. ii. 13).

sharper] So sharp is it, that it dissects the whole inward nature; not only "to the disparting of the soul and the spirit," but so as to reach the most hidden parts of both,—yes (by a bold metaphor), their vertebrae and spinal marrow (see Additional Note). The message of Revelation lays bare the various affections and habitudes of the spiritual and psychical natures.

a discerner of] "able to discriminate" their character with judicial accuracy. Cp. John xii. 48.

thoughts and intents...] Its busy, anxious, revolvings of thought (cp. Matt. ix. 4, xii. 25), and its fixed and settled modes, or lines, of thought.

13. The sentence, which in its first part had described the "word" of God, now proceeds to speak of God Himself.

naked] The sophisms, with which men think to cloke their misdoings, are of no avail before Him (Gen. iii. 8—11).

opened] Or, "exposed;" lit. "with the neck bent back." A naked man may bend down his head and cover his face with his hands. Not even this last resort of shame may avail at the Great Tribunal.—Many ancient writers suppose that the word contains a reference to animals, whose head was thrown back when they were to be slaughtered. But there seems to be no adequate philological ground for this.

the eyes of him] Rather, His eyes; with a slight pause after it; giving still more of impressive solemnity to the concluding words.

with whom we have to do] The words are taken by the Syriac, and by most ancient commentators to mean, "unto whom we must give account." But their range is both wider and deeper: "with whom our concern is;" which is well expressed by A. V. They, to whom the word of God has come, cannot avoid adopting a certain attitude towards it; accepting or refusing its conditions: and this determines their actual relation to God. The thought of our relation to God, which in ii.

17 had occurred in connexion with the high-priestly office of Jesus, prepares the way for a return to the consideration of that subject.

14. Seeing...] Rather, Having, therefore (as in x. 19). In iii. 1 he had asked them to contemplate "the Apostle and High-priest" of their profession. The comparison which had been instituted between His Apostolic dignity and that of Moses had led the writer to trace out the terrible consequences which must follow from refusing to "hear His voice,"—that soul-and-spirit-searching voice. Now, therefore, he can proceed to speak of the provision which has been made for the comfort of all faithful souls in our Lord's high-priestly functions.

great high priest] As transcendently exalted in His high-priestly, as He is in His apostolic, office. Comp. xiii. 20.

is passed into] Rather, hath passed through (as in 1 Cor. xvi. 5). Jesus passed through the created heavens into "heaven itself" (ix. 24); as the high-priest of Israel passed through the Holy Place into the Holy of Holies, in which God's symbolic "resting-place" was (see on iii. 11). There, then, in heaven is God's true "Rest;" into which we, by our "heavenly calling" (iii. 1), are invited to enter. There our compassionate High-priest is already seated, making the "throne of majesty" (i. 3) to be a "throne of grace" (v. 15).

Jesus] Typified by him (v. 8) who led Israel into Canaan; but incomparably mightier, for He is the Son of God.

our profession] By which we vowed that our relation to God should be that of willing service (cp. on iii. 1).

15. we have not...] as might have been feared, if we looked only at His greatness.

be touched...] Or, "have compassion on" (as in x. 34).

infirmities] v. 2, vii. 28; the weaknesses incident to our frail humanity (comp. 2 Cor. xii. 5, 10). All these Jesus took upon Him (Matt. viii. 17; cp. 2 Cor. xiii. 4).

but was] Rather, "but one that hath been."

like as we are] Lit. "in the way of resemblance" (cp. ii. 14, 17).

all points tempted like as we are, yet without sin.

16 Let us therefore come boldly unto the throne of grace, that we may obtain mercy, and find grace to help in time of need.

yet without sin] This is a material part of the consolation which is here suggested. Jesus was tried by the Tempter to the utmost; but, though His human soul understood the full force of the motives which were presented to it, to draw Him into sin, He remained entirely apart from sin (as in ix. 28). There was no vulnerable point in Him (John xiv. 30). He was tempted; therefore He can have sympathy. He was sinless; therefore He is fitted to be our Advocate.

16. come (vii. 25)] or, as in x. 22, "draw near;" approaching as accepted worshippers.

boldly] Lit. "with freedom of speech"

(as in iii. 6); not fearing to confess our weaknesses.

the throne of grace] Symbolized by the Mercy-seat, on which the God of Israel sate enthroned between the Cherubim (cp. on Isai. xvi. 5). Thence we may receive mercy for the forgiveness of our sins, and also may find grace, to "establish our hearts" (xiii. 9) that we may "serve God acceptably" (ch. xii. 28), in spite of our infirmities (2 Cor. xii. 9).

to help in time of need] A good rendering, though somewhat free. Lit. "for seasonable help;" with a reference to Ps. ix. 9, where the LXX. has, "a helper in seasonable times in trouble."

ADDITIONAL NOTES ON CHAP. IV. 2, 12.

2. The ἀκοή here, following upon εὐαγγελισμένοι, must be taken in the sense of "message," or "report;" as in Isai. lii. 7, "that publisheth the message (εὐαγγελίζομένου ἀκοήν) of peace." Cp. Isai. liii. 1; which in Rom. x. 15, 16 is coupled by St Paul with the passage just quoted. The phrase λόγος ἀκοῆς occurs also in 1 Thess. ii. 13; and the "word of hearing" is there asserted to be "in truth the word of God (λόγον Θεοῦ), which worketh effectually (ἐνεργεῖται) in them that believe;" a passage which illustrates v. 12, ὁ λόγος τοῦ Θεοῦ... ἐνεργής.

2. The word rendered "mixed" is twice used by Greek poets in a manner which illustrates its use here.

Πενία δὲ συγκεραθεῖσα δυσσεβεῖ τρόπῳ.
(Soph. 'Fr.' 681.)

Τὴν τοῦ λόγου μὲν δύναμιν οὐκ ἐπίφθορον, ἦθει δὲ χρηστῷ συγκεκραμένην, ἔχειν.
(Menander, ap. Stob. XLV. 8.)

Both passages speak of something entering into combination with a man's moral character, and being thereby modified in its action.

Instead of the received reading, συγκεκραμένος (supported by the Peshito and Itala), the great majority of MSS. (including A, B, C, D, but not K) have συγκεκραμένους or συγκεκρασμένους ("because they were not mingled by faith with those who heard it"). This variation has the support of the Coptic, Æthiopic, and Armenian versions; and of Irenæus, Theodorus, Chrys., and Theodoret. Yet it is rejected by Tischendorf, De Wette, Lünemann, Delitzsch, Moll, Riehm, and others. The usage of the verb (see above) and the whole tenor of the context conspire to show that the Received Text is correct.

12. For the reference of the clause ἀρμῶν τε καὶ μυελῶν to the spinal vertebræ, cp. Hom. 'Il.' xx. 483. For a metaphorical application of the word μυελός see Eurip. 'Hipp.' 255 (καὶ μὴ πρὸς ἄκρον μυελὸν ψυχῆς).

CHAPTER V.

1 The authority and honour of our Saviour's priesthood. 11 Negligence in the knowledge thereof is reprov'd.

FOR every high priest taken from among men is ordained for men in things pertaining to God, that he

CHAP. V. The subject introduced in iv. 14—16,—our Lord's qualification for acting as our High-priest,—is now more formally discussed. The idea embodied in the high-priest of Israel was that of one who was (1) empowered by God (2) to represent the people in their relation to Himself, and to make atonement for their sins; but who (3) in spite of this elevation was fitted for dealing gently with them that went astray, because he himself was "encompassed with infirmities." This whole idea, which is set forth in vv. 1—4, was perfectly realized in Jesus. He was appointed by God (vv. 5, 6); He passed through the deepest experience of human suffering (vv. 7, 8); He was constituted the "author of eternal salvation to all that obey Him" (v. 9). The particular way in which this "salvation" was effected (corresponding to the "offering for sins" of v. 3) is explained may offer both gifts and sacrifices for sins:

Or, can reasonably say with.

2 Who ^{can} have compassion on the ignorant, and on them that are out of the way; for that he himself also is compassed with infirmity.

3 And by reason hereof he ought, as for the people, so also for himself, to offer for sins.

4 And no man taketh this honour unto himself, but he that is called of God, as was Aaron.

5 So also Christ glorified not himself to be made an high priest; but he that said unto him, Thou art my Son, to day have I begotten thee.

6 As he saith also in another place, Thou art a priest for ever after the order of Melchisedec.

7 Who in the days of his flesh, in chh. viii—x; after ch. vii has first exhibited the superiority of Christ's priesthood to that of Aaron.

1. every high priest] under the Law;—Aaron and his descendants (viii. 3).

taken] Rather, being taken. This is the first point to which attention is called;—he is taken from among men. The command given to Moses was: "Take thou unto thee Aaron, thy brother... from among the children of Israel" (Exod. xxviii. 1). Cp. vii. 28.

ordained for men] Or, "appointed on the behalf of men;" to represent them in their relation to God (cp. ii. 17). This representative character of the high-priest was signified by the twelve precious stones upon the breast-plate, and by the names engraven on the shoulder-pieces of the ephod (Exod. xxviii. 12, 21).

gifts] The word is used of oblations in general; so that it includes burnt-offerings (Lev. i. 2, 3), meal-offerings (ib. ii. 1, 4), and peace-offerings (ib. iii. 1, 2): comp. ch. viii. 3, ix. 9. Here, in contrast with "sacrifices," it may be taken to denote the meal-offerings and incense.

2. have compassion on] "deal gently (or, forbearingly) with." Standing before God, he admits the full demerit of his and the people's sins;—in his dealings with man, he is ready to make all reasonable allowance for those who are in ignorance or error. The sin-offering of the Law was for those who sinned "through ignorance," from inadvertence or under a misapprehension (Lev. iv. 2, v. 17). The "erring" are those who have "gone astray" from God's ways (Ps. cxix. 176), yet not deliberately;—not as "heart-wanderers" (Ps. xcv. 10).

Obs. The first intercession offered by the great High-priest was for those who "knew not what they did" (Luke xxiii. 34; cp. Acts iii. 17; 1 Cor. ii. 8; 1 Tim. i. 13).

compassed]—as with bonds (Acts xxviii. 20). Underneath the gorgeous robes of office there were still the galling chains of the flesh.

3. At the end of v. 2 there should be only a comma;—for that he also is compassed with infirmity, and because thereof is required, on the Day of Atonement (Lev. xvi. 6—14), first of all to make atonement for his own sins.

4. honour] Or, "office." The words, "to himself," are emphatic;—amounting to, "by his own act;" as a thing to which he has a personal claim: (see Note below).

but he that is...] or (according to a better reading), but (only) when he is called by God.

5. Christ] "the Christ" (as in iii. 14). He who, at His baptism, was "anointed with the Holy Ghost" (Acts x. 38) and declared to be the Son of God, did not "glorify Himself," nor ascend at once out of the waters of Jordan to heavenly glory. No: He awaited His Father's will; which was, that He should be consecrated to His Royal Priesthood "through sufferings" (ii. 10).

but he] Rather, but He (glorified Him). Cp. John viii. 54: "It is My Father that glorifieth me." See also John xvii. 1, 5; Acts iii. 13.

6. As] Rather, Even as:—bringing into parallelism (as Delitzsch observes) "those two unique utterances of the Psalter;" "Thou art My Son," and, "Thou art a Priest for ever."

When Jesus rose "the first-begotten from the dead" (cp. on i. 5), He was fully constituted the high-priestly administrator of "the everlasting covenant" (see on xiii. 20). When He ascended to God's right hand, He clothed Himself "with honour and majesty" (cp. on ii. 10), and entered upon His administration.

order] Or, "style." The word must not be thought of as referring to an "order" of priesthood. On the contrary, it was an important element in the "style" of Melchizedek, that he had neither predecessor, assistant, nor successor; but stood absolutely alone.

7. Who] The construction of vv. 7, 8 is in strictness, "Who, in the days of His flesh,... Son though He was, yet learned obedience."

his flesh] He had taken part in flesh (ii. 14) that He might be capable of suffering. Cp. 1 Pet. iv. 1.

when he had offered up prayers and supplications with strong crying and tears unto him that was able to save him from death, and was heard ¹in that he feared;

8 Though he were a Son, yet learned he obedience by the things which he suffered;

when he had...] Rather, having with strong crying and tears offered up entreaties and supplications (cp. Sirach xxxvi. 17, li. 9—12) unto Him that was able to save Him from death, and having been heard, &c. By that gracious answer He was taught to practise obedience, even when it seemed to demand more than human nature could perform.

offered up] The word has the sense of sacrificial offering in vv. 1, 3 (cp. ix. 9, 14, x. 12, xi. 4). It probably has that sense here too; see Obs. 1, below.

crying] as of one in extremity, crying for help (Job xxxiv. 28, Ps. xviii. 8, Jonah ii. 3, LXX). Such was the cry of Jesus, when "being in an agony, He prayed the more earnestly" (Luke xxii. 44). "Tears" are not actually mentioned in the Gospel narrative; but could scarcely have been absent in that night of agony;—the antitype of Jacob's night of "wrestling," when "he wept and made supplication" (Hos. xii. 4), and "prevailed."

able to save him from death] This was expressed in His prayer: "Abba, Father, all things are possible unto Thee; take away this cup from Me: nevertheless, not what I will, but what Thou wilt." The "cup" was that bitter potion which He "tasted for every man" (ii. 9); a death not merely of shame and torture, but one in which the horror of the innumerable sins of men pressed upon Him as "a burden too heavy to bear;" while all the "power of darkness" assaulted His human soul, and the sense of God's presence was withdrawn from His spirit. That appalling ordeal was viewed by the Son of Man with natural apprehension. Nature cannot anticipate coming anguish without dread. A boly nature could not but shrink back from the prospect of suffering an obscuration of the light of God's countenance. Under that feeling of boly, filial, fear, Jesus prayed to Him who was able (cp. Dan. iii. 17), if He saw fit, to "save Him from that hour" (John xii. 27; both the verb and the preposition are the same): but He did so with entire submission to His Father's will. And although (in the infinitude of Divine love) the Father "withheld not His own Son" from death, yet, in answer to His prayer, He relieved Him from that apprehension.

heard in that he feared] Rather, heard to the removing of his fear (see below); so that the fear departed, and He went forth, "knowing all things that should come upon Him" (John xviii. 10), and endured all, not only with entire obedience, but with unclouded hopefulness (xii. 2). The answer to His prayer was made, partly in that "an angel appeared from heaven, strengthening Him" (Luke xxii. 43; cp. Isai. xli. 10, xlii. 6), but chiefly in that He was enabled to "set His face like a flint" throughout His actual sufferings.

Obs. 1. The "fear" here spoken of illustrates the statement that our High-priest was "tempted in all points" in a manner corresponding to our temptations; so that He can "sympathize with our infirmities" (iv. 15). He, indeed, remained "without sin," so that He had no need to offer "for sins of His own" (v. 3, vii. 27). But this "supplication," which Jesus offered up, may be looked upon as analogous to that first act of the high-priest on the Day of Atonement. It was the act by which He was definitively qualified to stand forward as High-priest to "make atonement for the sins of the people." That perfect resignation of Himself to His Father's will, amidst "strong crying and tears" (as though He were an agonizing victim), was rewarded by deliverance from the weakness which belonged to His innocent humanity. After that, He went forward to be the "propitiation" for the sins of the world with unwavering self-devotion.

Obs. 2. This experience especially fitted Him to comfort those, who (without servile fear of death, from which they are delivered, ii. 14, 15) might shrink from the hour of nature's dissolution, or (still more) from the prospect of martyrdom.

8. Though he were a Son] Rather, "Son though He was;"—on two occasions declared by a voice from heaven to be God's "beloved Son, in whom" He was "well-pleased" (Matt. iii. 17, xvii. 5). Between Him and the Father was uninterrupted identity of will; but, in order that He might be qualified as man for the high-priesthood of humanity, He "learned" to practise "obedience," even "obedience unto death" (Phil. ii. 8).—Something may be learnt as to what was involved in Christ's obedience from a consideration of Matt. xxvi. 53; "Thinkest thou that I cannot now pray to My Father, and He shall presently give me more than twelve legions of angels?"

9. being made perfect]—so that in Him, "the First-born," the Divine ideal of humanity was completely realized (cp. on ii. 10). Thus "perfected," He was qualified to stand as Second Head of our race, the author of "eternal salvation" (Isai. xlv. 17),—the one meritorious and efficient cause of salvation vation unto all them that obey him;

10 Called of God an high priest after the order of Melchisedec.

11 Of whom we have many things to say, and hard to be uttered, seeing ye are dull of hearing.

12 For when for the time ye ought to be teachers, ye have need that one teach you again which be the first principles of the oracles of God; and are become such as have need of milk, and not of strong meat.

13 For every one that useth milk ^{† is} unskilful in the word of righteousness: for he is a babe. ^{† Gr. hath no experience.}

14 But strong meat belongeth to them that are [†] of full age, even those ^{† Or, perfect.} who by reason [†] of use have their senses ^{† Or, of an habit, or, perfection.} exercised to discern both good and evil.

(Acts iv. 12),—"to all them that obey Him," submitting themselves to Him with entireness of faith, and following His commands, even as He obeyed the Father. Cp. John xii. 26.

10. Called...] Rather, addressed by God as High-priest. This is closely connected in thought with the "eternal salvation," that precedes. "Salvation" is the correlate of "righteousness." To secure our "eternal salvation," we have a High-priest, who not only by His sacrifice for sin fulfilled the typical requirements of the Aaronic high-priesthood, but who is also "a high-priest after the style of Melchizedek (the King of Righteousness)". Cp. Isai. li. 6, 8; Dan. ix. 24.

11. Of whom] Rather, Concerning whom; that is, concerning Christ, viewed as the eternal High-priest (cp. vi. 1). Or, "Concerning which."

many things...] More nearly: "much to say, and that not easily expounded in words,"—in such words as were on a level with their state of intelligence.

ye are] Rather, ye are become (as in v. 12); implying that they had not always been so. dull of] Or, "sluggish in" (cp. vi. 12). The words of Christ, which once had possessed so deep an interest for them, now fell on listless and inattentive ears. He tells them this, that he may rouse them out of their torpor. Moses had done the like in Deut. xxix. 4.

12. when for the time...] Rather, "whereas by this time (lit. on the score of time) ye ought to be even teachers, ye again have need (1 Thess. iv. 9) that one teach you what the first rudiments (in Gal. iv. 9, "elements") of the oracles of God are;"—what they amount to, what they involve (as in Acts xvii. 19, "what this doctrine is"). They had fallen back, it would seem, upon a naked literal view of the meaning of Scripture, and looked on Christianity as little more than a supplement to the Legal Dispensation; not as the fruit, on the appearance of which the blossom passes away.

the oracles of God] His express utterances recorded in Holy Scripture (Rom. iii. 2; Acts vii. 38). Such divine words must needs have a profound significance.

strong meat] Rather, solid food. The same distinction is drawn in 1 Cor. iii. 1, 2. The meaning of the figure there is explained by a comparison of ii. 6, "we speak wisdom among them that are perfect" (the word which here in v. 14 is rendered, "of full age"): this wisdom being such that to the "natural" man it was foolishness, because he could not "discern" it (ib. 13, 14).

13. For] This introduces (not a proof that the thing asserted in v. 12 was true, but) a development of what was implied in the figurative language just used. What had been a metaphor now becomes, in effect, an allegory. For every one that is fed on milk understandeth not that which is spoken about righteousness; he is not capable of perceiving the nature of right and wrong; for he is an infant; whose moral sense has not yet been called into exercise.

The application (which is not given) is obvious. As an infant is swayed, not by conscience, but chiefly by the gestures, looks, and voices of those who are in charge of it, so those who are in an infantile state as regards religious attainments are chiefly moved by rites and ceremonies and positive enactments. On the other hand, as they whose moral nature is matured are guided by their own quick perception of "good and evil," so persons of ripened Christian intelligence habitually strive after that "righteousness of God" (Rom. x. 3, Phil. iii. 9) which the "High-priest after the order of the King of Righteousness" has to bestow.

14. But...] Rather, But solid food belongeth to men of ripe age. The last term (generally rendered "perfect") is one which readily lends itself to the allegory; being the word used in Phil. iii. 12, 16 of such as have attained to true "righteousness." of use] Rather, of habit:—the only place where the word is found in the New Testament. Its occurrence here is in keeping with the ethical character which we have assigned to the illustration.

senses] Their faculties of perception; as we speak of a moral sense (cp. Phil. i. 9).

exercised] Or, "fully trained" (xii. 11).

urrection of the dead, and of eternal judgment.

3 And this will we do, if God permit.

tasted of the heavenly gift, and were made partakers of the Holy Ghost,

5 And have tasted the good word of God, and the powers of the world to come,

2. Of the doctrine...] Rather, "of teaching concerning baptisms and the laying on of hands, and the...and the;" so that "teaching" may refer to all that follows in the verse.

baptisms] It would be needful to distinguish the Legal "washings" (ix. 10; cp. Mark vii. 4) and the Jewish baptism of proselytes, as well as John's baptism, from baptism into the Triune Name. Comp. Acts xix. 3—5; where also mention is made of "laying on of hands" (v. 6; see also viii. 17). By baptism a man was incorporated into Christ's Body, the Church. By "laying on of hands" he was consecrated to his individual office as a member of the Body.—On the ancient "laying on of hands," cp. Gen. xlviii. 14; Num. xvii. 18.

resurrection...judgment] Both of them extending to all mankind (Acts xvii. 31, xxiv. 15). The judgment is "eternal," because its consequences are so (cp. "eternal redemption," ix. 12).

All the points which are here enumerated had their place also in the Elder Dispensation. There was a danger lest the Hebrew Christian should be satisfied with recurring to these fundamental points to the neglect of all higher, distinctively evangelical, teaching.

3. this] The pressing on to perfection. He undertakes, for himself and them, to press forward, "if only (iii. 14) God permit" (1 Cor. xvi. 7), by prolonging to them their day of grace.

4. The solemn "if only" of v. 3 is here commented on. There may be cases, in which men have sinned so fearfully against the light, that God withdraws His grace from them.

for those] Rather, as regards those. The actual construction of vv. 4—6 appears to be: "It is impossible to renew again unto repentance those who have been once...." But it is desirable on many grounds to follow the order of the Greek; especially as the conditional clause at the beginning of v. 6 and the explanatory clause at the end would otherwise be deprived of their force.

were...] Rather, have been...have tasted...have been made.

once] That is, "once for all;" already suggesting why it is "impossible" to renew them. For men, who have received "the light (or, illumination) of the glorious gospel of Christ" (2 Cor. iv. 4), and have "fallen away" from it, in hatred of the light, there remains no other source of illumination (cp. x. 26).

enlightened] See x. 32 ("illuminated"), Eph. i. 18 (cp. iii. 9, v. 14). Compare Acts xxvi. 18, 1 Pet. ii. 9.

The four clauses which follow are to be taken as an expansion of the first; showing what was involved in the "enlightening" there spoken of.

the heavenly gift] Probably, that special gift of the Holy Spirit which was "sent down from heaven" (1 Pet. i. 12) upon the Apostles on the day of Pentecost. Cp. Acts ii. 38. Of that special gift many thousands of the Jewish Christians had "tasted." They were, also, "partakers (cp. iii. 1, 14) of the Holy Spirit," as the Sanctifier of the whole Body of the Church.

5. tasted] Slightly different, in construction and in meaning, from the "tasted of" in v. 4. They tasted of that special Apostolic gift: they tasted how good the "word of God" (Rom. x. 17) was. For the expression "good word," see Josh. xxi. 45; Jer. xxix. 10, xxxiii. 14. (Cp. 1 Pet. ii. 3.)

world to come] Not the same words as in ii. 5:—lit. "the coming age" (Isai. ix. 6, LXX). In the supernatural endowments of the early Church, the influences of the invisible (and as yet future) world might be said to have penetrated into this present visible system.

6. If they shall fall away] Rather, and (yet) have fallen away; as revolters or deserters (see Ezek. xiv. 13, LXX.).

to renew them again] God had "sent forth His Spirit" with new creative power, and had "renewed the face of the earth" (Ps. civ. 30; cp. vv. 7, 8, below). If any "did despite to that Spirit of grace" (x. 29), there was no other means of spiritual renewal possible. God's ministers can only work in harmony with the arrangements of the Gospel Economy. Jesus is "exalted...to give repentance and remission of sins" (Acts v. 31): if any turn away from Him, man is powerless to renew them. It is plain that this in no way justified the Montanists and Novatians in refusing to receive penitents back into the Church. The fact of their repentance proved, that such were not of those for whom renewal and repentance had become impossible. They no longer "put Christ to open shame."

to themselves] so far as they are concerned, new them again unto repentance; seeing they crucify to themselves the Son of God afresh, and put him to an open shame.

7 For the earth which drinketh in the rain that cometh oft upon it, and bringeth forth herbs meet for them ^{1 Or, for.} by whom it is dressed, receiveth blessing from God:

8 But that which beareth thorns and briers is rejected, and is nigh unto cursing; whose end is to be burned.

9 But, beloved, we are persuaded better things of you, and things that accompany salvation, though we thus speak.

10 For God is not unrighteous to forget your work and labour of love, which ye have shewed toward his name, in that ye have ministered to the saints, and do minister.

ratifying by their own act and deed what the Jews had done when they crucified Him. Jesus had been condemned because He declared Himself to be the Son of God. If any fell back to the level of Judaism, what did they, in effect, but assert that Jesus had been justly condemned?

to an open shame] as a blasphemer (Matt. xxvi. 65).

7. The whole of the preceding passage wears the appearance of a warning addressed to a community. The privileges insisted upon in vv. 4, 5 are such as belonged to the Church generally, rather than specially to individuals. This impression is strongly confirmed by the allegory which now follows (for that it is an allegory, the use which is here made of the terms "blessing" and "cursing" shows; cp. Deut. xxx. 1, 19).

For] It is impossible to renew such; For, consider what is the law of God's spiritual husbandry (1 Cor. iii. 9), as it is set forth in the Old Testament (Isai. v. 1—6, 24; cp. Deut. xxix. 23).

the earth] Rather, the land (cp. Deut. xxviii. 8, 12).

drinketh in] Rather, hath drunk in (cp. Deut. xi. 11).

the rain] Comp. Isai. v. 6, Ezek. xxxiv. 26:—analogous to the "heavenly gift" of v. 4.

herbs] Or, "herbage." In Exod. ix. 22, 25, the word includes wheat, barley, and flax.

by whom...] Rather, on whose account (i. 14), indeed, it is tilled. As of old so much loving toil was bestowed upon Israel, not for its own aggrandisement, but in order that all nations might be blessed through it; so now the Hebrew Church at Jerusalem had received that "gracious rain" (Ps. lxviii. 9) of Pentecostal gifts with the like intent. If it brought forth abundant harvests, from which the bread of life might be communicated to a famishing world, it would be itself richly rewarded; such land "is a partaker (cp. ch. xii. 10, 2 Tim. ii. 6) of blessing from God" (Ps. xxiv. 5). This can scarcely be understood, unless we take the passage allegorically. As long as Israel had remained true to its national vocation, it had enjoyed its own share of Divine blessing (cp. Deut. xxviii. 8). So would it be with the Hebrew Church, if it diligently hearkened to the voice of the Lord its God (Deut. xxviii. 1, 2).

8. that which beareth...] Rather, if it bear thorns and briers (Isai. v. 6; Prov. xxiv. 30, 31), it is rejected; or, "reprobate" (Jer. vi. 30).

whose end] If that end be not averted by timely reformation (comp. Jer. v. 31; Ezek. vii. 3).

to be burned] As a consequence of the judicial curse (Deut. xxix. 20—23).

9. better things] Lit. "the better things;" the better of the two alternatives just described in v. 7; namely, fruitfulness rewarded by blessing.

accompany] Or, "go along with." Their lives were visibly such as harmonized with God's invisible plan of salvation. The word is used in Ezek. x. 16 of the wheels, which, "when the Cherubim went, went along with them."—He had already stated (in the verse which immediately preceded this digression, ch. v. 9) what the necessary "accompaniment" of salvation is on man's part: "He became the author of eternal salvation to all them that obey Him."

10. He was persuaded that they would receive the blessing of salvation; for God was not unrighteous, that He should forget, or fail to reward, their loving deeds.

your work...] or, (according to the better reading) your work, and the love which;—the words "labour of" having come into some MSS., doubtless, from 1 Thess. i. 3. Their work, being true and real work, though done amidst despondency, should be rewarded (Jer. xxxi. 16). The love which they had shewed, or manifested (comp. 2 Cor. viii. 24), in relieving their distressed brethren, He would look on as directed towards His Name; claiming what was done to His servants as done to Himself (Matt. xxv. 40; Prov. xix. 17).

the saints] The "holy brethren" (iii. 1)

11 And we desire that every one of you do shew the same diligence to the full assurance of hope unto the end:

12 That ye be not slothful, but followers of them who through faith and patience inherit the promises.

13 For when God made promise to Abraham, because he could swear by no greater, he swore by himself, 14 Saying, Surely blessing I will bless thee, and multiplying I will multiply thee.

15 And so, after he had patiently endured, he obtained the promise.

16 For men verily swear by the in Judea (Acts xi. 29) or in Jerusalem itself (Rom. xv. 26).

11. And] Rather, But. He had been speaking to them as a Church (see on v. 7): "But" he wishes that every one of them, individually, should manifest the same diligence in works of love, which he had commended in them as a community. That this is the true sense of the passage appears from 2 Cor. viii. 16, "the same earnest care;" the word there rendered "earnest care" (cp. 2 Cor. vii. 12, "care") being the one for which "diligence" stands in the text.

to the full assurance] This result (cp. the preposition in v. 14, ix. 13, 1 Cor. x. 4) would follow of itself. Their benevolent activity, if it had no immediate reward, would tend to the exercise and strengthening of their hope; every deed of disinterested charity being, in fact, rewarded with a livelier anticipation of what God had in store for them. Thus the fruit-bearing soil would have a "blessing from God" (v. 7). Cp. 2 Pet. i. 8—11.

the full assurance] "the full energy (or, development);" comp. x. 22, "the full assurance of faith." Of itself the word denotes simply the completeness with which the faculty produces its own proper fruit (see Additional Note). Cp. 1 Pet. i. 13, "hope perfectly."

unto the end] iii. 6, 14 (Rev. ii. 26). This refers, not to the "diligence" only, or to the "hope" only, but to the whole of what precedes. Let their practical charity and their religious hope continue acting and re-acting upon each other even to the end.

12. be not] Rather, become not. In ch. v. 11 he had charged them with being of "sluggish" ears. Now that he has roused their hearing, he warns them not, at any rate, to become "sluggish" in heart. The word is the same in both passages, and means "torpid," or inert, or insensible; as hearts would be, which had lost their "first love" and, with it, their energy of hope.

patience] which enabled them to bear up under the burden of long-deferred hope. The verb is used in v. 15, "having patiently endured." In x. 36, xii. 1 the word which is rendered "patience," refers rather to the endurance of pain or suffering (2 Cor. i. 6).

inherit the promises] The reference would seem to be, in part, to their own immediate predecessors in the faith (xiii. 7, whose faith imitate), but also (as the following verses imply) to the saints of former ages. In Acts xxvi. 6—8 St Paul speaks of "the promise made to the fathers" (unto which promise the twelve tribes so earnestly desired to come) as being, the resurrection of the dead. And in Acts xiii. 32, 33, he says, "We declare unto you glad tidings, how that the promise which was made unto the fathers, God hath fulfilled the same, in that He hath raised up Jesus again." Of that promised resurrection the faithful, as they rest in Paradise, are the assured heirs (cp. on xi. 39, xii. 23).

13. This requirement of "faith and patience" in order to an attainment of the promises is no new one. For—is it not set forth clearly in the history of Abraham? The greatest event in his life (which itself occurred after forty years of patient waiting) was the promise of a future blessing; a blessing to be won (as the figurative transaction on Moriah showed, cp. xi. 17—19) through a resurrection from the dead. On that oath—which revealed to him "the day of Christ," the fountain of blessing (John viii. 56)—Abraham stayed himself in faith and patience; and so, entering into rest, he attained the promise (cp. xi. 8, 10, 16).

14. multiply thee] In Gen. xxii. 17, it is, "I will multiply thy seed." The shortened form may involve a reference to Isai. li. 2, "I blessed him, and multiplied him."

15. And so] In the strength of that promise confirmed by an oath, he went on to exhibit the full energy of hope unto the end. The terms of the oath were such as might well stimulate hope. It began, For because thou hast done this thing; as much as to say, "I am not unrighteous to forget this work of thine and the love thou hast shewed toward My name. Thou hast not withheld thine only son from Me; be sure My love shall not fall short of thine. I too will not withhold My only Son (Rom. viii. 32), but will give Him up to death, to bring about the fulfilment of My solemn promise, that in thy seed all the families of the earth shall be blessed."

obtained] The word used in ch. xi. 34, Rom. xi. 7. Age after age Abraham in Para-greater : and an oath for confirmation is to them an end of all strife.

17 Wherein God, willing more abundantly to shew unto the heirs of promise the immutability of his counsel, ^{†Gr. interposed himself by an oath.} confirmed it by an oath :

18 That by two immutable things, in which it was impossible for God to lie, we might have a strong consolation, who have fled for refuge to lay hold upon the hope set before us :

19 Which hope we have as an anchor of the soul, both sure and stedfast, and which entereth into that within the veil ;

discovered found the promise advancing, in its various parts, towards completion ; and, when Christ triumphed over death, he obtained in Him the gift of eternal life.

Obs. This incident of Abraham's history is connected with chh. iii and iv by the words, "because thou hast hearkened to My voice" (Gen. xxii. 18).

16. the greater] Rather, that which is greater.

and an oath...] Rather, and an oath is unto them an assured end [lit., an end for sure adjustment] of all controversy.

17. Wherein] Rather, in regard whereof ; in consideration of the fact that an oath puts a stop to all controversy.

the heirs of promise] Not Abraham and Isaac only, but their spiritual seed, who are "heirs according to the promise" (Gal. iii. 29).

immutability] In respect of which the Covenant with Abraham stands contrasted with the Sinaitic (cp. vii. 12, xii. 27).

counsel] Or, "plan ;" the great scheme of Redemption (comp. Acts xx. 27).

confirmed it by an oath] Rather, intervened as mediator by an oath. The two parties to the Covenant of Blessing were God and man. How was this Covenant, then, to be guaranteed ? Where was one to be found who could represent the interests of each party, and guarantee to each party the stability of the Covenant (cp. Note below) ? Clearly no created being could do this. None but God Himself could so act. By His oath He undertook thus to mediate. When He said, "By myself have I sworn," He engaged His own holiness and truth to the fulfilment of His promises. In appealing to Himself by an oath, He, in fact, took on Him the office of Mediator ; pledging Himself to do all that was necessary for giving the Covenant eternal validity (xiii. 20). If this could be done in no other way than by giving His only Son to lie on the Altar of Atonement, even this should be done. Accordingly "the oath sworn to Abraham" (Luke i. 73) was actually made good in the person of "Jesus, the Mediator of the New Covenant" (xii. 24), who "laid hold on the seed of Abraham" (ii. 16). After He had sealed the Covenant with His blood, it was impossible that anything could vitiate it. When God raised Him from the dead, He in fact declared to Him : "In Thee are all the families of the earth delivered from the curse, because Thou hast hearkened to My voice."

Obs. 1. When Moses ventured to intercede on behalf of Israel at Sinai, he took his stand upon the oath made to Abraham (Exod. xxxii. 13). The covenant which he himself had mediated had been broken. How, then, could he plead for a fulfilment of its conditional promises ? He could only rest his intercession upon God's own mediatorial oath.

Obs. 2. The stress laid here on God's oath prepares the way for the discussion of Ps. cx. 4 (which has been already referred to at v. 6) in the next chapter. Indeed, what is the oath in Ps. cx but a renewal, in a more definite form, of the oath to Abraham ?

18. two...things] Two actual facts (cp. x. 1 b, xi. 1 b) ; the original promise (Gen. xii. 3 ; cp. xviii. 18), and the confirmation of it by oath (xxii. 18).

in which] Or, "in regard to which."

to lay hold upon] Therefore the "hope" must be something that is not of our originating. Yet being "laid hold of" it becomes ours ; ours to "hold fast" (iii. 6), and to employ as an anchor. This relation between the objective and the subjective in Christian hope arises from its very nature, since it is the outward object which creates the subjective energy (1 Pet. i. 3). Yet this hope is set before us (xii. 2), as a thing to be attained through faith and obedience.

19. This hope is as an "anchor of the soul," cast upward into that within the veil, the heavenly Holy of Holies (see Lev. xvi. 2, 12, 15,—in the rules for the Day of Atonement) ; where it finds firm holding in the "immutable counsel," which forms the basis of the "Mercy-seat."

20. Whither...] Rather, Whither, as forerunner, Jesus is for us entered;—as our “Leader” (ii. 10); and to act for us, or, on our behalf (as in v. 1, vii. 25); in such sort that His entrance ensures ours also (x. 19; John xiv. 2, 3).

for ever] In the original these words stand emphatically at the end of the clause;—“having become high-priest after the order of Melchizedek for ever ;”—so striking the key-note of ch. vii (see vv. 3, 16, 17, 21, 24, 25, 28).

ADDITIONAL NOTES on CHAP. VI. 11, 17.

11. The verb (πληροφορέω) occurs in 2 Tim. iv. 5, “make full proof of thy ministry,” so as to realize the full amount of fruit which thy ministry should produce (cp. Acts xii. 25, Col. iv. 17, where we have πληροῦν τῇ δ.): and again in v. 17, “that by me the preaching might be fully known,” or, be made known over the whole of its intended field of operations.

17. When Josephus (‘Ant.’ iv. 6, 7) speaks of the young Israelites, who engaged to marry the Midianite damsels, as “swearing and making God the mediator of what they undertook to do,” he means that they appealed to Him as the God of truth and righteousness to maintain the integrity of their covenant, making Himself its responsible guardian.

CHAPTER VII.

1 Christ Jesus is a priest after the order of Melchisedec, 11 and so, far more excellent than the priests of Aaron's order.

FOR this Melchisedec, king of Salem, priest of the most high God, who met Abraham returning from the slaughter of the kings, and blessed him;

2 To whom also Abraham gave a tenth part of all; first being by interpretation King of righteousness, and after that also King of Salem, which is, King of peace;

3 Without father, without mother, without descent, having neither beginning of days, nor end of life; but made like unto the Son of God; abideth a priest continually.

4 Now consider how great this

CHAP. VII. The writer now proceeds to unfold the typical significance of Melchizedek's history.

(1) He was King and Priest in one; like the Messiah of Pss. ii, xlv, cx, and like the typical Jozedek of Zech. vi. 13.

(2) When Abraham, shortly after God had put him in formal possession of Canaan (xiii. 14—17), had routed the invaders of the land, Melchizedek went forth to meet him, and blessed him;—as the Righteous King of Ps. lxxii is declared to be a fountain of blessing (v. 17).

(3) Abraham acknowledged him as God's Priest by giving him tithes from all the spoil.

(4) His name and title are significant; for he was both King of Righteousness, and then (for the order is important, Isai. xxxiii. 17, Rom. v. 1) “King of Peace” (cp. Ps. lxxii. 3); righteousness and peace being the chief ends that were to be attained through a priesthood (cp. Rom. iv. 25, v. 1).

(5) Melchizedek stands in the Scripture narrative with no mention of father, mother, or pedigree, of the beginning or end of his life; and the suppression of these details adapts him for standing as a type of the Son of God.

1. For this Melchisedec] The predicate is at the end of v. 3, “abideth a priest continually.”

2. Salem...peace] Such is its meaning in the name Jerusalem, “home (or, foundation) of peace.” If, as is generally agreed (cp. on Gen. xiv. 18), Salem and Jerusalem are the same city, then (as Mr Dale remarks) the mountain, on which Abraham received the oath of Blessing from God, was in the district over which Melchizedek reigned.

3. descent] Rather (as in marg.), pedigree. The Levitical priesthood was strictly genealogical (see Ezra ii. 62, 63).

made like] The sacred narrative regarding Melchizedek was so ordered, both in what it said and in what it left unsaid, that the historical picture is singularly fitted to represent in typical outline the Son of God. “We know of no beginning or end in either case:

man was, unto whom even the patriarch Abraham gave the tenth of the spoils.

5 And verily they that are of the sons of Levi, who receive the office of the priesthood, have a commandment to take tithes of the people according to the law, that is, of their brethren, though they come out of the loins of Abraham :

6 But he whose ¹descent is not counted from them received tithes of Abraham, and blessed him that had the promises.

7 And without all contradiction the less is blessed of the better.

8 And here men that die receive tithes ; but there he receiveth them, of whom it is witnessed that he liveth.

9 And as I may so say, Levi also, who receiveth tithes, payed tithes in Abraham.

10 For he was yet in the loins of his father, when Melchisedec met him.

11 If therefore perfection were by the Levitical priesthood, (for under it the people received the law,) what in the one, because none are recorded ; in the other, because they do not exist" (Chrys.).

The death of Aaron, on the contrary, has attention called to it in a very pointed manner, Num. xx. 23—29.

continually] Or, "in perpetuity;" without any term to the continuance of his office.

4. the patriarch] "the head of our race." In the original this stands, with marked emphasis, at the end: "Abraham gave tithe of the best of the spoil—(even he), the patriarch." This occurrence is commented on in the next six verses in the following order:

(1) vv. 5—7. The Levitical priests received tithes, not from foreigners on the ground of an acknowledged superiority, but from their brethren on the ground of a compulsory legal enactment. Abraham, on the other hand, paid tithes to Melchizedek, not on account of any legal claim, but voluntarily ; out of respect for one who was his superior, and who had freely bestowed a blessing upon him in God's name.

(2) v. 8. The Levitical tithes are paid to dying men ; Melchizedek is set before us only as "living."

(3) vv. 9, 10. In the person of Abraham the Levitical priesthood virtually paid tithe to Melchisedek.

On these grounds it is inferred that the Melchizedekan style of priesthood (referred to in the Psalm) is one which is superior to the Aaronic.

5. they that...] Lit. "those who being of the sons of Levi receive...;" that is, who receive the priesthood on the ground of their descent from Levi. The priests had a tenth of the Levites' tithe (Num. xviii. 26). Ultimately, therefore, it was from "the people."

according to the law] By positive enactment, not because of any personal superiority.

6. whose descent...] Lit. "that is not registered in pedigree from them;" the form of expression being chosen to carry the mind on to the antitype.

received] Lit. "hath received." That is the position in which he stands before us in history.

blessed...] This is a very distinctive part of Melchizedek's action: and what he did in words, the Antitype did in reality. "Through Jesus Christ the blessing of Abraham" has "come on the nations" (Gal. iii. 14). The attitude in which He was last seen by the Apostles signified that His work in heaven would be to pour out blessings on the faithful (Luke xxiv. 51): so eliciting ever-renewed benedictions from men towards God (Eph. i. 3; 1 Pet. i. 3); even as Melchizedek, after saying "Blessed be Abram," added "Blessed be God."

7. And without all contradiction] Rather, But without any controversy.

8. here] In the Levitical system. it is witnessed...] He is set before us in the Scriptural record simply as living; no mention being made of his birth or death. As in v. 3, the features of resemblance presented by the type depend on the silence of Scripture.

9. as I may...] Rather, so to speak. Though not literally, yet virtually, he did so. The interview with Melchizedek took place at least fourteen years before the birth of Isaac.

11. If therefore] Rather, "If however." The argument in vv. 5—10 had only reached so far as to prove, that a priesthood of the Melchizedekan order must be superior to the Levitical. The writer proceeds to draw from the fact, that Messiah is described in the Psalm as a Melchizedekan Priest, yet weightier consequences.

(1) vv. 11—14. The prediction of another kind of priest implied that the Levitical priesthood was set aside as imperfect, and consequently that the whole Legal constitution was so too. (2) vv. 15—19. This imperfection becomes more evident when we consider that their consecration rested on mere carnal ordinances, not, as His did, on the power of an further need was there that another priest should rise after the order of Melchisedec, and not be called after the order of Aaron?

12 For the priesthood being changed, there is made of necessity a change also of the law.

13 For he of whom these things are spoken pertaineth to another tribe, of which no man gave attendance at the altar.

14 For it is evident that our Lord sprang out of Juda; of which tribe Moses spake nothing concerning priesthood.

15 And it is yet far more evident: for that after the similitude of Melchisedec there ariseth another priest, 16 Who is made, not after the law of a carnal commandment, but after the power of an endless life.

endless life. (3) vv. 20—22. The superiority of Christ's priesthood appears from the fact that He was constituted Priest (as the Abrahamic covenant itself was constituted, vi. 13—17) by a Divine oath. (4) vv. 23—25. In consequence of this He retains His priesthood in unbroken continuity; always able and ready to save.

perfection] The restoration of man from his present fallen condition to a state of fitness for communion with God (v. 19, ix. 9, x. 1, 2, 14). Cp. on ii. 10.

for under it...] The parenthesis emphasizes the term "Levitical priesthood." If, however, there had been perfection by means of the Levitical priesthood (as might have been expected, for under it the people received its legal constitution). When Moses ascended Sinai he at once received instructions to prepare a tabernacle and to ordain the priesthood. Then, and not before, God promised to dwell among Israel as His people (Exod. xxix. 45).

that another...] Rather, that a priest should arise of a different kind, after the order of Melchisedec, and not be called after the order of Aaron.

12. Surely he would have been designated "after the order of Aaron:"—For, if the priesthood be changed, the consequence can be nothing less than a change of the Law; which was established on the supposition of that priesthood's being in existence. To remove Aaron from standing before God was to remove Israel (whom he represented, see on ch. v. 1) from the position which it held under the Law, as God's people.

The writer leaves the argument in its hypothetical form, but goes on to enforce the statement that the Person addressed in Ps. cx did not belong to the tribe of Levi.

13. he of whom] It was admitted by the Jews that their Messiah (addressed in Ps. cx) was to be the Son of David (Matt. xxii. 42). But the reference here is to Him whom the Hebrew Christians confessed to be Messiah: for, instead of "pertaineth to," we should translate, is a member of (lit. "hath taken part in;" cp. ii. 14).

another tribe] Rather, a different tribe. gave] Rather, hath given.

14. evident] Rather, manifest; as a matter of fact (cp. Rom. i. 3; Rev. v. 5). The Gospels of St Matthew and St Luke were, probably, both of them at this time in circulation.

sprang] The figure is taken from a plant (comp. Ezek. xxix. 21, "bud forth"). The derived noun is used in Jer. xxiii. 5; Zech. vi. 12, 13 ("the Branch"); the latter of which passages is closely related to Ps. cx.

of which] Rather, in regard to which. Many authorities instead of "priesthood" have "priests." The crime which filled up Judah's iniquity, and ushered in the sentence of judicial hardening upon it (Isai. vi. 1—11), was King Uzziah's assumption of priestly functions.

15. it is yet...] Or, "yet more abundantly is it evident;"—namely, the imperfection of the Levitical priesthood and its consequent abrogation. In vv. 11—14 the argument had rested upon the simple fact that Messiah was not to be of Aaron's line. In what now follows the inference is drawn from the eternal duration of His priesthood.

for that] Lit. "if;"—if (as is the case): nearly as in Acts xxvi. 23.

another] "a different."

16. a carnal commandment] The rites used at Aaron's consecration were of an outward kind; bathing, offering the flesh of animals, touching his right ear, hand, and foot with blood, placing the fat and bread in his hands. Those "carnal ordinances" (ix. 10) could have no intrinsic value. They were performed simply because they were enjoined (see Lev. viii with its oft-repeated, "as the Lord commanded").

power] The word is used twice in reference to the Eternal Priest in Ps. cx. In virtue of it, (1) He triumphs over all enemies (v. 2),—even over the last enemy of all, Death; (2) He draws to Himself a holy and devoted people; pure, bright, and numerous as the morning dew (v. 3).

endless] Rather, indissoluble. It is only natural that a time should come, when a 17 For he testifieth, Thou art a priest for ever after the order of Melchisedec.

23 And they truly were many priests, because they were not suffered to continue by reason of death:

system of positive institutions should be dis-solved. Not so with regard to the living, life-giving, energy conferred on the Eternal Priest; which was manifested first of all in His resurrection from the tomb (cp. Rev. i. 18; John v. 26, xvii. 2).

17. he testifieth] Or, according to another reading, "it is testified of him."

18, 19. The rendering of these verses needs to be entirely recast. For there taketh place, on the one hand, a disannulling of the previous commandment, because of its weakness and unprofitableness (for the Law made nothing perfect), and, on the other, the bringing in of a better hope; by the which... The office of the Levitical priesthood was only to pioneer the way for the coming of the true Priest. It was "weak;" leaving men "without strength" to contend with sin and death (Rom. v. 6). It was "unprofitable;" rather burdening, than easing, the conscience.

draw nigh] The same word is used in Lev. x. 3; Ezek. xl. 46, xlii. 13, xliii. 19, of priestly approach to God.

20. not without...priest] Or, simply; it was not without an oath.

21. For those...] Rather, For they indeed were made priests without an oath; but He."

him that said] Vv. 2—4 of the Psalm are taken as a continuation of the address "Sit Thou on my right hand" in v. 1. The occurrence of "The LORD" in vv. 2 and 4 is no disproof of the correctness of this; see Ps. cxxxii. 13. The clause "after the order of Melchizedek" is wanting in the best MSS.

22. By so much] Since the priesthood of Jesus rested on a Divine oath, and was therefore immutable, the covenant which His priestly work was to conserve must be equally immutable. The Sinaitic Covenant was conditional and temporary; this better Covenant absolute and eternal. It is here implied that Jesus was constituted "surety" by the oath which gave Him the everlasting priesthood. This suretiship, then, must consist in His guaranteeing the fulfilment of God's promises to men. He had this high office, in which He stood as Surety for God, conferred upon Him because He had already given Himself to be Surety for man, and as such had made satisfaction to God's righteous law for the sin of man (see Note at the end of the Chapter). The union of these two suretiships made Him a perfect Mediator: one who could provide that a Covenant of assured blessing for mankind should not be inconsistent with the holiness of the ever-blessed God.

testament] Rather, covenant. So A.V. in the similar passages viii. 6 and Gal. iii. 15—18. Such is invariably the meaning of the word in the LXX. (cp. notes on ix. 15); and no other meaning suits the context here (see below). A testament no more requires a surety than it does a mediator (see on ix. 15). A covenant between God and man required both; one who could give security to both parties that the covenant should not miscarry. The death of Jesus satisfied the Divine requirement; His presence in heaven satisfies the human.

23. were...were not] Rather, have been...are not. One generation of priests after another has been carried away by death; unable to save themselves and compelled at last to abandon those who had leaned on them for counsel and sympathy.

24. this man] Rather, He (as in v. 21). continueth ever] Cp. John xii. 34 "(the) Christ abideth for ever" (the same words).

an unchangeable priesthood] one "that passeth not" from Him to devolve upon another: or "that passeth not away" (so the Peshito; using the same expression here as in Dan. vii. 14: see Note below). His was truly an "everlasting priesthood;" while the Aaronic priest-those high priests, to offer up sacrifice, first for his own sins, and then for the people's: for this he did once, when he offered up himself.

hood had only the semblance of a claim to that title (Exod. xl. 15).

come unto] The word used in iv. 16.

by him] Rather, "through Him."

liveth] v. 16; Rev. i. 18; Rom. vi. 9, 10.

to make intercession] As in Rom. viii. 34. This is the great work of our High-priest in heaven (cp. Isai. liii. 12). His intercession surrounds the Throne of Majesty as with a cloud of fragrant incense.

26. The Apostle has shewn the transcendent excellence of Christ's priesthood, as foretold in Ps. cx. He now adds, that a High-priest of such a kind not only realizes the scriptural idea, but also is suited to our needs. (The correct reading is, "also became us.") such an high priest] Throughout the chapter, up to this point, the word "priest" (taken from Ps. cx) has been used. The change, which is made here, indicates that the writer is passing on to speak of the Levitical high-priesthood. Incomparably inferior to the priesthood of Christ, it nevertheless foreshadowed it. In itself devoid of efficacy, it finds its existence justified, in that, as a type, it bears unsuspected witness to a glorious reality, in which the Melchizedekan and Aaronic priest-hoods are combined.

holy] The word used in Acts ii. 27. It denotes one who is inwardly devoted to God; who is godly, and, because godly, pure.

harmless] Or, "benign;" without any touch of evil feeling.

undefiled] Indeed (so the word denotes) incapable of defilement; like that heaven (see 1 Pet. i. 4) to which He has ascended.

separate] Rather, separated;—once, continually "enduring the contradiction of sinners" (xii. 3); now, infinitely removed from them: though "He rules in the midst of them" by His sceptre (Ps. cx. 2).

higher...] At the right hand of God Most High (Ps. cx. 1; cp. on iv. 14).

27, 28. It is evident from v. 28 ("the word of the oath," "consecrated for evermore") that the writer is still contrasting the work of Him who is spoken of in Ps. cx with that of the Aaronic high-priests. Here, in conclusion, he gives the deepest, the most fundamental, of all the points of distinction between them.

Aaron, on the last day of his consecration (Lev. ix. 1—15), before he offered the sin-offering for the people, had first of all to offer for his own sins. And on each Day of Atonement it was necessary that he should do the same; which shewed that his consecration was only of an external kind, and that, too, unequal to the strain of more than one brief visit into the symbolic Holy of Holies. But not so was it with our High-priest. He abides always in the heavenly Holy of Holies; ever (v. 25) engaged in intercession for us. Every day of our mortal lives is for us a Day of Atonement, since He in Heaven "is the propitiation for our sins" (1 John ii. 2). He has no need "day by day" to renew His consecration, "as those high-priests" were obliged to do on each Day of Atonement. The "word of the oath" sealed the eternal validity of that one act of consecration, in which the "undefiled" High-priest offered up once for all His sinless Self.

this he did once] This, the work last-mentioned, He did once for all; and that with no preliminary offering for sins of His own, for—He offered up Himself; and only a sinless life can be accepted as an atonement for sin. The obscurity which attaches to the this in A. V. is materially relieved, if we follow more strictly the Greek (cp. Note below): "Who hath no necessity day by day, as those high-priests (have), first to offer sacrifices for their own sins, and then for (the sins) of the people; for this"—the offering for the people's sins—"He did once for all, when (having no sins of His own) he offered up Himself."

28. men] To be emphasized; mere men, in contrast with the Son. There should be a comma after "high priests."

infirmity] Moral weakness which required that they should seek expiation for their own sins (ch. v. 2, 3).

since the law] Rather, after the Law. A divine oath, coming later than the Law (which was only conditional in its nature), had power to abrogate it.

the Son] See on i. 2. consecrated] Or, "perfected;" see ii. 10, v. 9;—freed from all semblance of infirmity, and endowed with fulness of glorious power.

ADDITIONAL NOTES on CHAP. VII. 22, 24, 27.

22. The word ἄγγος occurs nowhere else in the New Testament or the LXX. In the Apocrypha it is found in two places, 2 Macc. x. 28 and Sirach xxix. 15. The latter supplies a singularly apposite illustration of the suretiship which Jesus undertook for man: "Forget not the thanks due to a surety: for he gave his life for thee" (ὑπὲρ σοῦ).

22. The radical idea of a διαθήκη, as exhibited in Gen. xxi. 22—32, xxvi. 28—31, is that of an averment on oath by two parties that they will maintain a friendly relation to each other. If the two parties to such an agreement are to be God and man, between whom sin and its penalty, death, stand as barriers, it is evident that some Mediator must interpose, who can re-adjust (or rectify, ix. 10) the relation of the parties. To do this, He must be able to make satisfaction to God's justice on the one hand, and on the other to rescue man from death. How such a Covenant could be established, was the problem set before God's servants in old time for the exercise of their faith and hope.

24. The Syriac is in each case ܕܢܚܝܬܐ.

The same occurs also in Ps. cxlviii. 6, "He hath given a law, and it passeth not away." In both Dan. vii. 14 and Ps. cxlviii. 6 the LXX. has οὐ παρελεύσεται. It seems most probable, therefore, that ἀπαράβατος is to be looked on as a Hebraism (the intransitive form of the adjective, as in εὐπερίστατος). St Athanasius ('c. Arian.' II. 9) gives ἀδιάδεκτος as its equivalent.

27. The correctness of this rendering will be evident, if we consider that

(1) The text has θυσίας, "sacrifices." For the High-priest on the Day of Atonement offered only one sin-offering for himself; and therefore the plural shews that the clause, in which it occurs, depends on οἱ ἀρχιερεῖς.

(2) The term τῶν ἰδίων ἁμαρτιῶν must mean, their own sins. In order to be connected with ὅς, it should be, ὑπὲρ ἰδίων ἁ., "sins of his own." The article implies that the sins were there; and, being there, created a necessity for expiation.

CHAPTER VIII.

NOW of the things which we have spoken this is the sum:

CHAP. VIII. The repetition, in v. 3 below, of the statement that was made in ch. v. 1, shews that the topic which was there introduced is now to be discussed. Ch. vii had shewn the infinite superiority of Christ's priesthood and the covenant which it conserved to the Aaronic priesthood and the covenant which rested upon it. But now the question occurs: "For what purpose, then, were that elder priesthood and covenant introduced? or in what relation do they stand to the Christian dispensation?" The answer is given in the three next chapters.—They supplied "figures for the time then present" (ix. 9); which trained the faithful to think aright of sin and its consequences, and by their very imperfection compelled men to look forward to a future system of spiritual and heavenly realities.

1. Now of the things...] Rather, "Now to sum up briefly the things we are saying." The following statement refers not only (v. 1)

We have such an high priest, who is set on the right hand of the throne of the Majesty in the heavens; to what has been said in chh. v—vii, but also (v. 2) to what is coming in chh. viii—x.

2 A minister ¹ of the sanctuary, ¹Or, of holy things. and of the true tabernacle, which the Lord pitched, and not man.

is set] Rather, sat down (i. 3, x. 12).

the Majesty] Rather, Majesty. The "Throne of Majesty" loses nothing of its essential glory, though His session makes it relatively to us "the throne of grace" (iv. 16).

2. A minister] To whom is entrusted the care of God's heavenly Sanctuary, and the work of presenting to God all that the redeemed people of God bring to be offered (see on v. 3). Though He be seated at God's right hand, it is not as one who has no active duties.

to the "Holy Place" (or, first Tabernacle). Similarly in ix. 11, 12, Christ enters into "the Sanctuary" by passing "through a greater and more perfect Tabernacle not made with hands." In both places, it would appear (cp. ix. 24), the "Tabernacle" corresponds to the Heaven in which the "myriads of angels" (xii. 22) worship, and the "Sanctuary" to the uncreated heaven of the "unapproachable light" in which God dwells (1 Tim. vi. 16).

pitched] The word is used in reference to the material heavens ("stretched out," as a tent) in Isai. xlii. 5.

3. For] This assigns a reason for the use of the term "minister" in v. 2. He is "seated," yet perpetually engaged in holy work. This Melchizedek Priest also realizes whatever was presignified by the Aaronic high-priesthood: and every high-priest (ch. v. 1) is "appointed to offer both gifts and sacrifices," on the behalf of the people and as their representative. But precisely this is indicated by the term "ministry" (cp. v. 6). In ch. v. 1, in speaking specially of human high-priests, he had said, "to offer gifts and sacrifices for sins." Now, that he is about to speak of the office of the heavenly High-priest (who had already established the New Covenant, under which "is no more offering for sin," x. 18), he omits the words "for sins." In v. 4 all is summed up in the word "gifts;" for such are all the "sacrifices," which the people of the New Covenant present through their heavenly High-priest; "gifts" offered by a grateful people. (Cp. "Thy people are free-will offerings," Ps. cx. 3.)

wherefore...] Rather, whence it is necessary that this one also should have somewhat to offer;" as, in fact, the word "minister" in v. 2 implied that He had.

to offer] Which He is now to offer, as "Minister" of the heavenly Sanctuary. Evidently this cannot refer to His "offering of Himself," which was made once for all on earth (vii. 27, ix. 26, 28, x. 10, 12, 14); and in virtue of which He entered in once for all into the heavenly Sanctuary (ix. 12): the covenant promise of "remission of sins" having been once and for ever definitely established (x. 16—18, xiii. 20). It must refer to His offering the "gifts and sacrifices" of His people; their prayers (iv. 16), their "sacrifices of praise" (xiii. 15), their works of love (xiii. 16; cp. Eph. v. 2); their oblation of themselves, their souls and bodies (Rom. vi. 13, xii. 1). They "who come unto God through Him," bringing such gifts, find Him at all times ready, as Minister of the Sanctuary, to "present" their gifts, hallowed by His own all-efficacious offering (compare on ch. v. 7) of "intercession" (vii. 25). See Additional Note.

4. For if he] Rather, For if indeed He (or, according to another reading, "If, then, He"). The three verses, 4—6, are to be taken together, a colon being placed at the end of v. 5; and the "but" of v. 6 forming the antithesis to the "if indeed" of v. 4. It "necessarily follows," that our High-priest in that "true Tabernacle" has somewhat to offer; since otherwise that which was a leading feature of the Levitical system would have no corresponding heavenly reality. To enable the people to bring their offerings to God continually with acceptance, was the reason why the Aaronic priesthood and the ceremonial of the Day of Atonement were instituted. Now, therefore, that Jesus, having "offered Himself" on earth (as on the altar in the outer court of the Temple), has, by virtue of His blood, "purged" the heavenly things and places (ix. 23) and sate down on the throne of Glory in the Holy of Holies, has He no ministerial work to perform? Will any imagine that His people's gifts are now to be offered through the high-priest of the earthly Tabernacle? in which case the fact that "every (earthly) high-priest is appointed to offer gifts" instead of making the inference drawn in v. 3 a "necessary" one, would exclude its possibility. Not so. There is no such interference between His ministry and theirs: "FOR" they lie in infinitely distant planes. If indeed Jesus were yet on earth, no true atonement having as yet opened a way into the heavenly Sanctuary, He would not even be a priest at all: since the divinely appointed Levitical system would in that case continue in full force; discharging its appointed duty of testifying to the existence of that real Tabernacle of God, in which our High-priest is actually ministering. But, in fact, His true priesthood having now commenced, the typical system is ready to disappear (v. 13).

Obs. Here, as everywhere, the forbearance of the writer is very observable. For, if it might be said, that Christ "would not even" have been "a priest" here in the earthly tabernacle, with yet greater necessity did it follow, that in respect of "the true Tabernacle" of God, the sons of Aaron were not even priests. Instead, however, of drawing this inference, he proceeds to shew what end their divinely appointed ministry did actually subserve.

there are priests] Rather, "there are already the priests;"—the appointed priests. Many MSS. omit "priests," making the clause run: "since there are already those who offer."

5 Who serve unto the example and shadow of heavenly things, as Moses was admonished of God when he was about to make the tabernacle: for, See, saith he, that thou make all things according to the pattern shewed to thee in the mount.

6 But now hath he obtained a more excellent ministry, by how much also he is the mediator of a better ^{1 Or, testiment.} covenant, which was established upon better promises.

7 For if that first covenant had been faultless, then should no place have been sought for the second.

8 For finding fault with them, he saith, Behold, the days come, saith the Lord, when I will make a new covenant with the house of Israel and with the house of Judah:

5. Who] Or, "Men that." While v. 4 admitted the exclusive prerogative of the Levitical priests to minister in the earthly Tabernacle, this verse shews what the nature of their ministry was.

serve unto...] Rather, serve that which is a delineation (ix. 23). Compare xiii. 10, "who serve the tabernacle." The tabernacle was only a diminutive outline sketch, which afforded a few hints regarding "the heavenly things (or, places, ix. 23)."

and shadow] Such an outline, dim and obscure, as is given by the shadow of an object.

admonished of God] As in Acts vii. 44; where the same passage is referred to.

pattern] Or, "model:" (cp. on Exod. xxv. 9, Acts vii. 44). The word supplies no ground for any inference respecting the relative dimensions of this pattern and the tabernacle which Moses was to erect; nor yet as to the nature of the "pattern,"—whether it were presented to the sight of Moses, or only to his mental eye. It is implied, however, that only a representation of heavenly things was furnished by it.

6. But now]—"now," as the case actually stands: in contrast with the supposition of v. 4. Cp. the "But now" of ix. 26, xi. 16.

by how much also] This is an additional way of exhibiting the transcendent superiority of Christ's "ministry." The measure of excellence supplied in vv. 4, 5—the difference between an earthly "shadow" and the heavenly reality—appealed more vividly to the reason and imagination. The one which is now to be given—the superiority of the Covenant which the heavenly High-priest administers over that which was maintained by the Aaronic priesthood—is more practically impressive.

The Covenant, and the Priesthood by which it is established and sustained, are correlatives. In vii. 22 the superiority of the Christian Covenant was measured by that of the Priesthood, as determined by Ps. cx. 4. Here the superiority of Christ's Ministry is measured by that of the Covenant, as determined by Jer. xxxi. 31—34.

the mediator] who stands between the parties to the Covenant as one who is alike interested in both, and who gives assurance to both that the Covenant shall be fulfilled. Through His one offering of Himself on earth, human nature was restored to the favour of God. Through His perpetual intercession in heaven, sanctifying grace is poured down upon all "who come unto God by Him."

established] Or, enacted:—so that it was the law, by which God's dealings with His people were defined; the constitution, under which His people were to live (cp. vii. 11).

upon...] on the basis of them. The promises which were directly attached to the Sinaitic Covenant had reference to Israel's occupation of the land of Canaan, and were conditional on their observance of the Law. Those of the New Covenant provided for man's restoration to full communion with God, and (which is especially to be noted) guaranteed that power to observe the Law should be bestowed on the faithful.

7. faultless] Or, without room for blame. In itself, indeed, it was so; "holy and just and good" (Rom. vii. 12), "tending unto life" (ib. 10). But in respect of sinful man, it was defective, and "found to tend unto death" (ib.). If, then, it was to be blamed, the ground of blame was not with it, but with them (see v. 8).

sought] by that "everlasting love" of God, from which the New Covenant proceeded (Jer. xxxi. 3).

the second] Rather, a second.

8. For] This refers to the last clause of v. 7, of which the full force is; "Then would not place be sought, as it now is, for a second."

with them] the people. "Not with it, but with them," says St Chrysostom. The censure is contained in the clause, "because THEY continued not in My Covenant" (v. 9).

make...with] Lit. "accomplish...towards." The verb is not the one which is used here and in v. 10 by the LXX. (though it is used by them in Jer. xxxiv. 8, 15). The variation, however, is intentional, since the Septuagintal word is retained in x. 16, 17.

new covenant] Luke xxii. 20, 1 Cor. xi. 25.

9 Not according to the covenant that I made with their fathers in the day when I took them by the hand to lead them out of the land of Egypt; because they continued not in my covenant, and I regarded them not, saith the Lord.

10 For this is the covenant that I will make with the house of Israel after those days, saith the Lord; I will ^{Je 31. 32. in rev. Gr. & Lat.} put my laws into their mind, and write them ¹ in their hearts: and I will be to them a God, and they shall be to me a people:

11 And they shall not teach every man his neighbour, and every man his brother, saying, Know the Lord: for all shall know me, from the least to the greatest.

12 For I will be merciful to their unrighteousness, and their sins and their iniquities will I remember no more.

13 In that he saith, A new covenant, he hath made the first old. Now that which decayeth and waxeth old is ready to vanish away.

9. with] So the Hebrew of Jer. xxxi. 32. The Greek here (as in LXX.) is "for," or "unto" (and so also in v. 10).

they...and I] Both the pronouns are to be emphasized.

continued not] A very gentle expression indeed. For 900 years they had been constantly guilty of shameful violations of the Covenant.

regarded them not] Or, "withdrew my regard from them." Instead of shewing the tender care for them which He had done, He treated them with cold, unconcerned, severity; as an injured husband might see fit to deal with an unfaithful wife. They had broken their vows; but He still retained His rights over them, and (in His marvellous love) He would exercise those rights with sternness (see Additional Note).

10. will make] Lit. "will covenant."

after those days] After the commencement of the "days" spoken of in v. 8.

I will put] Lit. "putting" (and so the Alexandrine LXX.). We may render, Putting my laws into their mind, on their heart also will I write them. Cp. 2 Cor. iii. 3.

will be to them a God] "Giving them" (as Dr Brown observes) "every thing which beings like men can receive from such a Being as God."

11. neighbour] Or (correct reading), "fellow-citizen." Under the new Covenant all should be "taught of God" (Isai. liv. 13).

12. For] The promises contained in vv. 10, 11 form the substance of the Covenant. That which is here added supplies the ground on which such a Covenant could be established. Before they can "know God," they must first be graciously "known of Him" (cp. Exod. xxxiii. 12-17); so that all which separates between God and man may be removed. Comp. 1 John ii. 12, 13, 2 Cor. iv. 6.

merciful] Or, "propitious;" ready to bestow forgiveness.

their sins and their iniquities] So again in x. 17. The words "and their iniquities" (which are not found in the LXX. or in the Hebrew) may embody a reference to Exod. xxxiv. 9.

The fact that this remission of sin is specified as characteristic of the New Covenant implied that no such provision had been made by the Old (cp. Acts xiii. 38, 39).

13. made...old] Or, "declared...old." Though we are not (as the next clause shews) to introduce here the technical sense of "antiquate," yet that meaning is plainly pointed to.

decayeth...] Rather, "becometh old" (cp. 1. 11, Isai. li. 6) and decayeth with age."

ready to vanish away] Or, "nigh unto perishing." The word which corresponds to "perishing" is, according to its Septuagintal use, a very strong one; being frequently used for "ruin," "desolation," "destruction" (see Note below).

ADDITIONAL NOTES on CHAP. VIII. 3, 9, 13.

3. Cp. Athanasius, 'c. Arian.' II. 7: "When was He made High-priest of our profession, but when, having offered Himself for us, He raised His body from the dead? And now He Himself brings near those who approach by faith in Him, and offers (προσφέρει) them to the Father, ransoming all and making reconciliation (as in Heb. ii. 17) to God-ward on behalf of all."

9. The view, which is taken above, shews how we may reconcile the two renderings of לֹא יִלְמְדוּ which are given by the LXX. in Jer. xxxi. 32, iii. 14 (see the notes on those passages); namely, ἀμελείω, "to disregard (or, slight)," and κατακυριεύω, "to act as lord over." When the injured husband withdraws the manifestation of his kindness and uses his rightful power in the way of discipline, he becomes for the time simply "lord." See Hos. ii. 8—16; where the Baäli of v. 16 corresponds in idea to the לַיְי of Jeremiah. Compare also Ezek. xvi. 42, 43, 59, 60—63.

13. The expression ἐγγὺς ἀφανισμοῦ recalls the κατάρas ἐγγὺς of vi. 8. It is observable that the two nouns occur together in 2 K. xxii. 19, "when thou heardest what I spake against this place (Jerusalem) and against the inhabitants thereof, that they should become a desolation and a curse (εἰς ἀφανισμόν καὶ εἰς κατάρas)." The word ἀφανισμός is also used in Jer. xxv. 11, "this whole land shall be a desolation;" and Dan. ix. 26 (Theod.), "desolations are determined."

When the prophecy in Jer. xxxi was delivered, the seventy years' captivity, spoken of in ch. xxv, had actually begun (see xxix. 10). Although, therefore, the Temple was still standing, it was "nigh unto disappearing."

When the writer of this Epistle quoted Jer. xxxi, the second Temple was, in like manner, still standing, but drawing near to the crisis foretold in Dan. ix.

CHAP. IX. In the preceding chapter the apostle had spoken of Christ as now seated in the heavenly Sanctuary, ministering on His people's behalf under a new Covenant; which had for its basis the declaration, "Their sins and their iniquities will I remember no more." Evidently, if this were the case, the Jewish priesthood, sanctuary, sacrifices, and Days of Atonement (however precious in time past) were no longer of any worth. So serious a charge, alleged against a divinely appointed system, required to be more fully substantiated. This is done in the following discussion, ix. 1—x. 18; at the close of which there is a recurrence to the prophecy of Jeremiah. In this section it is shewn, not only that the Tabernacle arrangements, while typical of heavenly things, testified to their own imperfection, but also that their inherent "unprofitableness" had been distinctly stated in the 40th Psalm.

1. Then verily...] Rather (correct reading), Howbeit, that first also:—the first Covenant; which had been spoken of immediately before, in viii. 13. Although it was soon to be swept away, yet it had been provided by Divine wisdom to answer certain valuable ends.

ordinances] To which every worshipper was bound to conform.

a worldly sanctuary] Rather, its sanctuary pertaining to this world; belonging wholly to this visible, temporary, order of things (cp. Tit. ii. 12 "worldly").

The two points here introduced are treated of in the inverse order; the sanctuary in vv. 2—5, the service in vv. 6—10.

2. tabernacle] The writer nowhere mentions the Temple. He is speaking of the Levitical system, and will take it at its best;—as it was in the time of Moses (see on v. 4). The existing Temple had neither the glory of the Shekinah, nor so much as an ark, in it.

made] Or, as in iii. 4, "built." The tabernacle is first mentioned as a whole; and then its two portions are referred to separately.

the shewbread] Lit. "the laying out (or, setting forth) of loaves;" in two rows, Lev. xxiv. 6.

sanctuary] Or, "Holy Place."

3. the second veil] The first veil being that which hung at the entrance of the Holy Place (Exod. xxvi. 36).

4. golden censer] Rather, golden altar of incense. So the Itala ("altare"), and so Calvin, Estius, Owen, Lünemann, Bleek, and Delitzsch. The A. V. followed the Vulgate ("thuribulum"), as also did Aquinas, Luther, Bengel, &c.; influenced, no doubt, by the fact that the altar of incense stood in "the Holy Place." This fact, indeed, was, as Josephus says ('J. W.' v. 5), "notorious to all men;" nor does our text assert the contrary. It only makes the altar belong to the Most Holy Place; which is expressly affirmed in 1 K. vi. 22 (not correctly rendered in A. V.), "the altar that belongeth to the oracle." In Exod. xl. 5, also, this altar is made to stand in a direct relation to the ark and the ark of the covenant overlaid round about with gold, wherein was the golden pot that had manna, and Aaron's rod that budded, and the tables of the covenant;

5 And over it the cherubims of glory shadowing the mercyseat; of which we cannot now speak particularly.

6 Now when these things were thus ordained, the priests went always into the first tabernacle, accomplishing the service of God.

7 But into the second went the high priest alone once every year, not without blood, which he offered for himself, and for the errors of the people:

8 The Holy Ghost this signifying, that the way into the holiest of all was not yet made manifest, while as the first tabernacle was yet standing:

("before the Ark of Testimony"); cp. Rev. viii. 3. On the Day of Atonement the altar of incense was connected with the mercy-seat in a very marked way, (1) by the fact that the "blood of the sin-offering of atonement" was sprinkled on both of them (Lev. xvi. 15—19; cp. Exod. xxx. 10); (2) by the fact that "the censer" from off it (so the words imply) was taken into the Holiest (Lev. xvi. 12).

It seems incredible then that this altar should not be mentioned in vv. 2—4; while the difficulty attaching to its being spoken of as belonging to the Most Holy Place is scarcely appreciable. Though locally situate in the Holy Place, it did in its nature and idea appertain to the Most Holy; and on the Day of Atonement was (as we have seen) distinctly associated with the Ark of the Covenant. (See Additional Note.)

golden pot] So the LXX. in Exod. xvi. 33. That this and Aaron's rod were placed inside the ark, might be inferred from Exod. xvi. 34 and Num. xvii. 10, in which it is commanded that they should be put "before the Testimony;" for this "Testimony" (the Law on the Two Tables) was "put into the ark" (Exod. xxv. 16). The circumstance that there was nothing in the ark, when it was placed in Solomon's Temple (1 K. viii. 9), except the Two Tables, is mentioned as if it were something remarkable.—Was it not also significant? That outwardly gorgeous temple was without the two great memorial symbols of Divine energy which had existed in the lowly tabernacle.

5. of glory] According to Jewish tradition there was a visible glory—the Shekinah—resting upon the Cherubim. According to Jerome, God's "dwelling upon the cherubim" was simply a fact revealed to, and to be apprehended by, faith. It would seem, however, from Lev. xvi. 2, that there was some visible appearance on the Day of Atonement.

shadowing] Rather, overshadowing. Their uplifted wings and bowed heads indicated the mysterious sanctity of the "Mercy-seat;" which was the very heart of the Holy of Holies, the meeting-point of God and man (Exod. xxv. 22). The word rendered "mercy-seat" is literally "propitiatory" (cp. Rom. iii. 25, where the same word is used).

Obs. The tables of the Law, and the Mercy-seat surmounting them, correspond to the promises of the New Covenant mentioned in ch. viii. 10, 12. The first, "Putting my laws into their mind, on their heart also will I write them" (on the "fleshy tablets of their heart," 2 Cor. iii. 3), is surmounted by the second, "I will be merciful to their unrighteousnesses."

particularly] That is, severally, or, in detail.

6. went...into] Literally it is, "Now, these things having been thus arranged, the priests go in;" and similarly in v. 7, "offereth;" in v. 8, "hath not been made...is standing;" in v. 9, "are offered." These shew that the writer transfers himself mentally to the Tabernacle period. It is more convenient, however, to retain the past tense in English.

the service of God] Rather, the services; the various acts of their ministry, such as lighting the lamps and burning the incense.

7. alone] without attendants. Not even a priest was allowed to enter the Holy Place while the High-priest was making atonement (Lev. xvi. 17).

once] Upon one day only. On that day he made two entrances: first, with the incense and the blood of the bullock for himself, and then, with the blood of the goat, for the ignorances (cp. v. 2) of the people.

offered] Sprinkling it upon, and before, the mercy-seat (Lev. xvi. 14, 15).

8. The Holy Ghost] who spake by Moses. signifying] Clearly indicating (xii. 27).

made manifest] The Old Testament saints had access by faith to the favour and grace of God, and the tabernacle services assisted them in drawing near to Him. But the veil, which was drawn over the mystery of Redemption, was not removed until the true High-priest had come and effected a real atonement.

was yet standing] Lit. "as yet had standing;" or, retained its divinely appointed status. The services of the Aaronic priesthood were

9 Which was a figure for the time then present, in which were offered both gifts and sacrifices, that could not make him that did the service perfect, as pertaining to the conscience ;

10 Which stood only in meats and drinks, and divers washings, and carnal ordinances, imposed on them until the time of reformation.

Or, rites
or, ceremonies.

11 But Christ being come an high priest of good things to come, by a performed in "the first tabernacle," the Holy Place. These depended for their validity on the observances of the Day of Atonement; but those observances intimated most clearly that the way into the Holiest was not yet "made manifest." So far was the Aaronic priesthood from affording to Israel direct access to the "throne of grace" in Heaven, that even the high-priest himself—the "called of God" (ch. v. 4)—was not allowed to enter the symbolic "Holy of Holies" except for two short intervals on one day in each year; when he entered (Jewish tradition says) with fear and trembling, bearing with him sacrificial blood, which had no power to appease the conscience. That "first tabernacle," then, testified that admission to God's presence was not yet granted. At the same time, since God Himself had ordained this ceremonial system, it supplied ground for hoping that a complete reconciliation between God and man would in due time take place.

9. Which] Or, "Which indeed." This assigns a reason why nothing better could be effected during "the first tabernacle." It was but an acted parable; useful as answering certain disciplinary and prophetic purposes, but incapable of cleansing the conscience.

the time then present] The "then" is justified by our having used the past tense of the verbs (see on v. 6). Lit. "which indeed is a parable for the time present." The meaning of this 'present time' is ascertained by the contrasted 'time of reformation' in v. 10; according to which it must denote the Levitical period (see Additional Note).

in which] Or, "throughout which." So the Received Text, the Itala, and the Peshito. Others (adopting a well-supported, but perhaps less probable, reading); "in accordance with which (parable);" implying that ceremonial sacrifices were in keeping with a symbolic tabernacle.

him that...] Whether the ministering priest (cp. viii. 5), or the worshipper whose offering he presented (cp. v. 14).

the conscience] Not even the rites of the Day of Atonement, much less the ordinary services, could heal the wounded conscience, or give an assurance of perfect reconciliation with God. They effected what was necessary for the maintenance of an Israelite's corporate privileges; and, taken in combination with God's other declarations concerning Himself, they supplied him with a good hope of forgiveness, but no more. Cp. on x. 3.

10. Which stood only...] Rather (correct reading), "connected only with meats and drinks, and divers washings,—carnal ordinances imposed until, &c.:"—the term "carnal ordinances" being in apposition with the "gifts and sacrifices" of v. 9. The ceremonial law kept men's thoughts revolving upon material things, as (1) the sacrificial "meats and drinks," of which the priests and people partook; and (2) the "divers washings," enjoined on the priests before they offered sacrifice (Exod. xxx. 19—21), or required in case of defilement contracted by persons or things (Lev. xi. 25, 32).

reformation] Strictly, "rectification;" the setting things right which have gone wrong. Here the thing to be "rectified" was the relation in which fallen man stands to God.

11, 12. being come] Having at last arrived; after He had been so long expected (comp. Isai. lvi. 1, lxii. 11). The name "Christ" points to His being the reality, of which the "anointed" priest (Lev. xvi. 32) was the typical prophecy (v. 14).

of good things...] Or, "of the good things that were to come" (comp. x. 1). From the beginning these "good things" had been designed for man. Prophets had announced their approach (cp. Isai. lii. 7, "bringeth glad tidings of good things," LXX.). Christ came to procure and dispense them. They were the things which He administered as High-priest;—forgiveness, sanctification, and eternal life.

by a greater...] This and the first part of v. 12 are to be read together, as dependent on the clause "entered in..." "Christ..., through a greater and more perfect Tabernacle, and (not by means of the blood of goats and calves, but) by means of His own blood, entered in...having obtained..." He "entered in once into the Holy Place through a greater Tabernacle, having obtained eternal redemption by means of His own blood." The "Tabernacle not made with hands" (cp. Acts vii. 48) appears to be best referred (with Lunemann and Delitzsch) to the heavens, through which "the Great High Priest passed" (iv. 14; cp. viii. 2, and v. 24 below). A large number of commentators, however, both ancient and modern, understand it of our greater and more perfect tabernacle, not made with hands, that is to say, not of this building;

12 Neither by the blood of goats and calves, but by his own blood he entered in once into the holy place, having obtained eternal redemption for us.

13 For if the blood of bulls and of goats, and the ashes of an heifer sprinkling the unclean, sanctifieth to the purifying of the flesh:

14 How much more shall the blood of Christ, who through the eternal Spirit offered himself without ^{1 Or, fault.} spot to God, purge your conscience from dead works to serve the living God?

15 And for this cause he is the mediator of the new testament, that of this building] Rather, belonging to this creation;—to this creation, which is all of it “made subject to vanity” (Rom. viii. 19—22).

12. goats and calves] sacrificed on the Day of Atonement (v. 13; Lev. xvi. 14, 15). once] once for all (vv. 26, 28).

obtained] by His obedience unto death (v. 15; Matt. xx. 28; Eph. i. 7).

eternal redemption] A recovery of man's forfeited inheritance (v. 15; cp. Eph. i. 14); and such a recovery of it as would secure it for ever.

Obs. The word for “redemption” (not quite the same as in v. 15) is the one used in Lev. xxv. 23—29, of the purchasing back land or house which had been parted with under the pressure of poverty. Man, who, as a child of God, had been heir of “a house eternal in the heavens” (2 Cor. v. 1), had parted with his privilege. The title, forfeited by sin, was won back by Christ's offering of Himself;—a sacrifice of infinite worth (v. 14). Cp. Hos. xiii. 14; Rom. viii. 19, 23.

13—28. The remainder of the chapter is an expansion of the statement which has been made in vv. 11, 12:—the fact that our redemption was effected by the blood of Christ being illustrated in vv. 13—22; while vv. 23—28 dwell on the eternal efficacy of His sacrifice.

13. ashes] Used in the “water of purification” (Num. xix. 17—19), which is called by the LXX. “water of sprinkling” (in vv. 9, 13, 20, 21).

the unclean] Or, “them that have been defiled.”

to the purifying] Lit. “unto the purity.”

of the flesh] So that a man who had “touched a dead body” (Num. xix. 11—16) was no longer debarred from entering the congregation. The disqualification created by the Law might be removed by a legal rite; yet such rite had no intrinsic value. The real purpose of the enactment was to drive men to think of the need there was of being cleansed from the defilement of sin (of which death was the fruit), and to awaken in them a hope of God's willingness so to purify them.

14. of Christ] Lit. “of the Christ;” of Him who was anointed to His priestly office by the Holy Spirit (Acts x. 38: cp. Luke v. 18).

through the eternal Spirit] The anointing of that Spirit (whose energy is the “Fire of love”) was as a flame, amidst which He, in the freedom of filial obedience (ch. v. 8, 9), “offered Himself up to God.” By that act of holy love He was evidenced to be perfect and without spot (cp. Num. xix. 2). For further remarks see Note below.

your conscience] Many authorities have “our.” Tischendorf and Tregelles retain “your.”

dead works] Works tainted with the corruption which entered man's soul when he lost his love of “the living God.” The fact of such corruption is testified by the conscience, whose declarations none can set aside. “No man can restore his own soul to life” (Ps. xxii. 29). Comp. ch. vi. 1.—There may be an allusion to the ceremonial pollution noticed on v. 13.

to serve] Or, “to worship” (compare v. 9, x. 2, xii. 28). The nature of this “rational service” is explained in Rom. xii. 1. They only can offer it duly who have been “sanctified” (cp. Lev. x. 2) through Christ.

the living God] For communion with whom the Old Testament saints thirsted so intensely (Ps. xlii. 2); longing for the time when the hidden mystery, which separated them from the mercy-seat, would be laid open, and full access be granted them to Him “with whom is the fountain of Life” (Ps. xxxvi. 9).

15. for this cause] Rather, by reason of this;—because of the purifying efficacy of His self-oblation. He was thus qualified to act as Mediator of “the New Covenant” (viii. 8); to secure its perpetual validity. For His sake God can now “be merciful” (viii. 12) to the sins of His people. Through Him the Holy Spirit is sent down to “write” God's laws “on their hearts” (viii. 10).

new testament] Rather, new covenant, as in viii. 8, xii. 24. It is evident from x. 15—17 that the passage, which has been quoted by means of death, for the redemption of the transgressions that were under the first testament, they which are called might receive the promise of eternal inheritance.

16 For where a testament is, there must also of necessity ¹ be the death ^{Or be brought in.} of the testator.

17 For a testament is of force after men are dead: otherwise it is from Jeremiah, dominates the whole discussion in chh. viii—x. The use of the term “Mediator” of itself shews that we have here to do with the Hebrew idea of a “covenant,” not with the Roman idea of a “testament.” A mediator is the proper guardian of a covenant (see Gal. iii. 15—20), but has no place in regard to a testament. Neither again does the death of a testator possess any of the sacrificial character which is referred to in vv. 15—22 (see further in Note below).

that by means of...] Rather; that, a death having taken place for... The indefiniteness of the expression is suited to the mysterious nature of the act which is referred to. Christ “tasted death on behalf of every man” (ii. 9). He “died for all;” and so in His death “all (in effect) died” (2 Cor. v. 14, 15). By that “death” the accuser’s power was abolished (ii. 15). The penalty due from man for his “transgressions” of God’s covenant (Hos. vi. 7) was now paid: and, as regarded Israel in particular, there was “a redemption of the transgressions that were under the first Covenant;” that is, a ransom, which more than compensated for those transgressions, and so procured their remission. Comp. Eph. i. 7, Col. i. 14; in both of which “redemption” is made co-ordinate with “the remission of sins” (as in v. 22 below); the ground of the redemption in both passages being “the blood of Christ” (comp. Matt. xx. 28).

under the first]—for which that first Covenant supplied no real expiation. Though “passed over through the forbearance of God,” they were not expiated until the second Covenant was established (Rom. iii. 25, 26).

are called] Or, “have been called;”—made “partakers of the heavenly calling” (iii. 1). Cp. 1 Thess. ii. 12.

might receive...] Rather, “may receive the promise of the eternal inheritance.” To “receive the promise,” here means, to have it fulfilled to them.

eternal inheritance] The “inheritance” (1 K. viii. 36) assigned to Israel under the provisions of the first Covenant was held by them “but a little while” (Isai. lxiii. 17, 18). The inheritance promised in the New Covenant is (like the Covenant itself, ch. xiii. 20) eternal. Cp. 1 Pet. i. 4.

16. a testament] Rather, a covenant. The statement here made is to be taken (no less than that in v. 22) as relative to the subject under discussion; in other words, as referring to covenants between God and man.

there must...] Rather, there must needs be alleged (or, supposed) the death of him that made the covenant. The term rendered “alleged” is wide enough to include the representative deaths by means of sacrifice, which accompanied the elder covenants, as well as that actual death which sealed the New Covenant (1 Cor. xi. 25). See Additional Note.

When God engages to bless sinful man, He recedes from the claims of eternal justice, which has laid the sinner under sentence of death. Every such covenant engagement, then, must from the first have rested on the foreseen death of a Mediator to come, who should be God as well as man. And, in fact, the earlier covenants were all accompanied by intimations of the necessity of such a death. So the covenant of “natural mercies” given to Noah was preceded by sacrifice (Gen. viii. 20—22). Isaac, with whom God purposed to establish His great covenant of blessing (Gen. xviii. 19), was rescued from death by the intervention of a divinely provided victim (Gen. xxii. 8—18). The covenant, in virtue of which Israel held possession of Canaan, was ratified by sacrifice (vv. 19, 20, below). They, whom God shall gather to Himself at the last day as His saints, are they who have “made a covenant with” Him “by sacrifice” (Ps. l. 5; see on v. 17).

In the death of Christ, as Mediator, both the parties to the Covenant had an interest. In that Jesus was, and represented, man, He endured death as the penalty of human sin. In that He was, and represented, God, He paid a ransom, which was sufficient to recover man from death and to open for him the gate of everlasting life.

17. a testament...] Rather, a covenant is steadfast that is made over the dead. So in Ps. l. 5 the strict rendering is “that make covenant with Me over sacrifice” (LXX. “over sacrifices”); the sacrifices being the presupposition, on which the ratification of the covenant proceeded.

otherwise...] Rather, whereas it hath no force when he that made the covenant liveth. The “living God” could not, as such, enter into a covenant “of life and peace” with sinful man. He had laid man under sentence of death. No created being could roll away that sentence; for none could “take away the sin of the world.” A covenant that promised eternal life to man appeared, therefore, impossible:—unless there could be One in whose person the Godhead and of no strength at all while the testator liveth.

18 Whereupon neither the first ^{10 Or, first} testament was ^{11 ded.} dedicated without blood.

19 For when Moses had spoken every precept to all the people according to the law, he took the blood of calves and of goats, with water, ^{12, 13, 14} and scarlet wool, and hyssop, and sprinkled both the book, and all the people, 20 Saying, This is the blood of the testament which God hath enjoined unto you.

21 Moreover he sprinkled with blood both the tabernacle, and all the vessels of the ministry.

22 And almost all things are by the law purged with blood; and without shedding of blood is no remission.

23 It was therefore necessary that manhood should meet together (cp. Note on ch. vii. 21); who, suffering death as Mediator, should, as man, endure the penalty of man's sin; as God, "purchase to Himself a Church by His own blood" (Acts xx. 28). See Additional Note.

That this is the true interpretation of v. 17 (resting on the idea of a Covenant, not of a testament), will be made plain by the three next verses, which follow upon it in the way of illustration.

18. Whereupon...] Rather, For which cause neither was the first (covenant) dedicated] Or, "inaugurated;" solemnly and formally instituted. In x. 20 the word is rendered, "consecrated."

19. according to...] Each separate command was recited by Moses in conformity with the Law which had been communicated to him by God (Exod. xxiv. 3). Thereupon the people promised obedience. But this assent of theirs was not adequate ground for the Covenant to stand upon. The basis on which its ratification rested was provided in the sacrifices that were offered afterwards (v. 6).

of calves and of goats] corresponding severally to the "peace-offerings" and the "burnt-offerings" mentioned in Exod. xxiv. 5.

with...hyssop] These accessories are not mentioned in Exod. xxiv. But scarlet wool and hyssop are mentioned in Lev. xix. 6, 7 as employed in the sprinkling of blood; and the water was useful for keeping the blood fluid.

the book, and] Rather, the book itself and. We are told in Exod. xxiv. 6, 7, that after Moses had sprinkled one half of the sacrificial blood on the altar, he took the book and read it; as if the book had been on the altar. Thus the altar with the book upon it represented God's Justice; which could enter into covenant relations with sinful man only by means of an atonement. The blood sprinkled on the people represented them as sharers in the atoning death.

20. the blood of the testament] Rather, the blood of the covenant; as in x. 29, Exod. xxiv. 8. See also ch. xiii. 20, Zech. ix. 11 (cp. Matt. xxvi. 28, 1 Cor. xi. 25).

which...enjoined] This refers to "the covenant" (cp. Josh. vii. 11, Ps. cxi. 9). It brings into prominence the specific nature of the Sinaitic Covenant, as a Law whose promises were conditional upon the people's obedience (cp. Gal. iii. 17).

God] In Exod. xxiv. 8, "the Lord;" (cp. John vi. 45). "The change avoids any confusion that might have arisen from the evangelical sense of 'the Lord'" (Delitzsch).

unto you] Or, "in regard to you."

21. The Tabernacle, as the abiding symbol of God's being in covenant with the people, was also sprinkled with blood. This, though not actually stated, may be inferred from what is said in Exodus and Leviticus. For

(1) A comparison of Exod. xl. 9—15 and Lev. viii. 10, 12 shews that the consecration of the Tabernacle ran closely in parallelism with that of Aaron; and we know from Lev. viii. 30 that Aaron was sprinkled with blood.

And (2) on the Day of Atonement (when, in fact, a renewal of the original consecration took place, cp. on vii. 27, 28) the High-priest was directed to "make atonement" for the Tabernacle (Lev. xvi. 16); which was done by the sprinkling of blood.

Josephus ('Ant.' iii. 8) says expressly, that Moses sprinkled not only Aaron, but the Tabernacle also, with both oil and blood.

be sprinkled...both the] Rather, be in like manner sprinkled...th:.

22. And almost] The adverb probably qualifies both the clauses. "One might almost say, that all purifications are, according to the Law, made with blood, and that apart from shedding of blood no remission (or, forgiveness) takes place." For instances of "purification" made by blood, see Lev. xii—xvi; for cases of "forgiveness," Lev. iv, v.

An exception to the rule occurs in Lev. v. 11—13, where a needy person is allowed to present fine flour as a "trespass-offering." But even here a portion was to be burnt on the Altar of Burnt-offering; which was always associated with blood.

shedding of blood...remission] Luke xxii. 20.

23. necessary] Both because it was so prescribed by the Law, and because such a provision was in itself fitting (see on vv. 16, the patterns of things in the heavens should be purified with these; but the heavenly things themselves with better sacrifices than these.

24 For Christ is not entered into the holy places made with hands, which are the figures of the true; but into heaven itself, now to appear in the presence of God for us:

25 Nor yet that he should offer himself often, as the high priest entereth into the holy place every year with blood of others;

26 For then must he often have suffered since the foundation of the world: but now once in the end of the world hath he appeared to put away sin by the sacrifice of himself.

17); not, certainly, because the rites themselves had any cleansing virtue (x. 4, 11). Their value arose simply from their being appointed by God (Lev. xvii. 11); who was pleased to accept the blood of the slain animal as a vehicle of atonement for the offerer's soul: this efficacy being assigned to it because it typified the blood of the One true Sacrifice for sin.

patterns] Rather, delineations (the same word as in viii. 5, "example").

with these] such things as the blood of goats and calves (v. 19).

heavenly things] Or, "heavenly places" (as in Eph. i. 20). The relations of Heaven and earth had been disturbed by man's sin. He, who is pure light, without any admixture of darkness (1 John i. 5), had (unchanged in Himself) become in regard to sinful man "a consuming fire" (cp. ch. xii. 18, 29). The Holy Love of God could shine forth in its serene brightness only after that real atonement for sin, which was made by Christ.

better sacrifices] The plural denoting what we should express by, a better kind of sacrifice.

24. is not entered] Rather, entered not (as in v. 12).

figures] typical images; differing from the archetypes not less widely than a photograph of the sun differs from the sun.

heaven itself] The heaven of the Divine glory (see on viii. 2).

now] So that the present dispensation is one continuous Day of full and perfect Atonement; since God and man now meet together without any cloud between them.

to appear] personally, as our Advocate (see Note below). The Aaronic high-priest entered the Holy of Holies only under a cloud of incense; as one who was unworthy of gazing even on the typical cherubic throne.

25. Nor yet] Rather, And not (as in v. 12;—vv. 24, 25 being precisely parallel to vv. 11, 12). It was needful that the heavenly places should be purified with a nobler kind of sacrifice (v. 23): and so they have been; "for" (v. 24) Christ has entered into heaven itself, reconciling man with God; "and" (v. 25) His atoning sacrifice is not one that needs to be repeated. The annually recurring entrances into the typical sanctuary were to have no place in the antitype. They were, indeed, due only to the essential imperfection of the type (see on v. 8). The Aaronic high-priest, having obtained a glimpse of the possibility of atonement, retired from the Holy of Holies. But, when Jesus entered heaven, it was to stand before God uninterruptedly on our behalf, "and not that He should offer Himself often;" His one self-oblation on the cross (vv. 14, 28, x. 10, 12) possessing an efficacy which extends to the whole race of man to the end of time.

with (Lev. xvi. 3) blood of others] Or, "with blood not his own:"—so that he cannot rest any claim of personal desert upon it.

26. For then...] If His one sacrifice be not available for all coming time, how is it that all God's saints, "from the foundation of the world" (Luke xi. 50), have approached God acceptably (ch. xi. 4) in the use of sacrifices? These were of themselves valueless, and derived their worth simply from being anticipations of the One true Oblation. If His sacrifice had such power in past time as "fore-ordained" (cp. 1 Pet. i. 20), much more, now that it is actually accomplished, will it suffice for all future ages.

in the end of the world] Lit. "at the consummation of the ages;" that "fulness of time," towards which all former ages had been converging; in which all things in heaven and earth were to be gathered up into unity in Christ (Eph. i. 10, Col. i. 20).

appeared] Rather, been manifested (comp. Rom. xvi. 26; Col. i. 26; 1 Tim. iii. 16; 1 Pet. i. 20; 1 John iii. 5); coming forth from the bosom of the Father to reveal the mysterious purpose which had been "kept unuttered during countless ages" (Rom. xvi. 25; Eph. iii. 9).

to put away sin] Lit. "for the disannulling (as in vii. 18) of sin." His perfect obedience not only abrogated "the law of sin," which had prevailed over the whole of Adam's race; but had real value to procure the abolition of the condemnatory power of sin, in respect of all those who are identified with Him by loyal obedience.

sacrifice of himself] So that He was priest and victim in one: priest, in His act of self-bear the sins of many; and unto them that look for him shall he appear the second time without sin unto salvation.

consecration; victim, in His endurance of a penal death for sins not His own.

27. as] Rather, "forasmuch as." Men have but one probationary life assigned them to do their work in. At death each man's work has finality stamped upon it; though its character will not be made manifest until the Day of Judgment. So too was it with Him who was "made in all things like unto His brethren" (ii. 17). Christ's work of redemption was definitely completed by His self-oblation; though the nature of its results cannot yet be made manifest. But at His second appearing the unspeakable grandeur of that work will shine forth in the salvation of all His faithful servants.

it is appointed] The verb properly belongs to both the terms which follow. Lit. "there is in reserve (cp. 2 Tim. iv. 8, Col. i. 5) for men once to die, and after that judgment."

28. So] Rather (correct reading), So also. Christ] "The Christ;" Priest and King. His first coming into the world (x. 5) was to offer His one atoning sacrifice, as Priest. He is now carrying on His mediatorial work in heaven, "a Priest upon His throne." When He re-appears, it will be to bestow His kingly gift of salvation.

was...offered] In the passive. Over against the death that is in reserve for men lies the one offering; demanded by divine Justice, provided by divine Love.

to bear the sins of many] A quotation from Isai. liii. 12. Upon the cross Christ "bare in His own body" the burden of the collective "sin of the world" (cp. 1 Pet. ii. 24, John i. 29). Now He is engaged in dispensing the virtue of His atonement to individual souls;—whose characteristic is that they "look (or, wait) for Him" (Phil. iii. 20). Cp. Isai. xxv. 9: "Lo, this is our God; we have waited for Him, and He will save us."

shall be appear] As in Isai. lxvi. 5. Every eye of man, indeed, shall see Him (Rev. i. 7); but "to them that wait for Him He shall appear unto salvation;" the completer, as He was the author (ii. 10, v. 9), of their salvation. Cp. Col. iii. 4, 1 Pet. v. 4.

without sin] Standing wholly apart from it: no longer; as at His first coming, "made sin for us" (2 Cor. v. 21).

ADDITIONAL NOTES on CHAP. IX. 4, 9, 14, 15, 16, 17, 24.

4. The word θυμιατήριον is used as the designation of the Incense-altar by Philo (i. 504), and Josephus ('Ant.' III. vi. 8; 'J. W.' v. v. 5); as also by Clem. Alex., and Origen. A different word (πυρεῖον, "fire-pan") is used by the LXX. for "censer" in Lev. xvi. 12. The adjective χρυσέον is applied to the Altar of Incense in Exod. xl. 5.

9. As regards the preposition eis, it may be either (1) for;—as in eis éniavtón, "for a (whole) year" (Hom. 'Il.' XIX. 32), or (2) unto;—a parable designed for those who lived before Christ came.

The καθ' όν of the next clause (καθ' όν) will mean "during" or "throughout."

14. Instead of αἰώνιον, many cursives have αἰών; and so the Itala, Vulg., and Coptic versions read. The variation is of no textual value, but is interesting as a testimony to the view which was taken of the meaning of the passage. In modern times many have understood by the "Eternal Spirit," either our Lord's Divine nature, or His human spirit. The use of the preposition διὰ seems scarcely consistent with either of these views; but harmonizes with the reference to the Holy Spirit. This reference is further supported by the prominence given to the title Χριστός in this chapter; recurring as it does in vv. 11, 14, 24, 28. The great High-priest needed no baptism to cleanse Him from sin; but He was anointed at His baptism with the Holy Ghost, in preparation for His priestly work. In the power of that anointing He "offered Himself without spot to God."

15. In addition to what has been urged above, observe that

(1) The word διαθήκη occurs frequently in the LXX., and always means Covenant.

(2) In vv. 18—20 we have Exod. xxiv. 8 quoted; where the word certainly denotes a covenant.

(3) The εἰσαγγελία, here associated with the διαθήκη, is used eight times in Gal. iii. 14—28 of God's covenant-promises. Comp. also ch. vi. 17, viii. 6; Eph. ii. 12; Acts iii. 25.

(4) To speak of "transgressions under a testament" (v. 15) is to join together incongruous ideas: whereas Israel is often said to have "transgressed" God's "covenant" (Deut. xvii. 2; Josh. xxiii. 16; Judg. ii. 20; 2 K. xviii. 12; Jer. xxxiv. 18; Hos. vi. 7, viii. 1).

(5) The return of the Mediator to life was necessary for the establishing of the Covenant (cp. 1 Pet. i. 3, 4): while the return of a testator to life would invalidate a testament.

(6) The idea of a covenant recurs in xii. 24 ("the Mediator of the New Covenant") and in xiii. 20.

16. The verb, φέρω, is used by Demosthenes (Liddell and Scott) of "alleging," or, bringing forward, "reasons." This, or nearly this, meaning is assigned to the word here by most modern commentators.

The Syriac uses the same word here that it does in ch. xii. 27 (A. V. "signifieth"), John xii. 33, xxi. 19.

The Vulg. has intercedat, "should take place;"—the same verb being used in v. 15 to represent γενομένου ("morte intercedente").

17. The assertion here made about a "covenant" (like that made in ch. v. 1 about "high-priests") must be taken as limited by the matter in hand; that is, it refers to a divine Covenant.

The general idea of a Covenant is, a solemn guarantee given by a person to maintain towards another the relation of peace and goodwill (Gen. xxi. 23, xxvi. 28—31), friendship (1 Sam. xviii. 3, 4), brotherhood (Zech. xi. 14, LXX.), or love (Mal. ii. 14). Plainly, then, death is no way necessary to the formation of a covenant between man and man. If any wrong have been done by either party, it must be set right (Gen. xxi. 25, 1 Kings xx. 34); but nothing more is needed. On the other hand, death enters of necessity into the idea of a covenant between God and man; since death is the penalty of sin, and sin adheres to all mankind. Sinful man can be brought into communion with the holy God only if provision be made for the forgiveness of his sin, and his restoration to holiness; both of which are provided for by the death of Christ (ii. 11, 17), the Mediator of the New Covenant.

This distinction is brought out prominently by a comparison of Gen. xxi. 22—32 and xxii. 9—13;—

(1) In xxi. 22—32 Abraham and Abimelech made a covenant (διέθεντο ἀμφοτέροι διαθήκην); but there is no sacrifice.

(2) In xxii. 9—13 the Divine Covenant is made ἐπὶ νεκροῖς. Isaac, representing "the seed of Abraham," is laid on the altar and is reckoned among the dead; "from whence also in a figure" (ch. xi. 19) he was raised. Shortly afterwards a victim provided by God is seen lying dead on the same altar. In the Antitype both the parties to the Covenant meet together.

24. In vv. 24, 26, 28 three different Greek verbs are all rendered in A. V. by "appear:"—in v. 24, ἐμφανισθῆναι, which is used in Acts xxiv. 1, xxv. 2 almost as a legal term, "to appear personally;" in v. 26, πεφανέρωται (see the note on v. 26); in v. 28, ὀφθῆσεται, which means simply to be seen, or become visible.

CHAPTER X.

1 The weakness of the law sacrifices. 10 The sacrifice of Christ's body once offered, 14 for ever hath taken away sins. 19 An exhortation to hold fast the faith, with patience and thanksgiving.

CHAP. X. With the concluding word of ix. 28, "salvation," the great argument of chh. vii—ix was virtually brought to a close. In vv. 1—18 of the present chapter it is recapitulated and enforced. This section has three subdivisions, each of which rests upon a passage of the Old Testament: (1) vv. 1—10, of the perfect sacrifice of Christ, on Ps. xl. 6—8; (2) vv. 11—13, of His perfect ministry, on Ps. cx. 1; (3) vv. 14—18, of the perfect Covenant which He has established, on Jer. xxxi. 33, 34. The ruling thought of the section is seen in vv. 4, 10 ("once"), v. 12 ("one sacrifice"), v. 14 ("one offering"), v. 18 ("no more offering for sin").

1. For] Only in Christ (ix. 11, 28) was this hope of present forgiveness and final salvation to be found: For the Law was utterly powerless to give these. It only furnished a shadowy outline (viii. 5) of the good things that were to come (ix. 11).

FOR the law having a shadow of good things to come, and not the very image of the things, can never with those sacrifices which they offered year by year continually make the comers thereunto perfect.

the very image of the things] In the Gospel we have the full, lifelike, presentation of the actual things (cp. xi. 1 b). In Christ atonement, sanctification, and salvation, are facts; ever present to the eye of faith.

Obs. The delineation of Christ's work given in the Psalms and Prophets went far beyond the shadows of the Law; yet, after all, it remained but a dim outline of things that were hoped for, and not as yet accomplished.

with those...] Rather, with the same sacrifices, year after year, which. The reference is plainly to the ever-recurring Days of Atonement. Each of these involved a confession that its predecessor had failed to provide the worshippers with freedom of access to God's presence. The fact, that the same sacrifices had to be reiterated in never-ending succession, shewed that they did not effect a true and final atonement.

the comers thereunto] Or, "those that draw near (with them);" comp. v. 22, vii. 25.

2 For then would they not have ceased to be offered? because that the worshippers once purged should have had no more conscience of sins.

3 But in those sacrifices there is a remembrance again made of sins every year.

4 For it is not possible that the blood of bulls and of goats should take away sins.

5 Wherefore when he cometh into the world, he saith, Sacrifice and offering thou wouldest not, but a body ¹ hast thou prepared me:

6 In burnt offerings and sacrifices for sin thou hast had no pleasure.

7 Then said I, Lo, I come (in the volume of the book it is written of me,) to do thy will, O God.

8 Above when he said, Sacrifice

perfect] restored to complete peace and communion with God (cp. v. 2, ix. 9).

2. once] "once for all." This purification is provided in the new Covenant; its outward pledge being the "one baptism for the remission of sins." Cp. v. 22, ix. 14; Rom. vi. 4-14.

conscience of sins] consciousness of unforgiven sins; such as separated from God and called for fresh expiatory sacrifices. The one sacrifice of Christ avails for the uninterrupted purification of all who "walk in the light" (1 John i. 7, ii. 1, 2).

3. a remembrance again made] The Greek has simply "a remembering:"—a recalling to mind of sins which, although "passed over through the forbearance of God" (Rom. iii. 25), continued adhering to the people; so that every returning Day of Atonement called for new typical sacrifices, "because of the uncleanness of the children of Israel and because of all their transgressions in all their sins" (Lev. xvi. 16; cp. 1 Cor. xv. 17).

The confession of the people's sins was made, not over the head of the slain goat, but over that of the living one: which bore them away, symbolically, to oblivion (Lev. xvi. 21);—put out of sight and passed over, rather than atoned for.

4. of bulls and of goats] Still pointing to the Day of Atonement (cp. ix. 12, 13).

take away] The word used in Isai. vi. 7, Zech. iii. 4 (A. V. "caused...to pass").

5. Wherefore] Since the legal sacrifices were unable to make any real atonement, the prophetic Psalm represents the Saviour as putting those sacrifices aside, and substituting for them His own perfect obedience and self-oblation.

when he]—the "Christ" of ix. 28. That the Psalm refers to Christ is evident, for

(1) The speaker is one whose coming had been foretold "in the volume of the Book" (v. 7); but it was of Christ that "Moses in the Law and the prophets did write" (John i. 45).

(2) In Christ only can vv. 8 and 12 be reconciled: "Thy Law is within my heart;"

"mine iniquities have taken hold of me" (cp. Isai. liii. 11).

(3) The reference to Christ gives harmony to vv. 12-17; in which one who is burdened with numberless "iniquities" solicits no pardon, but appeals to God for help, with the certainty that God "thinketh upon" Him.

(4) The confidence with which the speaker represents his own obedience as the object of Divine complacency, and as effecting the end which the legal sacrifices pointed to, but could not attain, is appropriate to none but Christ.

into the world] Resigning His supra-mundane glory; the glory which He had "before the world was" (John xvii. 5). Cp. John iii. 17, ix. 39, xvi. 28.

Sacrifice and offering] The former of these terms is applied more specially to the "peace-offerings" (Lev. iii. 1, 6, 9, vii. 11-34), the latter to the meal-offering. The burnt-offerings and sin-offerings are spoken of in v. 6.

wouldest not] They were not the end aimed at in the Divine arrangements. They came in only provisionally, as a means by which men might be trained to draw near to God in lowly, reverential, faith, and so be enabled to obey Him (cp. Jer. vii. 21-23).

a body...] So the LXX.; paraphrasing, as it does elsewhere, in a difficult passage. The Hebrew (cp. note on Ps. xl. 6) is literally: "Ears hast Thou digged unto (or, for) Me;" ears into which Thy word may sink deep. The rendering of the Seventy seems to imply that they understood the passage of Messiah, whose obedience was to be exhibited in the midst of intense bodily sufferings (Ps. xxii. 14, 15).

7. I come] Rather, I am come; in fulfilment of the many types and prophecies contained in "the volume" of the Law. Comp. John vi. 38.

to do thy will] To work out all God's will concerning Him: but especially, to effect what God had willed respecting the mystery of man's redemption;—that the inviolability of the law of righteousness should be established for ever by that very act which secured the remission of human sin.

8. Above when he said] Rather, "Having and offering and burnt offerings and offering for sin thou wouldest not, neither hadst pleasure therein; which are offered by the law;

9 Then said he, Lo, I come to do thy will, O God. He taketh away the first, that he may establish the second.

10 By the which will we are sanctified through the offering of the body of Jesus Christ once for all.

11 And every priest standeth daily ministering and offering oftentimes the same sacrifices, which can never take away sins:

12 But this man, after he had offered one sacrifice for sins for ever, sat down on the right hand of God;

13 From henceforth expecting till his enemies be made his footstool.

14 For by one offering he hath perfected for ever them that are sanctified.

15 Whereof the Holy Ghost also is a witness to us: for after that he had said before, first said;"—in the earlier words of the quotation. The writer wishes to call attention to the emphatic Then of the Psalm ("Then said I"). After the insufficiency of the ceremonial system had been clearly exhibited, then the Elect Servant of the Lord came forward to offer the one true sacrifice.

Sacrifice and offering] Or (correct reading), "Sacrifices and offerings."

which] Rather, such as (and so in v. 11).

9. The true reading here is without the words, "O God."

the first] The legal, typical, offerings.

the second] His own perfect obedience "even unto death" (Phil. ii. 8). This, as the appropriate means of saving mankind, was what God willed; what He had willed "before the foundation of the world" (1 Pet. i. 20).

10. By the which will] Rather, In virtue of which will;—God's will concerning the salvation of men (1 Tim. ii. 4), wrought out by Christ.

are sanctified] Rather, have been sanctified, or consecrated to God (see note on ii. 11). Compare v. 29, "the blood of the Covenant, wherewith (or, in virtue of which) he was sanctified" (cp. Eph. v. 26).

once for all] This may be connected either with "offering" or with "sanctified." The former way of taking it seems to be most in harmony with vv. 12, 14, vii. 27, ix. 12, 26, 28.

11. The argument now passes from the Day of Atonement to the daily sacrifices. The same charges apply to these: (1) They are constantly repeated; and (2) Each one of them is inefficacious.

standeth] The word used of the Levitical ministers in Deut. x. 8, xviii. 5, 7; as of servants generally, 1 K. x. 8, 2 K. v. 25.

take away] The word is often used of stripping off that which surrounds, or adheres to, a thing. In 1 Chro. xxi. 8, as here, it is applied to the removal of guilt.

12. But this man, after] Rather, "But He, when."

for ever,] In vii. 3 and x. 1 the phrase is rendered, "continually" (more exactly, "in perpetuity"). The punctuation given by the A.V. is that of Chrys., Theophyl., Luther, and Lachmann. The rhythm of the Greek, however, is very distinctly in favour of putting the comma after "sins" and joining "for ever" with what follows. So the Syriac: "But this man offered one sacrifice for sins, and sate down at the right hand of God for ever." This supplies a more complete antithesis, also, to the "standeth daily" of v. 11.

13. From henceforth expecting] or, "Thenceforward waiting;" waiting with long-suffering patience from age to age (as in 1 Pet. iii. 20). In ix. 28, nearly the same word is used of His people's waiting for His return.

14. perfected for ever] Brought into a state of complete and uninterrupted communion with God. Cp. v. 1, vii. 19.

that are sanctified] That yield themselves to the power of that consecration which He had bestowed on them (v. 10). Cp. ii. 11.

15. Whereof...] Lit. "And the Holy Ghost also beareth witness unto us;" confirming what has been said about the "perfecting" of those who abide under the consecrating power of Christ's Covenant.

said before] The best versions and MSS. have simply "said." Some MSS. and translations supply, before v. 17, "Then He saith," or, "He afterwards saith," to complete the sentence which begins, "After that He said." Most moderns suppose that the writer borrows the words "saith the Lord" from the prophetic text, and weaves them into his own statement (cp. on v. 9). "After He hath said, This is...days; the Lord saith, Putting my laws upon their heart, upon their mind also will I, &c." This has the advantage of giving prominence to the two elements of the prophecy, which correspond to the two parts of the assertion in v. 15; sanctification, and 16 This is the covenant that I will make with them after those days, saith the Lord, I will ^{or, 31.} "put my laws into their hearts, and in their minds will I write them ;

17 And their sins and iniquities will I remember no more.

18 Now where remission of these is, there is no more offering for sin.

19 Having therefore, brethren, ^{Or, liberty.} boldness to enter into the holiest by the blood of Jesus,

20 By a new and living way, which he hath ^{Or, new made.} consecrated for us, through the veil, that is to say, his flesh ;

21 And having an high priest over the house of God ;

22 Let us draw near with a true freedom of access to God. To such as have "the law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus" swaying them, "there is no condemnation" (Rom. viii. 1, 2).

18. remission] The word used in Lev. xxv. 10 (A. V. "liberty"). Here it corresponds to the "I will remember no more" of v. 17. The record of sin should be effaced no less surely than the record of debt was on the coming in of the Jubile-year.

Obs. This "remission of sins" was expressly mentioned by our Lord as the fruit of the "New Covenant," which He established in His blood (Matt. xxvi. 28).

no more] Or, "no longer:"—since there is no further need of it.

19. The THIRD great Argument, which began at ch. v. 1, being complete, an exhortation now follows, similar to that which came in at the close of the Second Argument (iv. 14—16).

boldness] As in iv. 16. There is no longer cause for shrinking from God's presence.

to enter into] Lit. "concerning the entrance into." They enjoy present freedom of access to the Mercy-seat (v. 22, iv. 16); and they look forward to the time when they shall actually enter the eternal Sanctuary (vi. 19, 20).

by the blood] Rather, "in virtue of the blood" (cp. v. 10). This may be connected either with "having boldness," or (more probably) with "entrance" (see ix. 25).

20. By a new...] Rather, "By the way which He consecrated (or, dedicated, see ix. 18) for us, a new and living (way)."

The thought contained in the last words of v. 19, "in virtue of the blood of Jesus," is here expanded in an allegorical form. The Jewish high-priest was shut out from access to the Holy of Holies by the veil, which hung in front of it. How then did he pass into it on the Day of Atonement? By what way? He entered in by the virtue of the sacrificial blood (ix. 7, 25). This alone enabled him to draw aside the veil, which separated between sinful man and the Holy God. The atoning blood formed (for a brief interval) a way of approach to God. But, whatever the typical value of this entrance into the Holy of Holies might be, it could not "give life" (Gal. iii.

21). The "living way" of reconciliation was "consecrated for us" by the blood of Jesus. So long as the Word tabernacled in flesh, sin was not atoned for. But, when that flesh was rent, so that the life-blood poured forth from it, the way into the Holiest was "made manifest" (ix. 8), and "dedicated:" a "living" way, endued with "the power of an endless life" (vii. 16); allowing man to enter into communion with the Living God.

a new...way] "New," in the sense of "recent," as being only of late established, after the lapse of so many ages.

through the veil] So that the veil was done away for ever; as was signified by the historical "rending" of the veil of the Temple, which took place at Christ's death (Matt. xxvii. 51). Having once "reconciled us in the body of His flesh through death," He did not resume the "likeness of sinful flesh." The veil disappeared; and in its room was seen the "living way," the glorified humanity of Him who is "the way, the truth, and the life" (John xiv. 6); "in whom we have boldness and access with confidence by the faith of Him" (Eph. iii. 12).

21. an high priest] Lit. "a great priest;" which is the exact rendering of the Hebrew words (in Num. xxxv. 25, 28, and elsewhere) for which "high-priest" stands in A. V. The expression, which occurs here only in the Epistle, is suited to the present passage; where Christians are viewed as priests, who have access into the Holiest and are members of God's family. In the passage of Leviticus, where the dignity of the high-priest is especially dwelt upon (Lev. xxi. 10—12, see on ii. 10), the words translated "He that is the high-priest among his brethren," are strictly, "The priest that is greater than his brethren." This corresponds to what is added here, over the house (or, household) of God (cp. on iii. 6). Christ is "the First-born among many brethren" (Rom. viii. 29), whom He has "made priests...unto God" (Rev. i. 6). This view throws additional light on v. 22, which points out what qualifications we need for "drawing near," as priests, to God.

22. draw near] A liturgical term (as in v. 1, iv. 16, vii. 25).

heart in full assurance of faith, having our hearts sprinkled from an evil conscience, and our bodies washed with pure water.

23 Let us hold fast the profession of our faith without wavering; (for he is faithful that promised;)

24 And let us consider one another to provoke unto love and to good works:

25 Not forsaking the assembling of ourselves together, as the manner of some is; but exhorting one another: and so much the more, as ye see the day approaching.

26 For if we sin wilfully after that we have received the knowledge of the truth, there remaineth no more sacrifice for sins, 27 But a certain fearful looking for of judgment and fiery indignation, which shall devour the adversaries.

with a true heart] The words used in Isai. xxxviii. 3, LXX. (in A. V. "with a perfect heart").

in full assurance of faith] So that our faith may have its complete developement (see on vi. 11); embracing the fulness of Christ's redemptive work.

having...] The perfect passive participles, following an exhortation, must be taken as supplying additional reasons why the exhortation should be obeyed (as in 1 Pet. i. 23, "having been born again"); "seeing that we have had our hearts sprinkled...our bodies washed." Both these terms refer to the benefits of the baptismal Covenant: (1) The heart is "sprinkled," and so cleansed (see on Isai. lii. 15), "from an evil conscience" (cp. v. 2, ix. 13, 14), through the atoning blood of Christ (called in xii. 24, "the blood of sprinkling"; cp. 1 Pet. i. 2), which is applied to the believer by means of baptism (cp. Acts xxii. 16); (2) And the body also has its share of blessing; the symbolical washing with "pure water" (comp. Ezek. xxxvi. 25) being a pledge, that the body so washed shall, in the great day of "the Regeneration" (Matt. xix. 28; cp. Tit. iii. 5), be raised to perfect "incorruption" (cp. Rom. viii. 11).

23. of our faith] A curious oversight. It should be, of our hope. Thus in v. 22 we have faith; in v. 23, hope; in v. 24, love.

without wavering] Rather, that it (our confession) waver not. The word here rendered "hold fast" is not the one which was so rendered in iv. 14, and the meaning is different. There the exhortation was, to hold fast by our profession of faith (objectively); here it is, to maintain in unwavering firmness the profession of our hope (subjectively).

faithful] and worthy of our trust (xi. 11; 1 Thess. v. 24).

24. consider one another] Looking with kindly interest on each other's concerns, so that we may "provoke" one another to a holy rivalry in generous deeds.

25. Such zeal of brotherly love would overcome that fear of persecution which made "some" abstain from the public assemblies of the Church.

the assembling...together] to meet your common Lord and Saviour. This may be taken as implied in the word: for the noun occurs elsewhere, in the New Testament, only in 2 Thess. ii. 1, where it refers to the gathering of the saints to meet Christ at His second coming; and the verb is the one which is used in Ps. cii. 22, "when the peoples are gathered together...to serve the Lord." Every assembling of the Church is a preparation for that final gathering. Cp. also Matt. xxiii. 37, xxiv. 31, where the same word is used.

The inference we have drawn from the term itself is confirmed by the fact that the Apostle here proceeds to speak of "the day;" just as in 2 Thess. ii. 1, 2, he goes on to speak of "the day of Christ."

the day] Cp. 1 Cor. iii. 13. As in James v. 8, 9, so here, there may be an allusion to the approaching visitation on Jerusalem; but the thought of the Last Judgment had been linked on inseparably to that event by our Lord's own prophecy (Matt. xxiv).

26. The wilful sin here spoken of must be apostasy (iii. 12, vi. 6); into which those, who forsook the fellowship of the Church, were in danger of drifting.

the knowledge] The word here used implies a degree of real insight; genuine "recognition" of the truth.

no more] or (v. 18), "no longer." This is the dark side of the truth, of which the consolatory side was presented in v. 18. To those who abide under shelter of the one atoning Sacrifice, no other sacrifice is needful; to those who have left that shelter, none other can be of any worth. The old ritual had been of value, so long as it nourished hope in a coming Saviour. To those who receded from faith in Christ, it was a delusion.

27. What remains for them is, during life, a certain vague and undefined, but anxious and fearful, looking forward to judgment; and afterwards, inexorable justice. There ought to be a comma at "judgment;" the word for "indignation" being in the nominative.

fiery indignation] Rather, "a fiery jealousy;" with allusion, probably, to Deut. iv. 24. God's 28 He that despised Moses' law died without mercy under two or three witnesses :

29 Of how much sorer punishment, suppose ye, shall he be thought worthy, who hath trodden under foot the Son of God, and hath counted the blood of the covenant, wherewith he was sanctified, an unholy thing, and hath done despite unto the Spirit of grace ?

30 For we know him that hath said, Vengeance belongeth unto me, I will recompense, saith the Lord.

And again, The Lord shall judge his people.

31 It is a fearful thing to fall into the hands of the living God.

32 But call to remembrance the former days, in which, after ye were illuminated, ye endured a great fight of afflictions ;

33 Partly, whilst ye were made a gazingstock both by reproaches and afflictions ; and partly, whilst ye became companions of them that were so used.

34 For ye had compassion of me

devour the adversaries] A reference to Isai. xvi. 11 (cp. lxiv. 1); where also God's jealousy is represented as a fire.

28. despised...died] Rather, "setteth at nought...dieth." Such was the provision of the Law respecting apostasy (Deut. xvii. 2—7). To go back from Christ to trust in an antiquated ritual was no way better than idolatry (cp. on iii. 12).

29. the blood of the covenant] By which the New Covenant was established (cp. ix. 20).

wherewith] Or, "in virtue of which" (v. 10, 19).

sanctified] So that he was allowed to approach the All-holy One with acts of worship (v. 10, xiii. 12).

unholy] Lit. "common" (in Rom. xiv. 14, "unclean"). Their apostasy was equivalent to asserting that Jesus was a mere man, and, consequently, a sharer in human sinfulness.

done despite unto] or, "insulted," "treated with scorn."

the Spirit of grace] Which (in accordance with the promise in Zech. xii. 10) had been "poured out" on believers; teaching them to "look unto Him, whom" the sins of men "had pierced." To treat with scorn the Holy Spirit, who was the fountain of grace, and who was Himself so gracious, so full of tender sympathy! to insult Him!—what desperate malignity!

30. we know him] We know His character, that He is "a God of truth" (Deut. xxxii. 6); who "will not call back His words" (Isai. xxxi. 2).

Vengeance...] Rather, To me belongeth vengeance (Deut. xxxii. 35; Rom. xii. 19).

God's justice is inviolable. It must perform its work of "recompensing." How fearful the lot of those who have left the only refuge which can protect against the sword of Divine Justice!

the Lord...] See Deut. xxxii. 36. God "judges" His people, when He vindicates their rights and overthrows their "adversaries" (cp. ib. v. 43);—those "adversaries" among whom the apostate had cast in his lot (v. 27).

31. the living God] See the note on iii. 12. Even for the penitent "it is a fearful thing" to be placed under His rod (2 S. xxiv. 14f.); what must it be, then, for the wilful transgressor (1 Pet. iv. 17, 18)?

David had been spared, when, in obedience to God's injunction, he offered a burnt-offering on Mount Moriah. For those who now rejected the one true Sacrifice, the Temple sacrifices on Moriah were utterly unavailing.

32. the former days] When they set a noble example to all Churches, 1 Thess. ii. 14.

illuminated] As in vi. 4 ("enlightened").

endured] Sustained, and bore up resolutely under (cp. xii. 2, 3, 7, where the same word is used). The derived noun is used in v. 36, xii. 1; where it is too feebly rendered "patience."

fight of afflictions] A "fight," or combat, like that of the athlete. They had to wrestle with "afflictions" (or, "sufferings;" as in ii. 9, 10). The Church at Jerusalem had passed through other persecutions besides those mentioned in Acts viii and xii (see on ch. xiii. 7).

33. a gazing-stock] Or, "a spectacle" (cp. 1 Cor. iv. 9); as when athletes were exposed to public view in the amphitheatre. The "reproaches" were, probably, the slanderous accusations which were so commonly brought against Christians (cp. 1 Pet. iv. 14).

became companions of] Rather, made yourselves partners with:—by your active sympathy with sufferers, drawing upon yourselves popular violence or legal penalties.

34. For ye had] For ye both had.

compassion of me in my bonds] Lit. "sympathy with my bonds;" or (according to in my bonds, and took joyfully the spoiling of your goods, knowing in yourselves that ye have in heaven a better and an enduring substance.

35 Cast not away therefore your confidence, which hath great recompence of reward.

36 For ye have need of patience, that, after ye have done the will of God, ye might receive the promise.

37 For yet a little while, and he that shall come will come, and will not tarry.

38 Now the just shall live by faith: but if any man draw back, my soul shall have no pleasure in him.

39 But we are not of them who draw back unto perdition; but of them that believe to the saving of the soul.

another reading, see Note below) "with them that were in bonds" (xiii. 3). If the Received Text be correct, the reference will naturally be to St Paul's detention at Cæsarea. The other reading would not exclude such a reference; since Aristarchus, who went up with Paul to Jerusalem (Acts xx. 4), was his "fellow-prisoner" at Rome (Col. iv. 10), and therefore, in all probability, was so at Cæsarea.

took joyfully] Or, "accepted with joy." Cp. Matt. v. 12; Col. i. 11; 1 Pet. iv. 12, 13.

knowing in...] Rather, knowing that ye have for yourselves a better possession [in heaven] and one that abideth.—See Additional Note.—The possession was theirs already by an indefeasible title; because they were brethren of Him who is "Heir of all things" (i. 2).

35. Cast not away]—as soldiers might cast away their arms after a long fight.

confidence] In v. 19 rendered, "boldness;" confidence in approaching "the throne of grace" (cp. iii. 6, iv. 16).

36. For...] They were not to be dispirited by the length of their trial: for—perseverance in doing the will of God was a needful preliminary to obtaining the reward which He had promised.

patience] patient endurance, or, fortitude; as in 2 Thess. i. 4, Rev. xiii. 10. Cp. on v. 32.

after ye have done] Rather, having done. In doing the will of God they would be conformed to Christ (vv. 7—9, cp. xiii. 21), and could not fail to enjoy His blessing.

the promise] of entering into His rest (iv. 1), in the "eternal inheritance" (ix. 15).

37. a little while] The expression (in the original, a peculiar one) is found in Isai. xxvi. 20, LXX. (in A. V., "a little moment").

that...] or, "he that cometh shall come, and shall not tarry." So the LXX. (Hab. ii. 2). The Hebrew is more naturally taken as referring to the vision: "though it tarry, wait for it; for it will surely come." The word used by the LXX. for "wait" is the one that occurred above in v. 32, "endured."

38. The writer, weaving the prophet's words into his own address, inverts the order of the clauses (comp. on Hab. ii. 4).

shall live] The verb has here the same kind of emphasis which it has in Ezek. xviii. 22; "In his righteousness that he hath done he shall live;"—shall maintain that spiritual life, which issues in salvation. Thus the "saving of the soul" of v. 39 may be looked on as an explanation of the term, "live," which is used here.—See Additional Note.

by faith] Lit. "from faith." The issue of his faith shall be life (see below). The Hebrew word rendered "faith" in Hab. ii. 4 generally signifies steadfastness, or, fidelity; but the "wait for it" of v. 3 shews that it here denotes, steadfast affiance on God's promise; which is the prevailing idea of "faith" throughout ch. xi. The most essential element in loyalty to God is, to put faith in Him. They only will be "steadfast in His covenant" who "believe in Him" (Ps. lxxviii. 21, 37).

if any man] Rather, if he. It is true that we should translate the LXX., "if one draw back;" but as the Apostle, in constructing his own sentence, deliberately transposed the verse-members, he certainly meant the warning to apply to the just man. Comp. Ezek. xviii. 24.

draw back] from patient waiting on God. Such withdrawal might be owing in some cases to cowardice, in others to self-confidence. The Greek word more naturally suggests the thought of the former of these; the Hebrew that of the latter. The men, whose history was commented on in chh. iii and iv, were guilty of "drawing back" in both ways; first refusing to go up and occupy Canaan, and then endeavouring to do so in opposition to God's will (Numb. xiv. 2, 40: see Note below).

shall have no] Rather, hath no.

39. not of them who...] Lit. "not (on the side) of drawing back...but (on the side) of faith...." It is this word "faith," which supplies the transition to ch. xi.

saving] A rare word; lit. "winning," or "acquiring:" here, winning back from perdition. The verb occurs in Ezek. xiii. 18 ("save the souls alive").

ADDITIONAL NOTES on CHAP. X. 34, 38.

34. The received reading rois deσmois mou is supported by κ, K, L, P, and other MSS., as also by Clem. Alex. and Origen; while A, D, with other MSS., as well as the two Syriac Versions and the Vulg., support rois deσmious. In the fifth century Euthalius appealed to this passage as confirming the belief that the Epistle was written by St Paul.

It is in favour of the ordinary reading, that συναδέν in iv. 13 has for its object, not the persons who suffer, but that which is the cause of their suffering.

34. The clause ἐν οὐρανοῖς is found in many good MSS., in the Peshito, and many Greek fathers; but is wanting in A, D, κ, in the Vulgate, and in some fathers. The rhythm of the sentence and the analogy of xi. 16 plead for its retention.

For ἐν ἑαυτοῖς, Lachmann reads ἑαυτοῖς, Tischendorf ἑαυτοῖς. The latter has the majority of cursive MSS. in its favour, is philologically simple, and yields a good sense: "Ye have done as your Lord advised, when He said (Luke xii. 33, 34), Sell your possessions (τὰ ὑμῶν) and give alms: make for yourselves bags that wax not old, a treasure in the heavens that faileth not."

38. This emphatic meaning of the word is illustrated by Gal. iii. 11, 12; in which Hab. ii. 4 is contrasted with Lev. xviii. 5,

"The man that doeth them shall live in them." Referring to this sentence of the Law, our Lord said (Matt. xix. 17): "If thou wilt enter into life, keep the commandments." In the other place in which Hab. ii. 4 is cited, Rom. i. 16, 17, it is to illustrate the statement that the Gospel is "the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth."

38. The Hebrew is, "in his faith" (cp. Ezek. xviii. 21): so that we may paraphrase the sentence thus; "The righteous man, abiding in his faith, shall have life." The Septuagintal rendering, μου ἐκ πίστεως (found in good MSS. here too), would be represented thus: "The righteous man shall, as the outcome of faith in Me (cp. Eph. iii. 12), have life." The position of μου before ἐκ πίστεως is similar to its position in μου ὑπὸ τὴν στέγην (Matt. viii. 8); whereas the unlikelihood of the combination ὁ δίκαιος μου is extreme; no such form as יְהוָה מִי being anywhere found.

38. The verb, which is rendered "lifted up" in Hab. ii. 4, occurs elsewhere only in Numb. xiv. 44; "they presumed to go up." In Deut. i. 43 the corresponding verb is וַיִּבָּהֵן; which is used in Neh. ix. 16 (A. V. "dealt proudly") in reference to Israel's refusing to take possession of the land. In each case their disobedience was a manifestation of self-will; which, in each case, had its root in unbelief.

CHAPTER XI.

1 What faith is. 6 Without faith we cannot please God. 7 The worthy fruits thereof in the fathers of old time.

NOW faith is the ¹substance of ^{Or, ground, or, confidence.} things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen.

CHAP. XI. In the conclusion of chap. x faith had been set forth as the means by which we obtain Eternal Life. The characteristics of this faith are now given, and verified in a large number of examples.

1. Now faith is] This is not to be taken as a definition of faith. The Hebrew Christians knew well that faith was "belief in God's word." But, if they did not require to have the term "faith" defined, they did stand in need of being reminded what was involved in the act of faith. God's word had revealed to them certain facts relating to the invisible world, and had taught them to hope for a far higher state of existence than the present. Well: where true faith existed, it would be found to give present substance to the things which were thus proposed to their hope, and to supply conviction of the reality of those unseen facts. They who were "on the side of faith" (x. 39), then, must not cling tenaciously to the present and the visible: for faith has to do with the future and the unseen; making the future present, the unseen evident.

the substance] Rather, "a substantiating," or "a giving present reality to" (see below). Faith, taking its stand firmly upon God's word, apprehends the good things which He has promised, as if they actually existed.

things hoped for] This is meant simply to describe the class of things spoken of. We are not to infer from it that hope precedes faith. Certainly, the promise itself must be first believed, before the affection of hope can be called into exercise.

the evidence] Rather, "an evidence." As sight is the surest evidence to a man of what is seen (producing the clearest conviction), so is faith the evidence of those invisible truths which God has revealed. There exists the same real relation between man's spirit and the things of the spiritual world, which exists between his eyes and the things of outward nature. Faith "sees Him who is invisible" (v. 27).

things] The Greek word for "things" in the second member of the verse (there is no corresponding word in the first member) denotes "facts," or, "real things" (as in vi. 18, x. 1; Luke i. 1). They are realities, though

2 For by it the elders obtained a good report.

3 Through faith we understand that the worlds were framed by the word of God, so that things which are seen were not made of things which do appear.

4 By faith Abel offered unto God a more excellent sacrifice than Cain, by which he obtained witness that they are "not seen;"—unseen and beyond the reach of sight. This latter term, "not seen," stands to the former, "hoped for," as genus to species (Rom. viii. 24, 25; 2 Cor. v. 7). Under it are ranged such revealed truths as the creation of the worlds (v. 3); God's being "a rewarder of them that diligently seek Him" (v. 6); and His omnipotence (v. 19).

2. by it] "in virtue of it" (as in x. 19).

the elders] All who are mentioned, or alluded to, in this chapter (see v. 39). These acted as if the things which God had promised were not less substantially present to them than the things of this world; as if the invisible impressed their minds with a conviction no less deep than that which was produced by the visible.

obtained a good report (v. 39)]—in the witness borne to them by Holy Scripture; the witness that they were righteous men (v. 4), that they pleased God (v. 5), that "God was not ashamed to be called their God" (v. 16).

3. Through faith] "By faith" (as in the following verses); and so in vv. 11, 28.

The nature of faith is first of all illustrated by a reference to the opening chapter of Genesis. We can know nothing of the origin of the universe, or of the causes of the great epochal changes which it has since undergone, except from Revelation. Clear, and even necessary, as the idea of creation may appear to the believer, we find no trace of it among nations that were wholly destitute of the light of Holy Scripture. Physical science is by its own principles forbidden to entertain the inquiry into the origination of things; although, as a matter of fact, its investigations continually suggest the need of a supernatural beginning of the world of nature.

understand] Or, "apprehend" (the word used in Rom. i. 20). Though the intellect cannot discover, or prove, the fact of creation, it feels the statement of Scripture regarding it to be in harmony with its own interior workings. It finds that the first verse of Genesis furnishes the only satisfactory standpoint from which to take a view of the constitution of the world, and of the relation between the world and man and God.

the worlds] Lit. "the ages" (see on i. 2); the universe, and its parts, in their several stages of existence. The latest of such "ages," as regards our own earth, commenced with the six days' work recorded in Gen. i. 3—31.

were framed] had their fixed and settled constitution given them (comp. Ps. lxxiv. 16, lxxxix. 37, LXX.).

the word of God] Here, as in Ps. xxxiii. 6, His spoken word. The ten Divine utterances of Gen. i. 3—29 are, no doubt, specially referred to.

so that] "in such wise that." The positive statement, which preceded, has its importance more clearly exhibited by this addition, which shows what it excludes.

things which are] "the things which are." Many authorities have, "that which is;" suggesting more distinctly the idea of the visible universe. The common reading, which is supported by good MSS., and by the Peshito and Vulgate, is favoured by 2 Cor. iv. 18 (where also we have the word which in v. 25 below is rendered "for a season").

were not made] Or, "had not their being." The visible world was not generated by, or formed out of, pre-existing phenomenal matter; as most schemes of philosophical speculation (unable to get outside the empirical maxim, ex nihilo nil) had imagined. Cp. Additional Note.

which do appear] Rather, that did appear (φαινόμενον); that had phenomenal existence; standing out to view, before there was any human eye to look upon them.

4. more excellent] of a higher kind (comp. on iii. 3). So different were the two sacrifices, that the one was accepted by God and the other rejected. How was this? It was because Abel offered his sacrifice "by faith;" a faith of which the effect was to make him "righteous" in God's sight. What, then, was the Divine word which Abel believed? what the hoped-for good to which his faith gave substance? What could it be but the predicted overthrow of him through whom sin and death had come into the world, an overthrow which was to be accomplished by the suffering of one who should be born of woman (Gen. iii. 15)? Even, then, if some more natural explanation of Gen. iii. 21 could be given than that which sees in it an indication of animal sacrifices having been instituted in Paradise, we can scarcely avoid the supposition, that Abel was taught of God to associate the death of the lamb which he offered with the hope of atonement for sin and consequent victory over death.

by which] Rather, by means of which (v. 7). The obvious reference of this is to "sacrifice;" and it was actually through, or, by means of, his sacrifice that Abel obtained he was righteous, God testifying of his gifts: and by it he being dead ^{Or, is yet speaker of.} yet speaketh.

5 By faith Enoch was translated that he should not see death; and was not found, because God had translated him: for before his translation he had this testimony, that he pleased God.

6 But without faith it is impossible to please him: for he that cometh to God must believe that he is, and that he is a rewarder of them that diligently seek him.

7 By faith Noah, being warned of God of things not seen as yet, ^{Or, being wary.} moved with fear, prepared an ark to the saving of his house; by the which he condemned the world, and became heir of the righteousness which is by faith.

8 By faith Abraham, when he was witness from God that he was a "righteous" man,—one who was in harmony with the mind and will of God. It seems better, therefore (in spite of v. 39, quoted by Delitzsch), to take it thus, than to refer it to "faith."

righteous] Compare Matt. xxiii. 35, 1 John iii. 12. The context of the latter passage ("he that doeth righteousness," "he that doeth sin") appears to point back to Gen. iv. 7.

of his gifts] or, unto his gifts (comp. Gen. iv. 4: "God had respect unto Abel and unto his gifts"). Abel was himself first accepted, then his offering: the acceptance of the offering, however, being a token that he was personally accepted.

by it] by means of it;—his sacrifice. Abel's sacrifice was, indeed, the occasion of his death; but this only constituted him the Proto-martyr. When dead, he yet spake; bearing witness to God's faithfulness. His very blood had a voice (Gen. iv. 10; ch. xii. 24), which cried aloud to God, and was heard by Him. Thus, by means of that one sacrificial act, standing as it does at the head of the history of our race, Abel has spoken to all succeeding generations, and still speaks: proclaiming, that to God's saints death is innocuous; that already, before a single death had occurred among mankind, the grace of God had provided an antidote against the venom of death; that "the souls of the righteous are in the hand of God" (Wisd. iii. 1); and that God cares for and "will speedily avenge His elect" (Luke xviii. 7, 8).

5. Abel lived on after death. Enoch did not even see death (Ps. lxxxix. 48; John viii. 51). He was "translated," or "transferred," from this world of shadows to the world of invisible realities, on which his faith had been fixed. The Hebrew word for "took" in Gen. v. 24 is the one which is used of Elijah in 2 K. ii. 3, 5.

was not found] So the LXX. When his friends or his foes sought for him, he "was not found."

for] This looks back to, By faith. The narrative implies that Enoch's translation was a reward of his faith; for, immediately before his removal is mentioned, we are told that he "pleased God."—As the argument is not complete till the end of v. 6, there ought only to be a colon at the end of v. 5.

pleased God]—acted in such a way as to please Him. That this is the meaning, appears both from the Hebrew ("walked with God;" comp. Gen. xvii. 1; 2 K. xx. 3;—in 2 Cor. v. 7, 9 both forms of expression occur), and from the use of the word here in v. 6.

6. to please] to act in such a way as to please. None could set themselves to walk with God, or strive to live acceptably to Him, unless they had faith; faith which enabled them to "see Him who is invisible," and to believe that He is righteous and true to His promises.

cometh to] Or, "draweth near to;" as a worshipper (cp. x. 1, 22).

is a rewarder] Or, "sheweth Himself (lit. becometh) a rewarder." He may see fit to defer the promised reward; but He is certain to prove Himself a rewarder; Himself, indeed, being "the exceeding great reward" of His people.

diligently seek] Or, simply, "seek" (cp. Ps. ix. 10, xxvii. 8; Amos v. 4, 6).

7. not seen as yet]—as yet, far beyond the reach of human vision. The first Divine warning seems to have been given 120 years before the Flood (Gen. vi. 13). The breaking up of "the fountains of the great deep" and the opening of "the windows of heaven" were not only things "not seen as yet," but such as might appear to run counter to the existing order of the visible world.

fear] Rather, godly fear (as in xii. 28); an apprehension of coming danger, which sprang from a sense of God's holiness and man's sinfulness.

prepared] Or, "builded" (as in iii. 3, 4).

by the which] Rather (as in v. 4), by means of which;—as the outward embodiment of his faith. The Ark was a proof that Noah felt the sentence which God had passed upon the world to be just.

became heir...] Noah's building the Ark led to his being delivered from death, and to his becoming the new covenant-head of the called to go out into a place which he should after receive for an inheritance, obeyed; and he went out, not knowing whither he went.

9 By faith he sojourned in the land of promise, as in a strange country, dwelling in tabernacles with Isaac and Jacob, the heirs with him of the same promise:

10 For he looked for a city which hath foundations, whose builder and maker is God.

11 Through faith also Sara herself received strength to conceive seed, and was delivered of a child when she was past age, because she judged him faithful who had promised.

12 Therefore sprang there even of one, and him as good as dead, so many as the stars of the sky in multitude, and as the sand which is by the sea shore innumerable.

13 These all died ^{† Gr. according to faith.} in faith, not having received the promises, but having seen them afar off, and were persuaded of them, and embraced them, and confessed that they were strangers and pilgrims on the earth.

14 For they that say such things declare plainly that they seek a country.

human race; so that he was "heir" of the promises made to those who, serving God in faith, are graciously accepted by Him as righteous.

by faith] Lit. "according to faith" (see marg. of v. 13, and 1 Tim. i. 9); on the basis of faith: faith in God being "reckoned for righteousness" (Gen. xv. 6); of which, indeed, it is the living germ.

8. called] by God (Isai. xli. 9). The strict rendering is, "By faith Abraham, when he was called, obeyed to go out." should after receive] Rather, "was afterwards to receive."

whither he went] Lit. "whither he cometh." At each stage of his journey he walked simply by faith. He did not know that Canaan was the land which God had promised to him, until he had actually arrived there.

9. a strange country] Or, "a land not his own." He fully recognised the fact, that the land was not to come into his own possession. The only piece of ground in it which became his was the burial-place of Machpelah; for the purchase of which he insisted on paying the full price. In negotiating the sale, Abraham stated, in a very pointed manner, that he was "a stranger and sojourner" in the land (Gen. xxiii. 4).

tabernacles] Rather, tents (Gen. xii. 8, xviii. 1, xxiv. 6, 7). In these he "dwelt," or, took up his abode; content to have no other earthly home.

heirs with him] Not merely sharers of such present blessing as God granted to him, but joint heirs of the promise made to him and to his seed.

10. a city] Rather, the city: the "heavenly Jerusalem" (xii. 22); one of whose "gates" Jacob saw, in his vision, thronged by angels (Gen. xxviii. 17).

which hath foundations] Emphasizing the contrast between the heavenly city, which "abideth" (see on xiii. 14), and the tents of the patriarchs. Comp. Ps. lxxxvii. 1.

builder and maker] Rather, architect and builder. Cp. viii. 2.

Obs. The examples of faith given in vv. 9—16 illustrate the argument of chh. iii and iv; which taught that Canaan was not the promised rest of God's people.

11. also Sara herself] Or, "Sara herself also:"—Sarah, who a little before had been reproved for unbelief (Gen. xviii. 12).

and was...age] Rather (according to a better supported reading), and that, when she was past age. Cp. Rom. iv. 21.

12. Therefore...] Rather, Wherefore also there sprang from one; the "also" pointing to the reward of his faith (cp. Phil. ii. 9). one] Isai. li. 2; Ezek. xxxiii. 24.

as good as dead] It is the same word as in Rom. iv. 19, "dead."

the sand which...] Rather, "the sand by the sea-shore, which is innumerable."

13. These all] Abraham and his family. in faith] Lit. (as marg.), "according to faith" (v. 7); standing on the ground of faith. Up to death they continued looking for God's salvation as a thing yet to come (Gen. xlix. 18).

not having...confessed] Rather (correct reading), not having received the promises [that is, the things promised], but having seen and saluted them from afar, and having confessed. They "saluted" the yet distant object of their faith, as travellers on coming within sight of Jerusalem are accustomed to give it a reverent greeting. Comp. John viii. 56.

pilgrims] Rather, sojourners (comp. Gen. xxiii. 4; Ps. xxxix. 12). Cp. Gen. xlvii. 9.

14. declare plainly] Or, "make it plain." seek a country] Rather, "are seeking their country;"—their true home (cp. xiii. 14).

15 And truly, if they had been mindful of that country from whence they came out, they might have had opportunity to have returned.

16 But now they desire a better country, that is, an heavenly: wherefore God is not ashamed to be called their God: for he hath prepared for them a city.

17 By faith Abraham, when he was tried, offered up Isaac: and he that had received the promises offered up his only begotten son,

Or, 7a. 18 ¹Of whom it was said, That in Isaac shall thy seed be called:

19 Accounting that God was able to raise him up, even from the dead; from whence also he received him in a figure.

20 By faith Isaac blessed Jacob and Esau concerning things to come.

21 By faith Jacob, when he was a dying, blessed both the sons of Joseph; and worshipped, leaning upon the top of his staff.

22 By faith Joseph, when he died, ¹made mention of the departing of ^{Or, remembered.} the children of Israel; and gave commandment concerning his bones.

23 By faith Moses, when he was

15. When the patriarchs called themselves "strangers" they did not refer to their having left Chaldea. If they had thought of that as still their country, they might easily have found "opportunity to return;" and so would have ceased to be wanderers. The distance was no such very serious hindrance (cp. Gen. xxiv. 4—6).

16. But now—to come back from the supposition made in v. 15 to the actual facts.

ashamed] Lit. "ashamed of them." They had shewn themselves to be fitting recipients of His grace; welcoming His overtures, and "walking worthily of the Lord" (Col. i. 10; 1 Thess. ii. 12).

their God] Gen. xvii. 7; Exod. iii. 6, 15. See Matt. xxii. 32. Comp. on viii. 10.

for] Such language God "was not ashamed" to use: For, unspeakably great as the privilege must be of having Him to be theirs—their God,—it is only what God has conferred upon them. In His wondrous counsel "He hath prepared for them," from the foundation of the world (Matt. xxv. 34; cp. 1 Cor. ii. 7, 9), "a city," in which "He Himself will be with them, their God" (Rev. xxi. 3).

17. Having shewn, in vv. 8—16, how the faith of the patriarchs was exhibited in their whole character, he now proceeds to speak of some particular acts of faith.

offered up] So far as Abraham personally was concerned, the offering was complete.

received] Rather, accepted; cheerfully submitting to the conditions under which the promises were made.

18. Of whom] Rather, "Unto whom" (as in ch. v. 5, Luke ii. 18, 20).

That] Rather, For (as being part of the quotation, Gen. xxi. 12). The name "seed of Abraham" was to belong to the line which descended through Isaac. In surrendering Isaac to death Abraham appeared to abandon the promise of blessing which had been made to his seed (Gen. xvii. 19).

19. able...dead] Rather, "able even to raise from the dead." He had firm confidence in God's veracity, and he thought it no way "incredible that God should raise the dead" (Acts xxvi. 8).

from whence also] Rather, from whence he did also in a figure receive him back. After Isaac had been laid as a victim on the altar and, by means of the substituted ram, figuratively slain, he was restored to his father, like one that had been raised from the dead. The text does not say that this sacrifice and resurrection was prefigurative; but that it was so, and that Abraham's faith was by it instructed to look forward to "the day of Christ," may be certainly inferred from John viii. 51.

20. Although Isaac gave his blessing to Jacob at first under a misapprehension, yet, when he found out his error, he distinctly ratified what he had done (Gen. xxvii. 33, xxviii. 3, 4); and, in blessing Esau, he recognised Jacob's superiority.

21. a dying] See Gen. xlviii. 21, "Behold, I die." Cp. xlvii. 29.

both] Rather, each of; discriminatingly (Gen. xlviii. 17—19). The act of "worship," mentioned in Gen. xlvii. 29—31, was prior to the benediction of Ephraim and Manasseh. When Jacob had received an assurance from Joseph that he should be buried in the land of promise, he "bowed himself upon (or, towards) the bed's head" (cp. 1 K. i. 47). So the Hebrew. The LXX. have "worshipped upon the top of his staff" (see below). As the act of worship was that by which the energy of Jacob's faith was shown, the Apostle did not care to deviate from the familiar Septuagintal rendering. To have done so might have diverted the reader's attention to a quite subordinate matter.

22. when he died] "as he was dying." made mention of] Or (marg.), "called to mind concerning." Joseph had for eighty born, was hid three months of his parents, because they saw he was a proper child; and they were not afraid of the king's commandment.

24 By faith Moses, when he was come to years, refused to be called the son of Pharaoh's daughter;

25 Choosing rather to suffer affliction with the people of God, than to enjoy the pleasures of sin for a season;

26 Esteeming the reproach ¹ of Christ greater riches than the treasures in Egypt: for he had respect unto the recompence of the reward.

27 By faith he forsook Egypt, not fearing the wrath of the king: for he endured, as seeing him who is invisible.

28 Through faith he kept the passover, and the sprinkling of blood, lest he that destroyed the firstborn should touch them.

29 By faith they passed through years been the ruler of Egypt, yet he did not forget the great promises which God had made to Israel.

23. he was a proper child] Rather, how comely the child was. It would seem from St Stephen's "comely before God" (Acts vii. 20), that there was something of unearthly beauty in the child, such as befitted one with whom God would hereafter "speak face to face." This kindled the faith of the parents, so that they had courage to set at nought the king's murderous edict. Instead of a semicolon after "child," there should be only a comma.

24. refused] He did so, virtually, when he took part with the oppressed Israelite (Exod. ii. 11—15).

25. the people of God] Cp. Exod. iii. 7: "I have seen the affliction of My people."

to enjoy the pleasures of sin] Rather, to enjoy the short-lived fruit of sin;—that is, the honour and wealth which would have been his, during this life, if he would have renounced his connexion with Israel;—the "sin" specifically referred to being that of apostasy (cp. iii. 12, 13). The word rendered "short-lived" is the same that is used in 2 Cor. iv. 18 ("temporal").

26. the reproach of Christ] The contempt with which men treated the very idea of a future Saviour of mankind, such as Israel professed to look for. To the wise counsellors of Pharaoh this expectation would appear grossly absurd. The reputed "promise" was said to have been made to Abraham some four hundred years before, yet here was God's elect nation in abject bondage! What language could describe the folly of one who would sacrifice his prospect of succeeding to the throne of Egypt for so miserable a delusion! The language of the text may refer to Ps. lxxxix. 50—52; "Remember, Lord, the reproach which Thy servants have;...wherewith Thy enemies have reproached, O Lord, wherewith they have reproached the footsteps [so slow and lagging] of Thy Christ." Compare also Rom. xv. 3 (Introd. III. 2, § ii.).

had respect unto] Turning his eyes away from other objects and fixing them on that one hope. The "recompence of reward" looked for by Moses was none other than that which had been already mentioned, in x. 35, as the aim of Christians.

27. forsook] Rather, left (comp. Matt. iv. 13). As the Passover is spoken of in v. 28, many have referred the present verse to the flight of Moses into Midian; so introducing an evident inconsistency with Exod. ii. 15. But, in fact, v. 28 is quite subordinate to v. 27; as is shown by the change of tense (lit. "he hath kept"); and the reference is really to the Exodus, in speaking of which Josephus uses the same words ('Ant.' II. 15): "They left Egypt in the month of Xanthicus." Thus everything becomes harmonious. Pharaoh's anger burst forth as soon as he heard the proposal that Israel should leave Egypt (Exod. v. 4—19). It culminated in his last interview with Moses (x. 28, 29): "See my face no more [to ask for permission to leave Egypt]; for in the day thou seest my face thou shalt die."

endured] Persevered in his resolve. This he did, as seeing by faith the "mighty hand and stretched out arm" of Him who is invisible (Exod. vi. 6; cp. xiv. 13).

28. Through faith] Rather, "By faith." Pharaoh had refused to allow Israel to go into the desert to "hold a feast to the Lord" (Exod. x. 9). Moses, in obedience to God's command and relying on His promise, held "a feast unto the Lord" (ib. xii. 14) there in Egypt.

kept] Or, "performed;" since the verb belongs also to the "sprinkling of blood" (on the door-posts of the houses, ib. xii. 7). The noun rendered, "sprinkling," is from the verb which is used in Levit. i. 5, &c., of sprinkling blood on the altar. On that passover-evening every house became an altar.

lest he...should] Rather, that the destroyer of the first-born might not touch them; but might spare all whose doors were sealed with paschal blood. The faith of Moses was signally displayed in this, the Red sea as by dry land: which the Egyptians assaying to do were drowned.

30 By faith the walls of Jericho fell down, after they were compassed about seven days.

31 By faith the harlot Rahab perished not with them ^{Or that were disobedient.} that believed not, when she had received the spies with peace.

32 And what shall I more say? for the time would fail me to tell of Gideon, and of Barak, and of Samson, and of Jephthae; of David also, and Samuel, and of the prophets:

33 Who through faith subdued kingdoms, wrought righteousness, obtained promises, stopped the mouths of lions,

34 Quenched the violence of fire, escaped the edge of the sword, out of weakness were made strong, waxed valiant in fight, turned to flight the armies of the aliens.

35 Women received their dead raised to life again: and others were "tortured, not accepting deliverance; ^{2 Mac. 7. 7.} that they might obtain a better resurrection:

36 And others had trial of cruel mockings and scourgings, yea, moreover of bonds and imprisonment:

whatever may have been the degree of insight which he had into the deeper significance of that Passover deliverance. In any case Moses understood that God had redeemed Israel (Exod. xv. 13).

29. which.....assaying to do] Lit. "of which [sea]...making trial;"—to discover if they too could not pass through it.

30. When the people carried the ark around the city seven days in succession, they gave a clear proof of their reliance on God's unseen Presence.

31. For the nature of Rahab's faith see Josh. ii. 9—11: "The Lord, your God, He is God in heaven above and in earth beneath."

that believed not] Rather (as marg.), that were disobedient (comp. iii. 18, Acts xix. 9); although they knew that Israel was coming up under God's directions (Josh. ii. 9—11).

with peace] Severing herself from Israel's enemies, and adjuring the spies in God's name to make a covenant of peace with her (Josh. ii. 12—14).

32—38. The instances of faith which are alluded to in these verses fall into two groups: the first of an active (vv. 32—34), and the second of a passive (vv. 35—38), character.

32. In order of time Gideon follows Barak; but he is placed first, as the victory which he gained was pre-eminently a triumph of faith (cp. Isai. ix. 4, x. 26). Of the kings, David only is mentioned; the deliverances granted to Judah in later times (even the great one in Hezekiah's reign) being said to be "for David's sake" (1 K. xi. 32, 34; 2 K. xx. 6). During the regal period the nation's spiritual life was chiefly upheld by the prophets, who are here represented by Samuel (cp. Acts iii. 14).

33. David subdued kingdoms (2 S. viii.

1—14), executed righteousness (ib. 15), and obtained promises of the most wonderful kind (2 S. vii. 12—15);—or, obtained the fulfilment of promises; his patient faith being rewarded by the throne of Israel. The clause, "stopped the mouths of lions," is best taken as referring to Daniel (Dan. vi. 22), since quenched the power of fire in the next verse evidently refers to Dan. iii. 25. It should, therefore, have been placed at the beginning of v. 34.

34. violence] Rather, power. The fire retained its natural properties, but its power was "quenched," so far as the three confessors were concerned.

escaped] As Elijah (2 K. i. 9) and Elisha (ib. vi. 13).

out of weakness] As Samson (Judg. xvi. 28), Asa (2 Chro. xiv. 11). But the last four clauses of this verse may all be referred to the men of the Maccabean period (so Delitzsch).

of the aliens] Of foreigners;—so in the case of Gideon (Judg. viii. 12).

35. Women] 1 K. xvii. 22; 2 K. iv. 36.

raised to life again] Lit. "out of a resurrection."

others] As Eleazar and the seven sons of the Maccabean mother (2 Macc. vi and vii).

tortured] Or, "broken on the wheel" (2 Macc. vi. 19, 28, 30).

deliverance] Lit. "the redemption;" the offer of purchasing life by apostasy.

a better resurrection]—better than that which had been wrought for the Israelite mothers by Elijah and Elisha. "The King of the universe," said one of them, "shall raise up us, who have died for His laws, to an eternal revival of life" (2 Macc. vii. 9).

36. cruel mockings] 2 Macc. vii. 7, 10.

bonds] As Jeremiah (Jer. xx. 2, xxxii. 2, xxxvii. 4).

37 They were stoned, they were sawn asunder, were tempted, were slain with the sword: they wandered about in sheepskins and goatskins; being destitute, afflicted, tormented;

38 (Of whom the world was not worthy:) they wandered in deserts, and in mountains, and in dens and caves of the earth.

39 And these all, having obtained a good report through faith, received not the promise:

40 God having ¹provided some ¹Or, ¹seen.
better thing for us, that they without us should not be made perfect.

37. stoned] As Zechariah (2 Chro. xxiv.
20—22).

§ 1, note 4.

were tempted] So the youngest of the seven martyrs in 2 Macc. vii. After his six brothers had remained firm under the worst bodily torture, Antiochus applied to him a yet sharper test of fidelity, promising with an oath to give him great wealth and to make him his personal friend, if only he would abandon "the laws of his fathers" (see Additional Note).

with the sword] 1 K. xix. 10, 13, 19.

wandered about] Rather, went about (a different word from that in v. 38).

sheepskins] The word used of Elijah's mantle in 2 K. i. 8.

tormented] Rather, distressed; the word used in v. 25 ("suffer affliction"), xiii. 3 ("suffer adversity").

38. the world] That proud, ungodly, world (v. 7), which thought them not worthy to live (Acts xxii. 22).

in deserts, and in mountains] So Judas Maccabeus (2 Macc. v. 27).

dens] ib. vi. 11, x. 6.

caves of the earth] underground caverns.

39. received not the promise] The recurrence of these words takes our thoughts back to x. 36 and its exhortation to patient endurance; thus preparing the way for ch. xii.

40. some better thing] The mysterious privileges of the Gospel dispensation; which excite the wonder of angels (1 Pet. i. 11, 12). Abraham and Moses and David were not "made perfect" (xii. 23) until Jesus had established the New Covenant, in virtue of which we are now already (in one sense)
"perfected" (see on x. 14). His resurrection from the dead was the fulfilment of "the promise made unto the fathers" (Acts xiii.
32, 33). By it we are "begotten again... unto an incorruptible inheritance" (1 Pet. i.
3, 4); the Holy Spirit being given as "the earnest of the promised possession."

for us] Or, "concerning us."

that they...] Or, "that they should not be made perfect apart from us." This thought,
"not apart from us," forms the ground of the exhortation in xii. 1. Those ancient worthies, who have now at length been "made perfect" (xii. 23), stand around us, adding solemnity to our lives.

ADDITIONAL NOTES on CHAP. XI. 1, 3, 21, 37.

1. There are two uses of the word ὑπόστασις, a transitive and an intransitive, to be carefully discriminated. In i. 2, iii. 14, it is used absolutely, and so is intransitive. Here, being in construction with a genitive, it is transitive. So Theophylact gives it, οὐσίωσις τῶν μὴ ὄντων, ὑπόστασις τῶν μὴ ὑφείστηκότων. And similarly Chrysostom: who gives this illustration of the meaning of the word; "The resurrection has not yet taken place, but faith substantiates (ὑφίστησιν) it in our souls."

3. There is no ground for imagining a transposition of the μὴ (as though it were ἐκ μὴ φαινόμενων); although the Itala, Peshito, and Vulg. (with many commentators) so translate it,—misled, probably, by 2 Macc. vii. 28, ἐξ οὐκ ὄντων (cp. Wisd. xi. 8). The μὴ negatives an implied assertion, that ἐκ φαινομένων τὰ βλεπόμενα γέγονε—"the world we see had its being from a prior phenomenal world." If it be asked whether this negation be consistent with Gen. i. 11, 20, 24, the answer is, that vegetables and animals did not receive their being from the earth or the waters, but were framed by the (creative) word of God operating upon the earth and the waters.—It is evident that the text gives no warrant for speaking of God as having created the world out of non-phenomenal substance.

21. Aquila and Symmachus render the word, "bed." Indeed, only two verses later on, the LXX. translate the same Hebrew word (there is no pronominal affix in either case) "the bed."—The Vulgate here retained the erroneous rendering of the Itala, "adoravit fastigium virgæ ejus;" although in Gen. xlvii.
31 it had paraphrased correctly; "adoravit Deum, conversus ad lectuli caput."

37. The word ἐπειράσθησαν, though absent from the Peshito, is in the Vulg., and is too well supported to be called in question.
Besides having good MS. authority, it is found three times in Origen.

CHAPTER XII.

1 An exhortation to constant faith, patience, and godliness. 22 A commendation of the new testament above the old.

WHEREFORE seeing we also are compassed about with so great a cloud of witnesses, let us lay aside every weight, and the sin which doth so easily beset us, and let us run with patience the race that is set before us,

2 Looking unto Jesus the ¹author ¹Or, ¹beginner. and finisher of our faith; who for the joy that was set before him endured the cross, despising the shame, and is set down at the right hand of the throne of God.

CHAP. XII. The exhortation begun in x. 32-36 is now resumed (see on xi. 39). If they, who had so much less light granted them, persevered thus manfully, what patience and courage ought we to exhibit!

1. The we also of A. V. is certainly misplaced, and gives a false antithesis; though it is not easy to represent the nicely constructed original. The strict connexion is: Wherefore let us also...run with patience;—even as those did of whom we have been speaking. But into this framework there are inserted two subordinate clauses: one to enforce the “Wherefore,”—having so great a cloud of witnesses surrounding us; the other to suggest a needful preliminary to the “running,”—laying aside every encumbrance and the sin that is so ready to beset us.

a cloud of witnesses] The heroes of faith, who lived under the elder Dispensation, stand in a near relation to us (cp. on xi. 40). They hover around us (cp. v. 23 below), witnesses to the solemn “profession” (iii. 1) which we have made; and, as such, undoubtedly watching our conduct with deepest interest. That this is the reference of the term “witnesses” here, is made plain by a comparison of 1 Tim. vi. 12;—where the word rendered “fight” (as also in 1 Tim. iv. 7) is the same which has here to be rendered “race;”—“Fight the good fight of faith; lay hold on eternal life, whereunto thou wast called, and didst profess the good profession in the sight of many witnesses.”

weights] Or, “encumbrance.” But the word may have a directly moral signification; “pride,” or “conceit” (Additional Note).

doth so easily beset us] Or, “is so ready to beset us.” Probably the sin referred to is that of timidity or false shame (see below); the sin which induced some of the Hebrew Christians to shrink back from their profession (x. 25).

the race] An athletic term, which carries our thoughts back to x. 32.

set before us] with certain rules laid down to which the candidates must conform, and certain rewards for those who win the race (cp. 2 Tim. ii. 5).

2. Looking] with eyes turned away from other objects and fixed on one only.

Jesus] In the Greek, the name occurs after the description (cp. ii. 9): “Looking unto the author and finisher of faith, (even) Jesus.”

the author (in ii. 10, “captain”) and finisher] Or, “the beginner and the perfecter:” who by His victory over the powers of darkness (a victory gained in the power of faith, ii. 11-13) won the grace of regeneration for the army of Faith; and who, after sustaining them in their conflicts, until they “stand perfect and complete in all the will of God” (Col. iv. 11), shall Himself bestow on them the crown of victory.

of our faith] Rather, of faith; as the principle of spiritual life. By His one self-oblation He supplied the ground on which faith rests. At His Second Coming He will consummate that which faith has striven after.

who] Christ’s own history is a pledge of what the recompense of faith shall be. He endured the unknown sufferings of the cross in steadfast faith (cp. ch. v. 7-9); the issue of which was exaltation to God’s right hand.

for the joy] in order that he might gain the joy (such is the force of the preposition in v. 16). Suffering was the price He must pay for it. “The Saviour’s joy,” says Theodoret, “was the salvation of mankind” (cp. Isai. liii. 11).

set before him (as in v. 1)] assigned to Him, in the counsel of eternal love, for His reward.

the cross] “Here, at last,” says Bengel, “he speaks of what to many was so odious a name;”—a “cause of stumbling” (1 Cor. i. 23).

despising the shame] For He could say in assured faith, “I know that I shall not be ashamed” (Isai. l. 7).

3. For] Fix your eyes on Him, I say; For, consider how slight your trials are, when they are compared with His.

consider] Lit. “estimate the proportion of.” So unspeakably glorious in Himself, and yet subjected to such indignities! What proportion can there be between His trial and yours? But He endured all in patience.

contradiction] From the beginning it had been foretold that He should be as “a sign to himself, lest ye be wearied and faint in your minds.

4 Ye have not yet resisted unto blood, striving against sin.

5 And ye have forgotten the exhortation which speaketh unto you as unto children, My son, despise not thou the chastening of the Lord, nor faint when thou art rebuked of him:

6 For whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth, and scourgeth every son whom he receiveth.

7 If ye endure chastening, God dealeth with you as with sons; for what son is he whom the father chasteneth not?

8 But if ye be without chastisement, whereof all are partakers, then are ye bastards, and not sons.

9 Furthermore we have had fathers of our flesh which corrected us, and we gave them reverence: shall we not much rather be in subjection unto the Father of spirits, and live?

10 For they verily for a few days chastened us after their own plea-be spoken against" (Luke ii. 34). His ministry was one long "day of Meribah" (in Num. xx. 13, the LXX. have "waters of contradiction").

faint]—as those who lose heart and give up their endeavour (cp. v. 5; Gal. vi. 9). Literally, the clause stands; "that ye be not weary, fainting in your souls."

4. The figure is now changed, from the race-course to the wrestling-ground (as in 1 Cor. ix. 24—27). In the expression, unto blood, the figure almost passes into reality.

not yet] He is addressing the second generation of Jewish Christians. In earlier times many had stood firm in their opposition to a sinful world, when this could be done only by risking their lives (Acts vii—xii).

The death of St James may have taken place two years previously (cp. on xiii. 7).

5. forgotten] It is a strong term; quite forgotten.

exhortation] Or, "consolation" (under their trials; cp. 2 Cor. i. 5, 7).

speaketh...as unto] Rather, discourseth with you as with (Prov. iii. 11, 12).

despise not] Do not think lightly of it, or cast it away in disdain; but reverence it, as having in it very precious fruit. Endure it, that you may obtain that fruit.

chastening] Or, "discipline," training, education; a phase of meaning, which is to be borne in mind throughout this passage.

faint] Or, "be disheartened" (v. 3).

6. and scourgeth] yea, and scourgeth. So the LXX. The Hebrew has, "Even as a father (chasteneth) the son..."

receiveth] to his favour.

7. If ye endure] Comp. x. 32 and vv. 2, 3, above. If, having chastisement sent on you, you endure it (after Christ's example), then know for your comfort that God dealeth with you as with sons (for the reading, see Additional Note). This patient enduring is the contrast of the "despising" in v. 5.

what son is he] Or, "what son is there;"—what genuine son?

8. without chastisement] None were without it, except those who, when it was offered them, "would none of it" (Prov. i. 23, 25), and so were left to "eat the fruit of their own way" (ib. 31).

all are] Rather, all have been made. The induction supplied in ch. xi warranted the use of "all."

bastards] Supposititious children, not really belonging to the family (Deut. xxxii. 5, Matt. xiii. 38, John viii. 39—44).

9. Furthermore] Up to this point the argument has been drawn from the analogy of human education. But this falls far short of representing the value of our Heavenly Father's discipline.

have had fathers...] Lit. "have had the fathers of our flesh as chastisers."

gave them reverence] The word used in Num. xii. 14 (A. V. "be ashamed"), 2 Chro. vii. 14 (A. V. "humble themselves").

be in subjection] Submitting our wills to His (as in James iv. 7).

the Father of spirits] From whom our spirits have their immediate origin (cp. Eccl. xii. 7). He is ready to bestow the tenderest regard on every "contrite and humble spirit" (Isai. lvii. 15, 16).

and live] obtaining from Him the only true life (Prov. viii. 35); that which is granted to the "just man" who abides "in his faith" (ch. x. 38); the essence of which is participation in God's holiness (see v. 10).

10. for a few days] occasionally, during our childhood. The contrast to this did not require to be mentioned in the second clause of the verse. God's training lasts so long as there is room for growth in holiness; consequently, until death.

after their own pleasure] Rather, as seemed good to them; to the best of their judgment: though sometimes they might be sure; but he for our profit, that we might be partakers of his holiness.

11 Now no chastening for the present seemeth to be joyous, but grievous: nevertheless afterward it yieldeth the peaceable fruit of righteousness unto them which are exercised thereby.

12 Wherefore lift up the hands which hang down, and the feeble knees;

Or, cor. 13 And make ¹straight paths for your feet, lest that which is lame be turned out of the way; but let it rather be healed.

14 Follow peace with all men, and holiness, without which no man shall see the Lord:

15 Looking diligently lest any man ¹fail of the grace of God; lest ¹Or, fall from. any root of bitterness springing up trouble you, and thereby many be defiled;

16 Lest there be any fornicator, or profane person, as Esau, who for one morsel of meat sold his birthright.

over-lenient, and sometimes unduly severe. God's discipline, on the contrary, always tends with certainty to our highest welfare.

partakers of his holiness] and so, in the end, of "everlasting life" (Rom. vi. 22). Cp. 1 Pet. i. 4.

11. no chastening] Or; "all chastisement seemeth for the time present to be not a matter of joy, but of grief." This statement is true universally. That which follows in the second part of the verse is also true (in a degree) of all "discipline" that is worthy of the name.

peaceable] Rather, peaceful; in contrast with the disturbance caused by "grief." In Isai. lvii. 19 "peace" is the healing balm, which the Father of spirits (v. 16) bestows on those whom He has "grieved" (so the LXX. in v. 17, "I grieved him").

of righteousness] A genitive of apposition; righteousness being itself the "peaceful fruit" (comp. James iii. 18).

are exercised] Rather, have been exercised, so as to be thoroughly trained and proficient (as in ch. v. 14).

12. There is an evident allusion to Isai. xxxv. 3. Later on in that chapter the Prophet foresees a time of "joy," in which "grief" shall have fled away (v. 10).

lift up] Lit. "straighten anew:" (see Note below).

feeble] In Luke v. 18 and 24, "palsied." Their sluggishness of faith has ended in spiritual paralysis; so that they make little progress in "the race set before them" (v. 1).

13. make...feet] From Prov. iv. 26.

lest...] Or, "that the lame be not turned out of the way," in dread of its roughnesses; "but may rather be healed" (cp. Isai. xxxv. 6). The Church must not only remove stumbling-blocks (Isai. lvii. 14) out of the way of the lame (the doubtful-minded, 1 K. xviii. 21), but must also labour for their recovery; bringing them to Him who said, "I will heal him" (whom I had chastened); Isai. lvii. 17, 19.

14. Follow] "Pursue" (Ps. xxxiv. 14). holiness] Rather, sanctification (as in 1 Thess. iv. 3, 7). They are to seek "peace with all men," so as not to provoke any needless contest with evil; but in doing this, they are to guard against anything that would interfere with their consecration of heart and life. Cp. 1 Pet. iii. 12—15.

see the Lord] Matt. v. 8; cp. Isai. xxxv. 8.

15. The members of the Church are to have a brotherly care of each other (cp. iii. 12, 13, iv. 1, x. 24). The form of this verse is evidently moulded on that of Deut. xxix. 18.

fail of] Or, "fall back from;" not keeping pace with the leadings of God's grace; but lingering behind and so missing the reward which He has provided. Cp. iv. 1.

of bitterness] Producing bitter fruit. The "root" designates the man who draws others into apostasy; see Deut. xxix. 18, 19 (cp. 1 Macc. i. 10). The same text is referred to by St Peter in Acts viii. 23.

many] Rather, the many; the body of the congregation. The sin of idolatry is frequently spoken of in the Old Testament as causing "defilement" (Jer. ii. 7, 23, iii. 1, 2; Ezek. xx. 30). Whatever else draws men away from the "grace of God," whether infidelity or worldliness, must have the effect of leaving the soul polluted.

16. as Esau] This probably belongs to the second of the preceding terms. "Any fornicator, or [more generally] profane person;"—of which profaneness Esau stands as the type. He despised his birthright (Gen. xxv. 34): that birthright which made him heir of the blessing pronounced on Abraham; perhaps, also, of the right of priestly ministration (Num. iii. 12, 13). For him "things hoped for" were as unsubstantial shadows, "things not seen" as things non-existent. Being thus sensual and faithless, he had cast away all care for that "sanctification" (v. 14), of which he had received the outward pledge in the rite of circumcision. He had become "profane."

Let all who belong to the "church of the 17 For ye know how that afterward, when he would have inherited the blessing, he was rejected: for he found no ¹ place of repentance, though he sought it carefully with tears.

¹ Or, way to change his mind.

18 For ye are not come unto the mount that might be touched, and that burned with fire, nor unto blackness, and darkness, and tempest,

19 And the sound of a trumpet, and the voice of words; which voice they that heard intreated that the word should not be spoken to them any more:

20 (For they could not endure that which was commanded, And if so much as a beast touch the mountain, it shall be stoned, or thrust through with a dart:

21 And so terrible was the sight, firstborn" (v. 23) beware of bartering away their heavenly birthright.

one morsel of meat] Rather, "one meal."

17. bow that...would have] Rather, that when he afterward would fain have.

rejected] his claim to be the rightful heir of "the blessing" being disallowed. Isaac himself recognized the fact, when he said of Jacob, "yea, and he shall be blessed" (Gen. xxvii. 33).

place of repentance] Or, "room for repentance;"—for that "repentance," which he "sought after with tears;" which was, a change of the Divine purpose that had been announced in Isaac's benediction of Jacob. There was no room for such a change. When Judah was "rejected" by God (Jer. vi. 30, vii. 29), the sentence ran, "I have spoken it, I have purposed it, and will not repent." So, too, when Saul was rejected, it was added, that God was "not a man that He should repent." So was it, when Esau was rejected from being heir of the blessing which he had once deliberately set at nought. God's sentence was irreversible. Cp. Deut. i. 45.

sought it carefully] Or, simply, "sought after it" (as in xi. 6). The pronoun "it" has been taken by many to refer to "the blessing" (so Theophylact, Calvin, Bengel, Bleek, and Delitzsch). The philological reasons against this, however, appear insuperable (see Additional Note).

It is strange that any should have inferred from this verse that a man might strive earnestly to repent, and yet find himself shut out from the possibility of doing so. Throughout the narrative Esau shows no sense of his having done wrong. His tears were not those of contrition. His aim was to bend Isaac to his will;—not to bow himself in penitence before God. As regards God:—His refusing to allow of any such "repentance" as Esau desired, was, in truth, giving him "room" and opportunity for personal "repentance;" see Wisd. xii. 10.

18. For] Having reminded them of the exhortation which Moses addressed to Israel of old, he now assigns a reason why the Hebrew Christians should be even more diligent than their fathers not to "fall away from the grace of God" (v. 15); For, how incomparably greater were the manifestations of that grace which had been made to them!

are not come] Rather, have not drawn near; as into God's presence (cp. x. 22): and so in v. 22. That this thought predominates throughout the passage, is plain from v. 28; "grace whereby we may serve God."

the mount] Deut. iv. 11. Sinai stood at the head of the whole Legal Dispensation. When the Ark of the Covenant,—constituted at Sinai the centre of Israel's religious system,—was lodged on Sion, it was as though "Sinai was in the sanctuary" (Ps. lxxviii. 17). Down to the close of the Levitical period, the earthly Jerusalem belonged to the order of things of which Sinai was the historical symbol (Gal. iv. 25).—For the reading, see Additional Note.

touched] Rather, felt by the hand; as an object is felt by men who grope in the dark (cp. Isai. lix. 10). When the people were led forth out of the camp by Moses to "the nether part of the mount" (Exod. xix. 17, Deut. iv. 11), they must have advanced through the thick darkness like an army of blind men; anxiously groping after the barriers at the foot of the mountain, beyond which they were forbidden to go on pain of death. It was a parable, in which the character of the Legal Dispensation was sketched. What a contrast to the later Dispensation! No need was there to grope after that Mount Zion, on which "the glory of the Lord was risen" (Isai. lx. 1).

blackness] Or, "thick gloom."

19. The "sound of a trumpet" is mentioned in Exod. xix. 16, xx. 18. The "voice of words" is from Deut. iv. 12; where it refers to the "Ten Words."

intreated...] Lit. "deprecatd (or asked to be excused from) having anything further spoken to them." The word recurs in v. 25. Comp. Deut. v. 25—27.

20. could not endure] The thought that even unconscious animals were to be slain, as if guilty of sacrilege, was intolerably appalling.

And if...] Rather, "If even a beast."

or...dart] This clause should be omitted. It is wanting in almost all ancient authorities.

21. And so...] Rather, And (so terrible was the sight!) Moses said. The passage that Moses said, I exceedingly fear and quake :)

22 But ye are come unto mount Sion, and unto the city of the living God, the heavenly Jerusalem, and to an innumerable company of angels,

23 To the general assembly and church of the firstborn, which are ¹written in heaven, and to God the ¹Or, enrolled. Judge of all, and to the spirits of just men made perfect, specially referred to is Deut. ix. 15—19. At v. 15 we read that "the mountain burned with fire," in token of God's anger against the sinful people. Then it is added in vv. 18, 19, that Moses offered supplication on their behalf, "being afraid of the anger and hot displeasure, wherewith the Lord was wroth." See Additional Note.

24 And to Jesus the mediator of the new ¹covenant, and to the blood ¹Or, testament.

22—25. At Sinai, and under the Dispensation that was there founded, men had "drawn near" to God only to shrink back in alarm from Him (Exod. xx. 21). The contrast now follows:

(1) Christians "have drawn near," not to the terrible Desert mountain, but to "the city of the living God;" of which Zion, "the perfection of beauty" (Ps. l. 2), was a type.

(2) There they meet "myriads of angels," not dispensing a "fiery law" (Deut. xxxiii. 2), but holding joyous festival.

(3) They have their names enrolled, not after any human pedigree (Num. i. 18), but as heirs of heaven.

(4) Their causes are heard, not by fallible men (Exod. xviii. 13—26), but by Him who, being the God of all, cannot but be a righteous Judge.

(5) Instead of looking forward to the undefined "blessing" promised to Abraham at some future time, they know that the departed "righteous" are now "perfected," and that the same "perfection" is already made over to themselves,

(6) through a Covenant, not mediated by man (like that at Sinai, which was broken before it was formally established, so that the mediator himself stood aghast, v. 21), but by the Divine Saviour,

(7) who ratified the Covenant, not with the blood of animals, which bore witness to man's guilt, but with His own atoning, and truly consecrating, blood. On this sustained contrast the admonition in v. 25 rests.

22. are come] "have drawn near;" v. 18. mount Sion] On which Christ reigns (Ps. ii. 6); from which He exercises rule (cx. 2); the abode of "everlasting joy" (Isai. xxxv. 10). the living God] See on ix. 14.

the heavenly Jerusalem] The true mother Church, to which all the churches on earth are affiliated (Gal. iv. 26).

to an innumerable... (v. 23)...firstborn] Rather, to tens of thousands of angels in festal assembly, and to the congregation of the first-born. "Tens of thousands of angels" had attended "the ministration of death" on Sinai (2 Cor. iii. 7), and had mournfully watched over Israel's later history. Now they were able to hold joyous festival; celebrating the victory of Divine love, achieved by Him at whose birth they had sung, "Glory in the highest to God," whose Ascension they had gazed on with admiring wonder (1 Tim. iii. 16), whose redeeming work they study with deepest reverence (1 Pet. i. 12).

At Sinai, too, there had been a "congregation of first-born," who were numbered by Moses (Numb. iii. 42ff). But the Hebrew Christians were joined to a nobler "congregation of first-born," whose names were enrolled (even while they were yet pilgrims,—'coetus peregrinantium') in "the book of life" (cp. Luke x. 20; Phil. iv. 3); all of them made "priests unto God" (Rev. i. 6), because all of them "conformed to the image" of the One First-born (see on i. 6).

23. to God the Judge of all] Or, to the Judge, who is God of all;—"God of the spirits of all flesh" (Num. xxvii. 16, cp. on v. 9);—the God and the Judge of angels also. Since He is the "God of all," He cannot but judge all equitably. Similarly St Peter, after setting forth the high dignity of Christians, proceeds to speak of "the Father, who without respect of persons judgeth according to every man's work."

As universal and impartial Judge, He has admitted to the citizenship of the Holy City not those only who have been "born anew" into it on earth, but also "the spirits of just men;" who (like Abel) had "made a covenant with Him over sacrifice" (Ps. l. 5), and were now "perfected" (xi. 40) through the one Mediatorial offering.

24. to Jesus the mediator...] The order of the words in the Greek is again noticeable (cp. ii. 9, etc.); "to the Mediator of the New Covenant, Jesus." The word here rendered "new" is not the one generally employed, which marks the contrasted character of the two Covenants. It points rather to this Covenant's having a new, fresh, vigorous, life; while the other was ready to die.

blood of sprinkling] Which really effects—what the sprinkling of sacrificial blood by of sprinkling, that speaketh better things than that of Abel.

25 See that ye refuse not him that speaketh. For if they escaped not who refused him that spake on earth, much more shall not we escape, if we turn away from him that speaketh from heaven:

26 Whose voice then shook the earth: but now he hath promised, saying, Yet once more I shake not the earth only, but also heaven.

27 And this word, Yet once more, signifieth the removing of those things that ^{are shaken} are shaken, as of ^{Or, may be shaken} things that are made, that those things which cannot be shaken may remain.

Aaron (ix. 13, 14) or by Moses (ib. 19—21) typically represented—purification from guilt (comp. x. 22, 1 Pet. i. 2).

better things...] Or (corr. reading), better than Abel; more nobly and excellently than Abel could (comp. vii. 19, 22, viii. 6, etc.). Righteous Abel did, indeed, speak to all later ages of God's readiness to accept the faith and obedience of His servants; but his voice had no power to quiet the conscience of his guilty brother. Cain's cry was: "My iniquity is too great to be forgiven" (Gen. iv. 13, marg.). But the blood of Jesus offered pardon even to those who had shed it (Acts iii. 19). Through it Abel himself, with all the "righteous men" who had been mentioned in ch. xi, had been "made perfect." Unspeakable, then, must be the value of that blood, "the blood of the Covenant, wherewith" Christians have "been sanctified" (x. 29). How important that none should despise its pleadings! If that great "cloud of witnesses," with Abel at its head, bids us to be earnest in "striving against sin" (v. 4), how much more He, to whose coming they all looked forward, "the Author and Perfector of faith" (v. 2)!

25. refuse not] Or, "decline not to hear" (the same word as in v. 19).

him that speaketh] God, who now "speaketh" to us "in His Son" (i. 1); with the gentle, yet infinitely persuasive, accents of the "blood of sprinkling" (v. 24), and by the "Spirit of grace" (x. 29). How deep the guilt of declining that invitation (Luke xiv. 18f., where the same word is used)!

escaped not] Comp. ii. 3. There was nothing which was necessarily, and of itself, wrong in Israel's shrinking from the terrors of Sinai (Deut. v. 25; Exod. xx. 16). But, in fact, their unwillingness to hear God's words sprang from distrust of their Divine Benefactor; who, with so much condescension, had "brought them unto Himself" (xix. 4). They asked for the intervention of Moses as if that might relieve them from responsibility to the Law, or shield them from its penalties (Exod. xxxii. 33—35);—an impossibility.

who refused] Rather, when they refused. That did not absolve them from the obligation laid upon them.

if we turn away] Lit. "we that turn away." The word is the same as in Josh. xxii. 16, 18, 29.

from heaven] That heaven into which Jesus entered "by His own blood" (ix. 12, 24); from whence the "beseeching" voice of "God in Christ" (2 Cor. v. 20) is continually issuing.

26. shook the earth] Exod. xix. 18. The earth trembled, as with birth-throes (Ps. xcvi. 4), when God's great plan for forming "a kingdom of priests" to Himself (Exod. xix. 6) began to work.

now] Under the Gospel dispensation; to which the prophecy in Hagg. ii. 6—9 looked forward.

promised] It is not said, "threatened." If the framework of heaven and earth is to be shaken, it is for the introduction of a far higher constitution of things.

Yet once more I shake] Or, "Yet again, once for all, I will shake." Israel's disobedience had brought the Sinaitic Covenant to an end. But the high design, which Israel as a nation had failed to accomplish, was not abandoned. God would "yet again once for all" set to His hand, and "shake the heaven and the earth and the throne of kingdoms" (Hagg. ii. 21, 22); that "the desire of all nations" might come (ib. ii. 6, 7), even His chosen Servant (typified by Zerubbabel), whom He would make to be "as a signet,"—the immovable Seal of His own immovable kingdom (ib. ii. 23).

27. This work of God (so the "once for all" signified) should be final. The old order of that natural system, which is "subject to vanity," should be "removed," or, "changed" (comp. vi. 17, vii. 12), to make room for that which, being "filled with the glory of the Lord" (Hagg. ii. 7; Isai. vi. 3), is everlasting.

that are made] Rather, that have been made. So in Isai. lxvi. 1, 2, it is said of heaven and earth, "all these things but my hand made;" and this as a reason why they cannot furnish a fitting Temple for God; whose abode must be spiritual (cp. lvii. 15). The things that are to "remain" must be such as partake of God's own holiness.

remain] The same word as in vii. 3, 24, x. 34, xiii. 14; John xii. 34; 1 Cor. iii. 14, xiii. 13.

28 Wherefore we receiving a kingdom which cannot be moved, ^{let us} let us have grace, whereby we may serve

God acceptably with reverence and godly fear:

29 For our God is a consuming fire.

28. we receiving a kingdom] Rather, seeing that we receive a kingdom (comp. Dan. vii. 18).

cannot be moved] Rather, cannot be shaken: Dan. ii. 44, vii. 14, 27. The centre of the kingdom is that "Zion" (v. 22) which "cannot be shaken, but abideth for ever" (Ps. cix. 1); with which God's "Covenant of Peace" stands firm, though "the mountains be removed" (Isai. liv. 10). Comp. also the note on v. 26 above.

let us have] Or, "let us hold fast." So the Peshito; using the same word here that it does in 1 Tim. iii. 9, Rev. iii. 11. (For another rendering, see below.) Through Him, who sits on the "throne of grace," we are consecrated with "the Spirit of grace" (x. 29), and receive at God's hands that priestly royalty which Israel forfeited; how careful, then, should we be not to "fall back from the grace of God" (v. 15) as they did.

serve God] Or, "do service to God;" presenting to Him that "holy, acceptable, sacrifice," which is our "rational service" (Rom. xii. 1).

reverence] Such as a due sense of the holiness of God is fitted to inspire even in the highest of created beings (cp. Isai. vi. 2). For the reading, see Additional Note.

godly fear] The verb is used in Exod. iii. 6; "Moses feared to look upon God."

29. For] Rather, For indeed:—though He be so gracious; though He have condescended to call Himself "our God" (xi. 16).

a consuming fire] In Deut. iv. 24 there is added, "even a jealous God;" who is intolerant of everything that would injure the purity of His people (cp. Exod. xxiv. 10, 17; Lev. x. 1—3). That Fire has been burning in the Church age after age; yet is the Church itself "not consumed" (Exod. iii. 2, Mal. iii. 6).

ADDITIONAL NOTES ON CHAP. XII. 1, 7, 12, 17, 18, 21, 22, 23, 28.

1. So Bengel takes it here: quoting from Hesychius; ὄγκος] φύσημα, ὑπερηφανία. By giving it this sense (1) We bring the term into symmetry with ἀμαρτίαν (cp. 1 Pet. ii. 1: ἀποθίμενοι οὖν πᾶσαν κακίαν καὶ πάντα ὄλον). (2) We obtain the very same antithesis to patient faith which lies in the Hebrew of Hab. ii. 4: "His soul is lifted up" (or, "swollen out").

1. The verb περιύστημι is used of φόβος in Thuc. iii. 54; and of αἰσχύνω in Demosth. 30. 24. The adj. εὐπερίστατος is a strictly εὐαγέ λεγόμενον; occurring elsewhere only in Christian writers who are referring to this passage.

7. Instead of εἰ παιδεῖαν, the most ancient MSS. and versions give εἰς παιδεῖαν ("endure ye (or, ye endure) unto chastisement"). In the face of this strong external evidence Bleek, Tholuck, and Lünemann, adhere to the Received Text; and with good reason: for the other reading, besides grievously marring the continuity of v. 7, leaves the εἰ δὲ of v. 8 without anything to refer to. It should be remarked that the verb ὑπομένω has just been used transitively in vv. 2, 3, and in x. 32; and that it here supplies the needful antithesis to the slighting of God's discipline which had been spoken of in v. 7.

12. The word ἀνυπόβουλος is used by the LXX. in Ps. xviii. 35: "Thy hand upheld me, and Thy discipline (or, chastisement) lifted me up again" (ἡ παιδεία σου ἀνύποβόσέ με).

New Test.—VOL. IV.

17. 1. The distance between αὐτήν and εὐλογίαν is far too great.

2. Μετανοίας from its emphatic position remains on the ear.

3. The antithetic verbs "found" and "sought" all but compel the reference to be to μετανοίας.

4. To put μετανοίας γὰρ...εὗρε into a parenthesis, leaves the clause καίπερ...αὐτήν to come in tautologously, after a completed statement.

5. The structure of the verse is clearly chiastic; the θελησας clause corresponding to the ἐκζητήσας, and ἀπεδοκιμάσθη to the μετανοίας γὰρ... (cp. Jer. iv. 28, οὐ μετανοήσω; vi. 30, ἀπεδοκίμασεν αὐτοὺς ὁ Κύριος).

18. Some MSS. and versions omit ὅρει (leaving us to render "to a palpable and kindled fire"): which, however, is well supported by manuscript and patristic authority. The correctness of the Received Text is confirmed by Deut. iv. 11: καὶ προσήλθετε, ...καὶ τὸ ὄρος ἐκαίετο πυρὶ...σκότος, γνόφος, θύελλα (cp. ib. v. 22, 23, ix. 13). In Rev. xxi. 1—8 we have the λίμνη ἡ καιομένη πυρὶ as the antithesis of the Heavenly Jerusalem.

The word ψηλαφωμένον ("groped after") has a sufficiently obvious application to the mountain enveloped in darkness; but appears quite unsuited to a "burning fire."

21. In Deut. ix. 19 we have ἐκφοβός εἰμι; in the text, ἐκφοβός εἰμι καὶ ἐντρομος; the second adjective being an idiomatic appendage, as in the phrase μετὰ φόβου καὶ τρόμου (2 Cor. vii. 15; Eph. vi. 5; Phil. ii. 12). Cp. 1 Macc. xiii. 2, ἐν τρόμῳ καὶ ἐμφοβῳ.

22, 23. Most are now agreed in connecting πᾶνγγύραι with what goes before it (not, as A.V., with v. 23). So the best MSS., the Peshito and Vulgate, Origen, Ambrose, and Augustine ("decem millibus exultantium angelorum"). It remains doubtful whether we are to render "to myriads of angels, a festal throng," or, "to myriads, a festal throng of angels." As πᾶνγγύραι is not so well suited to govern the genitive, the former rendering is to be preferred.

28. Many translate, "let us have thankfulness;" but

1. No instance is given to show that the words can have this meaning, when used (as here) absolutely, and with the verb standing first.

2. The drift of the exhortation is to promote the "reverence and godly fear," which are spoken of at the end of the verse. Thankfulness, however compatible with this, yet belongs to a different line of thought.

3. The "holding fast of grace" is the contrast of the "falling back from the grace of God," which had been spoken of in v. 15 (cp. also x. 29, xiii. 9).

28. The oldest MSS. read μετὰ εὐλαβείας καὶ δέους. Tregelles and Alford refer to the Peshito as supporting this reading; but incorrectly. The first of the two Syriac words is the one which is used for αἰδώς in 1 Tim. ii. 9, while the second (from the verb used for εὐλαβηθεῖς in xi. 7) represents εὐλαβεία in ch. v. 7, 8. The Received Text has good MSS. on its side, in addition to the Peshito and (very distinctly) St Chrysostom. Delitzsch notices that the combination αἰδώς καὶ εὐλαβεία occurs in Philo, II. 597, 33.

CHAPTER XIII.

1 Divers admonitions, as to charity, 4 to honest life, 5 to avoid covetousness, 7 to regard God's preachers, 9 to take heed of strange doctrines, 10 to confess Christ, 16 to give alms, 17 to obey governors, 18 to pray for the apostle. 20 The conclusion.

LET brotherly love continue.

2 Be not forgetful to entertain strangers: for thereby some have entertained angels unawares.

3 Remember them that are in bonds, as bound with them; and them which suffer adversity, as being yourselves also in the body.

4 Marriage is honourable in all, and the bed undefiled: but whoremongers and adulterers God will judge.

5 Let your conversation be without covetousness; and be content with such things as ye have: for he hath CHAP. XIII. 1. brotherly love] The love of such as are brethren in Christ (ii. 11, iii. 1; cp. 1 Thess. iv. 9, 10). How active this love had been in the Hebrew community, we saw in vi. 10, x. 32. The exhortation is, "Let it continue," unshaken;—a sign that you belong to the immovable kingdom (xii. 27). In vv. 2, 3, two forms of this brotherly kindness are mentioned—kindness to "strangers" and to "prisoners;" both of which classes had been specially named by Christ as among His "brethren" (Matt. xxv. 38—40).

2. The Emperor Julian (Ep. 49) held that the kindness which Christians showed to strangers was one of the principal causes of Christianity having spread as it had done.

3. bound with them] So closely united to them in love that you cannot but share their bonds (1 Cor. xii. 26; cp. x. 33 above).

suffer adversity] Or, "are in distress" (see on xi. 37).

in the body] and therefore exposed to the like sufferings.

4. Marriage is honourable] Rather, Let marriage be held in honour (the construction as in v. 5; cp. Rom. xii. 9).

in all] Rather, "in all things" (as in v.

18; Tit. ii. 9, 10). No part of that which is God's institution is to be treated with disrespect.

the bed] Rather, let the bed be. Many good authorities, however, introduce the second clause by "for," instead of "but."

God] Human law may not be able to reach such, but there is One who will without fail judge them,—God.

5. conversation] Or, "conduct;" habits and manner of life.

without covetousness] Lit. "un-money-loving;" implying the reverse of money-loving,—open-handed and generous. (On the sequence of vv. 2, 5, cp. Introd. III. 2, § i.) be hath said] "He Himself," or, "HE;"—there was no need to say, who. The quotation is from Josh. i. 5 (see below), where the words are addressed to Joshua after the death of Moses. A similar assurance was made to Jacob when he left Isaac (Gen. xxviii. 15), and to Solomon when he was about to lose his father (1 Chro. xxviii. 20). The Hebrew Christians might apply the assurance to themselves, though they were separated from the Mosaic economy (now all but defunct, viii. 13), and cast out from their patrimony (x. 32—34).

^{Josh. i. 5} said, "I will never leave thee, nor forsake thee."

6 So that we may boldly say, The Lord is my helper, and I will not fear what man shall do unto me.

^{1 Cor. xii. 19} ^{the guides.} 7 Remember them which have the rule over you, who have spoken unto you the word of God: whose faith follow, considering the end of their conversation.

8 Jesus Christ the same yesterday, and to day, and for ever.

9 Be not carried about with divers and strange doctrines. For it is a good thing that the heart be established with grace; not with meats, which have not profited them that have been occupied therein.

10 We have an altar, whereof they have no right to eat which serve the tabernacle.

6. may boldly say] Rather, say boldly. The quotation is from Ps. cxviii. 6. There ought to be a colon at "fear," the second clause being interrogative: What shall man do unto me?

7. which have...spoken] Rather, that had the rule over you, (lit., your leaders;—the same word as in v. 17) which spoke. The reference is plainly to some who had been removed from among them. One of these, probably, was James the Just, bishop of Jerusalem, who was put to death in A.D. 62 (Jos. 'Ant.' xx. 9).

follow] That is, imitate (vi. 12).

considering] Or, "observing carefully."

the end of their conversation] Or, "the issue of their life:"—how nobly they concluded their long course of consistent labour; faithful to the last. There should be a full stop at the end of the verse; the order of the words in the original being, "of whom, observing carefully the issue of (their) life, imitate the faith."

8. the same] is the same. The Greek order is somewhat more emphatic: "Jesus Christ is yesterday and to-day the same, and for ever." He is "the same to-day," in your season of trial, that He was yesterday, when your fathers were tried; and He will be the same "for ever." What, then, if the Legal constitution were perishing, and an unknown future lay before the Church? They might advance courageously on their way to the Land of Promise. The "Ark of the Covenant of the Lord" had gone before, and would stand firm, until the whole Church should have "passed over" (Josh. iii. 3, 17) in safety.

Obs. Thus the last chapter resumes, and applies practically, the testimony to Christ, which had been given in the first; Thou art THE SAME (i. 12).

9. carried about with...doctrines] Rather (corr. reading), carried away by...teachings:—away from that simplicity of faith, which marked your departed leaders (v. 7); and so, away from the one unchanging Source of spiritual life (v. 8).

The circumstances of the Church at Jerusalem were at this time very critical. The "many myriads" (Acts xxi. 20) of its members were all "zealous for the law." The fact that a whole generation had passed away since the Christian Church was founded, and yet the Temple-services still continued to be celebrated, might incline some to suppose that the Levitical ritual was meant to be perpetual. True, the sacrifices were not needed (as the preceding part of this Epistle had shown) for the purpose of atonement. But might they not be the appointed channels of self-consecration and thanksgiving? And were not the sacrificial feasts valuable means of brotherly communion? The "many teachers" who existed among the Hebrew Christians (James iii. 1) might easily be led to form divers, and ever-varying, theories on these points; embodying elements that were strange, and alien to the true principles of the Gospel. Such speculations would be especially dangerous in times of persecution; when anything would be welcome which seemed to offer a plausible ground of compromise.

established] Made firm and strong (comp. Col. ii. 7). This steadfastness of heart could be produced only by abiding in the "grace" of Christ (Rom. v. 2); not by sacrificial meats, which were mere "carnal ordinances" (ix. 10). If any Christians trusted in them, they were "fallen from grace" (Gal. v. 4).

which have not] Lit. "wherein they that walked found no profit." Had men not tried long enough what could be got from the Law as an outward system? Had they not walked in it, regulating their whole life by it, and found it unprofitable (vii. 18)? The naked and heartless ritual observances of the later Jews were, like the idols their fathers had trusted in, things that could not profit (Jer. ii. 8, vii. 8; cp. Isai. lvii. 12).

10. We have an altar]—by means of which our souls are upheld in health and comfort (v. 9). The Altar is that, on which Jesus offered up Himself "to sanctify His people" (v. 12); by which both our thank-offerings to God and our deeds of kindness to our fellow-men are hallowed (vv. 15, 16). We do not stand in need of those Levitical 11 For the bodies of those beasts, whose blood is brought into the sanctuary by the high priest for sin, are burned without the camp.

12 Wherefore Jesus also, that he might sanctify the people with his own blood, suffered without the gate.

13 Let us go forth therefore unto him without the camp, bearing his reproach.

14 ^b For here have we no continuing city, but we seek one to come. ^{b Mic. 1 10}

15 By him therefore let us offer the sacrifice of praise to God continually, that is, the fruit of our lips ^{† Gr. ca} giving thanks to his name. ^{feeding}

"meats;" we "have meat to eat which they know not of." We have an Altar, of (or, from) whicb they that serve (viii. 6) the tabernacle have no right (or, power, as in 1 Cor. ix. 4) to eat. Only by faith (sursum corda) can any have "power" (comp. John i. 12) to partake of the one true Sin-offering which was offered upon that invisible Altar (see Additional Note). They who faithlessly adhere to the antiquated type disable themselves from feeding on the reality, which is "meat indeed" and "drink indeed" (John vi. 55).

11. This disability was figuratively set forth by the Law. For not even the high-priest was permitted to eat of the sin-offerings of the Day of Atonement. The bodies of the bullock and the goat were to be carried "without the camp," and to be there burnt (Lev. xvi. 27). Those sacrifices represented simply the penalty of sin, death; and were to be "burnt" (not with holy altar-fire, but) as polluted things (cp. Josh. vii. 15, LXX.). The Law itself, then, declared that they "who served the Tabernacle" were not permitted to feed on the most solemn of its typical sin-offerings. Although these, by Divine ordainment, bore the people's sins representatively, yet, being unable truly to atone for sin, they were treated as under a curse. So long as the Jews held Jesus to be, like their own sin-offering, simply an "accursed thing," they could not partake of that most precious Sacrifice.

12. Wherefore] That He might fulfil what was presignified by that provision in the Law, Jesus was contented to be led outside the gate of Jerusalem (John xix. 17), as one laden with guilt (cp. Lev. xxiv. 23; Num. xv. 35; Acts vii. 58). This He did that He might "sanctify the people" (which was the end aimed at by the Day of Atonement, Lev. xvi. 30); see on ii. 11, 17.

"Through the offering of" His sacred "body we are once for all sanctified" (x. 10). When He "bore the sins of many" (ix. 28), and "tasted death for every man" (ii. 9), He made a real atonement for sins; and abolished the power of sin and death. The virtue of that sacrifice is communicated to all who obey Him; so that it becomes to them the reality, which was typified by the "peace-offerings" of the Law;—a means of communion with the Holy and Blessed God. In the fullest sense, then, "we have an altar;" of which we may eat and live for ever.

13. go forth unto him] go outside the unbelieving and rebellious camp; to Him, in whom we have sacrifice and high-priest and altar all combined. When He went forth from Jerusalem, He made it necessary (as of old) for "every one who sought the Lord" to go forth without the camp (Exod. xxxiii. 7).

his reproach] Cp. Ps. lxxix. 7, 19. So Moses bore "the reproach of Christ" (xi. 26) when he forsook Egypt. The city "where the Lord was crucified" was now "spiritually" Egypt (Rev. xi. 8). This apostolic "Let us go forth" was a token that the unfaithful city's doom was fast approaching.

14. Let us not hesitate to go forth; For we, like our fathers (xi. 13—16), are only travelling towards the city that abideth (the same word as in xii. 27, "remain").

one to come] Rather, that which is to come;—the subject of sure promise.

15. By him] Rather, Through Him. Through Him, as the one offering for sin, by which we are sanctified (v. 12); through Him also, as the living Altar (altar and priest in one), whereby our gifts are made acceptable to God (cp. 1 Pet. ii. 5).

sacrifice of praise] The words are used of the Levitical thank-offering in Lev. vii. 12—15, but appear already lifted up to a higher application in Ps. l. 14, cvii. 22, cxvi. 17.

continually] The "thank-offerings" of the Law were only occasional. Those of Christians are to be, "at all times and in all places;" of perpetual recurrence (see Num. xxviii. 10, 15, 23, 24, 31, LXX.). The Rabbins say, "In the world to come all the offerings cease; but the offering of praise never ceases" (Schöttg. 'H. H.' II. 612).

Obs. The word is the one used in St Luke xxiv. 53. When the Apostles had seen Jesus taken up to heaven as He was bestowing on them His high-priestly benediction, "they returned and were continually in the temple, praising and blessing God."

fruit of our lips giving] Rather, fruit of lips that give. The expression "fruit of the lips" occurs in Isai. lvii. 19. Though the LXX. omitted it there, they inserted it in Hos. xiv. 2, where the Hebrew has "the 16 But to do good and to communicate forget not: for with such sacrifices God is well pleased.

17 Obey them that have the rule over you, and submit yourselves: for they watch for your souls, as they that must give account, that they may do it with joy, and not with grief: for that is unprofitable for you.

18 Pray for us: for we trust we have a good conscience, in all things willing to live honestly.

19 But I beseech you the rather to do this, that I may be restored to you the sooner.

calves of our lips" [lit. "our lips (as) calves"]: see Note below. Words of praise, uttered by the lips, are as fruit, borne by affections whose roots are in the heart. In the "fruit of the lips," therefore, man's "rational service" of God finds expression, and so the whole body becomes "a living sacrifice" (Rom. xii. 1).

to his name] To Him as He has revealed Himself; in accordance with that "great Name" (Mal. i. 11) into which we are baptized.

16. But] Thanksgiving to God is the first great sacrifice; But it is not the only one. Deeds of kindness to our fellow-men are also offerings of "sweet odour, acceptable to God" (Phil. iv. 18).

In the Communion Service both the offerings mentioned in vv. 15, 16 are combined with the sacramental feeding on the body and blood of Christ.

to communicate] To impart of our earthly store to those who are in need (Rom. xii. 13).

17. In v. 7 he had bidden them imitate the faith of their departed "rulers." Having warned them in vv. 8—16 against being drawn aside from the one Fountain of grace, he now speaks of their duties to their living "rulers."

submit yourselves] Rather, "defer (to them);" yielding to their authority, complying with their admonitions (cp. 1 Cor. xvi. 16). Such compliance was reasonable; For they on their part watch, with unsleeping care (Luke xxi. 36), for your souls (2 Cor. xii. 15).

give account] Or, "give an account;" an account of the flock entrusted to their charge (Gen. xxxi. 39, 40; Ezek. xxxiv. 10; cp. Acts xx. 28).

may do it] Rather, may do this. The majority of commentators understand "this" to refer to, watch for your souls.—Yield a ready compliance to your pastors' admonitions; for they on their part keep watch for your souls' salvation with godly earnestness;—that so they may do this their work (cp. 1 Tim. iv. 16) with joy (Acts xx. 24; Phil. i. 4; cp. ii. 2), and not with grief (as mourning over your unfruitfulness, 2 Cor. ii. 13, xii. 21); for that were indeed your loss.

Others, however (as Paschasius, Anselm, and Lyra, in Estius; and so Owen) refer the "this" to, give an account;—that they may render in their account with joy (rejoicing over you as the "crown" of their labours, 1 Thess. ii. 19, 20), and not with grief (as having "lost the things" they had "wrought," 2 John 8). The last clause, "that were unprofitable for you," is then to be regarded as a euphemism for, "Terrible indeed in that case would the loss be to you."

The most probable punctuation of the verse is, "Obey them that watch over you, and defer to them; for they on their part watch for your souls, as men that must give an account: that they may do this with joy, and not with grief; for &c."

18. for we trust] Or, "we are persuaded." He states this, because they would pray on his behalf with greater confidence, if they were assured of his integrity.

a good conscience] Acts xxiii. 1, xxiv. 16.

in all things...] Rather, desirous in all things to act rightly (or, "honourably;" see on Rom. xii. 17).

19. the rather] the more earnestly (as in ii. 1).

restored to you] Re-instated (so the word implies) in his former relations to them (cp. Jer. xvi. 15; in A. V. "bring again"). St Paul had been torn away from the Church at Jerusalem precisely at the moment when the plan, at which he had so long laboured, for testifying the love he bore to his brethren after the flesh, had to all appearance reached a prosperous issue.

20. Now] Rather, But. He longed to see them again: But, however that might be, he committed them to the God of peace (cp. Rom. xv. 33, just after he had spoken of his desire to visit Rome); the God, who, amidst the unceasing changes of the world, "blesses His people with peace" (Ps. xxix. 11).

brought again] Rather (as in Rom. x. 7), brought up:—with a plain reference to Isai. lxiii. 11; which stands in the LXX., "Where is He that brought up from the sea the Shepherd of the sheep?" The ascent of Moses and Israel out of the depths of the Red Sea was typical of the restoration of Christ and (in due time) of His redeemed host out of Hades.

In the Greek the order of the words is (cp. ii. 9, &c.), "that brought up from the dead that great Shepherd of the sheep through the blood of the everlasting Covenant, our Lord Jesus."

through the blood] Rather, "in virtue of the blood" (cp. ix. 25, Eph. ii. 13, Zech. ix. 11; which last passage appears to be referred to). The death of Christ, as the expression of His perfect obedience, was of infinite merit. His blood, poured out on the cross, sealed the everlasting covenant of peace between God and man; which being effected (and because it was effected) the Surety of the covenant was Himself raised triumphantly from the dead. ADDITIONAL NOTES on CHAP. XIII. 5, 10, 15.

5. In Deut. xxxi. 6, Moses assuring Joshua of God's favour, says, οὐ μὴ σε ἀνῆ, οὐδ' οὐ μὴ σε ἐγκαταλείψῃ. In Josh. i. 5, where God Himself gives this same assurance to Joshua, the LXX. has a feeblere rendering; instead of which the Apostle (retaining the first person) adopts the form of words which had been used in Deut. xxxi. 6.

10. This is the only view regarding the nature of the "Altar" here spoken of, which satisfies all the requirements of the context.

(2) Nor yet can it be understood of the Lord's Table. It is, of course, true to say that they who continued to serve the Tabernacle had no right to partake of the Lord's Supper; and if v. 10 had stood alone, this might have been what it asserted. But the argument of vv. 11, 12 compels us to carry our thoughts to the Altar on which Christ offered Himself once for all as the world's Sin-offering. The Lord's Table is not that Altar; though it be the hallowed means by which the faithful partake of that invisible, yet alone real, Altar.

That antitypal Altar was wholly outside the range of the Levitical system, because it belonged to an order of things infinitely elevated above it. On that Altar He, who went forth bearing the "reproach" of the legal high-priest's anathema, was offered up; realizing in fulness of perfection every thing that had been presignified by all the legal sacrifices. If, then, the Fire of that antitypal Altar was "the Eternal Spirit"—the "Fire of Love" (see on ix. 14),—what could the Altar itself be but Christ's own Divine-human personality?

Obs. 1. Estius refers to Thomas Aquinas, as taking the Altar here to be, "the cross of Christ, or, Christ Himself;" and as remarking, "To eat from this Altar is to partake of (percipere) the fruit of Christ's passion, and to be incorporated with Him as Head." Comp. Cyril. Alex. 'De Ador.' ix.: Αὐτὸς οὖν, ἄρα, ἐστὶ τὸ θυσιαστήριον, αὐτὸς δὲ τὸ θυμίαμα καὶ ἀρχιερεὺς.

Obs. 2. With this interpretation vv. 13, 15 are in harmony. "Let us go forth to Him,"—to that Altar, which is invisible to the unbelieving Jew, but from which Christians eat continually (especially in the sacrament of the Lord's Supper). Through Him (altar, at once, and high-priest) let us offer up our thanksgivings (especially, our Eucharistic praises), and our deeds of kindness (especially, our offertory gifts).

Compare Chrys. on ch. vi. 19, 20: "As the difference between Aaron and Christ is great, so is that between the Jews and ourselves. For see; we have our victim above, our priest above, our sacrifices above:—let us offer such sacrifices as can be present on that altar."

15. The substitution of the term καρπός was so much the easier, because (in addition to the resemblance between מִנְחָה and מִנְחָה) the words κάρπωμα and ὀλοκάρπωμα, κάρπωσις and ὀλοκάρπωσις, had come to be used of the "burnt-offering," and generally of "offerings to the Lord made by fire;" under which head came the minchah of the "thank-offering" (see on Lev. vii. 11, 12). Such "offering made by fire" represented the self-sacrifice of a heart, in which the flame of Holy Love had been kindled;—the noblest fruit that the human spirit can yield.

JAMES.

INTRODUCTION.

I.

THE writer tells us little, directly, of himself; though there are few writings which in the same space reveal more of the individual character of their author. He simply calls himself "James, servant of God and of the Lord Jesus Christ;" and addresses "the Twelve Tribes which are in the dispersion."

But he may be safely identified with that James of Jerusalem, who is prominent in Acts xii., xv., and xxi.¹ In xii. 17, St. Peter sends the announcement of his release "to James and to the brethren." In xv. 13, seqq., after Peter, Barnabas and Paul have made their several statements in the meeting of the Apostles and elders, James formally sums up the discussion with "Men and brethren, hearken unto me," &c.: and the encyclic letter announcing the decision is, in substance, identical with his speech.² And in xxi. 18, we read that "the day following [his arrival at Jerusalem], Paul went in with us unto James; and all the elders were present." In the next verse but one it is James, apparently, who speaks on behalf of "the myriads of Jews which believe, and are all zealous of the Law;" and induces Paul to undertake certain ritual obligations which would satisfy them that he walked orderly and kept the Law.

² It is remarkable that the classical epistolary form χαίρειν occurs in this Epistle, and in the encyclic letter; but nowhere else in the N. T., except in the letter of the Gentile, Claudius Lysias, in Acts xxiii. 26. Cp., however, 2 John 10, seq.

2. Such external testimony as we have, is in harmony with this view; and we may further identify him with James "the Just" or "Righteous," who is mentioned by Josephus ('Antt.' xx. 9, 1), and described more fully by Hegesippus in Eusebius ('H. E.' ii. 23, see Routh, 'Reliquiæ Sacræ,' vol. 1). The account in Hegesippus is, indeed, highly coloured: but it may be accepted as containing a substance of truth. From this it may be inferred, that he was a man of ascetic habits, if not, strictly speaking, a Nazarite. The priestly features in the description may be taken as a conventional portraiture of his Christian character, his ecclesiastical position, and perhaps also his "brotherhood" to the Great High Priest.¹ He was (we are told) continually in the Temple interceding for the sins of the people, so that his knees grew callous from kneeling on the pavement. He commanded the confidence and reverence of Jew and Christian alike; and received from the Jews not only the title ὁ δίκαιος, but also another, Ὁβλίας,² interpreted by Hegesippus περιοχὴ τοῦ λαοῦ, Bulwark of the people; as the Christians called him "one of the pillars." And it is stated that his martyrdom (which took place in the interregnum between the procuratorship of Festus and that of

² I.e. Ὁβλίας, as Suicer s. v., Lange in Herzog's Encyclopädie, s. v. Ἰακώβος. — Οἱ δοκοῦντες στῦλοι εἶναι, Galat. ii. 9.

Albinus, about A.D. 62 or 63), was supposed by many to have been avenged by the woes which shortly afterwards began to fall upon Jerusalem.¹

3. The internal evidence of the Epistle points in the same direction. The man who reveals himself to us in it, is a Christian, and yet a Jew; and, as such, not severed from those Jews who, though they had not yet embraced Christianity, might hereafter become Christians; one who saw in Christianity the completion and perfection of the older covenant; who probably looked on all Gentile Christians as received into Israel; yet would not lay on them a yoke of Judaism, but conceded to them a liberty that he would not use (probably did not desire) himself. Thus he was qualified to act as a mediator, in a conciliatory spirit, in the questions which arose; occupying a position which was indeed provisional,² while that visitation of Jerusalem was impending, by which God Himself was about to make the old vanish away: and looking on all things with the practical object of promoting the quiet discharge of duty; without taste for speculation, with a positive abhorrence of controversy, shunning "questions," impatient of "talk" as a substitute for work and a hindrance to it.³ The portrait is not without its likeness to the human side of His character, who spent His nights in prayer to God, wrestling, even against hope, for those who refused to be saved; the Man of sorrow, of suffering, of love; severe only to sin, most of all to hypocrisy and oppression of the brethren; of whom it was said, "He shall not strive nor cry; neither shall any man hear His voice in the streets; a bruised reed shall He not break, and smoking flax shall He not quench" (Matt. xii. 19-21).

4. This leads us a step further. St. Paul describes this James of Jerusalem as "the Lord's brother" (Gal. i. 19); a title which, whatever may be the precise interpretation given to it, implies a close relation. Who were "the brethren of the Lord," is a question which has been already discussed in the additional note on St. Matthew, ch. xiii.; to which the reader is referred. But a few supplementary remarks may not be out of place here. Doubtless, it is hard to answer the question positively; because we are left in ignorance of the details. All would have been clear, if these had been told. But "Something sealed The lips of the Evangelist:" and we are left to choose among hypotheses, to every one of which objections have been found or invented. It is the old story; "there are objections to a plenum, and objections to a vacuum; yet one or the other must be true." That the "brethren" were younger sons of our Lord's mother, is inconsistent with the fact that the charge of His mother was bequeathed by Him, in the hour of His death, to St. John. And it may be added, that their interference with the conduct of Jesus (compare Matt. xii. 46; xiii. 54-56, with Mark iii. 21, 31; vi. 2, 3; Luke viii. 19-21), implies that some, if not all, of them were older than He was. The argument on the other side from the word "first-born" in Luke ii. 7 (and Received Text of Matt. i. 25), plausible as at first sight it seems, is now generally given up; the expression being (like our "son and heir") no less applicable to an only son, than to one who is "first-born among many brethren;" inasmuch as it refers to the law, "Sanctify unto Me all the first-born, whatsoever openeth the womb among the children of Israel" (Exod. xiii. 2, comp. 12, 15): and the idea which it expresses is that of consecration to God. The theory, in which Bishop Lightfoot acquiesces, that they were sons of Joseph by a former wife, is in accordance with the probability that they were older than our Lord; but is liable, like the former one, to the objection that the Blessed Virgin was consigned, at the death of Christ, to the charge of St. John ("Behold thy Son!—Behold thy Mother!" John xix. 26, 27). And though it has much of ecclesiastical tradition in its favour, yet, as soon as we recognise the fact that the term

² It is not clear whether he was enabled to see that it was provisional. But ch. v. 1-9 seems to make it probable.

³ Reuss, 'Geschichte d. heil. Schriften,' § 144.

"brother" is frequently used of any near relative (see Dr. W. H. Mill 'On the Pantheistic Theory,' p. 227, seq.), it ceases to have any real support in Holy Scripture.

5. On the other hand, the amount of Scriptural evidence which has to be set aside or explained away by those who refuse to identify James the Lord's brother with James "the little" (ὁ μικρός) son of Alphæus or Clopas (the identity of these names being sufficiently proved), is considerable. We have a right to assume that St. Paul calls him one of the Apostles; not only because this is the more natural interpretation of his words in Gal. i. 19 (ἕτερον δὲ τῶν ἀποστόλων οὐκ εἶδον, εἰ μὴ Ἰάκωβον τὸν ἀδελφὸν τοῦ Κυρίου); but because the alternative interpretation, "other of the Apostles I saw none; but [I saw] James," is excluded by what follows in ii. 6-9, where the whole strength of St. Paul's argument rests on the fact that the three whom he met on equal terms, and with whom he formally divided the field of Apostolic labour, were not only Apostles, but chief among the Apostles in the estimation of the Church,— "James, Cephas, and John, who seemed to be pillars," οἱ δοκοῦντες στῦλοι εἶναι. We are reminded of that group of Three within the Twelve, who were nearest to our Lord in some of the most solemn hours of His earthly life, Cephas and John (as here), and the other James, the son of Zebedee.

Again, in 1 Cor. ix. 5, nothing short of the assumption of another Cephas besides St. Peter can justify the separation of the brethren of the Lord, who are there mentioned, from the Apostles; and the argument of the passage requires that they should all be called Apostles in the same sense. And in 1 Cor. xv. 5, seqq., the appearances of our Lord after His resurrection fall into two groups, 1st. Cephas, . . . the twelve, . . . the five hundred; 2nd. James,¹ . . . all the Apostles, . . . Me.

We conclude, then, that St. James of Jerusalem, the brother of our Lord, was an Apostle. And though that word is sometimes found in the Epistles in a sense not only lower than, but different from that in which it is applied to the Twelve and to St. Paul, being used of the messengers or ambassadors of a Church; yet this is only so in passages where no mistake could arise; and cannot be admitted in any passage where the ambiguity would be so misleading as in Gal. i. 19. Besides, St. Paul is speaking of one who not only was an Apostle, but occupied a chief place, as one of the Three who were accounted "Pillars."

6. Nor is it more satisfactory to say that James in some way or other came to be an Apostle, though he was not so at the first. We see in Acts i. 21-26, how carefully the qualifications were marked out which were ordinarily requisite for the Apostleship, and by what solemn sanctions that office was guarded against intrusion. In the special case of St. Paul, who had not "companied with" them "all the time that the Lord Jesus went in and out among" them, we see how formally he was called and appointed by special revelation, and how "the signs of an Apostle" are indicated (Acts xiii.; 1 Cor. ix.). And even so he had to maintain a continual struggle with the gainsayers of his authority, who disputed the evidences of his mission. In view of all this, it is not easy to recognise a process, by which men grew, as it were, into Apostles by a gradual expansion of their personal influence, without Divine revelation or human appointment.

7. There is, therefore, every probability, primâ facie, that James "the brother of our Lord" was, accurately speaking, our Lord's cousin, being the son of "Mary of Clopas,"¹ his mother's sister was one of the twelve who sat down with Christ at the Paschal supper. And the other brethren are mentioned as believers in Acts i. 14.

¹ Cleophas, in John xix. 25, is a mistake of the A.V., probably traceable to the Vulgate. The two names are, in fact, essentially distinct, Κλεώπας being = Aramaic ܩܠܫܐ (ʿAlphaios); but Κλεοπᾶς being a Greek name shortened from Κλεόπατρος, as Ἀντιπᾶς from Ἀντιπατρος. Κλεο- might become, by contraction, either Κλε- or

(or perhaps her cousin). And the only remaining question seems to be, whether this probability is destroyed by John vii. 5, "Neither did His brethren believe on Him." It has been hence assumed that none of the brethren could have been of the number of the Twelve. But this is to strain the language of St. John far beyond what it can reasonably be made to bear. In the first place, the word "belief" is used by the Evangelists in various shades of meaning. Observe, "His disciples believed on Him," John ii. 11; and "Because of your unbelief," said to those disciples who had been trying, though unsuccessfully, to cast out the evil spirit (Matt. xvii. 20). The very narrative which states that His brethren did not believe on Him, implies that they were among His followers; and is more consistent with the confused and worldly expectations of adherents than with the designs of enemies. If they had no belief

Κλει- (Κλεισθενής, Κλειδάμος), but not Κλω-. And Κλωπ- would have been peculiarly objectionable in a Greek name, as suggesting κλώψ. (Renan, 'Évangiles,' App., has overlooked these considerations). It is true, that Jews occasionally adopted Greek or Roman names which resembled their own; and thus Clopas and Cleopas might be names of the same person. But, even in this case, Clopas would be the original name. It has indeed been said that Hegesippus calls Clopas the uncle of James. But this is a mistake. His words, as quoted (Euseb. H. E. iv. 22) are μετὰ τὸ μαρτυρῆσαι Ἰάκωβον τὸν δίκαιον ὡς καὶ ὁ Κύριος ἐπὶ τῷ αὐτῷ λόγῳ, πάλιν δ' ἐκ θεοῦ αὐτοῦ Συμεῶν ὁ τοῦ Κλωπᾶ καθίσταται ἐπίσκοπος· ὃν προέθεντο πάντες, ὄντα ἀνεψιὸν τοῦ Κυρίου, δεύτερον. Here the words ὁ ἐκ θεοῦ αὐτοῦ are, however they are taken, awkward; and, grammatically, αὐτοῦ might refer either to Κύριος or to Ἰάκωβον. But the context, indicating that the relationship to our LORD was the thing which made all agree to choose Symeon, would be enough to decide that θεοῦ belongs to Κύριος. And this becomes certain when we compare another passage, in which Hegesippus says, μέχρις οὗ ὁ ἐκ θεοῦ τοῦ Κυρίου ὁ προειρημένος Συμεὼν υἱὸς Κλωπᾶ συκοφαντηθεὶς κ. τ. έ. (ap. Euseb. iii. 32). Cp. Eusebius himself in iii. 11, Συμεῶνα τὸν τοῦ Κλωπᾶ . . . τοῦ τῆς αὐτόθι παροικίας θρόνου ἄξιον εἶναι δοκιμάσαι, ἀνεψιὸν γε, ὅς φασι, γεγονότα τοῦ Σωτῆρος· τὸν γὰρ οὖν Κλωπᾶν ἀδελφὸν τοῦ Ἰωσήφ ὑπάρχειν Ἠγήσιππος ἱστορεῖ. This would imply a double relationship, according to the legal genealogy. And, possibly, πάλιν . . . δεύτερον, in the fragment first cited, are not mere words of surplusage, but suggest that Symeon and his predecessor stood in the same degree of relationship to our LORD.

in Jesus at all, they must have been deliberately urging Him to expose Himself to death. It seems more reasonable to ascribe to them an inadequate or erroneous belief, and an incapacity for appreciating the true nature of the kingdom which was to be inaugurated. But, even if it be granted, that "the brethren" generally grouped themselves with those who tried to thwart the Son of the Virgin, there remains a palpable fallacy in this interpretation of John vii. 5. It converts a general into a universal proposition. St. John's words are not equivalent to "All His brethren came, . . .; for neither did any of His brethren believe on Him." Yet this is what the argument requires. We do not know how many "brethren" there were: four, the sons of Mary of Clopas, are mentioned by name; and of His "sisters" it is said "Are they not all with us?" There may even have been other cousins besides the children of Clopas and Mary. At any rate, one or two of the brethren may have been believers (and if so, may even have been Apostles), without any contradiction to the general statement of St. John.

8. And various incidental considerations point to the same conclusion. Only two persons bearing the name of James are mentioned in the Gospels or the early part of the Acts—the son of Zebedee, and the son of Alphæus. And, after the death of the former, James of Jerusalem is spoken of without any distinctive epithet, as if there was no longer another for whom he could be mistaken. Compare Acts xii. 2, with ver. 17 of the same chapter. That one Apostle called James should silently disappear, and another should silently and immediately take his place, is scarcely credible. Moreover, the position of primacy which James assumes among the Apostles and elders at Jerusalem, and the marked deference which St. Paul shews towards him, all combine to indicate an Apostle, not "born out of due time," but one of the Twelve.

9. The internal evidence from the Epistle of St. James, which has been scarcely noticed at all, is no less important. To the present writer, it appears absolutely decisive. The Epistle does not indeed assert the writer's Apostleship. It asserts nothing about him. But (which is equally important for the interpretation of the words in John vii. 5) it is unquestionably the work of a constant and devoted follower of Jesus of Nazareth. If the Epistle is read with reference to this point, it strikes the ear, from beginning to end, as an echo of the oral teaching of our Lord. It is impossible that it should have been written by any one who had not, throughout the whole course of Christ's ministry, drunk in His words and stored them in his heart, till his whole spirit was steeped in their inspiration. There is scarcely a thought in the Epistle which cannot be traced to Christ's personal teaching.¹ If John has lain on the Saviour's bosom, James has sat at His feet.

Nor is it as if this can be traced to the study of the written volumes of the Evangelists; although there is, as might be expected, more likeness to St. Matthew (especially to the Sermon on the Mount)² than to the rest. No sure ground exists for believing that the writer had had the opportunity of studying any one of the written Gospels. Nor is the likeness such as to suggest this explanation: for it consists, not in verbal quotations, but in the reproduction of the teaching. Limited to the actual discourses of the Saviour, and residing in the thoughts rather than the expressions, it suggests to us that the Evangelists and the writer of the Epistle drew from a common source in the living words of the Divine Teacher. Probably the same account is to be given of the parallel passages (which are also remarkable) in St. James and St. Peter.¹ And perhaps the writer's apparent reserve in regard to the Redemption through the death of Christ (which has been the subject of much criticism), and his controversy with the unloving, lifeless orthodoxy of Pharisaism, will become more clearly intelligible, when viewed in this light, as reflecting the actual teaching of his living Lord.

II.

St. James, while governing the Mother Church of Jerusalem, wrote to "the twelve tribes in the dispersion" (there is something ideal in the expression; cf. Matt. xix. 28), with a sort of patriarchal authority, if not actual jurisdiction. For the Jews who were scattered abroad, were wont to apply to the ecclesiastical authorities at Jerusalem for direction, and to receive decrees from them.² And thus those Jews who had believed in Christ were already prepared to look for guidance and doctrine, to him who stood at the head of the Christian Church at Jerusalem. No other Apostle or Bishop could claim their attention precisely in the same way. The Churches of Jewish Christians belonged (to use a more modern ecclesiastical phrase) to his "obedience," in the same way as those of Rome, Colossæ, &c. (even while yet unseen) belonged to St. Paul's. The care of all these Churches came upon him.

From a comparison of these passages it is inferred by some that St. Peter had the Epistle of St. James before him.

² From Acts ix. 2, it appears that the high priest could issue his warrant to the synagogues at Damascus, to bind any Jews who were there accused of heresy, and to send them to Jerusalem for trial.

It is here taken for granted that the "twelve tribes" (the name having become technical, though the actual number had been lost; see note on i. 1, and compare "the Thirty Towns" of early Roman history) are the believing Jews, whose faith was in a Messiah already come. So much seems clear; although it requires to be guarded by certain reservations. For,—

1. Gentiles admitted into Churches which were in the main Jewish, could not be excluded. They had been received into "the true Israel."

2. There may have been "a mixed multitude," a floating, indeterminate amount of semi-christianity,—the enquiring, the doubting, and the double-minded,—which he could not exclude from his thoughts while writing from Jerusalem to his brethren of the dispersion.

3. And still further: as neither he nor they had ceased to be Jews on becoming Christians, but all retained their membership in their ancient commonwealth, which was Church and State in one, asserting their nationality, and sharing the worship of the Temple and the Synagogue,¹ they could not forget those who, though still unconverted, were yet their brethren as Jews, and might hereafter become so in a fuller sense, as Christians also.

And therefore, although it would be wrong to say that the Epistle was addressed to the unbelieving as well as to the converted Jews, we may admit that the feeling of this brotherhood has had its influence in the apparently fluctuating way in which the suffering Christians and their oppressors are spoken of, and classes of persons are apostrophised who can scarcely have pretended to be Christians in any sense. See the notes on iv. 2, 13; v. 1.

III.

Written from Jerusalem to the Jews of the Dispersion, the Epistle is, without prejudice to its Christian character, and notwithstanding the remarkable correctness of its Greek diction (a characteristic which has scarcely received the attention that it deserves), essentially Hebrew in tone of thought and feeling, and even phraseology.¹ In every paragraph it reminds us of the teaching of the Saviour Himself. But the vessel which received His words had first been imbued with the peculiar character of Semitic, and especially Hebrew, culture. The Proverbial Books of the Jews rise in our thoughts as we read the Epistle, alike in their general ethical character, and, especially, in their peculiar development of the idea of 'Wisdom.' It may perhaps admit of doubt whether the books of 'The Wisdom of Solomon' and 'Ecclesiasticus' are among the actual sources of St. James's teaching, or whether they are merely to be looked upon as intermediate products of the same school of thought and philosophy, in which the Jewish mind found its congenial sphere from the days of Solomon to those of St. James. Yet the resemblances seem too many and too striking to be thus explained; and it is most probable that they indicate an actual and familiar acquaintance with all the so-called 'Sapiential books.' See Additional Note at end of ch. i.

Again, the stress laid on sins of the tongue and on the unruliness of that member, and the melancholy picture of the social relations of rich and poor,—almost synonymous with oppressors and oppressed,—seem to carry us back to the same storehouse of practical experience. Equally characteristic and remarkable, especially in contrast with the argumentative trains of thought and closely-linked statements to which we are accustomed in St. Paul's writings, is the abrupt gnomic form of enunciation which often disguises the real closeness of the connexion of the thoughts. Here we often seem to pass from "the words of the wise and their dark sayings" to the oracular utterances of the prophet.¹

So also, instead of general statements, St. James is fond of placing before us in a concrete form representations of scenes vividly, almost dramatically, realising to our imaginations the lessons which he wishes to enforce.² And with these again are connected the picturesque allusions³,

THE GENERAL EPISTLE OF JAMES.

CHAPTER I.

1 We are to rejoice under the cross, 5 to ask patience of God, 13 and in our trials not to impute our weakness, or sins, unto him, 19 but rather to hearken to the word, to meditate in it, and to do thereafter. 26 Otherwise men may seem, but never be truly religious.

CHAP. I. 1. James.] For the personal questions connected with this name, see the Introduction.

a servant of God and of the Lord Jesus Christ.] More exactly, slave, bondman, of Him who has purchased us to Himself. The word is not necessarily so harsh as it seems to those who look at slavery only on its tragic side. Domestic slaves were usually well treated (St. Luke vii. 2); though this depended on a master's temper or caprice. We know of no household servants, except slaves, in Greece or at Rome (cp. Lat. familia). St. Paul uses the word of himself, both with the title of an Apostle (Rom. i. 1; Tit. i. 1), and without it (Phil. i. 1); see too 2 Peter i. 1; Jude 1. It seems to indicate some (though undefined) ministry, beyond the ordinary Christian's relation to his Lord (see 2 Tim. ii. 24). Some, comparing the usage of the Hebrew prophets, even think it = Apostle. In John xv. 15, Christ calls the disciples no longer "servants" (slaves), but "friends." Compare what is said of Moses in Num. xii. 7, with Exod. xxxiii. 11; Heb. iii. 2-5.

The co-ordinate mention of God and the Lord Jesus Christ implies their co-equal dignity. And it accords with St. James's view of the oneness of the old and new Dispensations.

to the twelve tribes.] A name of pride to the children of the twelve patriarchs (really thirteen tribes), even when the commonwealth of Israel was no more. Its significance is both religious and political. Christ recognises it in connexion with the number of the Apostles, and (prophetically) with the future kingdom (Matt. xix. 28; Luke xxii. 30; cp. Revel. vii. 4, xxi. 12-14). St. Paul

JAMES, a servant of God and of the Lord Jesus Christ, to the twelve tribes which are scattered abroad, greeting.

2 My brethren, count it all joy when ye fall into divers temptations; which are scattered abroad.] Literally, of the dispersion, i. e. who were dispersed abroad in the captivity and did not return to Palestine. Many had formed ties in the far East, and remained there. And there were others who, for commercial or other reasons, had followed the march of Alexander's empire, and settled in the kingdoms into which it was broken up, chiefly in the cities on the coasts of Asia Minor. The phrase is derived from the LXX, Deut. xxx. 4; see Ps. cxlvii. 2; Ezek. xxii. 15. St. Peter addresses his first Epistle to "the strangers of the dispersion of (in) Pontus," &c. The Jews, in John vii. 35, ask whether Christ will go "unto the dispersion of (among) the Greeks." All these Jewish colonies were in correspondence with Jerusalem, and received the decrees of the Sanhedrim on ritual and ecclesiastical matters. So those who became Christians would still look to Jerusalem, and gladly receive an epistle from the pastor of that church. See Introduction, ii.

(Acts xxvi. 7) uses an equivalent noun (τὸ δωδεκάφυλον, "the dozen tribes"), which also occurs in early ecclesiastical writers. Here the Christian Jews, as being the true Israel, are probably meant, not the whole Church, St. Paul's "Israel of God" (Gal. vi. 16); though Gentile converts, attached to churches chiefly Jewish, may be included.

greeting.] Literally, wisheth joy—a Greek salutation; whereas the other Epp. wish "mercy," "grace," "peace," the last being the prevalent Eastern form, even to the present day. See Introduction, i. note 1.

2. My brethren.] St. James, writing from the fulness of his heart, and knowing the 4 But let patience have her perfect work, that ye may be perfect and entire, wanting nothing.

5 If any of you lack wisdom, let needs of his brethren and the troubles which were threatening, plunges at once into his subject. The comparison of 1 Thess. ii. 14, with Acts xvii. 1-7, throws light on the situation. The double tie of brotherhood in blood and in faith may account for the frequent use of the words "my brethren" (15 times) in this Epistle. St. Paul and St. John prefer "children."

count it all joy.] Nothing but joy, in spite of outward appearances and the suggestions of human weakness.

when ye fall into divers temptations.] We speak of trials of affliction, and temptations of allurements; but the same family of words in the original expresses both, though the verb is more commonly used of temptation, the noun of trial. (The verb is also used simply of testing, 2 Cor. xiii. 5; even of trying, attempting, Acts xvi. 7, xxiv. 6:—the noun is used by Christ of Himself, in Luke xxii. 28). The common notion is the risk of shaking faith or obedience, whether by pain or pleasure. Here the temptations are such as persons "fall into," or "fall in with" (cp. Luke x. 30, of the man who "fell among thieves"), and therefore are—(1) outward, as opposed to the inner temptations of verse 14 (see note there); (2) not self-sought; such as we fall, not run, into. The risk of failure under trial is enough to make those who know their weakness pray that they be not led into temptation (Matt. vi. 13) even of this kind (see Hooker, 'E. P.' v. 48, 13, and Augustin. ib. n. 51); but those who fall into it may, even while suffering, feel joy, remembering (1) its uses in detaching the soul from earth, disciplining it and conforming it to Christ; (2) the assurance of help proportioned to their need (1 Cor. x. 13); (3) the promise of reward great beyond all comparison of the suffering (Rom. viii. 17, seq.; 2 Cor. iv. 17, seq.; cp. Heb. xii. 2-7).

The coincidences between verses 2-12 and Eccles. chap. ii. are very striking.

The whole Epistle shews what need there was to dwell on the sweetness of the uses of adversity. St. James views the present and coming troubles on their spiritual side, and calls them "good," in virtue of the fruit that they bear.

3. Knowing this.] Delicately teaching them, if ignorant, what they ought to know and must recognise,—that these temptations test the reality and depth of faith, and that the process of trial works and establishes patience. "Patience" is not merely passive submission: rather, enduring fortitude, the elastic spirit which bears up against trials until it conquers. So "patient continuance in well-doing" (literally, endurance of good work), Rom. ii. 7; "let us run with patience the race that is set before us," Heb. xii. 1; "he that shall endure unto the end, the same shall be saved," Matt. x. 22, xxiv. 13: see infra 12. In 1 Peter i. 7, "the trial of faith" is connected, as here, with "manifold temptations," and leads to "glory at the appearing of Jesus Christ;" cp. also Rom. v. 3, seq., "we glory in tribulation (nearly = 'temptation' here; cp. Luke viii. 13, with Matt. xiii. 21), knowing that tribulation worketh patience, and patience experience, and experience hope;" where "experience" is nearly the same word with "trying" here, varying only as experience differs from the experiment of which it is the result, and so coming nearer to the "perfect work" (verse 4) which crowns "patience" than to the probation which perfects it.

4. have her perfect work.] Further marking the energetic character of this "patience" (cp. Rom. ii. 7; 1 Thess. i. 3); the "work" being the exercise which develops and purifies patience to perfection. "Perfect," as used in N. T. of human things, implies full growth; strictly of persons (as here, "that ye may be perfect"); as of men (contrasted with babes) in Christ, 1 Cor. xiv. 20 (A. V. men); cp. "unto a perfect man . . . that we be no more children," Eph. iv. 13; and see Heb. v. 14; 1 Cor. xiii. 10, 11. A thing is "perfect," in its kind; "entire," in all its parts;—"perfect," not rudimentary, "entire," not maimed or incomplete. "Entireness" (A. V., "perfect soundness") was given to the cripple in Acts iii. 16. Josephus uses the word of victims fit for sacrifice; the LXX (Exod. xx. 25), of stones unhewn. In 1 Th. v. 23, man's threefold nature, in the completeness of all its parts, is indicated: "your whole spirit and soul and body be preserved."

Note St. James's habit to gain emphasis by repeating those words which form the links of his thoughts. Already we have had "to rejoice" (A. V., "greeting") . . . "joy," "patience . . . patience," "perfect" . . . that ye may be perfect."

wanting nothing.] Rather, wanting in nothing: the same thought is expressed first positively, then negatively. It is not a lesson of contentment, but a warning against being contented with anything short of perfection: cp. 1 Cor. i. 7.

him ask of God, that giveth to all men liberally, and upbraideth not; and it shall be given him.

6 But let him ask in faith, nothing wavering. For he that wavereth is like a wave of the sea driven with the wind and tossed.

7 For let not that man think that he shall receive any thing of the Lord.

8 A double minded man is unstable in all his ways.

9 Let the brother of low degree¹ rejoice in that he is exalted:

Thus the Christian's sufferings are made to display, exercise, and develop his good gifts; he is accomplished in all graces collectively, he is perfected in every one severally.

5. If any of you lack (or, is wanting in) wisdom.] The phrase of the last verse repeated: let him ask (cp. Matt. vii. 7; 2 Chr. i. 7) of God, whose attribute is to give—to give to all—and that liberally, with open and stretched-out hands; or literally, with simplicity, single-hearted good-will, without any such arrière pensée, or selfish consideration, as often modifies the bounty of men. But both meanings meet in one, when the word is used of giving: see Rom. xii. 8; 2 Cor. viii. 2, ix. 11, &c. Elsewhere used of simplicity, singleness of character, Eph. vi. 5; Col. iii. 22.

That it belongs to man to ask, and to God to give, is one contrast. Another is, that when man gives, he gives and upbraids, repaying himself by the assumption of superiority, and making the receiver chafe under the obligation. This thought is very frequent in Eccles.: see xviii. 18, xx. 15, xli. 22, and especially xxix. 22–28.

wisdom.] See add. note at end of chapter.

6. in faith.] Relying on God's will to give (verse 5). The word is further defined, as often in St. James, by the negative following:—nothing wavering, or doubting, cp. Matt. xxi. 21; Mark xi. 23; Acts x. 20, xi. 12; “at odds with oneself, undecided, hesitating”; in verse 8, of two minds. The doubt of God's steadfastness is the reflex of man's own conscious vacillation, whereas fulness of faith and entireness of devotion are the conditions of effectual prayer; see ch. v. 15. He who knows not his own mind in asking must have misgivings as to receiving. And so it turns out to him. This doubting is illustrated by an image from outward nature, found also in Isaiah lvii. 20, but there of sin rather than weakness. See too Eccles. xxxiii. (xxxvi.) 2; Jude 12, 13. Here the ceaseless agitation of the storm-driven wave represents the unrest of a soul not “grounded and settled in the faith” (Col. i. 23). In Eph. iv. 14, the bark is tossed at the mercy of the winds: here we have the wave itself, the very element of instability, of restless, purposeless motion.

On the use of natural imagery by St. James, see Introduction, iii., last note.

7. For let not that man.] The doubter mentioned in verse 6. The change from “it shall be given” to “he shall receive” may refer the failure to the disqualification of the receiver, rather than to the unwillingness of the Giver.

of the Lord.] St. Paul's rule is to use this word (Gr. Kύριος) of Christ. In the LXX it uniformly represents the Hebrew Yehovah. St. James uses it sometimes of Christ (e. g. i. 1, ii. 1, v. 7); but also of the Father or (more probably) of the Godhead in Unity, without distinction of Father, Son, and Holy Ghost; as here, and v. 10.

The Lord, “with whom is no variableness” (v. 17), is forcibly contrasted with the weak creature who asks of Him, yet knows not his own mind even in asking.

8. There should be only a comma between vv. 7 and 8; the verses may be paraphrased, “Let not such an one as this expect to receive anything, great or small, that he asks of the Lord, double-minded man as he is, unstable in all his ways!” And this gives meaning to “But” (omitted in A. V.) at the beginning of v. 9.—double-minded]. In iv. 8, where this word recurs, the context suggests the notion of duplicity. But it is not always conscious hypocrisy to serve two masters or cherish two minds (“a heart and a heart,” 1 Chr. xii. 33, cp. Eccles. i. 28). And here the double-minded man is not so much wicked as weak in faith, “halting between two opinions” (1 Kings xviii. 21); cp. “Woe to fearful hearts and faint hands, and the sinner that goeth two ways” (Eccles. ii. 12).

unstable in all his ways.] This word (ἀκράτατος) does not occur again in the received text of the N. T., though it is probably to be read in iii. 8. But the cognate substantive is common in the general sense of disorder, confusion, disturbance, unsettledness; coupled with “Wars” and opposed to “peace,” Lu. xxi. 9; 1 Cor. xiv. 33: see 2 Cor. vi. 5, xii. 20:—below, iii. 16, “confusion and every evil work.”

The doubtfulness in the man's prayer betrays itself in all his goings. He cannot walk straight or aim straight at an object; at odds with himself, he goes two ways—and therefore no way.

9. Let the brother.] Read “But let the brother.” The difficulty which probably 10 But the rich, in that he is made low: because as the flower of the grass he shall pass away.

with a burning heat, but it withereth the grass, and the flower thereof falleth, and the grace of the fashion of it perisheth: so also made our Translators leave out the word, disappears with the wrong punctuation; see note on v. 8. We have a regular series, "Count it . . . ; let patience . . . ; let him ask . . . ; let not that man But let the brother"

Vv. 9, 10, should be compared with the "Beatitudes" in Matt. ch. v., and the parable of the Pharisee and Publican, Lu. xviii. 10, seqq.: see too 2 Cor. xi. 30; and especially 1 Cor. vii. 22, "he that is called in the Lord, being a servant, is the Lord's freedman: likewise he that is called, being free, is Christ's servant." Whether poor or rich, the Christian, as such, is placed so high that he looks down on and beyond worldly distinctions,—except in so far as he may find rank and riches a temptation to descend to earthly things, or low estate a help to reach spiritual blessings:—which thought again suggests the connexion between temptation and blessing, see vv. 2, 12. The humble brother's exaltation must consist in the spiritual blessings (v. i. 18; ii. 5), which more than make up for his outward lowliness; and in his being conformed to his Saviour's image.

10. But the second part of the precept (v. 10) is more difficult. Bouman ('Comm. in Ep. Jac.,' Traj. ad Rhen., 1865) even proposes to supply "not in his riches" after "humiliation." It seems clear that we must (1) recognise "the rich" as a "brother" equally with him "of low degree";—(2) supply, "let him rejoice," in this verse, as found in v. 9;—and (3) understand the word paraphrased "in that he is made low" (lit. "in his humiliation") in the usual Christian sense, not as implying moral degradation.

Thus both poor and rich are treated as disciples who are to be taught to go on to perfection. True, not many rich or mighty were among them (1 Cor. i. 26): yet even before the crucifixion we read of a Nicodemus, a Zacchæus, a Joseph of Arimathæa. And both classes are recognised here, and taught to become Christians indeed, the poor being exalted, the lofty being humbled. Each has the contraries reconciled in himself; the poor, rich in faith (infra, ii. 5); the rich, poor in spirit (Matt. v. 3); that both may inherit a blessing. The will of God, to which theirs must be conformed, is the exaltation of the lowly, the abasement of the lofty (Lu. i. 48, seq.). And this is wrought, (1) outwardly, in the uncertainty of riches (1 Tim. vi. 17), through which, if he is merely a rich man, he shall fade away as they do; (2) inwardly, in the change of heart, which makes him count as loss all things that had seemed gain to him, that he may win Christ (Phil. iii. 7). See in Mark x. 17, and the parallel passages, how Christ tried the rich young man who came running to Him; noting how nearly Christ there identified the having riches with the trusting in them. Again, the rich Christian by the contrast of eternal things can take the true measure of his earthly wealth. Thus by abasement he rises to the spiritual level of those who have had no such encumbrances; and he is on the way to share the exaltation of the poor in that world where these differences disappear. Above all, this is directly to follow the steps of Christ, who, being rich, for us became poor, and because He humbled Himself was highly exalted by His Father (2 Cor. viii. 9; Phil. ii. 6–11).

11. This verse, when exactly rendered, gives a vivid picture of what is wont to happen, by describing in the past tense one representative instance of it:—"for the sun arose, and the fiery blast, and scorched the grass; and the flower thereof dropped off, and the comeliness of its form perished." All is over before the sentence is uttered! So infra, v. 24, where see note.

The burning beat here may be merely that of the sun when he goeth forth in his might. But more probably it is the burning wind, blowing like the hot blast of a furnace from the torrid wilderness: for this, rather than the mere power of the sun's rays, is the scourge of Palestine, not merely exhausting, but scorching and shrivelling up the vegetation (Ezek. xvii. 10). In the LXX the word (καύσων) is used of "the wind from the East, from the wilderness," Job i. 19; Jer. xiii. 24. In Lu. xii. 55, it is the South wind, which also brings with it a Simoom-like influence from the desert. Matt. xx. 12 leaves the question undecided. But cp. Jonah iv. 8, "When the sun did arise, God prepared a vehement east wind; and the sun beat on the head of Jonah, that he fainted." See also Matt. xiii. 6 and 21.

the grass.] Here as elsewhere comprehending all the gorgeous wild flowers of Palestine; cp. Matt. vi. 28, 30, "Consider the lilies of the field . . . ; if God so clothe the grass of the field," &c. Hence the grace or comeliness of its form (lit. "face") here spoken of. See Ps. ciii. 15, 16; Isai. xl. 6, 7; 1 Pet. i. 24, for similar comparisons.

12 Blessed is the man that endureth temptation: for when he is tried, he shall receive the crown of life, which the Lord hath promised to them that love him.

shall . . . fade away in his ways.] Not generally, "paths of life;" but literally, "his goings, journeyings," cp. Lu. xiii. 22. Herder draws the picture of an Oriental merchant cut off while journeying from place to place with his merchandise.

12. St. James returns to the thought of verse 2, with the expression so familiar to us in Ps. i., Matt. v. 3, seqq. The blessing is not in the temptation (trial, see verse 2), but in its work on the soul, in the courageous endurance of it (v. 1 Pet. ii. 20), in the strength of faith in the Lord's (the holy name is not found in the best authorities, A B N, &c., being reverently suppressed and easily understood) promise of the crown; cp. 1 Pet. v. 4, where the crown is amaranthine, "that fadeth not away;" as here it is the crown of life, in contrast with the rich man's fading away in his ways.—When he is tried] not tempted, but tasted (verse 3, "the trying of your faith"); when he has come forth approved from the trial; i.e. when patience has had her perfect work (verse 4). In St. Paul the figure of the crown is evidently taken from the Greek games (1 Cor. ix. 25; 2 Tim. iv. 8, cp. ib. ii. 5). But this is alien from ordinary Jewish habits and religious associations. Josephus ('Antt.' xv. 8, 1) describes the irritation of the Jews when Herod instituted games of this sort. In Rev. ii. 10, the "crown of life" is the reward of "faith unto death;" cp. 1 Pet. v. 4. Zechariah (vi. 11, 14, where LXX, ὁ στέφανος ἔσται τοῖς ὑπομένουσι) seems to allude to the holy crown which formed part of the high priest's mitre; while the various passages in the Revelation rather suggest a kingly crown. Perhaps they are combined here, as "He hath made us kings and priests to God and His Father" (Rev. i. 6); "a royal priesthood" (1 Pet. ii. 9).

The crown of life is, according to some, "worn through eternity," the living, everlasting crown:—and perhaps that thought is present. But the eternal life is itself the crown. In the very similar passage, 2 Tim. iv. 8, it is "a crown of righteousness (where 'righteousness' is the reward, not the thing rewarded), which the Lord will give to all them that love His appearing." This is the love by which faith worketh (Gal. v. 6). The sureness of His "promise" is the ground of faith; the nature of it is the motive of love.

13 Let no man say when he is tempted, I am tempted of God: for God cannot be tempted with ^{1 Or, a} evil, neither tempteth he any man:

14 But every man is tempted, when he is drawn away of his own lust, and enticed.

13. Let no man say, &c.] Not referring to deliberate blasphemers, but to those who, instead of enduring, give up the struggle against temptation in despair, as if an irresistible force were pressing them; illustrated by Gen. iii. 12, seq.; Ezek. ch. xviii. The error is corrected, and the actual work of God shewn in 1 Cor. x. 13, "God is faithful, Who will not suffer you to be tempted above that ye are able; but will with the temptation make a way to escape, that ye may be able to bear it."

The temptations in verse 2 were outward things, which give the opportunity of choosing or resisting sin. These are harmless, or rather useful, unless the outer fire touches fuel within, and so a man "is (allows himself to be) tempted." This is a very different thing from "falling into temptations." Even in the first and typical temptation, where it might have been least expected, Eve thought she saw more inducements than the Tempter suggested (Gen. iii. 6). In 1 Cor. vii. 5, it is because of our incontinency that Satan tempts us. The occasion, indeed, may be "of God" in the order of His providence and of our spiritual training: but the inclination is not of Him. Evil has no place with Him, and had none in His creation on the day when He "saw every thing that He had made; and behold, it was very good" (Gen. i. 31).

God cannot be tempted.] His nature cannot be reached or touched by any power of evil: nor is He the author of it to others. (This is not inconsistent with the use of the word for trying, making proof of obedience or faith, as the LXX use it of God proving, not only Abraham, Gen. xxii. 1, but also the Israelites, Exod. xvi. 4, xx. 20; Deut. xiii. 3, &c.) But it is in the nature of weak sinners to throw the blame on God,—"Why hast thou made me thus?" Not "enduring" the temptation, they first surrender themselves, and then plead that they were tempted by a Power which could not be resisted. See Eccus. xv. 11, 12, 20; and Prov. xix. 3 (in LXX), "the foolishness of man perverteth his way; but he accuseth God in his heart."

He.] αὐτός, probably "neither Himself tempteth any man," as antithesis to "tempted of evil" immediately before. Others, not so well, explain it, "neither . . . He [but some thing else]."

14. Of his own lust.] It is not important

15 Then when lust hath conceived, it bringeth forth sin : and sin, when it is finished, bringeth forth death.

16 Do not err, my beloved brethren.
17 Every good gift and every perfect gift is from above, and cometh down from the Father of lights, with whether these words be taken in the second clause (as A. V.) or in the first. But the correspondence with verse 13 is more precise, and the contrast stronger, if we say, "But it is by his own lust that every man is tempted, being drawn away and enticed."

It has been thought that the figure drawn away (dragged out) and enticed, is from a fish caught by a baited hook. Certainly, δελαιζόμενος contains the notion of a bait: but then the words would need to be transposed; for the bait must be swallowed before the prey is dragged out. They probably express generally the twofold character of lustful temptation,—appetite and lasciviousness,—the passion which hurries away the will, and the pleasure which bribes the judgment. See 2 Pet. ii. 14, 18: and perhaps there is an allusion to Prov. vii. 10–23. And this is of his own lust; sometimes dormant, but always lurking within, awaiting opportunity. Cp. Mark vii. 21, seqq.

15. Compare the figure in Ps. vii. 14. But the personification and the genealogy of lust, sin, and death (elaborated from this passage by Milton, 'Par. Lost,' ii. 747–800) is quite in the manner of the Greek Poets, e.g. Æschylus, "Agam." 751–771. Chrysostom remarks that joy follows the pangs of childbirth, but here the agony of death is the end. In the similar passage, Rom. vii. 7, seqq., "sin" produces "lust." But St. James does not carry his analysis back to that Power of Evil, which works to produce its own likeness in us. In his practical way he is content to begin with the "lust" which is the first manifestation of the inward corruption. This gradually becomes definite in a determination to some specific sin: and this, again, takes a body in an outward sinful act; and having arrived at full growth, brings forth its offspring—death.

It is questioned, whether, in this genealogy, (1) conception and birth are both represented as taking place within the heart, a specific sin of intention being developed out of the general corruption, though not yet committed in act; and this afterwards being "finished" or completed by the outward act of sin, by which the fruit, death, is brought forth: or whether (2) "the bringing forth of sin" describes the step from the inward inclination to the actual commission of sin; and "the finishing," its coming to maturity in the formation of a habit by indulgence,—thus arriving at the same consummation. Probably, sin is treated as positively existing, whenever it has taken a definite shape in the heart; and its outward commission is described as its maturity, and its travail of death. When it is finished, = when it has come to full growth (see note on verse 4), which exactly suits the figure here. St. Paul by another metaphor, calls death "the wages of sin," in contrast to life, the gift of God, Rom. vi. 23. Here, as there, death implies not merely the dissolution of the body, but exclusion from that life which is "the gift of God," the crown of life which He has promised. And this adds a proof that temptation does not come from God. That which ends in death cannot be derived from the Author of life.

16. Do not err, &c.] This is a link between verses 15 and 17; "Do not be deluded into thinking either that God is the author of evil to you (see above), or that you can expect good from any other Giver than Him (below, verse 17). But "be not deceived," "do not err," &c., usually refer to something following; see 1 Cor. vi. 9, xv. 33; Gal. vi. 7; 1 Jo. iii. 7; and introduce a warning or precept arising out of what goes before; and indicate some danger which is really serious, though thought trifling. Here the severity of the phrase is tempered by the usual my beloved brethren.

17. The first part of this verse has been thought to be a quotation, perhaps from a hymn. It forms (in the Greek) a heroic verse.

gift . . . gift.] Two different words in the original, the second more emphatic than the first; cp. Prov. xxi. 14.—"Every kind of gift that is good, every one that is perfect in its kind, comes down to us from on high, from God." The words also suggest the converse thought, "All that are good—and none else;" though this is not actually expressed. Verse 18 records the best gift, the most perfect grace of all; cp. Matt. vii. 11 with Lu. xi. 13.

is from above and cometh down from . . .] Or, coming down from above, from . . ., as in iii. 15; the participle perhaps implying the continual illapse of the heavenly grace.

the Father of lights.] (1) of the material lights of the created heavens, cp. Jerem. iv. 23 LXX; but (2) of those intellectual and spiritual lights, of which the former are the least inadequate emblems; the thought which culminates in "Light of Light," following "God of God," in the Nicene Creed. God is whom is no variableness, neither shadow of turning.

18 Of his own will begat he us with the word of truth, that we should be a kind of firstfruits of his creatures.

"Very Light" (αὐρόφως). All else, material or spiritual, that shews light has received it of His; "in Thy light shall we see light," Ps. xxxvi. 9. Hence in a derived sense Christians, being "children of light," are themselves "light in the Lord," Eph. v. 8: cp. Jo. i. 8, seq., with ib. v. 35, of the Baptist's relation to Christ (in verse 35 the word used is lamp, not light). See too Job xxxviii. 7, "the morning stars sang together, and all the sons of God shouted for joy," compared with ib. i. 6.—The lights of heaven, though imperfect (Job xxv. 5), set forth their Maker by their glory and purity (Ps. viii. 3, xix. 1). This it was, that enticed men to give them the honour due to Him (Job xxxi. 26–28; Wisd. xiii. 1–9). The inadequacy of the material type is corrected by the following words, which exclude the imperfections inherent in it. These heavenly bodies, bright though they be, come and go, appear and disappear, change shape, inflict and suffer eclipse. Not so with the Father and fountain of lights: "God is light, and in Him is no darkness at all," 1 Jo. i. 5.

no variableness, neither shadow of turning.] Imperfections incident to the material lights of heaven, but not to God. Variableness (or variation); shadow (such as is cast by one body on another; e.g. by the gnomon of a sun-dial); turning (cp. the word tropic); all seem to be allusions to astronomical phenomena; though the variety of suggested explanations shews that we cannot identify them precisely. It is enough to say that "variableness" may be well applied to the alternation of day and night, the rising and setting of sun, moon, stars; and that "shadow of (or 'caused by') turning" may refer to the changes of the moon (cp. the intermittent revolving light in a lighthouse); or (but less probably) to eclipses; or to the advent of night by the earth's rotation. Wisd. vii. 18, is singularly like this passage, σύστασιν κόσμου καὶ ἐνέργειαν στοιχείων, . . . τροπῶν ἀλλαγὰς καὶ μεταβολὰς καιρῶν, ἐνιαυτῶν κύκλους καὶ ἡστέρων θέσεις. Cp. Bp. Jebb's 'Sacred Literature,' xv. p. 316, seqq. But the language is phenomenal, not scientific; describing things as they appear to the eye; and vividly teaching that the Father who lightens our darkness is free from the imperfections of His creatures; that in His unchangeableness we have the foundation of our faith, and the assurance that as He is the author of all good, so the good of which He is the author is unmixed.

18. This verse is very important as the basis of the more exclusively moral and practical precepts which follow. It declares the grace of God in the regeneration of the believer to be the starting-point of the Christian life. The works, so much dwelt on afterwards, are the fruits of this first work of God in us.

18. Of his own will,] He did it not for any work or merit of ours (Tit. iii. 5); so Eph. i. 5, 11, "according to the good pleasure of His will . . . after the counsel of His will." This is connected with the position that every good gift comes from God. And this one blessing implies all others.

The instrument of this regeneration is the Word of truth; so 1 Pet. i. 23, 25, "born again not of corruptible seed but of incorruptible, by the word of God, which liveth and abideth for ever, . . . the word which by the gospel is preached unto you" (cp. ib. 3). In Eph. i. 13, "the word of truth" = "the gospel of your salvation" (cp. Col. i. 5); and in Eph. v. 26 (where the concrete ῥῆμα is substituted for λόγος) it is annexed to the "washing (laver) of water" in baptism (cp. Tit. iii. 5). So infra, 21, "the engrafted word which is able to save your souls." But moreover the Fathers recognise in this Word of Truth a mystical allusion to the Personal Word of God. He is called both "the Word" and "the Truth:"—but this is scarcely sufficient. Probably St. James is not directly speaking of God the Word: but he shews a consciousness of the relation between the notion of the Personal Word and that of the word of Revelation whereby we receive Him. In the N. T. usage we trace a gradual ascent from (a) the concrete "message" as conveyed to man by personal agency, through (b) "the Word," the revelation of God to man which the message embodies, forming, as it were, its life and soul,—to (c) "THE WORD" Who, being Very God, not only reveals, but imparts Himself to us, "is formed in us" (Gal. iv. 19) thereby. See Acts x. 36–38, where St. Peter passes, as if developing one thought, from (b) to (a), and thence to (c); "the Word (λόγον) which God sent . . . that word (ῥῆμα) ye know, . . . Jesus of Nazareth, how God anointed Him," &c. (not merely, "how God anointed Jesus," as in A. V.).

begat he us.] The Greek word belongs to the mother, not the father, being the same as in verse 15, "bringeth forth death," to which this supplies a contrast: cp. the lax way in which the same figure is used in Gal. iv. 19. But it is an intelligible description of 19 Wherefore, my beloved brethren, let every man be swift to hear, slow to speak, slow to wrath :

20 For the wrath of man worketh not the righteousness of God.

21 Wherefore lay apart all filthi-the regeneration or new creation ; " He is our Father and Mother in One " (Bengel) ; cp. Ps. xvii. 10, and Isai. xlix. 15, where the deeper tenderness of the mother's love is recognised.

a kind of first fruits of his creatures.] Elsewhere the first converts (as of Asia, Achaia, Rom. xvi. 5 ; 1 Cor. xvi. 15) are called " first-fruits ;" and some understand the phrase so here, comparing Eph. i. 12, seq., and identifying " us " with the Jewish Christians, as the nucleus of the future Church. But this seems inconsistent with St. James's view : nor is the interpretation adequate. The word, like " first-born," signifies consecration to God, rather than priority among men. The " first-fruits " were offered in the Temple-service on the morning after the Paschal Sabbath (Levit. xxiii. 10-15, &c.), i.e. on the morning of the Resurrection. Hence the word derives a higher meaning, as applied, (1) to Him, " the first-fruits of them that slept " (1 Cor. xv. 20, 23), " the first-born from the dead " (Col. i. 18 ; Rev. i. 5) ; (2) from Him, to " the church of the first-born " (Heb. xii. 23, see the type in Exod. xiii. 2, &c.) ; cp. Rev. xiv. 4. And as He is styled " first-born of every creature " in Col. i. 15, " the first-fruits of His creatures " here is the designation of the Body of Christians, in their degree. In the natural world mankind hold this pre-eminence, though last created. In the New Creation, the Only-Begotten is THE First-fruits ; but the adopted children are (as the word is carefully qualified) " a sort of first-fruits " among mankind. So of Israel, Exod. iv. 22. This double application of the word makes it probable that there is a secondary reference in " the Word of truth " also.

19. Wherefore.] For "wherefore (ὥστε)," &c., A B C, Vulg., Memph., have "Know ye, or rather ye know (ἵστε), my beloved brethren : —but (δὲ inserted in B C, Vulg., Memph. : om. 31 K L, both Syr. : A has καὶ ἵστε) let every man," &c. :—a difficult reading ; for Ye know, or Know ye this, are elsewhere connected with what follows ; but here must refer to something going before, probably verses 16-18. Whether " wherefore " or " but " be the link, the connexion of the thoughts is obscure. But noting the stress laid throughout on quiet and endurance as the chief and hardest manifestations of faith (cp. i. 3, 4 ; iii. 1, 13-18), we may trace this as following from the regeneration through the word. The new life is not to shew itself by stirring, but rather, in relation to the word, by listening. Our duty is (1) to hear that Word ;—especially important for those who are to be ' masters ' (διδάσκαλοι) of others (iii. 1) :—but also (2) generally, to hear, to listen and learn, rather than to speak and teach (verses 21, 26). Ecclus. iv. 29 ; v. 11, may be compared ; though there is no actual quotation.

slow to wrath, follows " slow to speak ;" cp. what is said of the work of the tongue generally in ch. iii. ; perhaps also with specific reference to unholy zeal and jealousy combined with the ambition of teaching (iii. 1).

20. worketh not the righteousness of God.] There are here two distinct interpretations, according to the meanings in which " working " is used :—either (a) to produce, cause an effect or end ; e.g. to work wrath, death, glory (Rom. iv. 15, vii. 13, and 2 Cor. iv. 17) :—or (b) to do a work whose end is in itself ; e.g. to work unseemliness, evil, sin, the will of the Gentiles (Rom. i. 27, ii. 9 ; infra, ii. 9 ; 1 Pet. iv. 3 ; see Rom. vii. 15-20).

If we take (a), the sense is " doth not execute the righteousness of God, is no fit instrument of His judgments or vengeance." But as to " work the righteousness of God " is not merely contrasted with " the wrath of man," but implicitly recognised as the duty of God's children, the second interpretation is simpler and better. See the phrase in Acts x. 35 ; Heb. xi. 33. True, it is not merely " worketh righteousness," but " the righteousness of God." But cp. 1 Cor. xvi. 10, " he worketh the work of the Lord : " and in Acts x. 35, the words are, " he that worketh righteousness is accepted of Him." So here the work which befits the sons of God, and is incompatible with the indulgence of sinful wrath, is to work that righteousness which comes of the grace of God, and avails to please Him. If, however, with Hofmann we take " slow to wrath " as a warning to him who " speaks " as a teacher, not to lose temper if his efforts fail, then " the righteousness of God " must be that righteousness which a Christian teacher must try to " work " in the hearers.

21. filthiness and naughtiness (the latter word is usually better rendered malice in N. T., e.g. Eph. iv. 31 ; Col. iii. 8 ; Tit. iii. 3, &c. ; maliciousness, Rom. i. 29) comprise two classes of sins,—the sensual and the malignant ; sins against one's own personality (1 Cor. vi. 18), and sins against one's neighbour ; the one opposed to holiness, the other to righteousness ; cp. Rev. xxii. 11 ; 2 Cor.

ness and superfluity of naughtiness, and receive with meekness the engrafted word, which is able to save your souls.

22 But be ye doers of the word, and not hearers only, deceiving your own selves.

23 For if any be a hearer of the word, and not a doer, he is like unto a man beholding his natural face in a glass:

24 For he beholdeth himself, and goeth his way, and straightway forgetteth what manner of man he was.

25 But whoso looketh into the

vii. 1. "Superfluity of naughtiness" is rather ambiguous:—abundance, overflow of malice would better describe the evil which, having filled the heart, overflows in the outer conduct; "out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh," Matt. xii. 34; Lu. vi. 45. Cp. "the overflowings of ungodliness" (Ps. xviii. 3 (4, Prayer Book); where the A.V. has, "floods of ungodly men" or "Belial").

lay apart.] Put off all this, as filthy garments (see for the literal sense Acts vii. 58; for the figurative, Eph. iv. 22–25), and receive the word ("swift to hear"), with meekness ("slow to wrath"):—the word mentioned in verse 18, where see note: cp. Rom. i. 16, "the gospel . . . is the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth." But Bp. Wordsworth points out that there is a higher significance in the expression, if we recognise the Personal indwelling of the Word of God; cp. Acts xx. 32; Gal. iii. 27; Col. ii. 6.

engrafted.] ἐμφυτον, a word not elsewhere found in the N. T.; but see Wisd. xii. 10, "malice bred in them." Here it is not "in-born, native;" rather, as sometimes in classical Greek (Hdt. ix. 94, cp. Odys. xxii. 348), "divinely implanted or given,"—the contrast being between that which is acquired by teaching or study, and that which comes to us either as a natural gift (as the phrase is) or by inspiration; towards which we contribute nothing ourselves, but simply "receive" it. Cp. 1 Pet. i. 23.

your souls.] "Soul," here and in verse 20, is the living and abiding principle of man's personality, of which Christ speaks in Matt. x. 28, &c., xvi. 26, &c.

22. be ye.] Rather become ye; it requires effort and practice.

doers of the word.] As "doers of the law," infra, iv. 11; Rom. ii. 13; i.e. of the things contained in it. The contrast of "doers" and "hearers" shews the ineffectual character of the hearing. Indeed the word "hearer" (ἀκροατής, cp. ἀκροᾶσθαι, ἀκρόυμα, ἀκροατήριον) suggests listening for amusement to a lecture, recitation, or public performance.

deceiving your own selves.] I.e. "not hearers only; for this would be to deceive yourselves." On this wilful self-deception, see infra, 26; Gal. vi. 3; 2 Tim. iii. 13; also Matt. vii. 21–23.

23. his natural face.] Literally, the face of his birth (so LXX in Gen. xxxii. 9, "the land of thy birth"); not contrasted with the new birth (18); but the material and visible features, in contrast to the mental and spiritual form revealed in the mirror of the "perfect law of liberty."

in a glass.] Mirror. The ancient mirrors were of polished metal (Exod. xxxviii. 8); see 1 Cor. xiii. 12, we see by means of a mirror, i.e. not the things themselves (as we might "through a glass"), but only their images. So Eccles. xxxiv. 3, of dreams. Cp. 2 Cor. iii. 18, where the argument (from Exod. xxxiv. 29–35) seems to require the translation "reflecting," instead of "beholding as in a glass" the glory of the Lord. See also the next note.

24. For he beholdeth, &c.] This brings out the point of likeness—not in the mere "beholding," which might be careful or careless (in Acts xxvii. 39, the word is used for "observing," "taking notice of" a creek in an unknown shore)—but in the particular mode, viz. glancing carelessly, and passing by without a second look. We might have expected "when," instead of "for;" but, as if the full description had been given in verse 23, this verse gives one representative instance; cp. verses 10, 11, and the note. And the tense is emphatic here, as there, the literal version being "for he 'beheld' himself, and 'is gone' away, and straightway he 'forgot,'" &c., i.e. he gave but one glance at himself, went away, and never came back (the continuous absence is indicated), and so straightway forgot what he looked like.

The mirror of the Word shews us our true selves,—the likeness of God, and the sins that have defaced it; but, to what end, if we turn away and take no heed to maintain or restore that likeness?

25. looketh into.] An emphatic word, παρακύψας, used in the literal sense in John xx. 5, "he stooping down [and looking in] saw," &c.; cp. 1 Peter i. 12. The attitude perfect law of liberty, and continueth therein, he being not a forgetful hearer, but a doer of the work, this man shall be blessed in his deed.

26 If any man among you seem to be religious, and bridleth not his

of the eager observer is caught, as he bends over and gazes. And he "continueth therein." The object of this study is "the perfect law, that of liberty (two distinct thoughts, the latter flowing from the former); "the law," virtually = "the word" in verses 22, 23, but viewed (from St. James's standing-point) as a rule of practice—"the royal law" of ii. 8, cp. Matt. v. 17, seqq.: not a different and more perfect law (for the law itself is of God), but the law fulfilled in perfection such as Judaism could not reach, and now at one with the springs of action in the Christian's inner man. Cp. Rom. vii. 12, 14, with viii. 1, 2, 13; xiii. 8-10.

that of liberty.] St. Paul speaks of "the law of faith" (Rom. iii. 27), and of "the obedience of faith" (ib. i. 5, xvi. 26; cp. xv. 18; Acts vi. 7). Moreover, St. James had not become a Christian by any violent change, but by a regular progress from the imperfect Law to the perfection of the Gospel (Matt. v. 17). But he marks the reality of this progress by this word "perfect," adding "that of liberty," to shew its character. Cp. Rom. viii. 1, 15; Gal. iv. 24-31. In Gal. v. 13, we find freedom disciplined by rule; here we have the rule tempered by freedom.

a forgetful hearer . . . a doer of the work.] Literally, a "hearer of forgetfulness . . . a doer of work: i.e. "a forgetful hearer . . . a working, energetic doer" of this law (cp. "a hearer, a doer of the word," verse 23). The idiom is found in Luke xvi. 8, 9, "the steward, the mammon, of unrighteousness" (ib. 11, "the unrighteous mammon") &c.; v. infra, ii. 4. The "forgetful hearer" is the one represented in verses 22-24. (Ἐπιλησμονή is the regular Greek form: but ἐπιλησμονή occurs in Eccclus. xi. 25.)

shall be blessed in his deed.] Rather, in his doing: the doing of these things being an end in itself, containing its own reward. Shall be does not necessarily refer to the future day of restitution, but is "the future of promise," expressing the result which follows from given premisses. Cp. the Beatitudes in Matt. v. 4-9.

26. religious . . . religion.] Devout . . . devotion (as Tyndale and Cranmer) would be a better rendering. Two families of words are used in N. T. of the outward service of God: one ritual, and specially belonging to the worship (λατρεύειν, λατρεία) of the Temple, see Rom. ix. 4, xii. 1; Heb. ix. 1, 6; John xvi. 2 (the ministerial service is usually denoted by another, λειτουργεῖν, γία); the other (as here, θρησκός, θρησκεία) not denoting rites of worship (though possibly including them in the general sense of worshipping, e.g. of angels, Col. ii. 18, cp. Wisdom xi. 15, xiv. 16, 18, 27), but special devotion exhibited in one's conduct and way of life. This word is used of the Pharisees, "the straitest sect of our religion" (Acts xxvi. 5). It is used by Herodotus of observances based on religious feeling, but belonging to ordinary life: e.g., of abstinence from particular kinds of food (ii. 18): in ii. 37, the words ἅλλας τε θρησκείας ἐπιτελέουσι μυρίας sum up his list of various customs in reference to clothing, washing, shaving, &c., which were observed as religious duties; see also the verb θρησκεύω, ib. 64, and Dionys. Hal. ii. 63. And so here the word refers, not to acts of worship, but to the general tenor of religious duty which marks a life as dedicated to God's service. If a man thinks himself, claims to be thought (see 1 Cor. iii. 18; Gal. vi. 3; Phil. iii. 4: the warning is against self-deceit, rather than false appearances), in this sense "religious" or "devout" (St. James says), his devotion, if real, will take a practical shape in the habitual discharge of duty.

and bridleth not his tongue.] Literally, not bridling his tongue, but [thus] deceiving his own heart. One might have expected, "this man deceiveth his own heart, and his religion is vain." See infra, iii. 2-4, &c.; supra, verses 19-22.

vain.] "Of none effect, unavailing before God," as Matt. xv. 8; 1 Cor. xv. 17, and therefore "unreal." This description of the true religious life, negatively and positively defined, seems abrupt. But this (as usually in St. James) is rather in the gnomic form of expression than in the matter. The dominant thought is, "Be ye doers of the word" (verse 22): and this is pithily put in a double antithesis: doers, not bearers only, (verses 22-25)—doers, not talkers (verses 26, 27). The negative test here may seem narrow, but it meets a temptation frequently yielded to even by persons who keep a watch over their doings. So in Matt. xii. 34-37, Christ treats sins of the tongue as the most direct evidence of a corrupt heart.

27. pure . . . and undefiled.] The same idea, expressed (as usual) positively and negatively. Yet perhaps pure refers more to the inward source: undefiled to the freedom from evil contracted by converse with others; see 1 Peter i. 19; Heb. vii. 26; and cp. Titus i. 15. Perhaps there is an allusion to the outward purifications, in which the Jews trusted so much (Mark vii. 2-8; Matt. xxiii. 25, seq.; Heb. ix. 10). The outward and inward cleansing are combined in Heb. x. 22, and (of the Church) Eph. v. 26, seq. In Luke xi. 41, Christ says, "Rather give alms of such things as ye have; and behold all things are clean unto you." This teaching is the more impressive in a writer who was in his own person a pattern of rigid conformity to the Law. Before God and the Father (see 1 Peter ii. 20) contrasts His judgment with man's; cp. Matt. vi. 1-18.

God and the Father.] I. e. God who is our Father. In Matt. v. 48, we are taught to emulate His perfections (in Luke vi. 36, His mercies), because He is our Father; cp. Ps. lxviii. 5, "Father of the fatherless, and Judge of the widows:" these representing the class who have God for their especial helper, because they have none else (Deut. x. 18; Job xxix. 12, seqq.; Eccles. iv. 10). "To visit" the afflicted, is an act of charity which the Son of Man recognises as done to Himself, Matt. xxv. 34, seqq.

to keep himself.] See 1 John v. 18, where these words stand absolutely. Here probably two thoughts are combined: "to keep himself unspotted" (cp. 1 Tim. v. 22), and "to keep himself [safe] from the world" — as "from the evil," John xvii. 15; cp. Prov. vii. 5. Active charity and moral purity make up the definition of the religious life (as in Christ's discourses the second table of the Decalogue is often made the test of duty); the more direct duty towards God being assumed as the root of all, and being sufficiently indicated by the word "religion," and the reference to the judgment of God.

See Coleridge's 'Aids to Reflection,' Introd. Aphorism xxiii. But he identifies St. James's "religion" with ritual observances (θρησκεία with λατρεία).

ADDITIONAL NOTE on Chap. I. verse 5.

Why is wisdom the grace specified here, and not faith or patience, as in verse 4? Probably, as comprehending the sum of practical religion according to the ethical view, rather Hebrew than Greek, so prominent in the Book of Proverbs, and, later, in those of Wisdom and Ecclesiasticus. (See Introduction, iii.) This Wisdom is (1) the Spirit of God, present with Him in all His works, and showering the gift of Himself on those who seek Him; (2) this gift and inspiration, enlightening the soul, but still more, purifying and hallowing it,—the grace of practical holiness,—wisdom unto salvation. In iii. 13-17, it is described as coming down from heaven, and contrasted with the serpent-wisdom of this world. Note how the Psalms identify sin and folly, sinners and fools; and how St. John uses the word truth in reference to practice rather than speculation, as that which we are not only "to hold," but "to do" (iii. 21; 1 Ep. i. 6). Wisdom, in St. Paul, is rather different in meaning, even when it is the true wisdom of which he writes. He connects it more directly with the sanctified intellect; yet see 2 Tim. iii. 15.

"Wisdom," then, presupposes the "faith" which asks for it, and transcends "patience" as containing the "perfect work" of patience, the Christian character "perfect and entire."

CHAPTER II.

1 It is not agreeable to Christian profession to regard the rich, and to despise the poor brethren: 13 rather we are to be loving, and merciful: 14 and not to boast of faith where no deeds are, 17 which is but a dead faith, 19 the faith of devils, 21 not of Abraham, 25 and Rahab.

MY brethren, have not the faith of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Lord of glory, with respect of persons.

CHAP. II. 1. the faith of our Lord Jesus Christ.] I. e. the faith in Him: as Gal. ii. 16; Acts iii. 16. To have this is probably not to hold the faith (objective, the doctrine believed), but to have the faith which believes (subjective); as Mark xi. 22, "have faith in (of) God." The question whether the disciples held the true faith or not is not raised. They had received it; they professed it. St. James therefore argues from it to shew how lifeless that faith must be which does not conquer evil temper, indolence, unbridled tongues, or (as here) respect of persons. One point of practical unchristianity is touched after another, till the belief of devils crowns the whole with terrible irony (cf. Rom. i. 18).

of glory.] Cp. "crucified the Lord of glory," 1 Cor. ii. 8; "the God, the Father of glory," Acts vii. 2; Eph. i. 17; emphatically of the Divine glory. See the reference to the Shekinah, in Rom. ix. 4, compared with 1 Kings viii. 11. The order of the words here is remarkable: cp. 1 Thess. ii. 13, where the true order, "ye received the word, which ye heard of us, of God," tells that, though received through the ministry of men, it was God's word, not man's (v. seqq.). Here it may be paraphrased, "Why pay such deference to the persons of men, when you have for the object of your faith the Lord Jesus—the Christ of glory?" See the contrast in John v. 44, where "honour" represents the same word (δόξα) as "glory" here.

with respect of persons.] A Hebrew phrase, frequent in O. and N. T.; v. Levit. xix. 15; Luke xx. 21; Rom. ii. 11; Jude 16; favour, acceptance shewn to the person, i. e. the outward show and accidents, instead of the substantial merits of the case;—expressed rather differently in Matt. xxii. 16; Mark xii. 14; John vii. 24. In Exod. xxiii. 2, 3; Lev. xix. 15, the warning is equally against subserviency to the great, and partiality to the humble. But the danger is nearly all on one side; and in the N. T. the former meaning is found alone. This verse exposes one flagrant breach of that "pure religion" which is shewn in love to those who are most in need of it. Others are indicated in this and the next chapter. Chapter iv. deals with offences against the other portion of i. 27—"unspotted from the world."

Again an individual instance (perhaps the description of an actual scene) is substituted for an abstract precept; v. especially verse 4. —into your assembly] literally synagogue—the only place in the N. T. where this word is distinctly applied to a Christian assembly. In Rev. ii. 9, iii. 9, "the synagogue of Satan" may perhaps, in accordance with the Hebrew imagery of the book, have a Christian reference. Elsewhere in the N. T. (except Acts xiii. 43, where the A. V. has "when the congregation was broken up") always used of the material building. In the O. T., only found in A. V. of a late Psalm (lxxiv. 8), where the LXX have a different word. But συναγωγή is very common in the LXX of an assembly of the people, whether for worship or other public purpose, especially in Exodus, Leviticus, and Numbers, as = Hebrew édab, whereas in Deuteronomy the word used is kābal, LXX ἐκκλησία (cp. Acts vii. 38). There was no real distinction between the words; see Num. xx. 8, 10; Judges xx. 1; Prov. v. 14. Nor is any distinction made here between the old and the new assembly. All the brotherhood are, as it were, taken into Israel, not distinguished from it. The "footstool," and the arrangements incidentally noticed, suggest that both the place and the assembly are included. But it was not necessarily a separate building. A chamber in a private house would suffice, as in Acts i. 13, xx. 8; as we read of "churches" in Rom. xvi. 5; Col. iv. 15; Philem. 2.

Nor is it necessary to decide whether the "rich man" is supposed to be a Christian. The brethren in Judea were indeed generally poor (v. Acts xi. 29; Rom. xv. 25; 1 Cor. xvi. 3, compared with 2 Cor. ch. viii., ix.); yet there were exceptions from the first. But the scene represents rich and poor, as such, without filling up all the details:—indeed we might remark that both seem to enter the assembly as strangers; and that first the one and then the other is distinguished from the disciples (6, "ye have despised the poor . . . ; do not rich men oppress you?")

Nor is anything as yet said in disparagement of the rich man. His apparel is goodly (gay represents the same word), bright in colour or glossy in texture (in Lu. xxiii. 11, "gorgeous" is an exaggerated translation; see note there); or perhaps brilliantly fresh and clean, opposite to "vile . . . filthy." No doubt, there is a temptation to luxury in dress and ornaments. But there is neither fault in "goodly," nor merit in "filthy" apparel. A gold ring, under the Romans, might be the simple badge of the wearer's rank. Josephus ('B. J.' ii. 14, 9) speaks of Jews who were Roman knights; and every Roman knight wore a gold ring. The rebuke is for those whose "respect" was paid, not to merit, not even to "person,"—but to apparel!

Some think that the assembly here named was not for religious rites, but for the transaction of general business among Christians, comparing 1 Cor. vi. The Jewish Synagogue was so used: and its officers had in some cases judicial functions. But here, the rebuke implies that "rich and poor were meeting

3 And ye have respect to him that weareth the gay clothing, and say unto him, Sit thou here ¹in a good place; and say to the poor, Stand thou there, or sit here under my footstool:

¹ Or, well, or, seemly.

4 Are ye not then partial in yourselves, and are become judges of evil thoughts?

5 Hearken, my beloved brethren, Hath not God chosen the poor of this world rich in faith, and heirs of ¹the kingdom which he hath promised to them that love him? ¹ Or, that.

6 But ye have despised the poor. Do not rich men oppress you, and draw you before the judgment seats?

together" not as members of a Society in which such distinctions must be recognised, but as in presence of "the Maker of them all," before whom they are absolutely equal. In 1 Cor. xi. 20, seqq., we read of somewhat similar evils; and there the scene is a religious assembly, "the Church of God." See note on verse 6.

3. have respect.] Not the same word as in verse 1; but the same as in Lu. i. 48 (cp. ix. 38), meaning "to look with favour on one."

Sit . . . here, &c.] Some suppose that a bustling official is represented, marshalling the congregation to seats according to rank. But this is an anachronism. It is the officious act of one who himself has a good seat ("here in a good place") with a "footstool;" and who offers the rich man a similar one: here, evidently in the best part of the room: there, by contrast, "away, in yonder corner." Stand thou there or sit here may either be two alternative speeches, or one speech mocking the poor man with the choice of two positions, both uncomfortable:—the opposition between "thou . . . thou" rather favours the latter view.

under my footstool.] i.e. on the floor at my feet. The customary attitude of the disciples of Jewish Doctors; whence St. Paul's phrase, "brought up . . . at the feet of Gamaliel" (Acts xxii. 3); cp. Mary in Lu. x. 39, and v. Deut. xxxiii. 3. But here a humiliating distinction is made between two of the hearers (cp. Ps. cx. 1). The fondness of the Jews for "the chief seats in the synagogues" is touched upon in Matt. xxiii. 6, &c.

4. Are ye not.] Were ye not, as if describing one actual and typical instance; see i. 11, 24. So in vv. 5, 6, God chose . . . ye despised (not "hath chosen . . . have despised").

then.] Greek and: but = and so, then: so LXX often; and in N. T., 2 Cor. ii. 2, "If I make you sorry, and (= then) who is he that maketh me glad;" cp. also Phil. i. 22.

But the meaning of διακρίθητε (A. V., are ye partial) is doubtful. The active verb may mean to draw a distinction between one and another (Matt. xvi. 3; Acts xv. 9, &c.). But the passive is commonly to be doubtful, as opposed to faith (see note on i. 6, and references there). Here it probably means that this respect of persons shewed that they were halting between God and the world, double-minded.

and are [were] become judges of evil thoughts?] i.e. judges possessed, biased by (cp. "forgetful hearer," i. 25, &c.) evil, unfair modes of thinking and deliberation. Used in Matt. xv. 19; Lu. v. 21, seqq., of reasonings, either with oneself or with others; processes which lead to a conclusion, whether in action or in judgment.

5. Hearken, my beloved brethren.] Cp. i. 16, 19, &c.

Hath not God chosen.] Rather, Did not God choose; the tense carries us back to the very act of God's election (the same word; cp. 2 Peter i. 10; Rom. viii. 33, xi. 5, 7, &c.), prior to the faith of the chosen; therefore, not "who are," but "to be rich," &c.; for though the kingdom is in a true sense already come, the mention of faith and heirs (not partakers) refers us to its future perfect revelation. Cp. the construction in 2 Cor. iii. 6, "Who hath fitted us [to be] ministers."

poor of this world.] Either in the things of, or in the estimate of, this world; probably the latter. Cp. 1 Cor. i. 26, seqq.

rich in faith.] (1) Abounding in faith, faith being the riches: as God is "rich in mercy," Eph. ii. 4; or (2) by virtue of faith rich [in heavenly riches], i.e. in the inheritance of the kingdom; cp. "though He was rich, yet for your sakes He became poor, that ye through His poverty might be rich," 2 Cor. viii. 9. The latter seems the better, as contrasting their worldly poverty with their heavenly riches. Cp. "the riches of the glory of His inheritance in the saints," Eph. i. 18.

heirs of the kingdom] See Matt. v. 3; Luke vi. 20.

6. But ye have despised the poor.] Rather, but ye despised the poor man, i.e. the man spoken of in verse 2, seqq. Note the contrast: "God chose the poor—ye did despite to the poor man" (πτωχός is a very strong word, almost = "pauper" or "beggar;"

7 Do not they blaspheme that worthy name by the which ye are called?

8 If ye fulfil the royal law according to the scripture, Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself, ye do well:

9 But if ye have respect to persons, ye commit sin, and are convinced of the law as transgressors.

cp. Ar. Plut. 548-554.) Note, too, the delicacy of conduct towards the poor, taught by the Law, Deut. xxiv. 10, seqq. The Book of Proverbs is full of this subject; cp. also Wisdom ch. ii.; Eccclus. xiii. These words belong to verse 5, contrasting man's treatment of the poor with God's love for them.

Do not rich men.] Rather, the rich as a class, opposed to "the poor," verse 5). Another suggestion,—“How ill do they, as a class, deserve the attention that you pay them!”

draw you before the judgment seats.] Perhaps “themselves” should be added, i.e. with their own hands drag you, as in Matt. xviii. 28; cp. ib. v. 25 for this summary process, which may be illustrated by Livy's description of debtors and creditors in the early times of the Roman Republic (e.g. ii. 23, 27):—add Luke xii. 58; Acts viii. 3, xvii. 6.

From the phrase “judgment seats” (tribunals, law-courts), some have inferred that verse 2 describes a secular assembly for the settlement of disputes between Christians without appeal to Heathen courts (see 1 Cor. vi., where the same word κριτήριον is used, not indeed of the tribunal, as here and in Hist. Susann. 49, but of the matter in dispute); and that the special offence imputed to the rich was their appeal from the Court Christian to the Roman Law-court.

7. that worthy name.] The name of CHRIST; cp. Acts v. 41, “to suffer shame for His (rather the) name;” ib. xv. 17 (from Amos ix. 12), “the Gentiles on whom my name is called.” Here, too, the literal rendering would be, “that name which is called on you,” the covenant-name, in which they are called His people and He their God; a name “invoked over them” in the form of baptism. Certainly not “the respectable name of the Poor,” as Herder and others think, supposing that the Ebionites (Ebion, in Hebrew = poor) might claim St. James as their representative. But though it is the name of CHRIST, it does not follow that the word Christian is alluded to. Christianus is a word of Latin formation (Tacitus, ‘Ann.’ xv. 44), first used at Antioch (Acts xi. 26), used by Agrippa (ib. xxvi. 28), and by St. Peter (1 Ep. iv. 16); nowhere found in St. Paul; and not likely to have been current at Jerusalem, where the believers were called Nazarenes or Galileans by their enemies (Acts xxiv. 5; John vii. 52), and among themselves, “the disciples,” “the brethren,” and “the Way.” (Acts ix. 2, xix. 9, 23, xxiv. 14.)

they blaspheme that . . . name.] Some say, “act so as to make the enemies blaspheme it:” a thought expressed in 2 Sam. xii. 14, and in Rom. ii. 24. But we must understand the word, as usual, of actual blasphemy against the name, doctrine, word, way of God (1 Tim. vi. 1; Titus ii. 5; 2 Peter ii. 2, &c.). It is indeed originally used of all scurril, slanderous speaking (so in N. T., Rom. iii. 8; 1 Cor. iv. 13; 2 Peter ii. 11, &c.); but usually in reference to persons or things which have a halo of sanctity about them (e.g. “against Moses and against God,” Acts vi. 11; cp. ib. 13), and most often, specifically, of a sin against God.

These rich, then, blasphemed the name of CHRIST; and are thus, at last, contrasted sharply with the brethren. Nor is this inconsistent with verse 2; cp. 1 Cor. xiv. 23, seqq., of unbelievers coming into an assembly of worshippers. See below on iv. 2, 13, v. 1. But here note that as it is the poor, as a class,—and yet not all the poor, or only the poor as such—that God chose (“to the poor the Gospel is preached,” Luke vii. 22, cp. Isai. lxi. 1, confirmed historically, John vii. 48, seqq.; Mark ii. 15, xii. 37; 1 Cor. i. 26, seqq., &c.), so it is the rich, as a class,—yet not simply as such, but in so far as they trust in riches (Mark x. 23-27)—who are shut out of the kingdom; see Luke xvi. 25, and cp. Eccclus. xiii. This language, harsh as it sounds, is but the echo of Christ's warnings against the dangers of riches (Luke, l. c.). True, the temptations of riches assumed in that age very gross forms of sensuality or of greed; but do they become less dangerous by losing a portion of their grossness?

8, 9. the royal law.] That kingly law to which all others minister, each in its own sphere: being, in fact, the second of those two Commandments, on which “hang all the law and the prophets” (Matt. xxii. 36-40, and parallel places); see Rom. xiii. 8-10; Gal. v. 14; called above, i. 25, “the perfect law, that of liberty;” cp. 12, infra, and Cicero ‘Offic.’ i. 12, ‘Regalis sententia.’

according to the scripture.] Not a mere form of citing the text which follows from 10 For whosoever shall keep the whole law, and yet offend in one point, he is guilty of all.

! Or, that law which said.

11 For he that said, Do not commit adultery, said also, Do not kill. Now if thou commit no adultery, yet if thou kill, thou art become a transgressor of the law.

12 So speak ye, and so do, as they that shall be judged by the law of liberty.

13 For he shall have judgment

Levit. xix. 18, but "according to the real spirit of the scriptural precept." See Christ's teaching in Matt. v. 43-47, illustrated by the parable of the good Samaritan, Luke x. 29, seqq.

ye do well.] Probably ironical (as in 19). "True, if you really act up to the spirit of that law, you do well; but you have other neighbours besides the rich: do you treat them all alike? The poor needs your love most. If you treat him as an enemy, and the rich man as a neighbour (Matt. v. 43), ye commit (work, practise, implying a habit, not a single act) sin;" v. Matt. vii. 23; Acts x. 35; Heb. xi. 33.

convinced.] Rather, convicted, according to the modern distinction between the two words, which are originally the same; cp. John viii. 9, with ib. 46.

of the law.] Either, the whole law as forming one code; or, more probably, that very law, Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself, to which the appeal was made in verse 8; see Rom. ii. 23.

as transgressors.] More specific than "sinners;" "breakers of a positive law;" cp. "where no law is, there is no transgression," Rom. iv. 15; though the Christian rule is, "whosoever committeth sin transgresseth also the law; for sin is the transgression of the law," 1 John iii. 4.

10. the whole law . . . one point.] I. e. every jot and tittle except one precept, see Matt. v. 18, seq. Not as if the breach of one were as sinful as the breach of all; but (1) The principle of duty, and of obedience to all the Commandments, is one; so that if we choose for ourselves nine commandments to keep, and one to break, we are not doing God's will, but our own. (2) All the precepts are alike expressions of one Divine will, and rest on one authority ("He that said," &c.). (3) All the precepts are manifestations of love at work—love first to God, then to our neighbour; and each particular failure shews defect in this. "Love is the fulfilling of the law" (Rom. xiii. 10), inasmuch as it keeps not one or another Commandment, but every one alike, working no ill to his neighbour. It is the spirit, of which the several precepts are partial expressions. V. Augustin. Ep. 167 (29).

guilty of all.] The same word (ῥωγος) occurs in Matt. v. 21, 22, xxvi. 66; 1 Cor. xi. 27: the one common meaning in all these places being "within the grasp, scope, of a law;" and so, either "guilty" of that which it forbids; or "liable to, in danger of," its penalties. Cp. Rom. iii. 19.

11. be that said.] The one Lawgiver, Whose will and authority are the same in all the Commandments, and Who, literally, spoke them (Exod. xx. 1). Compare the paragraphs treating of these particular Commandments in the Sermon on the Mount (Matt. v. 21, seqq., 27, seqq.). There they are mentioned in the same order as in Exod. xx. and Deut. v.; whereas here, and in Mark x. 19, Luke xviii. 20, Rom. xiii. 9, the sixth and seventh Commandments are transposed: for which there must have been some (now lost) traditional authority; for Philo Judæus ('de Decal.' 2. 189, 201, 207) argues from it to prove the heinousness of adultery.

12. So speak ye, and so do.] The assertion of equal responsibility for words and deeds is characteristic of St. James; see i. 19, 26; iii. 2-11; iv. 11. The key-note is in Matt. xii. 36, seq.

as they that shall be judged.] I. e. "as being persons who shall . . ."; not "like those who . . ." Note that this law is still the standard of their judgment.

the law (rather, a law) of liberty.] I. e. "the royal law" (8), "the perfect law, that of liberty" (i. 25); not a law of outward compulsion or minute detail, but an inward principle, moulding man's spirit by the working of the "free Spirit" ("principalis Spiritus," Vulg. Ps. li. 12) of God. The reconciliation of law with liberty, issuing in a service which is perfect freedom, is attained through the Spirit of Christ: "the law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus hath made me free" (Rom. viii. 2), the spirit of adoption superseding the spirit of bondage (ib. 15), that love may cast out fear (Bp. Bull, 'Harm. Apost.' i. 3, § 2). Law, then, is no longer a law under which, but a law by which we act, becoming a law of our spiritual nature, in a sense somewhat analogous to that in which the word is applied to the order of physical things.

13.] God's mercy is restrained and His without mercy, that hath shewed no mercy; and mercy ^{10r. 14b} rejoiceth against judgment.

14 What doth it profit, my brethren, though a man say he hath faith, and have not works? can faith save him?

15 If a brother or sister be naked, and destitute of daily food,

16 And one of you say unto them, Depart in peace, be ye warmed and filled; notwithstanding ye give them not those things which are needful to the body; what doth it profit?

17 Even so faith, if it hath not works, is dead, being ^{1 Gr. by itself.} alone.

18 Yea, a man may say, Thou hast faith, and I have works: shew pardon forfeited, if, after all, the spirit of bondage revives. See the parable of the unmerciful servant, Matt. xviii. 23, seqq., especially 35. "Love of neighbour" is here "mercy," probably because viewed (as in the Lord's Prayer) in connexion with God's love to sinners. Where the Spirit is thus revealed, the rigour of justice is not felt; "mercy," the spirit of brotherly love in us, "rejoiceth against judgment," triumphs over it. God is not the Judge, but the Father, of those in whom He beholds the Spirit of His Son moving. See Christ's words, Matt. vi. 14, seq., xxv. 34-46;—"I will have mercy, and not sacrifice" (Matt. ix. 13, &c.). Here, as in the parables, it is not injustice, but the rigid exaction of justice, which is condemned. Woe to those who receive justice, simple and unmitigated, at God's hand! Cp. also Rom. v. 7.

This verse is probably thus connected with the foregoing—"Unless ye keep the royal law, ye are transgressors. By mercy it is kept, and transgressions are blotted out; but the unmerciful remain, as transgressors, in danger of the law."

14-26.] On this paragraph, see Excursus, "St. James and St. Paul."

14.] The works (which carry us back to i. 22, 27) are tacitly identified with the second table of the Decalogue, i. e. the "royal law" of verse 18. They are equivalent to love, and contrasted with an unworking, unloving faith. The words, though a man say that he hath faith, are more guarded than St. Paul's, "Though I have all faith, so that I could remove mountains, and have not charity (love), I am nothing" (1 Cor. xiii. 2). Cp. Gal. v. 6, "In Jesus Christ neither circumcision availeth anything, nor uncircumcision; but faith which worketh by love." The profession of faith is assumed throughout. See i. 17-21, for the regeneration, the gift of God, the Divine and saving Word. To make this more clear, we should express the definite article of the original: "Can the faith thus described—this faith of his, such as one can have who has no works—save him?" The opportunity of working is of course assumed.

save him?] Connected with "judgment" in verses 12, 13; referring not to the past epoch of their conversion, nor even to their present state of salvation, but to the Day of Judgment.

15. If a brother, &c.] Or, But if: perhaps, "Nay, to take another case, which is strictly parallel (faith and charity being sister graces (1 Cor. xiii.) and both essentially practical), but which is more self-evidently absurd." Faith in words, and charity in words, are alike null: but there might be a mistake about the former; there could be none about the latter.

a brother or a sister.] One of the Christian brotherhood (1 Peter ii. 17), to whom the first offices of love are due. Mark the significance of the phrase which St. James uses so often.

naked.] Often used of persons without the upper garment; here, evidently of one who is insufficiently clad, as in the parable, Matt. xxv. 36, seqq.

destitute of daily food.] Lacking (i. 5) day by day the food which would suffice for the day; unable to procure it by daily labour, either because hired by no man (Matt. xx. 7), or because the wages were withheld (v. 4).

16. one of you.] Gently expressed; but followed by, ye give them not, as if, though one had spoken, the neglect had been general.

Depart in peace.] A Hebrew phrase. The meaning is not, "Go, get these things for yourselves;"—that would have been churlishness; but this is hypocrisy—"May God grant you them!" a plain mockery in the mouths of men who had the opportunity of being God's instruments to supply these necessities (cp. 1 Tim. vi. 18), but who rejected the privilege offered to them.

what doth it profit.] First, and most simply, "profit the hungry and naked brother." But "they shall be filled" (Matt. v. 6), and verse 14 suggest the profit that it would have been to him who might have done this to Christ, but did it not (Matt. xxv. 45).

17. Even so faith.] The faith of which me thy faith ¹without thy works, and I will shew thee my faith by my works.

19 Thou believest that there is one God; thou doest well: the devils also believe, and tremble.

we are speaking, being alone, isolated, by itself. Others, "dead in itself," i.e. not merely outwardly ineffectual, "but in its inner state and character dead." But the former is better. Cp. the LXX in Gen. xliii. 32, "for him by himself, and for them by themselves," &c.

dead.] Retaining, it may be, the outward semblance of the living thing; but a corpse, powerless to perform the functions of life.

18. Yea, a man may say.] Greek, But some one will say. This expression elsewhere introduces an objection to the previous argument or assertion, see 1 Cor. xv. 35; Rom. ix. 19; whereas the present verse supports St. James's foregoing argument. The difficulty is much less if we take, "What doth it profit, if a man say that he hath faith" (verse 14), and "But rather and more naturally some one will say," &c. (18), as an antithesis, the particular instance in vv. 16, 17 being parenthetical. Thus a friendly speaker is introduced, arguing, ad hominem, "You claim credit for faith without shewing any evidence of it, while I work its works. Prove the existence of your faith, if you can, by any evidence except that of works; while I, by working, exhibit my faith in the only way in which proof of it can be given." So in Luke v. 18-25, the visible miracle is made the evidence of the spiritual. If a man say that he has faith, no one can contradict him. But the works of faith can be seen, and these will prove that, though invisible, it is present.

without thy works.] Literally, apart from them; supply, "if thou canst." Some read "by" them, but with less authority and less satisfactory meaning (cp. verses 14, 17).

19. that there is one God.] Rather, that God is one, asserting the unity as well as the existence of God,—against polytheism rather than atheism (1 Cor. viii. 4, 6); for the argument is with a Christian Jew, zealous in the assertion of this verity, as being the groundwork of the revelation to Moses, "Hear, O Israel; the Lord our God is one Lord" (Deut. vi. 4, &c.), where His absolute right to their allegiance is rested upon it. It is not an exclusively Christian article of faith; but it heads the Nicene Creed as well as the Decalogue; and it is pressed here on those who were at once Jews and Christians.

The mention of the devils believing seems to connect this with their confession of Christ, Mark i. 24, v. 7. Note the absence of anything beyond the bare historical belief of a fact. "What so great a thing is it, if thou sayest that Christ is the Son of God? Peter said it, and was answered, 'Blessed art thou, Simon Bar-jona.' The devils said it, and they heard, 'Hold your peace.' The word is one and the same; but the Lord tests not the flower, but the root" (Augustin. 'Serm. ad Pop.' 158. 6).

thou doest well.] "So far, well?" Ironical: cp. Mark vii. 9; Rom. xi. 20; 2 Cor. xi. 4.

tremble.] Nay, shiver or shudder, with such horror as makes the hair bristle; cp. Job iv. 15. Such is the faith which works not, because it loves not; the assurance of judgment to come; the foretaste of the "torments" of "the pit"!

20.] It may be doubtful whether vv. 18, 19 are to be taken together, or whether St. James himself speaks in verse 19; but, anyhow, v. 20 resumes the argument of v. 17.

wilt thou know.] Rather, hast thou the will to know; bringing out two truths:—(1) The real obstacle to the reception of the truth resides in the corruption of the will. (2) The intellectual assent at once involves practical consequences. Cp. "I would not have you ignorant," Rom. i. 13, xi. 25, &c.

vain man.] Not in reference to self-conceit, though, perhaps, to self-deceit. It is a grave rebuke; cp. Judg. ix. 4, xi. 3, with 1 Sam. xxii. 2, where the Hebrew word is identical with "Raca" in Matt. v. 22.

without works.] "Apart:" severed from its characteristic works, as in verse 17: cp. John xv. 5.

dead?] See verse 17; but others read idle, unworking, and so "useless" (ἀργή B C*, &c.); cp. the "idle word," Matt. xii. 36; "neither barren nor unfruitful," 2 Peter i. 8. This gives a characteristic antithesis, "work," "workless," and points to συνήργει, in verse 22; but the reading is not certain.

21. Abraham our father.] Father of the Jews, according to the flesh; and of all the faithful, by that adoption which makes them heirs of his blessing; see Gal. iii. 7-9, &c. But St. James's view is that the believing Gentile is taken into the true Israel, while the birthright of the unbelieving Jew falls into abeyance; see John viii. 37, 39—"I know that ye are Abraham's seed: but . . . if ye were Abraham's children, ye would do the works of Abraham:" where "the works" are probably those specific things by which his faith was tested (cp. ib. 56). So here "works" (plural) are named (Abraham representing a class, typically); but the reference is not so much to the general tenor of his life, as to that one act of faith by which he was specially tried, for which he received the blessing, Gen. xxii. 16, seqq.: "Because thou hast done this thing, and hast not withheld thy son, thine only son, in blessing I will bless thee, &c. . . . because thou hast obeyed my voice." (cp. xxvi. 5). Not that this was Abraham's first trial, or first promise (see Gen. xii., xiii., xv., xvii., xviii., &c.; Heb. xi. 8-19); but the crowning trial and temptation of his life was "when he offered Isaac his son upon the altar." And hence his faith and its reward (in short, his justification) are concentrated in this incident.

The weightiness of this trial, for the argument, is not in the violence done to a father's feelings. The Scripture shews us that the real trial was of the faith which wrought obedience. As Abraham believed God in his departure from his own country, and in the conception and birth of Isaac, so it was especially in this sacrifice; however much the command seemed to contradict the distinct assurance that Isaac, and not another, should be the heir of the promises (Gen. xvii. 19, xxi. 12); see Heb. xi. 17, seqq., especially verse 19, "accounting that God was able to raise him up, even from the dead." These last words are the key to the whole. The obedience of Abraham was rooted in faith, and that, faith in the resurrection from the dead. Believing that God would find the way to fulfil His own promise, he did not hesitate to obey the command which seemed to make it impossible. But all this depends on the historic truth of the fact that He who gave the command was the same God who had given the promise.

Abraham's faithfulness, with its motto, "The Lord will provide," may be contrasted with the conduct of Rebekah and Jacob.

22. faith wrought with his works.] Or, "wrought with him in his works;" i. e. helped him, so that his works through this faith became what without it they would not have been. This interpretation is favoured by Rom. viii. 28, "All things work (or, God worketh all things) together for good to them that love God." (The words "fellow-worker," &c., are more usually followed by the thing or person for which, than by the person with whom, one labours; cp. in the Greek, 3 Jo. 8; 2 Cor. i. 24, viii. 23; Col. iv. 11. Even in 1 Cor. iii. 9, "God's fellow-labourers" is probably "fellow-labourers in God's service.") Thus the words "faith helped in his works" state one side of the question, and "by works was faith made perfect," the other. "Faith creates works: works perfect faith" (Stier). "Work is faith ripened" (Messmer). This seems the preferable interpretation. For, though a man is said to be justified by faith, or to be justified by works, according to the point of view of St. Paul or St. James, it is doubtful whether there is any point of view from which it can be said that faith and works combine to justify, because this would imply that both justify in the same sense of the word.

Though the argument is here generalised, yet the definite article in the Greek refers us to Abraham's faith, as well as to his works, i. e. those which have been mentioned before. This faith is taken for granted, as prior to the works, and contrasted with the "dead" or "idle" faith. But for the faith, the works had not been done:—but for its working, the faith had not received the stamp of perfection.

made perfect?] Not as a material structure is completed by adding something: but as a living organisation arrives at the normal fullness of its maturity; cp. Eph. iv. 13.

23. And the scripture was fulfilled.] Gen. xv. 6, belongs to the period before the birth of Ishmael. But (as in prophecies, e.g. Matt. ii. 17) the words are taken to have been most truly fulfilled, not when first spoken, during the progress of Abraham's trials, but when his faith, advancing from high to higher, obtained its final triumph in the sacrifice of Isaac. So in Rom. iv. 3, 9, 10, St. Paul cites the words in their chronological order; but adds, in reference to the generation of Isaac, "and therefore it was imputed to him for righteousness" (ib. 22). By each proof of faith the promise acquired not only confirmation, but proportionate growth and meaning; so that its "fulfilment" followed that trial by which the faith itself was made perfect. Compare the word "fulfil" in Matt. v. 17.

24 Ye see then how that by works a man is justified, and not by faith only.

25 Likewise also was not Rahab the harlot justified by works, when she had received the messengers, and had sent them out another way?

26 For as the body without the spirit is dead, so faith without works is dead also.

CHAPTER III.

1 We are not rashly or arrogantly to reprove others: 5 but rather to bridle the tongue, a little member, but a powerful instrument of much good, and great harm. 13 They who be truly wise be mild, and peaceable, without envying, and strife.

MY brethren, be not many masters, knowing that we

it was imputed unto him.] So quoted (from LXX) by St. Paul, l. c. In the original, "He counted it to him." This "imputation" of righteousness, then, lies at the root of all that St. James says of justification. Whether or not there is any conscious reference to St. Paul's teaching, the distinction between imputed and actual righteousness (Rom. iv. 2-8) cannot fairly be left out of sight in interpreting St. James. See also iii. 2, on the imperfection of our works, and v. 15 on the efficacy of faith. Thus, from first to last, faith enables to all working;—in working, faith holds its own;—and when work proves to be imperfect, as all work must, it is through faith alone that this is remedied.

was called the Friend of God.] Isai. xli. 8; cp. 2 Chron. xx. 7. Philo Judæus quotes "friend," from Gen. xviii. 17, where the LXX have "servant:" which, though an interpolation, illustrates Christ's words on the distinction between servant and friend, John xv. 15. Cp. "God took Abraham for His friend," 'Koran,' c. 4; whence the Arabs call Abraham Khalil Allab, or simply Al-Khalil ("the friend"), and Hebron is said to be called Al-Khalil to this day:—Ἀβραάμ, ὁ φίλος προσαγορευθεὶς, Clem. Rom. i. 10.

Therefore "was called" is not = "was," but means "received the title."

24. by faith only.] Not as if faith did part, and works were needed to do the rest; but "only" as isolated, apart from works (see on verses 20, 22), granting (for argument's sake, at least) the possibility of such a faith, as instanced in the case of devils (verse 19). This is a conclusion drawn from the case of Abraham, and therefore the same limitations must be recognised in the conclusion which were assumed in the premisses. Note that nothing is here said of the "works of the law" (Rom. iii. 20, ix. 32; Gal. ii. 16, &c.). The works are the works "of Abraham," which those who are indeed his children will do (John viii. 39).

But what does "to be justified" mean in the language of St. James? See the remarks in the Excursus, 'St. James and St. Paul,' § 7, seqq.

25. Rahab the harlot.] See Josh. ii., and

vi. 22-25. From St. Matthew (i. 5) we learn that she became the wife of Salmon and mother of Boaz. We need not shrink from the plain meaning of "harlot." In those times and countries any woman who took in lodgers promiscuously must have borne a degraded character. The "works" spoken of are solely those by which her faith was shewn in the one incident of her life mentioned here and in Heb. xi. 31. It has been noticed that all the females mentioned by St. Matthew in our Lord's genealogy have a stigma attached to them—Tamar the incestuous, Rahab the harlot, Ruth the Moabitess, Bathsheba the adulteress. So Christ touched the leper, and took no taint, but made him clean. Rahab was justified, not by the general tenor of her life, but by that one work of faith which saved her from the judgment of Jericho. See on verses 21, 24, and Excursus, 'St. J. and St. P.,' § 2.

sent them out.] Literally, "cast them out," perhaps expressing their hurried departure; as in Acts xvi. 37. Yet it may be used without such special emphasis; cp. John x. 4.

another way?] Probably, not merely a different, but (as in 1 Cor. xiv. 21; Jude 7; cp. Gal. i. 6, 7) a strange, unusual way, viz. by a cord through a window; see Josh. ii. 15, and cp. Acts ix. 25; 2 Cor. xi. 33.

26. For as, &c.] The general conclusion of verses 17, 20, is resumed, and the unreality of a merely correct intellectual belief, without love to God or man, is reasserted. The comparison of faith to the body, and works to the spirit, seems strange. But if faith be dead without works, these are fairly termed its spirit or life. Cp. "the form of knowledge and of the truth in the law," Rom. ii. 20; "having a form of godliness, but denying the power thereof," 2 Tim. iii. 5; see also Rom. i. 18. On the other hand, compare "dead works," Heb. ix. 14.

2 For in many things we offend all. If any man offend not in word, the same is a perfect man, and able also to bridle the whole body.

ness; and against the danger of assuming it without fitness.

masters.] Or teachers; = the Hebrew Rabbi (v. John i. 38, xx. 16). We are reminded of Matt. xxiii. 8, "Be ye not called Rabbi; for one is your master, even Christ." Probably rivalries in the Church-teaching are touched, cp. verses 14, 16; also 1 Tim. i. 6, 7, and (of women) ii. 12; also Heb. v. 4, 5. The same subject is noticed in the letter (probably written by St. James), Acts xv. 24. But he refers also to a tendency to talk instead of acting, and to the responsibility incurred by those who undertake to teach others their duty. A harsh way of lecturing one's neighbours is the natural vent of a cold intellectual belief; cp. Rom. ii. 1. See the use made by Christ's hearers, in St. Luke xiii. 1, of what He had said in xii. 58, seqq.

knowing that.] Half argumentative, "inasmuch as ye know;" half hortatory, "for ye ought to know."

the greater condemnation.] Being punished with many stripes, if we fail, in proportion to our self-assertion; while, in fact, all of us often fail in one thing or another. "Mighty men shall be mightily tormented," Wisd. vi. 6. Cp. Matt. xxiii. 14, of those who added the sin of hypocrisy to that of extortion and rapine; cp. also Matt. vii. 1.

2. in many things (or "oftentimes," as Matt. ix. 14) we offend all.] A grave confession here, where the duty of "works" is so broadly enforced:—all of us offend, and that often; not in one thing, but in many; not some, but all; cp. 1 John i. 8. But, mercifully, "to offend" is not necessarily "to fall," but may be merely "to stumble" (traiw); see Rom. xi. 11; nay, "a just man falleth seven times, and riseth up again" (Prov. xxiv. 16; cp. Ps. xxxvii. 24).

offend not in word.] This goes beyond failure in the teacher's office, which would scarcely be called "offence." St. James returns to the subject of much, rash, or vain talking, which, in the true spirit of the Hebrew moralists, he deems so serious. "All of us offend oft—in word, even if not in deed. Many who keep their hands pure are careless of their tongues. The man who rules this member can rule all the others."

So much more than we commonly suppose is needed for the "perfection" which Christ demands of us (Matt. v. 48, cp. xii. 31-37)! Was not Moses shut out of Canaan for "speaking unadvisedly with his lips"? (Ps. cvi. 33; Num. xx. 10, seqq., xxvii. 13, seq.) Nay, to suppress sins of the tongue is not merely a counsel of perfection. Often they come first, and lead to sins of action; see Matt. l. c. and xv. 11, 18-20. Moreover, of that sin which shall never be forgiven, we know this at least, that it is a sin of the tongue rather than of the hands (Matt. xii. 31, seq.). This new thought is expanded in the following verses.

to bridle.] See next verse, and cp. i. 26.

the whole body.] The aggregate of those "members" which are in the natural man instruments of sin, but are meant to be the instruments of righteousness (Rom. vi. 13); called "the body of sin," (ib. 6), but still very different from "the flesh," which is not merely to be "bridled" and controlled, but warred against and mortified.

3.] A minute but important various reading (ei de for ide or idou) should be adopted from A B N, 13, 31, K L, Vulg., Memph.; and the passage should be translated, "But if we put our horses' bridles into their mouths . . . then we turn their whole body about." Cp. Ps. xxxii. 9.

4. Behold also the ships.] Another figure, co-ordinate with the last, in illustration of verse 2. In i. 6, "the wave of the sea driven by the wind," typifies the man of two minds, the waverer or doubter. Here the ships "driven before fierce winds" represent the soul as carried away by vehement passions. Perhaps the words should be rendered, "even when they are driven . . ." whithersoever the governor listeth.] In the classical sense of the word (gubernator, κυβερνήτης). Literally, "where the impulse of him that steereth, listeth;" the "impulse" being either the movement by which the helm is turned, or the pilot's guiding will. The word "listeth" favours the latter interpretation. Lucretius (iv. 902), "quanto vis impete euntem" is quoted on the other side, and should be compared. But he is speaking of the whole ship, not of the rudder.

wood.

5 Even so the tongue is a little member, and boasteth great things. Behold, how great ¹a matter a little fire kindleth!

6 And the tongue is a fire, a world of iniquity: so is the tongue among our members, that it defileth the whole body, and setteth on fire the course of nature; and it is set on fire of hell.

7 For every ¹kind of beasts, and of ¹birds, and of serpents, and of things in the sea, is tamed, and hath been tamed of ¹mankind:

These instances exhibit the power of one small member in controlling a great body. But the small member is itself seldom controlled; and if it remains unruly, they suggest its power for evil. Thus the greatness and rarity of the achievement is first brought out; then the amount of mischief which is the alternative. Finally comes the application, "Such is the member which you leave uncontrolled!"

5. boasteth great things.] Characteristically of the "little member's" arrogance (cp. Ps. xii. 3; Dan. vii. 20:—the word μεγαλυνεῖν is used in Ecclus. xlviii. 18, of Sennacherib). But it is no empty vaunt. Often it does guide the whole body, as the bridle the horse, the helm the ship; even as a little spark can kindle a conflagration.

how great a matter, &c.] Rather (ἡλίκον for ὀλίγον A², B, N, C^{*} P, Vulg.), how small a fire kindleth how great a forest!—ὕλη=1, a wood; 2, matter (not a matter), as a philosophical term, which cannot be the meaning here. A forest-fire is an incident which is often referred to by the ancients; not only the poets, e.g. Il. 2. 455 seqq.; Pind. P. 3. 64; Lucret. i. 888–891; Virg. 'Georg.' ii. 303; but even Thucydides, when describing the fire kindled by the besiegers of Platææ (ii. 77):—"A fire arose, greater than was ever seen before of man's kindling: though perhaps such a thing has been known when some mountain forest (ὕλη) has of itself burst into fire and flame by friction of its branches as the wind stirred them. Cp. Ps. lxxxiii. 14: "As the fire burneth a wood; and as the flame setteth the mountains on fire;" Isai. ix. 18, "Wickedness burneth as the fire: it shall devour the briars and thorns, and shall kindle in the thickets of the forest." Others explain "wood" as "a heap of fire wood"—"how huge a pyre"—less picturesquely, and probably less accurately, though supported by Ecclus xxviii. 10 in a somewhat similar passage.

6. a world of iniquity.] This clause is difficult, and variously explained, though the general meaning of the verse is not doubtful. The old Syriac version gives it, "The tongue is a fire; the world of iniquity [is a wood]," supplying a complete correspondence between this clause and those which precede and follow. Cp. Luke xxiii. 31, "If they do these things in a green tree, what shall be done in the dry?"—But probably the simplest interpretation is the best,—that the tongue, small as it is, contains a whole world of mischief. The LXX have in Prov. xvii. 6, "the whole world of wealth is for the faithful, for the faithless not a penny;" and the same version uses this word (κόσμος), where we have "the host of heaven," Gen. ii. 1, probably meaning the aggregate body of it. Translate, the tongue, that world of iniquity, is fire.

so is the tongue, &c.] So must be removed from the text, on the authority of all the best MSS. The tongue hath its place among our members as that which defileth (lit. "spotteth"), &c. Cp. Jude 23; 2 Pet. ii. 13; Eph. v. 27.

setteth on fire the course of nature.] Literally, the wheel of being (or becoming); a phrase hard to account for. But our version, though vague, is not incorrect; for "wheel" = circle, cycle; and the word translated "nature" (γένεσις, natura) comes very near to "creation" (κτίσις) in its collective sense; see above on i. 23. In Judith xii. 18, it is simply "life." So it comes to be, "the course of human life, as the wheel comes round and round in successive generations." Cp. also the "wheel at the cistern," Eccl. xii. 6.

and it is set on fire of hell.] Not = "whose end is to be burned," but, "itself kindled at the gehenna of fire (Matt. v. 22, xviii. 9; Mark ix. 47), and with that fire kindling all human life."

7. A fourfold division, though not scientific, consisting of two pairs; beasts (probably quadrupeds, though used in Acts xxviii. 5, of a serpent) and birds, reptiles and fishes. We are reminded of Gen. i. 20, 21, 24, 25.

serpents.] Reptiles. "Every kind of creature—those that walk, that fly, that creep, that swim—is tamable, and, in fact, hath been tamed by mankind." A rhetorical expression, amply justified by the success of experiments in each of these four groups of the animal kingdom. Every kind is tamed of mankind: lit. every nature . . . of man's nature (φύσις). Man's nature and powers grapple

8 But the tongue can no man tame; it is an unruly evil, full of deadly poison.

9 Therewith bless we God, even the Father; and therewith curse we men, which are made after the similitude of God.

with each nature of the other creatures, and master them all in detail; there being in him that before which their nature quails. The charter of his mastery is Gen. i. 28; and is still valid, though modified by the curse, Gen. iii. 17-18. "Imago Dei domat feram" (Augustin.). Cp. Ps. viii. 6-8.

There is a remarkable coincidence, both of thought and expression, in a lyric passage of Sophocles, 'Antig.' 332, seqq.

8. can no man tame.] Some make this an interrogation; which, though forcible, is less suitable to the argument. Again, it is asked, Is this one's own tongue, or (in reference to the teacher's office) the tongue of another? St. James makes no distinction. Simply, man cannot tame it, though he can tame all else! Yet the context implies that he is thinking of self-control.

unruly.] "Ungovernable," ἀκατάσχετον, corresponds with the foregoing verses: but the reading of A, B, N, P, Vulg., Memph., ἀκατάστατον, "disorderly, inconsistent, chaotic" (see i. 8, iii. 16), suits better the self-contradictory, unaccountable character of the mischief—blessing and cursing, blowing hot and cold—described in verses 9-12.

poison.] Distinctively, venom; conveying, as so often in Holy Writ, a reference to the Old Serpent and the first temptation. Cp. Eccl. x. 11, "Surely the serpent will bite without enchantment; and a babbler is no better;" also Ps. lvi. 3, seq., cxi. 3.

9. bless we God.] The Jews used to introduce such ejaculations into ordinary, even frivolous, conversation. Devotional phrases become a testimony against those who combine them with the "cursing" of men.

ought not so to be. The word (χρή) is still stronger, implying that they are contrary to law and nature.

11. Doth a fountain.] "The fountain," individualised as a familiar object of reference.

at the same place.] Or opening (used of chinks, clefts, or holes in the earth, Exod. xxxiii. 22; Obad. 3, LXX; Heb. xi. 38); the "fountain" of St. James being the subterranean source or reservoir which supplies the water. The one corresponds to the heart, the other to the mouth, of man; see Matt. xii. 35, xv. 18. A moral impossibility is illustrated by physical impossibilities, such as the Jews in Palestine would appreciate readily and keenly. They had read of the bitter waters of Marah (Exod. xv. 23), and of the healing of the spring at Jericho (2 Kings ii. 19, seqq.), and were well acquainted with the "Salt Sea" (Gen. xiv. 3; Josh. iii. 16, &c.) and the characteristics of its basin. And the names of En-dor, Engedi, En-rogel, En-hakkôrê, Aen-on, &c., poetically describing the fountain as the eye which gives life and animation to the landscape, bespeak the preciousness of living waters in a land where to be dry is to be desert (the evil spirit walks through "dry places," Matt. xii. 43). See the description of the country in Deut. viii. 7, and cp. Judg. i. 15; Ezek. xlvii. Where springs were wanting, see the value of wells, Beer-sheba, &c., Gen. xxi. 22-32, xxvi. 18-33; and the song of the well-diggers, Num. xxi. 16-18. Note, too, "Jacob's well" at Sychar, John iv. 6, seqq.

12. the fig-tree . . . olive . . . vine.] The three trees of blessing in Jotham's parable, Judg. ix. 7-15. Here is no contrast of good and bad, as in Isai. v. 2, 4, or Matt. vii. 16; but only the truth that as the tree, so the fruit, "after his kind." This teaching, like our Lord's, reflects the features of the Holy Land; see especially Deut. viii. 8; 1 Kings iv. 25, and all the references to the Mount of Olives. Similar illustrations occur in several Heathen writers after the so can no fountain both yield salt water and fresh.

13 Who is a wise man and endowed with knowledge among you? let him shew out of a good conversation his works with meekness of wisdom.

Christian era; v. especially Plutarch 'Mor.' ii. 472 F.

As the question requires the answer, "No," the sentence (in the received text) proceeds as if the words had been, "The fig-tree cannot . . . so can no fountain," &c. But probably this is only a paraphrase of the harder and better attested reading (of A, B, N, C, &c.), and the whole should be, "Can a fig-tree bear olive-berries, or a vine figs? Neither can that which is salt yield sweet water." This made Elijah's miracle at Jericho, 2 Kings ii. 20, 21, the more remarkable.

We might have expected, "so the same mouth," &c. But St. James first illustrates his subject by the metaphor of the fountain, and then, as if this was the statement to be illustrated, adds the further figure of the trees.

On this section (vv. 1-12), see Bp. Jebb's 'Christian Literature,' xiv.

13. Who is . . . ? let him.] I. e. "Whoever is . . . , let him." Compare the construction in Eccclus. vi. 34.

Who is, &c.] An abrupt transition. But the subject is still the need to control the tongue, and the desire of "many" to be "masters" or teachers (verse 1), which implied both a pretension to the possession of wisdom, and an inclination to expend it in words. St. James sees in such word-wisdom a mere instrument of vanity and contention. St. Paul also disclaims and denounces it (1 Cor. i. 17, seqq., ii. 1-13) as human, in opposition to the wisdom which is the gift of the Spirit. But here it is portrayed as a work of the devil, a vent of the evil in the heart, and a hindrance to godly life. St. Paul contrasts teaching with teaching; St. James, wrangling with love. See on i. 5.

wise . . . and endowed with knowledge.] Probably, "intelligent and practically wise," as Matt. xi. 25; 1 Cor. i. 19, "wise and prudent," "wise and understanding," Deut. i. 13 (cp. LXX there). But no sharp distinction is to be drawn. Whatever mental gifts a man may claim to have, they are to be used in works, not words; in meekness, not contentiously; with such consistent perseverance as to shew a good conversation (rather life; see Gal. i. 13; Heb. xiii. 7, for this word, which is also common in St. Peter's Epistles).

meekness of wisdom.] This carries us back to "slow to wrath," coupled with "slow to speak," i. 19; and forward to the further description in verse 17.

14. envying and strife.] Rather, jealousy and party-spirit, or faction. Ζήλος may be either good or bad zeal; but the bad sense prevails in the N. T., even without such interpreting words as occur here; cp. Acts v. 17. (In Heb. x. 27, it is used of God's jealous indignation as revealed in fire.) Ἐριθεία is not "strife," but is the sordid rivalry of political factions, jobbing partisanship, intrigue. So here and in verse 16; cp. Phil. i. 16; 1 Cor. i. 12.

the truth.] Not mere "veracity," against which all lies are; but the Gospel of Him who is Himself the Truth (cp. i. 18). "If your wisdom bears such fruits as these, your glorying is the lie of Satan and Antichrist." Gal. vi. 14, "God forbid that I should glory, save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ." Cp. the word in Rom. xi. 18. Above, ii. 13, there is a different shade of meaning. The "bitterness in the heart" here recalls the bitter water of the fountain in verse 11.

15. This wisdom descendeth not, &c.] Rather is not one (or that) which descendeth. Two kinds of wisdom are recognised; as, above, two kinds of faith; one good, the other bad; see verse 17. Cp. also i. 17, 'Every good gift,' &c.

from above.] Or, "from on high," suggesting the inspiration of the Holy Ghost (contrasted with "devilish"), which those who lack wisdom are to seek of God (i. 5).

earthly, sensual, devilish.] A descending climax: (1) "Earthly," opposed to heavenly, "descending from above;" and by this contrast acquiring the added notion of low and grovelling (cp. Phil. iii. 19); though the word in itself is not necessarily of evil meaning (cp. "If I have told you earthly things," &c., John iii. 12), but merely local. (2) "Sensual," ψυχικός, elsewhere also rendered "natural," of man's state under the dominion of his own unregenerate nature, with all his natural faculties, with a soul, but wanting the Spirit, alien from God. So 1 Cor. ii. 14, "the natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God," &c.; ib. xv. 44, seq., "a natural body," opposed to "a spiritual body;" Jude 19, "sensual, not having the Spirit."

CHAPTER IV.

1 We are to strive against covetousness, 4 intemperance, 5 pride, 11 detraction, and rash judgment of others: 13 and not to be confident in the good success of worldly business, but mindful ever of the uncertainty of this life, to commit ourselves and all our affairs to God's providence.

4 Ye adulterers and adulteresses,

CHAP. IV.—1. A painful transition from the ideal to the actual, all the more striking from its abruptness; especially if we read (as Ln., Tdf., Trg., with A B & C, &c.) whence wars, and whence fightings among you? Hitherto the language has been general (“but if,” iii. 14; “for where,” 16): but now it is “among you,” and the outward works being recognised, the hidden source is sought for: cp. iii. 12. Whether these were strifes of (so-called) religious parties, or individual rivalries for selfish ends as the following words may suggest (litigation about meum and tuum is less likely), they were works of the flesh (see in Gal. v. 19–21, how much these comprehend) coming of lusts, literally, pleasures, sins of pleasure rather than of avarice or any other form of greed; so in verse 3, “that ye may consume it on your pleasures;” cp. also Tit. iii. 3; and Xen. Mem. 1. ii. 23, ἐν τῷ σώματι συμπεφυτευμένοι τῇ ψυχῇ αἱ ἡδοναὶ πείθουσιν αὐτὴν μὴ σωφρονεῖν. See also Clem. Rom. i. 46.

that war in your members?] Different sins possessing the several members as their instruments; as the eye, the hand, offends, Matt. v. 29, seqq.; cp. Rom. vi. 6, 12, 13: in Col. iii. 5, unclean lusts are “your members which are upon the earth.” So, “fleshly lusts which war against the soul,” 1 Pet. ii. 11; whence some supply “against the soul” here,—the struggle being between these members and the true self; see Rom. vii. 23. But such supplemental ideas only limit the meaning. Wherever these lusts exist uncontrolled, there is confusion. Whether in combination to enslave the man, or in mutual conflict, or in pursuit of some special end, their normal state is war. “The way of peace they have not known.”

2, 3. These accusations have seemed so incredible, as brought against the disciples by an Apostle, that forced explanations have been adopted to evade them. But they are plain and consistent: cp. 1 Pet. iv. 15, “Let none of you suffer as a murderer or as a thief,” &c. Nor can we change kill into envy (φονεῖτε into φθονεῖτε) as has been thought plausible. True, “ye kill and are jealous” is a lame expression: but it may help us to that which probably is the real meaning, “Ye play the murderers and zealots.” See Additional Note (A) at end of Chapter.

This verse is sometimes divided into three parts,—1. ye lust; 2. ye kill; 3. ye fight; followed by the general explanation, “because ye ask not.” Sometimes only into two,—“ye fight and war, yet ye have not” being a recapitulation in the very words of verse 1, with the addition of the reason. But “yet” is omitted by Ln., Tdf., Trg., after A, B, & C: so it is better to render, “ye fight and war. Ye have not, because ye ask not; ye ask and receive not,” &c. The thing “asked” is not specified; but seems to be something which may be rightfully prayed for, Matt. vii. 7; John xv. 7. The first fault is that they ask not of God; and so one can only gain (if at all) by another’s loss: hence the wars and fightings, when one has, and another cannot obtain. The second fault is theirs, who do ask of God, but ask “amiss” (not “in ill fashion,” but “with evil intent”), that they may consume (use up, waste, as Mar. v. 26; cp. 2 Cor. xii. 15) it in their pleasures (see on verse 1), in sensual and worldly indulgence. Such asking makes that which might be not evil in itself, evil to them: it seeks to make God the instrument of their desires, instead of subjecting these to Him. Prayer, without the spirit of prayer, has not the promise of prayer, and is not heard. Perhaps this is well. “The too indulgent gods,” says Juvenal (Sat. x. 7), “have ere now overthrown whole households by answering their prayers.” But these men dwell with unsatisfied greed on the “have not;” whereas real prayer removes our selfishness by our conscious relation to God: and faith knows that it is answered, even when others can see no fulfilment.

4. adulterers and adulteresses.] If this is the true reading, and the words are taken literally, the thought advances from “lusts and pleasures" to overt acts of fleshly sin. But the "friendship of the world, enmity with God," shews that the fleshly sin, even if literally imputed, does but symbolise apostasy from God, according to the usage of the O. T. prophets, in speaking of those who go after strange gods; e. g. Jerem. iii., Hosea ii., iii., iv., &c. So St. Paul speaks of the Corinthian Church as a virgin whom he had espoused to Christ (2 Cor. xi. 2); and "the marriage of the Lamb" crowns the Revelation of St. John (xix. 7, xxi. 9). If those who are espoused to the Lord combine other loves with His, this is precisely the spiritual adultery which the prophets denounce. But the spiritual and carnal sins went hand in hand (as in the days of Moab and Midian, Num. xxv.) in the lewd rites of Heathendom. The one was a devil's sacrament of the other.

But the best authorities (A, B, N, &c., followed by Ln., Tdf., Trg.) have only the words "ye adulteresses," which is more difficult. It is not likely that the female disciples are singled out for rebuke. In the O. T. figure, God is always the bridegroom or husband, to whom all His people are wedded (Jerem. and Hosea above cited; cp. Isai. lxii. 4, 5); and so, perhaps, all (male and female alike) are designated in their unfaithfulness as adulterous spouses of the Lord. This would weaken the reference to lusts of the flesh in verse 3; but point more sharply the warning against the world's love as (in God's spouse) adulterous. Perhaps Rom. vii. 4 may be taken as favouring this interpretation. It is, however, worthy of remark that elsewhere the Spouse of God or Christ is not an individual, but always a Church or Community, personified as a female. And Hofmann suggests that the feminine word may have been used in contempt of the "effeminate."

friendship of the world.] Cp. 1 John ii. 15, 16,—the world, as antagonistic to God, lying under the powers of darkness and their prince (Eph. ii. 2, vi. 12; John xiv. 30). We must make our choice; "Ye cannot serve God and Mammon" (Matt. vi. 24). The very "will" ("would be a friend") to gain the world's favour incurs of itself the enmity of God.

But verses 4-6 require a longer examination, which will be found at the end of the chapter (Add. note B). The following paraphrase contains the result:—"Ye adulterous spouses of the Lord, know ye not that to love the world is to be the enemy of God? Or think ye that all which Scripture saith of this relation of God to man is unmeaning? Passionately, ay, with passion that is even terrible, He yearneth for the entire possession of the Spirit which He Himself gave to dwell in us (κατοίκησεν is to be read, as Ln. Tdf. Trg. after A, B, N). But in proportion to His burning jealousy is the abundance of the grace that He giveth. It is the measure of His intense yearning for us. Nothing short of His love could pass into aught so terrible!"

6. Wherefore he saith.] Rather, "it saith," i. e. "the Scripture," as in verse 5. Quoted from Prov. iii. 34 (LXX), except that "God" is here substituted for "the Lord," as in the parallel passage (where there are several verbal coincidences), 1 Pet. v. 5. See also Rom. xii. 16. The "proud" are the enemies of God (verse 4), viewed as rebels; followers of the rebel Angel (verse 7) whom we are to resist, and who is baffled by those who humble themselves.

7. The coincidences with 1 Pet. v. 5-7 continue; there is also a reference to Christ's Temptation (especially Matt. iv. 10, 11);—all three passages testifying to the personality of the Tempter (see too Luke xxii. 31, seq.), who appears (as elsewhere) as the prince of this world; whose thralls the friends of the world necessarily become (John xii. 31, xiv. 30).

therefore.] Because this submission implies the humility to which God gives grace (verse 6). For then Christ, who conquered the Tempter, will fight for us; and in Him we shall be conquerors, because (1) we are "found in Him," and no one can pluck us out of His hand and the Father's (John x. 28, seq.); (2) He does not allow any temptation to be overpowering (1 Cor. x. 13); (3) His strength is made perfect in our weakness (2 Cor. xii. 9).

8. Draw nigh to God, &c.] Not only with "mouth" or "lips," which is in effect to hands, ye sinners; and purify your hearts, ye double minded.

9 Be afflicted, and mourn, and weep: let your laughter be turned to mourning, and your joy to heaviness.

10 Humble yourselves in the sight of the Lord, and he shall lift you up.

remain far from Him (Matt. xv. 8; Isai. xxix. 13); but with "heart" and "hands,"—the inward disposition, the outward life and practice,—in sincerity and truth. And then He will be found. He "is not far from every one of us" (Acts xvii. 27): but He will have us seek Him; see 2 Chron. xv. 2; Isai. lvii. 15; Ps. cxlv. 18. It is this which will make the devil flee.—"Draw nigh . . . and He will draw nigh," answer to "Resist . . . and he will flee," verse 8.

Cleanse your hands, ye sinners.] Of the grosser forms of actual sin, and the ordinary and outward cleansing, e. g. from physical impurities or from leprosy. In 1 Tim. ii. 8, "holy hands" are among the conditions of acceptable prayer.

purify your hearts, ye double minded.] The more subtle evil demands a higher purification; the word καθαρίσαι expressing either special preparation for a religious service (John xi. 55; Acts xxi. 24, 26, xxiv. 18), or, as here, inward sanctification (1 Pet. i. 22; 1 Jo. iii. 3). The "sinner" is one that is separated from Christ (Heb. vii. 26); the "double minded" (see on i. 8) is he who would fain serve God and the world (verse 4); see 1 Kings xviii. 21; Eccclus. ii. 12; and cp. Psalm xxiv. 4. Perhaps the former is he who asks not, and the latter he who asks amiss (verses 2, 3). But both epithets may apply to the same persons, as viewed on different sides of their character;—see Calvin.

9. Be afflicted.] More literally, be wretched, i. e. feel the real wretchedness of your condition; cp. Rev. iii. 17, of the Church of Laodicea. If this reality is felt, repentance will shew itself in the outward manifestations of "mourning" and "weeping,"—in dress, look, gesture, voice, tears: see Lu. vi. 25. We must remember the demonstrative character of Jewish (as generally of Oriental) joy (2 Sam. vi. 14, &c.) and sorrow (Lev. xvi. 29, 31, Num. xxv. 6, &c.). Here they are exhorted to avert the coming judgment by anticipating it. In ch. v. 1, seqq., comes the denunciation of the judgment itself, on those who have "lived in pleasure."

heaviness.] Downcastness, as that of the publican, who "would not lift up so much as his eyes to heaven" (Lu. xviii. 13). See

1 Kings xxi. 27, seqq., for the partial efficacy of even Ahab's self-abasement. "As a tree must strike root deep downward, that it may grow upward, a man's spirit must be rooted in humility, or he is only lifted up to his own hurt." (Augustin., quoted by Calvin.)

10. Humble yourselves.] Still with reference to verses 6, 7; see Eccclus. ii. 17, iii. 18; Matt. xxiii. 12 with the parallels; and especially Micah vii. 8, seq. In 1 Pet. v. 5, it is "humble yourselves under the mighty hand of God:" but here "in the sight of the Lord" expresses the self-abasement which the sense of His presence works; as expressed in Job xlii. 5, 6.

lift you up.] Referring first to the hidden glory of the present dispensation; then to the future revelation of the consummate glory.

11. An abrupt change, resuming the subject of "the tongue;" its licence, in contrast with the quiet discharge of duty,—its misuse (in presumptuous judgments of others), in contrast with strict self-judgment and watchfulness.

brethren.] I. e. "my brethren!" as so often in this Epistle; not "since ye are brethren." Yet the appeal suggests the same argument in a more touching way; cp. Act. vii. 26.

Speak . . . evil.] Is interpreted by what follows, not of slander, but of harsh judgment, censoriousness. It is almost = to condemn; but without authority to condemn.

of his brother.] Rather, of a brother, "one that is a brother;"—and judgeth should be "or judgeth," as A, B, N, 13, and the old versions.

the law.] Not merely the specific precept, "Judge not" (Matt. vii. 1); but identical with "the royal law" (ii. 8), which embraces all,—"thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself." Such a violation of the spirit of the "great commandment," is in fact a censure of the law itself which is summed up in these words. See Rom. ii. 1, 13, where he that judges another is spoken of, and the "doer of the law" is opposed to the "hearer," as here to the critic. To judge, or criticise the Law, one must be outside of, and above it; not within its sphere and under its jurisdiction. Otherwise it cannot be judged comprehensively, disinterestedly, and (consequently) fairly. It is by "doing" it that a man comes to understand it (John vii. 17): and the doer is not likely to criticise.

12. To judge the law belongs to the same authority as to make the law. The best authorities (A, B, N, &c.) add "and judge" after "lawgiver:" and these words are important;—"the lawgiver and judge is One; even He who is able to save and to destroy;"—He who made the Law and gives it validity; He who can save when man condemns (Rom. xiv. 4); who can destroy the men who take so much upon them. See especially Matt. x. 28.

to save and to destroy.] In the complete and final sense; see Matt. i. c.

who art thou . . .] Brings man's nothingness into sharp contrast with the Majesty of God the lawgiver and judge; and exposes the self-delusion of those who thus encroach on His prerogative.

another ?] Probably we should read, thy neighbour (A, B, N, &c.); the sense being the same; cp. for the first, Rom. ii. 1, 21; for the second, supra, ii. 8. In ii. 10, 11, the unity of the Lawgiver was the proof of the unity of the whole Law. Here God, in His unity, is contrasted with all those to whom the Law is given.

13. From presumptuous judgments of others it is a slight step to presumptuous confidence in one's own future; v. Lu. xii. 15-20; Prov. xxvii. 1; and see note on Eccles. x. 14.

Go to.] This phrase (see Gen. xi. 3, 4, 7, A.V.) has a scoffing tone; which, however, is not found in the Greek word either here or in LXX, Gen. i. c., but is derived from the context. Strictly, an imperative verb ought to follow (as in ch. v. 1); and some think that there is a long parenthesis, after which in ch. v. 1, "Go to" is repeated. But the classes rebuked in the two paragraphs are distinct. The present sentence is really finished, in another form, in verse 16, "all such rejoicing is evil."

To-day or to-morrow.] Or, "to-day and to-morrow;" to day to set out, to-morrow to arrive. Note the chain of the scheme, every link of which is treated as safe; whereas any one may break, and ruin the whole;—to-day—to-morrow—a year; all leading up to the object, "we will get gain."

into such a city.] Into this city here; as if pointing it out while speaking. The character here sketched is rather Jewish than Christian; that is, St. James describes persons according to their nationality rather than their religion (see on iv. 2). We see the commercial genius of the nation, already developed by their dispersion; a people without a home, following their traffic from place to place. Josephus ('Antt.' xx. 11, 1) describes them as fleeing from Palestine in all directions to escape the avarice and cruelty of Gessius Florus. Compare the notices of Aquila (a Jew of Pontus) and Priscilla, first at Rome, then at Corinth (Acts xviii. 1, 2); then at Ephesus (ib. 26; 1 Cor. xvi. 19); again at Rome (Rom. xvi. 3); lastly, again at Ephesus (2 Tim. iv. 19).

14, 15. Verse 14 is parenthetic, and verse 15 continues verse 13, "Go to, ye that say . . . instead of your saying" (as ye ought), "If," &c. The A. V. is rather ambiguous.

It is.] We should probably read, Ye are (with A, B, &c.).

a vapour.] Cp. Job vii. 7; Wisdom ii. 2. In Ps. cxliv. 4, a Greek version has "like a vapour" instead of "vanity." See too Hosea vi. 4, xiii. 3. The condition "If the Lord will, we shall live," must precede even the first link in the chain of verse 13. Others have, "If the Lord will, and we live and do this or that," . . . the conclusion being left to be supplied by the readers. "Our calendars give the longest day and the shortest, the fasts and the festivals: but no Calendar gives the last day" (Stier).

16. ye rejoice in your boastings.] The verb itself implies glorying or boasting (v. Prov. xxvii. 1, LXX); and this may be well-grounded (in the Lord, in the Cross, 1 Cor. i. 31; Gal. vi. 14), or ill-grounded (in men, 1 Cor. iii. 21). But the noun expresses presumptuous boasting—"All such glorying (not, all glorying) is evil."

boastings.] (Plural) the aggregate of those instances of arrogances which form the character; as in ii. 1 (literally), "with respects of persons."

17.] With this maxim cp. Christ's words in Luke xii. 47; John ix. 41, xv. 22, seqq.; and especially xiii. 17. St. James delights in abrupt apophthegms, especially at the end of a paragraph. But here he does not merely say, "Now I have warned you; so, if you go wrong, your sin will be the greater." However abrupt the style, we reasonably expect to trace some connexion with the context. Probably, the reference is to the boastful rejoicing just mentioned. The Jews relied on their knowledge (Rom. ii. 17-20); and their condemnation was, that they said they saw; therefore their sin remained (John, ut supra, cp. vii. 49). Their "hearing" was not "doing," and therefore "their religion was vain" (supra, i. 26, seq.). Some have suspected a direct reference to Rom. xiv. 23, "Whatsoever is not of faith is sin." We can scarcely assume so much: but the correspondence is very remarkable; and St. James supplements St. Paul. "It is sin to doubt whether a thing be right, and yet to do it. It is also sin to know that a thing is right, and yet to leave it undone."

ADDITIONAL NOTES on Chap. IV.

(A.) Verse 2.

First, we must remember how often Christ directs His discourses, sometimes to one class, sometimes to another, among that mixed multitude which contained alike the ardent disciple and the half-hearted listener, even the secret enemy; all being within the pale of possible conversion so long as, from any motive, they were attracted to the Teacher. Next, we must consider the position of St. James and those to whom he wrote, as still Jews, though believers; still looking on their unconverted brethren as members of the same communion, though they had not yet accepted God's entire revelation. Both these classes were necessarily present to his mind while he wrote; as he was, in fact, connected with both at Jerusalem. See note on ch. v. 1, and Introduction, ii.

We can comprehend, therefore, the state of things here indicated, without directly imputing it to the Christians themselves. Perhaps, indeed, we are too apt to picture to ourselves the Apostolic times as a golden age of a spotless Church. The Epistles to the Corinthians and Galatians are enough to destroy this illusion. But St. James's description is far beyond anything that can be imputed to the Christians of his time. It is, however, no exaggerated portrait of that state of Jerusalem which made the Temple (literally) a den of robbers. The well-known politico-religious party of the Zealots was probably at first a sincere brotherhood of enthusiasts, not unworthy of the Maccabees, whose era they hoped to revive. Their zeal, we may believe, was for God, though they misread the leadings of His providence, and did not recognise His kingdom as it came. Such a one Judas of Galilee (of Gamala, the Gaulonite) may have been, whose insurrection in the time of the Census (Acts v. 37; Joseph. 'Antt.' xviii. 1, 1 and 6) marks the popular consciousness of the utter departure of the sceptre from Judah. Such, certainly, was Simon the Zealot—Canaanite, or Cananean, is a name formed from the corresponding Hebrew kannâ (Exod. xx. 5)—so called, doubtless, from his former associations. Such was Saul of Tarsus (though he was of the school of Gamaliel, grandson of that Hillel who gave his name to the moderate party), a zealot for God and the traditions of the fathers (Acts xxii. 3; Gal. i. 14;—see Introduction to the Acts, vol. ii. 337). And St. James himself says (Acts xxi. 20) of the "many myriads" of believers at Jerusalem that they were all "zealots of the law." But while many became Christians, the Zealots, as a body, became associated, and popularly identified, with the dagger-men (sicarii, Acts xxi. 38), or murderers, in the Jewish war. Josephus uses the names as convertible in describing the bands of Eleazar (a descendant of Judas of Galilee), John of Giscala, and Simon, son of Gioras ('B. J.' ii. 17, 9; vii. 8, 1 and 2, &c.). But it must be remembered that they were Josephus' bitter enemies. This bastard "zeal," or "zealotry," developed itself in two directions during the times of anarchy. In some, it became bloody fanaticism; to others it was a mere cloak for rapine, murder, and all brutality. The doings of the Zealots are the crowning horrors of the siege of Jerusalem. The mischief had not yet reached its climax; for before that came, St. James "the Just" himself became their victim. But this is probably the allusion in his words: and if these may be fairly rendered ye play the murderers (sicarii) and zealots, there will be no lack of force in them.

(B.) Verses 5, 6.

The interpretations of this passage are beyond numbering. Referring, therefore, once for all, to the condensed summary in Theile, 'Comm. in Ep. Jac.,' pp. 213-229, let us enquire what points may be considered as accepted. These will guide us to the general result.

1. The word or (omitted in A.V.) carries us back to verse 4, "Know ye not that . . . , or do ye think:" so that "the Scripture" (whether quoted, or only referred to) is something equivalent to the foregoing clause; the alternatives being that the world's friendship is God's enmity, or that the Scripture speaks in vain. A note of interrogation should therefore follow λέγει. It is indeed objected that λέγει must then be translated "speaks," not "says" (as neuter, not transitive); and that this is contrary to usage. But (a) in Heb. ix. 5, περὶ ὧν οὐκ ἔστι νῦν λέγειν κατὰ μέρος, it is simply "to speak." Besides, (b) the verb has an intermediate use, especially where it refers to something going before, meaning "to say this, to say so." So in the parenthetic clause "I speak (or say this) as a man," Rom. iii. 5, vi. 19; and cp. 1 Cor. x. 15, xv. 34; 2 Cor. vii. 3, viii. 8, xi. 21 (in Gal. iii. 15, the reference seems to be to what follows). And though the words usually introduce a quotation, they may refer to something already stated. Moreover, an appeal to the authority of Scripture, to confirm a foregoing general statement, does not imply a verbal quotation of any one passage, but may be taken as a summary of the general teaching of Scripture (e.g. in Rom. ii. 24; cp. 1 Kings ii. 3; Matt. xvi. 24; Mark ix. 13); whereas, when the words "it is written," or the like, stand first, they must be followed by an actual quotation.

2. Now the words which here follow ἡ γραφή λέγει cannot be found in form or even in substance, either in the O. T., or (as has been attempted) in the N. T. Perhaps Deut. xxxii. 21, seqq., and Isai. lxiii. 7-11, come nearest. But all attempts at identification fail. And the suggestion that the writer means to quote Prov. iii. 34, but after the words "the Scripture saith" interpolates a paraphrase of his quotation, which then follows with "wherefore He saith," in verse 6, needs no refutation.

3. Again, the ordinary rules of construction require that ἐπιποθεῖ (verse 5) and δίδωσι χάριν (verse 6) should have the same nominative case. If ἡ γραφή λέγει . . . μίζωσα δὲ δίδωσι χάριν are assumed as correlatives, the result is a mere false antithesis. And if ἀνθρώποις (the true reading, as A, B, W) is balanced with μ. δὲ δίδωσι χάριν, this is equally false; the real antithesis being between πρὸς φθόνον ἐπιποθεῖ and δίδωσι χάριν. Again, δίδωσι χάριν, occurring twice in verse 6, must have the same meaning both times; whence it follows, that θεός (suggested by θεοῦ ἔχθρα, θεοῦ ἐχθρός in verse 4) is the nominative to all three verbs, ἐπιποθεῖ . . . δίδωσι . . . δίδωσι.

4. If then θεός be the nominative to ἐπιποθεῖ, the verb must be used in a good sense, as it is everywhere else in N. T., Rom. i. 11; 2 Cor. v. 2, ix. 14; Phil. i. 8, ii. 26; 1 Th. iii. 6; 2 Tim. i. 4; 1 Pet. ii. 2; and so ἐπιποθεῖα, Rom. xv. 23; ἐπιπόθητος, Phil. iv. 1; ἐπιπόθησις (note its connexion with such words as ἀγανάκτησις, φόβος, ζῆλος, ἐκδίκησις) 2 Cor. vii. 7, 11. It is therefore not "to lust" (as it seems to be in Eccles. xxv. 21, and perhaps in Ps. lxii. (lxi.) 11, LXX), but "to long affectionately, passionately for" a person or thing.

Proceeding from these data we must understand τὸ πνεῦμα as an accusative after ἐπιποθεῖ, meaning not the Divine Person, but the Spirit which God has given us. If κατήκησεν were read, it would be the Holy Ghost dwelling in us, and might be the nominative; but this would produce confusion between πνεῦμα and θεός, as subjects of the verbs, and would require ἡμᾶς to be awkwardly supplied after ἐπιποθεῖ.

Omitting for the present the words πρὸς φθόνον, we find the dominant idea throughout to be contained in the word "adulteresses" in verse 4. And the allusion in ἡ γραφή λέγει is to the virtual identity between the friendship of the world and the enmity of God, as exhibited throughout the whole of the O. T. history, and enforced in the continual assertion of God's claim to the exclusive love and devotion of those whom He takes to be His own ("Thou shalt have no other gods before Me;"—"Hear, O Israel, the LORD our God is one LORD; and thou shalt love the LORD thy God with all thine heart," &c., Exod. xx. 3; Deut. vi. 4, &c., adopted and ratified by CHRIST in His discourses); and especially in those frequent passages where the prophets use the figures of human love, wedlock, and adultery. Note on the one hand the combination of impurity with idolatry in the false worship to which the Israelites were tempted; and on the other the significant punishment of the adulterer under the law of Moses. God was wedded to His people. Therefore, His was a jealous love; and the love of the world was infidelity to Him.

Thus understood, "the Spirit" for which God craves so peremptorily, is not that which He breathed into man on the day of creation, but that which He makes ours when the Holy Ghost imparts to us the gift of Himself, to dwell in us, moulding and informing our spirits, and making our bodies His temples by His presence;—yet so, that it is still possible for us to lose Him, by grieving Him and doing Him despite (Eph. iv. 30; Heb. x. 29). Compare Rom. viii. 23–27, for the strivings of the Holy Spirit for and in those who “have the first-fruits of the Spirit,”—He who dwells within them struggling to retain His place, while the contest goes on between the deep love of GOD to man, and that necessity (so to speak) of His perfect holiness which must destroy the defiler (or destroyer) of His temple (1 Cor. iii. 17).

But what are we to say of the phrase πρὸς φθόνον? It cannot be translated “against envy.” Most modern commentators render it, “even unto jealousy.” This is simple; and few would question it, if the ideas of φθόνος and ζήλος were philosophically identical. Usually, however, they are contrasted; see Aristot. Rhet. ii. 11: (φθονερὸν τὸ θεῖον, the heathen maxim in Herod. i. 32, &c., is altogether different, ascribing to the Deity a grudge against man’s excessive prosperity). And yet the words “GOD craveth for the Spirit, which He hath made to dwell in us, even to the point of—φθόνος,” are such as to make any other interpretation still more difficult; so that we must submit to interpret φθόνος, not indeed as = ζήλος, but as that into which ζήλος passes, when the provocation reaches the extreme point. For there is a relation between jealousy and envy; though jealousy presupposes love, whereas envy implies hate. Both are combined in Plato, Symp. 213 D (cp. also Phaedr. 243 C); and though one shrinks from quoting such passages in connexion with St. James’s thought,—for they describe the insanity of unruly passion venting itself in spiteful tricks,—yet the words ζηλοτυπῶν καὶ φθονῶν, “jealous and envious,” are so coupled as to shew that the contrast of their meanings is sometimes lost sight of.

Thus the fundamental idea is, as before, the wedded bond between God and His people, dissoluble only by such profligate faithlessness as in human nature would turn love to hate, but here combines in one, love and hate, passionate yearning and envy (ἐπιποθεῖ πρὸς φθόνον); as if nothing short of such a startling paradox could shadow forth the combination of the Divine attributes,—the love that is jealous, the jealousy that slays: see Deut. vi. 15; and cp. ib. xxxii. 11 (LXX), where ἐπιποθεῖν occurs, followed (in verses 15–22) by the apostasy of Israel and the fury of God’s vengeance. That affection, which in its purity is Love, becomes, when suspicion is roused, jealousy; and, when the apostasy of the spouse is certain and irremediable, is changed into something still more terrible, of which the deadly workings are described in sundry portions of Holy Writ (e. g. Deut. ii. cc.; Ezek. xxiii., &c.); and which seems to be here expressed, for want of a more accurate word, by “envy;”—being the passion into which jealousy changes, when certainty supersedes suspicion, “for the Lord thy God is a consuming fire, even a jealous God” (Deut. iv. 24). This is indeed a figure of speech most strange and startling in its application to God and His Holy Spirit! Yet our choice among all the renderings which have been proposed, seems to lie only between this and one other, not very different from the A. V., but treating, as above, ἡ γραφή λέγει as a question:—“The spirit which God gave to dwell in us carries its longings even to envy (see verses 1, 2, “wars, fightings, . . . from your lusts”): but He, who gave that spirit, gives all the more abundant grace to control it; wherefore,” &c. This gets rid of the difficulty in the translation of φθόνος: but it creates several others, some of which have already been considered in detail. It connects the thought exclusively with verses 1–3, so that the mention of the friendship of the world in verse 4 loses its importance, and all reference to the bond of spiritual wedlock and its violation disappears. Consequently it requires the adoption of the inferior reading, “ye adulterers and adulteresses;” and these words must then be used in their literal, not their spiritual sense. The omission of the nominative before μείζονα δὲ δίδωσι χάριον becomes on this view intolerable. The balance of God’s resistance to the overweening and His graciousness to the humble is injured: for He is represented solely in His attribute of mercy, even while sinners are still impenitent; whereas St. James depicts the terrors of the LORD as enhanced, to those that brave them, by the mercies which have been rejected; he shadows forth the great war against the Evil One and the world which is in bondage to him: and he shews that we must take one side or the other, because we cannot be the friends of God and of the world. But if we choose the world’s love, we are more than mere enemies of God. Because we have enjoyed His love, we are rebels, apostates, ay, adulterous spouses.

CHAPTER V.

- 1 Wicked rich men are to fear God's vengeance.
 7 We ought to be patient in afflictions, after the example of the prophets, and Job: 12 to forbear swearing, 13 to pray in adversity, to sing in prosperity: 16 to acknowledge mutually our several faults, to pray one for another, 19 and to reduce a straying brother to the truth.

CHAP. V. 1. Go to now.] See on iv. 13, where the rebuke was directed against those who hasted to be rich, and made sure of living to gain their object. Here St. James turns abruptly to those who are rich, only thinking of themselves, careless of charity, humanity, or even justice. The common feature of the two classes is their presumption in boasting of the morrow.

In ii. 2-7, the entrance of a rich man into a Christian assembly leads to the thought of the treatment of the poor believer by the rich; but it is not certain that the rich man is represented as a professing Christian (see note). And many think that the burst of indignation here is not directed against those to whom St. James is writing (the customary "Brethren" does not occur from iv. 13 to v. 6 inclusive), but is to be understood like the denunciations of the enemies of God's people (which it so much resembles) in the Books of the Prophets; the point of application lying in the concluding exhortation to patience (verse 7), in the confidence that the time of the oppressor is short. See the same suggestion in 2 Thess. i. 5, seqq. But the subject is wider. The disciples of St. James in becoming Christians had not ceased to be Jews. They were members not only of the nation, but of the Church which was co-extensive with it. They had received an additional revelation, but not a call to sever themselves (so long as they were not violently severed) from the commonwealth of Israel. The Church at Jerusalem was the Society of those Israelites who were true to their God, listening to His revelations, believing on Him whose coming had been so long looked for. They were, in this sense, the true Israel, the element of vitality in a mass which it was still possible that they might leave. (See Bouman, pp. 37-39.) Note the words spoken by St. James to St. Paul in Acts xxi. 20-24, and his submission to them, ib. 26; and the broad distinction made between the Jews and the Gentiles which had believed (ib. 20-25). This denunciation of woe (for such it is, rather than a call to repentance) is addressed to persons who were still formally within the pale of God's Church along with "the election," "the true Israel," though they were cutting themselves off from

GO to now, ye rich men, weep and howl for your miseries that shall come upon you.

2 Your riches are corrupted, and your garments are moth-eaten.

3 Your gold and silver is cankered; and the rust of them shall be a witness against you, and shall eat your it (v. Rom. x. xi.). The night was fast closing in upon them, but their day of grace was not wholly past. (See Introduction, ii.)

Even to eyes devoid of prophetic speculation, the coming miseries must have been casting their shadows darkly forward at this time, in the preparations for the siege of Jerusalem. The key to this paragraph is Christ's discourse in Matt. xxiv.; and "the last days," "the coming of the Lord," must be interpreted according to the general analogy of Apostolic thought on this subject, the times and the seasons remaining unrevealed (ib. 36). The tribulations are those which usher in the kingdom of Christ in glory; comfortless to such as look not for Him, but birth-pangs of joy (ὠδίνων, ib. 8; cp. John xvi. 21) to those who do; affecting the whole Dispersion—indeed all the Believers throughout the world—as well as the Jews of Jerusalem; because in the expectation of the Apostolic Christians her destruction was connected not only typically, but actually, with the Judgment Day.

that shall come upon you.] That are coming upon you (cp. Luke xxi. 26, 35), either "soon," or "suddenly;" probably, both.

2. Your riches are corrupted.] The general term comes first; particulars are specified afterwards. These riches are not to be thought of as stores of merchandise (which would rather belong to iv. 13-15). The wealth of the ancients was of a miscellaneous sort, consisting not merely of the precious metals, but of more perishable things. Cp. what Horace (Epist. i. 6. 40) says of Lucullus. It is still the Oriental fashion to heap up garments, shawls, carpets, and all manner of stuffs, as the furniture of a princely house. See Matt. xxii. 11, 12, where it is implied that wedding-garments were provided for the king's guests. Such wealth as this was liable to corruption and decay, and especially to the ravages of the moth. Similar allusions are found in Matt. vi. 19, seqq.; Job xiii. 28; Isai. l. 9, li. 8.

3.] Gold and silver are not, strictly speaking, liable to "canker" or "rust." But they are liable to be so tarnished as to justify the use of the words; cp. the Epistle of Jere-flesh as it were fire. Ye have heaped treasure together for the last days.

4 Behold, the hire of the labourers who have reaped down your fields, which is of you kept back by fraud, crieth: and the cries of them which have reaped are entered into the ears of the Lord of sabaoth.

5 Ye have lived in pleasure on the earth, and been wanton; ye have nourished your hearts, as in a day of slaughter.

6 Ye have condemned and killed the just; and he doth not resist you.

7 ¹Be patient therefore, breth- ^{1 Or, Be long pa-} as it were fire.] By some, these words are thrown into the next sentence—"treasured up, as it were, fire" (cp. Prov. xvi. 27 in LXX); but not so well. Cp. "our God is a consuming fire," Heb. xii. 29, from Deut. iv. 24. The glowing metal itself (perhaps in the form of fetters, unconsciously hugged by the greedy) is thought of as clinging, consuming the living flesh. After this comes a fresh thought. Men lay up treasure for the future; but these did it "in (not for) the last days." This is spoken as if from the very last day of all. When the end came, it found them heaping up treasures which they could never use. See Matt. xxiv. 38, Luke xvii. 26, 28, of the days of Noah and Lot; and the parable of the rich fool in Luke xii. 16, seqq.

4. the hire of the labourers.] The Mosaic law was very jealous for the rights of those who had nothing but their labour: see Levit. xix. 13; Deut. xxiv. 14, seq. But the rebukes in Jerem. xxii. 13; Mal. iii. 5 (cp. Job xxiv. 6, seqq.; Tobit iv. 14; Ecclus. xxxiii. 30 seq.) shew the neglect of the duty. The ill-gotten gear crieth (like the blood of Abel, the sin of Sodom and Gomorrah, Gen. iv. 10, xviii. 20, xix. 13); cp. Habak. ii. 11; Luke xix. 40. And the ears of the Lord are open to the cry, as in the Egyptian bondage (Exod. ii. 23). Those who have no earthly protector have Him; the Lord of Sabaoth, the Lord of Hosts is His name. The Hebrew Sabaoth, preserved also in Rom. ix. 29, from the LXX, unites the ideas of might and glory; the angelic hosts being connected with the revelation of Sinai (Deut. xxxiii. 2; Ps. lxxviii. 17), and with the Last Judgment (Dan. vii. 10; Matt. xxv. 31; 2 Thess. i. 7; Jude 14). Cp. LXX, Isai. v. 9.

fields.] The word implies large tracts of land, latifundia, as in John iv. 35; Luke xii. 16.

5. Ye have lived . . . ye have nourished.] Read, ye lived . . . ye nourished, and so in next verse, ye condemned. The tenses are emphatic. St. James speaks as if in retrospect from the Judgment Day: "Ye did thus and thus: but it is all over now!" "Ye lived in luxury and wantonness. (1 Tim. v. 6); ye nourished, pampered your hearts" (Acts xiv. 17). If "as in a day of slaughter" be read, the "slaughter" must refer to the preparations for feasting; cp. Isai. xxii. 12, 13; Jer. xii. 3. But, omitting "as" (so A, B, N*, 13, Vulg., Memph.), their own slaughter is probably indicated. There is here an echo of Christ's teaching in Luke xii. 16-21, xvi. 19-31; see too Ecclus. xiii.

6. Ye condemned (not have condemned and), ye killed the Just (or Righteous One.) Suggested by Christ's words, Matt. xxiii. 35 (cp. δικαίων . . . τοῦ δικαίου . . . ἐφονεύσατε there), of the sin of the Jews, from age to age, in killing the prophets of God; till in the fulness of time, when God sent His own Son, they slew Him also (ib. xxi. 33, seqq.; Luke xiii. 33, seq.) The idea had been so distinctly developed in Wisd. ii. 10-20, that that passage must have been accepted as a Messianic prophecy, if it had not been recognised as a summary of prophecies already extant, the religious instincts of the people forecasting the shape in which these should be fulfilled. When thus led up to the Person towards whom all prophecy converged, we cannot accept the series of historical details without seeing here that event, the great Antitype of all, which shews us the significance of the rest—the one bloodshedding, to which all the others point; in short, the death of the only Victim to whom the title of "the Just, the Righteous One" belongs (Acts iii. 14, vii. 52, xxii. 14; cp. 1 John ii. 1). Cp. Bp. Jebb's 'Sacred Literature,' xiii. pp. 258-267.

he doth not resist you.] (Omit "and." Compare Isai. liii. 7, and see Matt. v. 39, xxvi. 63, xxvii. 12-14; 1 Pet. ii. 21, seqq.

It is miserably inadequate to give "wearied and harassed to death" as the equivalent of "condemned . . . murdered;" and can only be accounted for by the persuasion that St. James was here denouncing a sin which the Christians had committed. But see note supra, v. 1. True, the Jews of the Dispersion first, or, sufferer, with long patience. ren, unto the coming of the Lord. Behold, the husbandman waiteth for the precious fruit of the earth, and hath long patience for it, until he receive the early and latter rain.

8 Be ye also patient; stablish your hearts: for the coming of the Lord draweth nigh.

9 'Grudge not one against another, brethren, lest ye be condemned: behold, the judge standeth before the door.

¹Or, Groan, or, Grieve not.

10 Take, my brethren, the pro-had had no part in this particular act; but in this the national sin had culminated, and from this the thought goes on to the various other sins, which differed rather in degree than in kind. The crucifixion of Christ was a sin representative of a class.

A very few years later, St. James himself followed his Lord, being murdered at Jerusalem by those very Jews who had given him the surname of "the Just," or "the Righteous," and called him "the Bulwark of the people." See Introduction, i. 2.

7. Be patient.] Or, "long-suffering," as elsewhere translated, whether in expectation (Heb. vi. 15) or in endurance: here in both. Used of God, as bearing with sinners and delaying vengeance, in Rom. ii. 4, &c.

Herder remarks the pathos with which, at the very climax, when instant vengeance was to be looked for, the curtain falls with "Patience, brethren, patience!" But the words "therefore" here, and "be ye also patient," in verse 8, imply a connexion, not a transition. They recall the attitude of the Christ before His murderers; see the prophecy and the history (Isai. liii. 7; Matt. xxvii. 12-14; cp. Rom. xii. 19, seqq.; 1 Pet. ii. 19, seqq., iii. 17, seqq.) But all this has its limit. "Patience, until the coming of the Lord: He will redress the balance, if, meanwhile, you imitate His meekness and patience!" See 2 Thess. i. 6, 7, where St. Paul joins comfort to the sufferers with terrors to the enemy. The "coming" is Christ's, and the whole passage refers to Him; therefore He is the Lord here spoken of, though St. James uses that title both of the Father and the Son. His Second Advent is indicated vaguely; perhaps dimly conceived of; for we know that the "times" were hidden even from those to whom so much was revealed; cp. Matt. xxiv. 27, 36; but it must have been recognised, in type and germ at least, in the approaching day of Jerusalem.

the husbandman.] See the parable, Matt. xiii. 39. The point of comparison here is that faith in the future which makes all present trials bearable. So St. Paul treats husbandry as a work of faith, even faith (virtually) in the Resurrection of the dead, 1 Cor. ix. 10, xv. 36, seqq.; cp. also Eccles. vi. 19.

until be receive.] Rather, "until it receive."

early and latter rain.] Often mentioned in the O. T., e. g. Deut. xi. 14; Jer. v. 24; Hos. vi. 3; and especially Joel ii. 23: "the former rain, and the latter rain in the first month"; the "early rain" falling in the early part of the civil year, about October, soon after seed-time; "the latter" at the beginning of the ecclesiastical year, about March. The former made the seed sprout, the latter filled the ears before the ripening. It is to be remembered that "the first fruits" were offered in the Temple service on the morrow of the Paschal Sabbath, i. e. on the day of Christ's Resurrection (Levit. xxiii. 10, 11; cp. 1 Cor. xv. 20).

8. also.] I. e. as Christ was; as "therefore," in verse 7.

stablish your hearts.] Brace, nerve them to endure all that comes between; cp. 1 Thess. iii. 13. The prospect of the Lord's coming makes this easy, for it is at hand (as the word is rightly translated in Matt. iii. 2; Mark i. 15).

9. lest ye be condemned.] Or, judged (as all the best authorities); see Matt. vii. 1, which suggests the idea of passing sentence on our brethren, as included in grudge (marg. groan, or grieve). But probably, the thought is, "If ye grieve under ill-usage, yet let it not be as invoking vengeance on those who use you ill." Long-suffering has the promise of the reward; the want of it becomes uncharitableness, and therefore is "in danger of the judgment." The Judge (i. e. the Lord at His coming), who is already at the door (Matt. xxiv. 33; Mark xiii. 29, and especially Rev. iii. 20), ready to avenge His own elect, will judge you, if your faith and charity fail; v. Matt. v. 39; Rom. xii. 19, on the one side; and Luke xviii. 7, 8; 2 Thess. i. 6; 1 Peter iv. 19, on the other.

10. who have spoken.] Who spake.

in the name of the Lord.] The idea of "prophet" is of one who speaks in the name of God: not out of his own heart, but as he is moved by the Holy Ghost (2 Peter i. 21). This exhortation carries us back to Matt. v. 11, 12, "Blessed are ye (μακάριοι, as μακαρίζομεν here) . . . when men shall perphets, who have spoken in the name of the Lord, for an example of suffering affliction, and of patience.

11 Behold, we count them happy which endure. Ye have heard of the patience of Job, and have seen the end of the Lord; that the Lord is very pitiful, and of tender mercy.

12 But above all things, my brethren, swear not, neither by heaven, neither by the earth, neither by any other oath: but let your yea be yea; and your nay, nay; lest ye fall into condemnation.

13 Is any among you afflicted? let him pray. Is any merry? let him sing psalms.

secute you . . . for so persecuted they the prophets which were before you." See this amplified, Heb. xi. 1—xii. 11, especially xi. 32—38. From all this, as well as the reference to Job in verse 11, it is plain that the "prophets" are those of the Old Dispensation, not of the Apostolic age.

of suffering affliction, and of patience.] Not one idea (as of suffering with patience), but two; "of the sufferings which you are to expect, because they are the badge of your profession (2 Tim. iii. 12); and of the spirit in which they must be borne;" the first being the more prominent in Matt. l. c., the second here. "May you not be content, if you are dealt with as they were? Must you not rejoice, if your reward is like theirs?" See 2 Cor. iv. 17.

11. them . . . which endure.] This would comprise not only the prophets above-mentioned, but all who follow their faith and share their trials. But the better-attested reading (A, B, N, Vulg., Syr.) is, "who endured." From Matt. x. 22, we supply "to the end." In these instances the reward was not in this world, but it was a matter of faith that in God's mercy the sufferings would not always remain unrecompensed; cp. 2 Thess. i. 5, seqq. But the example of Job was recorded and "heard of" (Job xlii. 7, seqq.; Ezek. xiv. 14; see Tobit ii. 12—15, in the Vulgate).

have seen the end of the Lord.] These words, which in themselves might refer to the example of our Lord in His Passion, must from the context mean the conclusion with which God crowned the trials of Job. The words "that the Lord is," &c., are added by way of explanation.

very pitiful.] Literally, "abounding in bowels of compassion."

It has been asked why St. James limits himself to O. T. examples, and does not refer to our Lord's Passion. Answer—(1) he has already done so in verses 6, 7; (2) he is writing with his mind full of the Sermon on the Mount, v. 10 being suggested by Matt. v. 10—12, and v. 12 being a paraphrase of ib. 33—37.

12.] The parallelism between this and Matt. v. 33—37 (omitting the reasons given by Christ for each precept) is as follows:—

ST. MATTHEW.	ST. JAMES.
Swear not at all, neither by heaven . . . : nor by the earth . . . ;	Swear not, neither by heaven, neither by the earth, neither by Jerusalem . . . ;	neither by any other oath :
neither shalt thou swear by thy head . . . ;
but let your communication be yea, yea : and nay, nay : for whatsoever is more than these cometh of evil.	but let your yea be yea, and your nay, nay : lest ye fall into condemnation.

That which St. James makes prominent in the last clause is implicitly contained in St. Matthew: "Say Yea, yea; Nay, nay; and nothing more." Again, "Let your yea stand simply and surely for yea; and your nay for nay. Say no more than you mean: make it clear that you mean precisely what you say." The conclusion in each case corresponds with its antecedent—(1) "nothing more: for that is evil;" (2) "nothing different, lest ye be condemned." Note that the vain use of God's name is not noticed in either passage, though Christ (l. c.) shews how all swearing whatsoever contains a virtual appeal to Him. Hence it would seem that both these warnings refer, not to the confirmation of the truth by a solemn appeal to God on due occasion, but to a habit of using oaths lightly in business or conversation, especially (if we take the position of this verse into account) under irritating circumstances. In St. Matthew, an exhortation against revenge of injuries follows, and here patience is inculcated in verses 7—11; verse 12 may connect these with the "afflictions," &c., of verse 13, "Bear evil patiently: let no irritation, however natural, under wrong or suffering shew itself in swearing (again note the importance attached to sins of the tongue!). Affliction must vent itself in prayer, as cheerfulness in praise." See the passage from Bp. Sanderson on 'Oaths' vii. 11; (Works iv. p. 356, seqq.), quoted by Bp. Wordsworth here. In 2 Cor. i. 17—20, there are some remarkable verbal coincidences with this passage. But while the thought in St. James and St. Matthew is nearly the same,

14 Is any sick among you? let him call for the elders of the church; and let them pray over him, anointing him with oil in the name of the Lord:

15 And the prayer of faith shall save the sick, and the Lord shall raise him up; and if he have committed sins, they shall be forgiven him.

St. Paul is dwelling on the combination of yea AND nay—faith and doubt, assurance and uncertainty; “yea” being that which is, the objective truth (cp. Amen, as a name of Christ, in Rev. iii. 14), while “nay” is its negative and contradictory. So Shakspeare, ‘King Lear,’ iv. 6, “To say Ay and No, to every thing I said! Ay and No too was no good divinity!”

13. afflicted!] The word elsewhere in N. T. is used of outward suffering (cp. 2 Tim. ii. 3, 9, iv. 5); here (in contrast with “merry”) of the inward sense of suffering. The remedy is Prayer: not necessarily to obtain the removal of the trial, but at any rate for the increase of faith, to raise the spirits, so that we be comforted (confortari) and of good cheer. Mirth (in the modern sense of the word) is not meant; but a temper cheerful, faithful, and hopeful, to sustain us while work is still to be done. See Acts xxvii. 22, 25, 36, for the courage imparted by St. Paul to his shipmates. The “afflicted” and the “merry” may be the same persons, first praying to God to remove their burden, and, when He has heard their prayers, singing to Him with thanksgiving. “Psalms and hymns and spiritual songs” are joined with thanksgivings as the outpourings of Christian joy in Eph. v. 19, the Psalter of David having for ever stamped the word with its religious meaning among Jews and Christians. So, “I will pray . . . I will sing” . . . 1 Cor. xiv. 15, seqq.

Are these clauses interrogative, “Is any sick,” &c.? or hypothetical, “Put the case, sick is,” &c.? The difference is very slight, but the latter form seems rather the more vivid, and connects itself more clearly with the foregoing verses. There is the same doubt in 1 Cor. vii. 18.

14. Is any sick . . .] See last note. Some limit this to such sicknesses as have been sent to punish the sins mentioned in verse 15 (see note there, and cp. 1 Cor. xi. 30). We recognise, indeed, the mysterious connexion of all suffering with sin in a world which has been put out of joint by the Fall. But this very truth disproves the limitation. Besides, in verse 15, it is, “if he have committed sins,” which cannot refer to all the cases here mentioned.

the elders of the church.] Doubtless within this body of “presbyters” were found (though not exclusively) all the miraculous gifts of the Spirit, and especially that of healing. But the words point not to certain gifted individuals, as such, but to a solemn visit of the Body, as the representatives—in ecclesiastical language, the “Persons”—of the Church of which they are the ministers. So they are joined with the Apostles in Acts xv. 6, 22, 23; cp. 1 Peter v. 1.

let them pray over him.] We seem to see them bending over the bedridden man (cp. Luke iv. 39 with Matt. viii. 14) while they pray for him; cp. too Acts xix. 13. It has been thought that the imposition of hands along with prayer is implied. Not improbable in itself; but not contained in the words.

anointing him with oil.] So Mark vi. 13: “They (the Twelve) anointed with oil many that were sick, and healed them.” Isai. i. 6, and Luke x. 34, are referred to for the healing properties of oil and its use. But the use of oil as an outward sign in these cases belongs to its more extensive use as a religious symbol, e.g. in the unction of King, Priest, Prophet, as well as of the vessels of the sanctuary; see Exod. xxx. 23–33; Ps. cxxxiii. 2, &c. Hence the name MESSIAH, CHRIST, THE ANOINTED ONE (Ps. ii. 2, &c.). And this anointing symbolised the unction of the Holy Spirit, 1 Sam. x. 1, 9, xvi. 12, seq.; cp. Isai. lxi. 1 (Luke iv. 18); Acts x. 38; 2 Cor. i. 21, seq.; 1 John ii. 20, 27. We are within the sphere of the Holy Spirit’s manifestation of Himself in visible miracles: yet all in orderly gradation. Christ spoke the word, and a miracle was wrought. His Apostles spoke, as a rule, in His name, with the same result. These elders do not speak as having authority, but “pray,” and “the prayer of faith” is the means of healing. Christ Himself sometimes used outward symbols, e.g. John ix. 6, 11. Some suggest “medicated oils,” but common sense shews us that something is described here utterly different from the ordinary blessing of God on medical appliances.

in the name of the Lord.] Not to be joined with “pray,” but with “anointing,” the name of Christ being the power which made the outward symbol a means of grace; see the confession of the Apostles in Acts iii. 16, iv. 10–12.

15. the prayer of faith.] Note how the 16 Confess your faults one to another, and pray one for another, that ye may be healed. The effectual fervent prayer of a righteous man availeth much.

17 Elias was a man subject to like passions as we are, and he prayed earnestly that it might not rain: ^{1 Or, in prayer.} and it rained not on the earth by the space of three years and six months.

condition of faith is connected with Christ's miracles of healing, just as with the forgiveness of sins; because all evil, spiritual and physical, flows from one source and is healed by one Saviour. The want of faith was an obstacle to healing (Mark vi. 5, seq.), as it is to salvation. In Matt. ix. 2, He seems to accept the faith of those who brought the paralytic to Him; but we may take for granted the patient's own faith. And here, though the prayer is that of the elders, the sick man has shewn his faith in calling for them (verse 14). See the promise in Matt. xxi. 22; Mark xi. 22, seqq.

save.] Used, as in some of the above references, of bodily healing, the "forgiveness" coming later.

the Lord.] Christ, as in verse 14.

raise him up.] From the bed of sickness, as in Acts ix. 34, &c.

and if he have committed sins.] Possibly, referring to a sickness sent as the punishment of sin. "If he has brought his sickness on himself by sinning;" see John v. 14; 1 Cor. xi. 30. If the sickness be only bodily, it shall be healed; if spiritual also, his sins shall be forgiven; both alike through faith.

they shall be forgiven him.] Literally, "It shall" i.e. the commission of them.

Very few words are necessary on the subject of the authority supposed to be derived from this verse for the so-called sacrament of Extreme Unction in the Romish Church. To quote the title, "Extreme Unction" (sacramentum exeuntium) is enough. For the unction of St. James is primarily and distinctively for the healing of the sick.

16.] Verse 15 treated of the functions of the Church's ministers. But though its collective life and spiritual energy take form and action in the persons of these elders, every member has his vocation and ministry; the same duty extends, the like blessing is promised to all; through the sympathy of all the members each one works for good, and receives it (1 Cor. xii. 12-27, especially 26). The words one to another carry us from the elders to the whole body: all can give, and all can receive, this benefit.

Confess your faults.] Cp. Rom. x. 9, seq. As that confession avouched the reality of belief, so this the reality of penitence. Moreover, it is right that others, who may have been cognisant of the sin, should be equally aware of the repentance; and that the penitent should have the help of all their prayers;—objects not attained by confession under the seal of secrecy.

healed.] Bodily ailments are seldom mentioned in the N. T. without reference to spiritual things; compare the use of the verb "to save," and see 1 Peter ii. 24, "By whose stripes ye were healed." Here both the "sickness" and the "sin" are included: the Spiritual and the Material, the soul and the body, being alike recognised and honoured in Holy Writ.

A cheering apophthegm winds up the exhortation, "Great is the force of a righteous man's prayer, when urgent;"—not merely "in its working," for the place which the word holds at the end of the sentence in the original is emphatic. Not as if the prayers of the righteous are ever likely to be slack; but this is a special zeal, a special emotion and fervour of heart, an agony of prayer, such as takes Heaven by storm (Matt. xi. 12, &c.) Observe this in Christ's prayer at Gethsemane, Luke xxii. 44; Heb. v. 7; and cp. Col. iv. 12, "Labouring fervently (Gr. "agonizing") for you in prayers." See also Col. i. 29; 1 Cor. xii. 6, 10, 11, of God "working mightily" in us, and of the operations of the Holy Ghost in gifts of miracles.

17. subject to like passions.] Of like nature, feelings, or affections, perhaps also "temptations;" so that, notwithstanding the awe with which he impresses us, there is no gulf between us and him, that we should not do what he did. The caution is necessary, because Elijah was so far apart from other men in the whole course of his ministry, especially in his journey to Horeb and sojourn there, his ascension, his appearance at the Transfiguration, and his generally expected return to earth (Mal. iv. 5; Matt. xvii. 10, seqq.). Cp. Eccclus. xlviii. 1-12. The word (ὁμοιοπαθής) is used in Acts xiv. 15, where the Apostles assure the Lycaonians that they are men like themselves; also in Wisd. vii. 3, of our kindred earth.

that it might not rain.] In 1 Kings xvii. 1 Elijah announces the coming drought, but his prayer is not mentioned. The gift of rain is afterwards naturally connected with the prayer recorded in xviii. 36, seqq., and 18 And he prayed again, and the heaven gave rain, and the earth brought forth her fruit.

19 Brethren, if any of you do err from the truth, and one convert him ; implied ib. 42. The promise in xviii. 1 was an encouragement to pray for its early fulfilment. In 2 (4) Esdras vii. 39, his prayer is actually mentioned. The specification of three years and six months is remarkable. Lightfoot says that in 1 Kings xvii. 1, "these years" is plural, not dual; and he thence infers that they were three at the least. Ib. xviii. 1, has "in the third year;" but from what starting point? Probably from the first actual signs of serious drought, which would not occur for some time after the end of the ordinary rainy season—perhaps "at the end of days," when the brook dried up (xvii. 7, Marg.). This period of 3½ years was certainly familiar to the Jews; for Christ mentions it in connexion with Elijah's going to Sarepta (Luke iv. 25). Extant Jewish writings specify the same period. But there is also something mystical in it as a period of suffering—"a time, times, and a half;" "forty and two months;" a thousand two hundred and threescore days; the half of a prophetic week; see Dan. xii. 7; Rev. xi. 2, 3, xii. 6, xiii. 5; in Rev. xi. 6, the two witnesses, who have power to shut heaven, prophesy for the same period.

18. the heaven the earth.] The reversal of the denunciation in Levit. xxvi. 19; Deut. xxviii. 23. Palestine is described in Deut. xi. 11, as "a land of hills and valleys, that drinketh water of the rain of heaven." We can scarcely appreciate the extent to which in that country water is plenty and drought is famine. But our Indian empire may teach us. See note on iii. 11.

19.] Another practical precept to conclude with: abrupt, as regards the verses immediately preceding, but embodying that thought of the duty of brotherhood which runs like a golden thread through the tissue of the Epistle. It has been treated negatively, "Do the brethren no ill; repay no injuries" (v. 9, seqq.); then positively, "Minister to them, and pray with them for bodily and spiritual healing" (v. 14, seqq.); and now, lastly, "Seek them out; reclaim for Christ His lost sheep." This is the climax of love; more than brotherly, Christlike! In connexion with the exhortation to prayer, this may be looked on as praying with the hands, working as God's ministers towards the fulfilment of that which has been uttered by the lips.

err from the truth.] Cp. Gal. vi. 1. This must not be limited to the case of relapses either to Judaism or to the world and its corruptions. It is quite general. The "truth" may be doctrinal, or practical, or (most probably) both: St. James deals little with doctrine, except from a practical point of view. See the words, "error of his way," "sinner," in verse 20, and cp. John iii. 21; 1 John i. 6; 1 Cor. xiii. 6. But the reference is not to details, but to practical consequences of the abandonment of the principles of Christian doctrine by those whom "He begat with the Word of Truth" (i. 18).

20. Let him know.] In sense, this is impersonal = "be it known," i. e. "know, all of you" (B. has, know ye).

which converteth, &c.] Resuming the phrase in verse 19; see note there. But this verse rises from the particular instance to a declaration of the blessedness of all acts of the like character. Perhaps the words "a (not the) sinner" are intentionally substituted for "err from the truth," as at once more weighty and more general.

save a soul from death.] A greater work, a higher charity, than "to save (or heal) the sick;" for this is the death of a soul (Matt. x. 28); and the words carry us forward to the Judgment-Day.

hide sins.] According to a common Hebrew expression (see Ps. xxxii. 1, 2, quoted in Rom. iv. 7; also Ps. lxxxv. 2; Prov. x. 12), connected etymologically and symbolically with the cover of the ark, the mercy-seat (kāphar, kappôreth); v. Exod. xxv. 17-22. To hide them is to procure their forgiveness, in so far as God is pleased to give one of us influence over another's eternal lot. It can hardly mean "shall cloak his own sins," or even "shall have his own sins forgiven." The benefit is not represented as being directly repaid in kind to the agent. It is true that this recompense is offered in Matt. vi. 14. But to those whose exceeding great reward God Himself vouchsafes to be, He reveals a higher and purer blessing—that, like their Saviour, they "shall see of the travail of their soul" (Isai. liii. 11). Their joy shall be in this fruit of their labour, and they shall share, in their degree, the blessed work of Christ in hiding, blotting out sins, and saving souls from death.

Compare 1 Peter iv. 8, where, however, the context leaves it more doubtful whose are the sins that shall be covered.

And thus St. James concludes, as if saying that if but one soul were won to Christ by his Epistle he would be well repaid, and that he would have every Christian feel this, even as he himself felt it!

EXCURSUS.—ST. JAMES AND ST. PAUL

Much has been written on "the conflict" existing between St. James and St. Paul, especially with reference to James ii. 14-26. And various attempts have been made to reconcile them.

Yet it is probable that no such conflict really exists; because there is no such relation between their arguments as might produce it. The two lines neither cross nor touch one another. But it is not surprising that the idea should have been entertained. The appearance of opposition is very remarkable. Not to mention passages like Rom. iii. 20, 28, Gal. ii. 16, where "the works of the Law" are spoken of, and which, therefore, are less strictly applicable (for St. James does not mention these), St. Paul discusses (Rom. iv. 2-5, &c.) the instance of Abraham, prior by four centuries to the Law of Moses; and he denies the justifying power of works in Abraham's case. On the other side we have what St. J. says of the efficacy of "works," and of the inefficacy of "faith" without them (ii. 14, 17, 20, 26). And, as if to sharpen the antagonism, the instances of Abraham and Rahab (cited in Rom. iv. and Heb. xi.) are brought forward by St. J. in confirmation of his teaching.

2. The section of the Epistle to the Hebrews (xi. 8-19, 31) may, however, be set aside; not from any question of the authority of the Epistle, which, even by those who deny that St. P. actually wrote or dictated it, is generally admitted to have been the product of his immediate school, and to contain his teaching; but because, (1) throughout Ep. Hebr. ch. xi., the thing asserted of the Heroes of the Old Covenant is, not that they had faith, but that by faith they wrought this or that; according to the summary in v. 33, "who through faith subdued kingdoms, wrought righteousness," &c.; (2) there is nothing in the references to Abraham and Rahab in the two epistles so striking as to warrant the inference that the one passage is meant to contradict, or indeed in any way to refer to, the other. The bead-roll of saints in Heb. xi. is so extensive, that it would have been difficult to select a name suitable to St. J.'s argument, which was not contained in it. Abraham, the father of the faithful, could not be omitted.¹ Rahab is only one, and not a prominent example, among the many; nor is anything said of her in Heb. xi. 31, which is denied in Jam. ii. 25. Moreover, on a different ground there is a special reason why St. J. should mention Abraham and Rahab together, standing as they do at opposite poles—male and female—Jew and Gentile,—he the friend of God, she the sinner, the harlot. We must admit that an argument which is applicable to these extreme cases, must cover all that lies between them.²

3. It remains to consider the supposed opposition between the Epistles to the Romans (especially ch. iv.) and the Galatians, and that of St. James. Yet there is a previous question, which it is not easy to answer positively. Was St. J. acquainted with St. P.'s writings, or was he not?³ They are indeed referred to in St. Peter's second Epistle (iii. 15, 16), but, probably, at a later date than can be assigned to that of St. J. It has even been suggested that the spread of so-called "Pauline" doctrine among the churches over which St. J. presided, was the actual occasion of his writing. And this is chronologically possible, if he wrote his Epistle shortly before his death, A.D. 62 or 63. For the Epistle to the Romans is usually assigned to the early part of A.D. 58. At all events it belongs to the period specified in Acts xx. 3. But the following chapter of that book (xxi. 17-26), describes the relations between the two Apostles in a way which does not justify the suspicion of any doctrinal collision between them, although their characteristic differences are not disguised. On that, as on a former occasion (Gal. ii. 9; Acts xv. 13, seqq.), St. P. satisfied St. J. In proportion, however, as we are induced by other reasons to assign a late date to our Epistle, we may admit it as a probability that the errors of some who distorted St. P.'s teaching, may have had a share in calling forth St. J.'s rebukes. But there is no satisfactory, or even plausible, evidence of the imputed antagonism, unless the character and phraseology of the statements in the Epistle itself are construed as containing a deliberate attack on portions of St. P.'s writings and teaching.

² See J. C. K. v. Hofmann, 'Schrift-beweis,' i. p. 556, seqq.; Id. 'D. heil. Schrift untersucht,' vii. 3, p. 83.

³ Yes, according to Wiesinger, 'Einleitung,' p. 36, seqq.; No, say Huther, 'Einleitung,' § 5; Reuss, 'Théologie chrétienne,' ii. 257.

Now St. P.'s argument rests chiefly on the statement of the Old Testament, that Abraham's belief was counted unto him for righteousness, as being applicable only to one who had received this as a gift by favour, not as a reward for work. But this is the very starting-point of St. J. (ii. 23); who, however, adds that this saying was "fulfilled" (i.e. apparently, was revealed in its true significance, and received its complete historical ratification) at a later date, when the works which his faith wrought, proved how true the imputation had been.¹ "Thus," he says, in summing up, "a man is justified by works, not by faith isolated and by itself";² ch. ii. 18 and 20.

4 Everything depends on the right interpretation of the two words,—“faith,” and “justified.” Is it quite certain that they are used by the two writers in precisely the same sense?

First, of faith.

It must be remembered that St. J. attempts no analysis and gives no definition of this word. He does not enter into theological speculations. He continually betrays an utter distaste for all controversies, viewing them as mere impediments to the practice of simple Christian duty.³ “Non magna loquimur, sed vivimus,” might well have been his saying. His Epistle has been, not without some plausibility, described by Reuss as a protest against all controversy, almost against all theology except that of a holy life. His object is simply and severely practical.

But in the passages which are the foundation of his argument, and in which he seems to use the word “faith” in the same sense as St. P., he assumes it as the condition precedent to all else; e.g. i. 3, “the trying of your faith”; i. 6, “let him ask in faith, nothing wavering”; ii. 1, “have the faith of our Lord Jesus Christ,” &c.; ii. 5, “the poor in this world, rich in faith,” &c. All this adds point to the words “though a man say that he hath faith,” in ii. 14. Again, he asserts the regeneration by the free will and grace of God, through the Word of Truth, as an accomplished fact, i. 18; and exhorts Christians, as a consequence of this, to “receive with meekness the engrafted word, which is able to save their souls” (ib. 21).

5. But he has to do with men who assign a very different meaning to the word “faith.” He looks, not backward to the time when they were brought to believe in Christ, but around him, on the actual character and conduct of the converts, and forward to the consummation to which all is tending; and he sees many who profess to hold this foundation, but who nevertheless assert that, as they have “faith,” it is enough, so that they are under no necessity of “working.” Consciously or unconsciously, such men must have held a definition of faith widely different from that which St. P. indicates in speaking of “faith which worketh by love” (Gal. v. 6). With such persons St. J. will not stay to argue whether they really have faith or not. He accepts their phraseology, and meets them on their own ground. But he tells them that such a faith as theirs is, which works not and loves not, will avail nothing; that it is dead; that it is nothing more than is held by the devils in hell (ii. 8–17, 19).

6. Respecting the exact character of the error thus combated by St. J., there have been two very different opinions. By many it is thought to consist in what is commonly called antinomianism, a fanatical conceit of personal faith as availing to ensure salvation, without effecting anything to purge the soul from sin and uncleanness.

This is, plainly, the falsehood which seeks to shelter itself under the mantle of St. P., being the depravation (only too natural) of his teaching by the carnal mind. And against this he himself makes a vigorous protest in Rom. iii. 8; vi. 1, 2, and elsewhere.

But others¹ are rather disposed to identify the error with the dead orthodoxy of Jewish Pharisaism, which rested contentedly in a cold intellectual assent to articles of faith, and in the precision with which it could controversially maintain correct doctrine, though without any religious feeling in the heart, or any apparent consciousness of moral obligation. Such persons were they who in Christ's day, sitting in the seat of Moses, “said, and did not”; who, when the multitude was inclined to believe on Him, called them cursed because they knew not the Law (Matt. xxiii. 2, 3; John vii. 49). They rested upon a formula (see Rom. ii. 17, seqq.): with them

the acceptance of a creed was everything; the belief in a Person was nothing. And of such as these St. P. had also spoken, "Though I have all faith, so that I could remove mountains, and have not charity (love), I am nothing" (1 Cor. xiii. 2; cp. Rom. x. 10, "with the heart man believeth unto righteousness").

This latter mischief is, of the two, the more likely to have gained ground among such persons as might have passed from Judaism to Christianity without putting off their Jewish sectarianism. And therefore it is the more likely to have prevailed among those with whom St. J. had to deal. As time went on, when the gap between the Jew and the Christian had become wider, the antinomian error might become the more dangerous. There is no reason to question the co-existence of both in the cities where "Jews of the Dispersion" sojourned among the Gentiles. But the special evil against which St. J. feels himself called upon to do battle is, in all probability, the spirit of irreligious pharisaism shewing itself among Jewish converts.

On those who are possessed by such a spirit St. J. turns; and, without disputing the claim which they made to be accounted as "having faith," he says, "Your faith—that faith which you profess—a faith without the works of love—will not justify you or any one; for it is not alive, but dead!"

It may be noticed that the subject of "works without faith," is never discussed at all.

7. Secondly, of justification.

What is it, in the phraseology of the two writers, to be justified (δικαιούσθαι)? In St. P. we may say that it is the restoration of man to his place in God's sight as righteous; the new relation in which (objectively) God places man to Himself for Christ's sake, and through the Redemption in His blood,—(subjectively) received and appropriated by the hand of faith. St. P. seems to place it at the beginning of God's work in us, and distinctively makes it an inward operation. Only twice (Rom. ii. 13; 1 Cor. iv. 4) does he himself use it otherwise; and once (Rom. iii. 4) he quotes it from the LXX (Ps. li. 4), "that thou mightest be justified in thy sayings, and mightest overcome when thou art judged." But this latter is the all but universal usage of the word in the LXX version of the Old Testament;¹ either, as in a court of law, to judge, be adjudged righteous, or in a figurative sense immediately derived from this; see Exod. xxiii. 7; Isai. v. 23; Ps. cxliii. 2; which last passage, when compared with Gal. ii. 16, shews at once the difference and the connexion of the two usages. The word is in LXX not gracious, but judicial. So in N. T., "to justify oneself," Luke x. 29, xvi. 15; and compare especially the words of Christ in Matt. xii. 37, "By thy words thou shalt be justified, and by thy words thou shalt be condemned."

8. In this sense the word is used by St. J.: and indeed the last quoted passage might be taken as the key-note of his argument and teaching. With him it signifies the maintenance, to the end, of that relation of man to God, into which he has been first admitted through faith. It contains everywhere the notion of judgment, as in the Psalm quoted in Rom. iii. 4; see Jam. ii. 12, 13. And this is enough to prove that the "saving" mentioned in ii. 14, refers to the consummation on the last day. But the necessity of maintaining good works, and the judgment according to works, are equally taught by St. P. to those to whom he gives the titles of "saved" (Eph. ii. 5, 8), "sanctified" (1 Cor. i. 2; vi. 11), "justified" (Tit. iii. 7, &c.); see Rom. viii. 4, 13; xiii. 8-10; 1 Cor. vi. 7-11; Gal. v. 6. Thus he calls on those who "live in the Spirit," to "walk in the Spirit" (Gal. v. 25).¹

9. In fact, St. J.'s subject is not so much "justification" (according to scientific theological terminology), as it is "judgment by works"; including, however, in that expression the continuous judgment which is always accompanying the course of human action,—the current record of that Book out of which mankind will be judged in the Day to which all is leading up, and in which the sentence will be pronounced. This article of the faith is equally maintained by St. P. in other forms of expression; while in the discourse of Christ which has been already quoted (Matt. xii. 37), the actual words "thou shalt be justified," stand opposed to "thou shalt be condemned," in plain reference to the Day of Judgment.

Those professing Christians, then, who claim to be absolved from the cultivation of holiness and charity on the plea of their acceptance of a creed, are met in this Epistle on the plain ground of human experience. St. James does not profess to be a metaphysical theologian. He judges men by the only test which is available to him—by their works and life. He looks at the Christian life as it exhibits itself; and it is in working that faith exhibits itself.² And this is according to the example of his Lord in Matt. vii. 15-23, and many other places.

10. But St. Paul is also—nay, is emphatically—a philosophical theologian. He analyses the work of salvation. Beginning at its source in the Divine counsels, he traces its operations in the inner man, to its consummation when it issues in “the perfect man in Christ.” St. P. investigates the process. St. J. tests the results. And the personal history of the two men throws light on this difference. The conversion of St. P. was a convulsion of his inward nature. Who can tell the death-pangs and birth-pangs, the searchings of heart, the revelations of God in Christ, during those three days at Damascus, in which “he was without sight, and did neither eat nor drink?” But St. J., an Israelite of another character, had gradually imbibed the spirit of the new Teacher, till the Old Dispensation was to him purified and glorified, so that it became New without break of continuity.¹ Hence it was to him still “a law;” but now “a royal law,” “a law of liberty,”—no longer external, but within,—the law of the nature of the regenerate Spirit.

11. And the views of both these Apostles, however different they may appear, are portions of the truth of God’s word. Compare that which Christ says about the tree and its fruit (Matt. vii. 17, 18). If we ask how we are to know that the tree is good, the answer is, “By their fruits ye shall know them.” But if the question is, Which is the source of goodness to the other? the answer must be that the goodness of the fruit is contained in the prior goodness of the tree. The first is St. J.’s statement; the second is St. P.’s. Both are true; both are important: both are founded on the teaching of Christ.

12. There is, however, something more to be said. Even when these two Apostles are practically teaching the same thing, their language will not be found to be the same. And this points to real differences in their mental characteristics, which are in themselves interesting and instructive, while they serve in some degree to shew how the Spirit chooses and moulds His own instruments to develope and reveal His truth, one and multi-form. The view which St. J. takes is human, outward, à posteriori; he deals with trials, with proofs, with results. Nor does St. P. neglect all this. But he is led rather to take the Divine point of view. He sees the answers to his questions as God sees them, prior to experience. He reads the human heart, as changed by the grace of God, before its good treasure has been brought forth in speech or act. He beholds Abraham justified, because he sees him to be from the first, not only potentially, but truly, that which he afterwards manifestly and historically became when he offered up Isaac. This offering shewed how truly “it had been counted to him” for righteousness before.

Both statements are true. That of St. J. is much needed as a safeguard against three very real dangers,—unfruitful formalism, unpractical pride of knowledge, and practical antinomianism.¹ But it must be confessed that St. P. reveals a truth which is deeper, more fruitful, and more Divine.² He shews, what St. J. does not so fully shew,³ the unity and homogeneousness of the Christian life. He brings us face to face with God, as loving children with a loving Father. Law and duty melt into love. “Honour thy Father,” is superseded by “My son, give me thine heart.” Nay, in Christ we are one with Him. And this carries us far beyond the limitations and imperfections of actual experience.

§ 1. INTRODUCTORY REMARKS.

IN this Epistle we have one of the most important and deeply interesting monuments of the Apostolic age. Accepted without a trace of doubt or hesitation by all early Christian writers, beginning with the immediate successors and contemporaries of the Apostles, quoted largely and repeatedly by those Fathers to whom we are indebted for the fullest and most authoritative testimony to the canonical Scriptures¹, the first Epistle of St Peter has always retained its high position in the estimation of the Church; nor was there any question as to its authenticity until within the last few years, when rationalism, guided by the sure instinct of antipathy, has assailed it in common with all documents which attest the faith and unity of the primitive Church.

Questions however of considerable importance towards the right understanding of the Epistle have been raised and are still contested by writers of various schools; they will receive due attention in this Introduction and in the following Commentary.

The first two questions concern the immediate or principal objects of the Writer, and the class of readers to whom the Epistle was addressed. These points being determined, we shall be in a position to estimate its bearings upon the doctrine and constitution of the Apostolic Church, and upon the relations between the great leaders to whom the establishment and guidance of that Church were specially intrusted by its Divine Head.

§ 2. THE OBJECTS OF THE EPISTLE.

As it appears to the present writer, two objects closely connected, and indeed inseparable in their development, were present with equal distinctness to the mind of St Peter.

It is scarcely questioned that the immediate occasion of this Epistle was the approach, or outburst¹, of persecutions in Asia Minor. This stands in front of the Epistle; but the extreme importance of bearing it in mind has never been so fully drawn out as by Ewald², who in his short but interesting introduction fixes attention upon the fact, that in this Epistle we have the only Apostolic model of exhortations and consolations addressed to Christians under circumstances, which formed at once the trial and the test of their faith. In other Epistles allusions are frequently made to sufferings and difficulties, in this the readers are presented to our minds as undergoing, or on the eve of undergoing, fiery persecutions. This is the first image impressed upon us in contemplating their external condition, though with admirable skill, or we should rather say in the true spirit of a Christian Apostle, St Peter gives precedence to their internal and permanent condition. We see Christians regenerate to a lively hope, assured of an inheritance of glory, but subject as a matter of necessity to trials which, though severe and searching as of fire, are temporary, which are indispensable to the full development of their spiritual life, and are therefore to be borne not merely without repining but with exultation, as an earnest and pledge of glory. The first and most direct object of the writer is to inspire Christians with an absolute confidence in the Divine favour and support.

² 'Sieben Sendschreiben des N. B.;' see especially p. 5. "The great and permanent merit of our Epistle is to have first distinctly set forth the right view as to the position of Christians in reference to the whole power of heathendom, and to its persecutions of the Church."

This point elicits the thought which specially occupied the mind of St Peter. All the confidence of Christian hope depended upon the certainty of the truths which converts had already received. Were they still to be inquirers, painfully comparing the teaching of rival or antagonistic leaders, looking out for more distinct revelations of God's will and purposes: or were they to repose upon the truth, in its principle and in its practical applications, which they had already received? To this consideration St Peter addresses himself at once; no shadow is permitted to rest upon the relations between the doctrine of the older Apostles, and that which the people, in all the districts contemplated by the Writer, had received from their own first teachers. The entire system as it stands before us in the Epistles of St Paul, as it stood before the minds of those who first listened to St Paul—many of whom must have personally known Silvanus, by whose hands this Epistle reached them—is presented by St Peter, not indeed in terms which indicate the existence of any previous controversy, but in every form of direct affirmation, constant allusion, frequent quotation of the best known writings of the Apostle of the Gentiles, which might impress upon the readers' minds the certainty of absolute unity of doctrine and perfect harmony of action. This characteristic is indeed so prominently marked, the allusions to or citations from the Pauline Epistles, the intention of confirming the readers in a faith already received, to which nothing could be added, from which nothing could be taken away, are so manifest, as to constitute a conclusive evidence of spurious origin in the minds of those who invented or still maintain the calumnious fiction of antagonism between the two chief representatives of Apostolic Christianity: and we may admit without hesitation that if their widely spread assertions could be established by conclusive reasoning, this great Epistle would fall in the general overthrow of nearly all¹ that the Church has retained of the sacred deposit intrusted to her by our Lord. Here it may suffice to bring forward distinctly the fact that we have the admission, or we may rather say the well-founded asseveration, of the strongest opponents of the faith, that this Epistle asserts, implies, and most distinctly proves that the doctrinal system of its Writer was in perfect harmony with that of St Paul.

This however is a point of so much importance that we would at once request the reader to examine the following passages (chh. i. 1, 2, 3, 12, 14, 17, 21, 25, ii. 16, iii. 6, 16, 18, iv. 1, 3, v. 12) and to consider the notes appended to them in this Commentary. He will find that St Peter is most careful to take the leading points which had raised controversies or occasioned doubts, and to intimate the perfect agreement between himself and St Paul. Thus the election of the Gentiles as well as Hebrews is attributed to the foreknowledge of God, and that in terms evidently intended to remind the reader of St Paul's own language and arguments². Faith is specially represented as the moving principle of Christians, the basis of their hope, and their preservative unto final salvation. The tone or, so to speak, the colouring of the Pauline Epistles, especially of that to the Ephesians, with which the people to whom this Epistle is specially addressed would naturally be most familiar, is preserved throughout. So too is that of the great Epistle to the Romans, in which we find the fullest statement of doctrines at present assumed by the critics of Tübingen to be most directly antagonistic to the Petrine system, and certainly most specially characteristic of St Paul¹. The turns of language, as well as the mode in which the principles are presented, leave no room for reasonable doubt that when St Peter wrote he had both those Epistles before him or distinctly impressed upon his mind. This point is indeed forcibly urged, and it may be said demonstrated, by critics who on that ground impugn the authenticity of this Epistle²: and it is a point which can only be accounted for in a satisfactory manner by the supposition that it was St Peter's express intention to cut off all occasion for misunderstanding, and to guard against intentional misrepresentation. Such a supposition is in accordance with all that Christian antiquity, setting aside heretical forgeries of the second century, has handed down to us in the Canonical Scriptures and in the writings of the weightiest and earliest Fathers, and we maintain it without hesitation. But our Apostle is not satisfied with allusions, references, and statements bearing upon this object; he takes occasion at two most critical points in the Epistle to attest the soundness of the doctrine which his readers had received from St Paul, to whom their conversion is incontestably to be attributed. First at the close of his introductory exhortations, ch. i. 25, "but this is the Word which was delivered as evangelic truth to you³." Secondly, not less forcibly, at the winding up of the whole Epistle, ch. v. 12. Here the Apostle first asserts that he transmitted it through Silvanus, in whose faithfulness he takes occasion to express his own perfect confidence, whom his readers knew well as the comrade, and so to speak the fellow Evangelist and fellow Confessor of St Paul; a circumstance which is of importance in its two-fold bearings, upon the personal relations of the Apostles and upon the position of the Churches which saw in the agent and deputy of St Peter a man whom they recognised as the trusted friend of St Paul. In this latter passage he emphatically states that the especial object of the Epistle was to affirm, in the strongest form of words, and attest that the faith which they had received was the true grace of God, an expression in itself so distinctly Pauline as to be regarded by some critics (e.g. De Wette) as a sure indication of Pauline authorship; but, as we have a right to regard it, a certain proof of the spiritual influence of which that Apostle was the chosen exponent. To this St Peter adds—if we retain the common reading—"in which ye stand," thus adopting St Paul's own words, 1 Cor. xv. 1, or—if we accept the preferable reading of the oldest MSS.—"in WHICH STAND!" thus substituting for a simple declaration of their secure position as adherents to the Pauline doctrine of grace, an emphatic exhortation to steadfastness in maintaining it.

² See the Introd. to Ephesians.

We shall presently have¹ to discuss other questions raised by those who regard the two great representatives of Christian truth as opponents, but we may here observe that, taking St Paul's own account of his personal intercourse with St Peter, we learn that the two Apostles resided together at a crisis of the highest importance in their ministry; that the younger Apostle sought out St Peter with the express purpose of inquiry; and that on the very occasion which caused a brief alienation St Paul appealed without hesitation to the fundamental principles recognised by both; while all other accounts concur in representing the elder Apostle as justifying and maintaining the cause of St Paul when that Apostle was assailed by the Judaizing party.

¹ See notes on i. 12, 14, 20, 21, ii. 1, 6—10, 11, 13 and 19, iii. 9, 22, iv. 1, 10, v. 1, 5.

² The most complete inquiry into this statement is that by Seufert, in two articles of Hilgenfeld's 'Zeitschrift für wissenschaftliche Theologie,' 1874, 1875. His object is to prove that the writer intentionally adopted Pauline doctrine, and therefore could not be St Peter; we accept his facts, substituting, however, agreement with the Epistle to the Romans for dependence upon it; as for Seufert's conclusion, it rests upon the πρώτον ψεύδος of antagonism between the two great teachers of Christendom.

§ 3. CLASS OF READERS TO WHOM THE EPISTLE WAS ADDRESSED.

The foregoing arguments may indicate the conclusion at which we have arrived, and to which we adhere with entire confidence, viz. that the Apostle throughout the Epistle is addressing not any separate or distinct party, faction, or class in the Church, but the entire body of Christian converts in those districts where the Gospel was undoubtedly planted by the instrumentality of St Paul. That body of course included a considerable number of Jewish converts, and all its members were deeply penetrated by Hebrew influences, were familiar with the Old Testament, and were well aware that the origin and root of Christianity was, as our Lord (John iv. 22) and all His Apostles state, to be sought in the revelation to the Patriarchs and to Moses. But not less certainly the great majority of the first converts, and of those who were added to the Church in the interval between St Paul's preaching and the issue of this Epistle, were Gentiles by birth, training, and previous religion. This being the case we should expect to find in the Epistle a pervading tone of ancient Hebrew thought, equally however intelligible to Jews and Gentiles under Apostolic teaching, but at the same time forms of address, exhortations, and injunctions specially adapted to those who were most exposed to heathen influences, and were undergoing a rapid but not yet complete process of transition from old heathenish customs to Gospel purity and light.

Now if we examine the forms of address we find that while the Hebrew tone is unmistakable (e.g. in the introductory clause, ch. i. 1, and in the description of believers, ch. ii. 9, taken from Exodus and Isaiah), yet by far the most numerous and specific expressions are applicable, not indeed exclusively to Gentiles, but to a body in which they constituted the predominant and characteristic portion¹. They are exhorted to eschew the habits formed in a state of ignorance (i. 14), a term expressly applied to heathens, being redeemed from ancestral corruption, called out of darkness, once not a people —an expression which certainly was never applied to faithful Israelites—and they are warned to be on their guard against heathen practices. Women are represented as having become, i.e. on their conversion, daughters of Sarah. Men are reminded of their old Gentile habits, iv. 3, 4—habits which were repulsive to the Jews scarcely less than to Christians. In short the general tone and special injunctions equally justify the conclusion at which the majority of modern commentators have arrived, that, far from having Israelites exclusively before his mind, the large-minded baptizer of Cornelius gave his deepest and most earnest thoughts to a body in which there is neither Jew nor Gentile, in which Christ is all in all.

This conclusion has indeed against it the opinions of many ancient writers, none however of really early date¹, none who learned from Apostles or Apostolic men, but who generally belonged to a time when the true relations between the members of the primitive Church were somewhat obscured and often misapprehended. Some modern writers², deserving of all consideration, maintain that the Epistle written by the Apostle of the circumcision³ must have been addressed exclusively to that party in the Church. But they do not and cannot point to a time or to probable circumstances in which Jewish communities could have been established in those districts which, as all Christian antiquity concurs, recognised St Paul as their first, and at that time (before St John resided at Ephesus) their only Apostolic Teacher; nor indeed is there the slightest ground for the assumption that in any Christian community, in any city or district, believers who acknowledged their union with the Apostolic body were separated into distinct classes of worshippers. Even at Corinth, where factious movements gave occasion to indications of such tendency—sternly repressed by St Paul—no such distinct bodies were formed. The Epistle of Clement of Rome, written about a quarter of a century from the probable date of this Epistle, proves that whatever might be the internal tendency in the Corinthian church, no such distinction was dreamed of as that which is implied in this assumption. That Epistle, addressed to a Church in which the Gentile element was unquestionably predominant, is most deeply tinged by Hebrew teaching, but it does not suggest or indeed permit the notion that Hebrews and Gentiles stood apart, worshipped apart, or could be addressed apart by an Apostolic teacher. Nothing can be more futile than the attempt to find traces of separate Hebrew bodies of worshippers tolerated within the Church. In Palestine the Hebrew element of course predominated for a time; in other districts, especially in Europe and Asia Minor, the Gentile element as certainly predominated. Tendencies existed which issued on the one side in the ultra-Gentile heresy of Marcion, on the other in the Ebionite faction, which has a fitting exponent in the worthless Clementine forgeries; but no sooner did they come to a head than they broke out in open separation, not within, but from the Church; noticed, so far as they are noticed by any Apostle, only to be uniformly condemned. Assuredly no such countenance as that which would have been given to the most mischievous and inveterate enemies of Church unity, had such an Epistle as this been addressed to them exclusively, ought to be attributed to the chief of the old Apostolic body—the friend and the consistent supporter of St Paul.

³ It should be borne in mind that the Apostle of the Gentiles invariably addressed himself in the first instance to the Jews, and that his arguments are often specially applicable to them. In fact both Apostles always contemplated the Church as an undivided whole, noticing differences connected with race or party, only with the view of pointing out their incompatibility with Christian principles. We should also remember that both Apostles suffered from the envy and jealousy of adversaries common to both, who had first attacked St Peter, see Acts xi. 1, 2.

§ 4 TIME AND PLACE OF THE COMPOSITION OF THIS EPISTLE.

1. The time is approximately settled if we admit the fact, now scarcely open to serious controversy, which has been discussed in the preceding sections, that the Apostle was acquainted with the Epistle to the Ephesians, which was certainly written towards the close of St Paul's two years' residence at Rome, in bonds but not yet incarcerated. This leaves no option of a composition earlier than A.D. 63. A much later date is certainly precluded by the notices of the constitution of the Church¹.

With this agree other clear indications in the Epistle, especially those which refer to the condition of the Christians in Asia Minor. It is evident on the one hand that partial, but very frequent attacks had been made upon them; that accusations of disloyalty, neglect or violation of legal enactments, had been urged; that the name of Christian was held up to scorn (iv. 14) and apparently was regarded as in some cases a sufficient ground for condemnation even to death (iv. 15, 16). Such was evidently the general condition of Christians from the time when the Gospel was first preached in those districts, and there is good reason to believe that the persecutions, regular or irregular, of which we find notices in the earlier Epistles, continually increased in intensity. The irritation of the Gentiles against those who themselves rejected, and induced numbers to reject the national superstitions; the fury of the numerous citizens and merchants whose interests were bound up with the public worship of the old and popular idols; the persistent and skilful machinations of the unbelieving Jews, especially influential in the "wrangling marts" and commercial sea-ports of the East, are brought before us in lively colours by the Epistles of St Paul: nor can it be doubted that those movements approached their culminating point about the time when Nero—not unskilful in discerning indications of popular excitement—first brought them to a focus in that fearful persecution of which the horrors are scarcely conceivable, to which indeed full justice could scarcely be done save by a writer who combines a lively imagination and singular historical tact with utter irreverence and disregard of ordinary feelings of modesty and tender-ness¹. But it seems clear that no regular, systematic persecution conducted under imperial authority, had broken out at that time either in the city where this Epistle was written or in the districts to which it was addressed. The mutterings of the storm were heard, and there were frequent anticipations of impending woes; but the great judgment had not yet begun from the house of God (iv. 17)². This Epistle had certainly for one object consolation under present sufferings, but far more distinctly and impressively preparation for a coming woe³. The Christian is the object of incessant calumny, of vigilant espial, but is not as yet in a position to be subject to the last penalty without any form of trial, simply on the ground of his adherence to a new faith.

On these grounds we must assign the Epistle to the interval between the first year of St Paul's imprisonment and the burning of Rome A.D. 64, July.

2. Closely connected with the question as to the time of the composition is that of the place.

Here we have first to examine the statement at the close of the Epistle, v. 13.

If we read it without reference to any early tradition, to any consideration of the history of the Apostle and of early Christendom, it would at first sight appear that when he gives the salutation of the lady or Church co-elect—doubtless with the Christians to whom the Epistle is addressed—in Babylon, the Apostle distinctly intimates that well-known city as the place where he was then residing.

This view accordingly has had numerous and very weighty supporters in modern times: critics of the highest eminence, and certainly little affected by party considerations, have adopted it without misgiving.

It implies that towards the close of St Peter's public ministry there existed at Babylon a Christian community, faithful to the whole system of Christian doctrine, equally under the influence of Pauline and Petrine teaching; that Silvanus, St Paul's old and tried friend, was living there, in close connection with St Peter; and that the Church was on terms of affectionate intercourse with those communities in Asia Minor which owed their existence to St Paul.

But to this whole statement and to each of its details serious and indeed insuperable objections exist.

In the first place we have to encounter the uniform, unvarying, testimony of early Christian writers. From whatever quarter their voices reach us, they affirm that Babylon here is a recognised appellation of Rome, the city which occupied the place of that ancient city as the central world-power, the head-quarters of Anti-Christian influences¹. In fact no other view of the passage was entertained or suggested before Calvin, who argued that the old tradition was connected with false notions as to the position of the Roman Church, and that in this as in all other cases the literal interpretation ought to stand, unless it is shewn to be untenable.

Now the main point to be determined is whether it is probable or even possible that, at the date assigned to this Epistle, a Christian community under the presidency of St Peter existed at Babylon.

One thing is certain, and seems of itself almost conclusive. The early records of Christianity, which give very full accounts of Christian Churches, and which especially give prominence to those

² So Steiger, Wieseler, Huther, and others.

³ It is scarcely conceivable that a critic so acute as Hilgenfeld should misunderstand or misinterpret intimations of such a character, as referring to the persecution under Trajan; nor indeed does it seem admissible to refer them to any period after the burning of Rome, when Christianity was for the first time formally denounced as an illicit religion, and persecution from that time if not continuous, yet breaking out in frequent intervals, became the normal condition of the Church of Christ. See an excellent article by M. Boissier in the 'Revue archéologique,' 1876, pp. 119 f. The notices in this Epistle refer to a different and early stage in the process. See notes on i. 6, ii. 12, iii. 16, iv. 19, v. 6.

founded by Apostles or under their guidance, are absolutely silent as regards the existence of a Church at Babylon. We have no notice of a succession of Bishops, no intimation of persecutions in that city; the Church must have been swept away without a trace of its existence—all points which, if they stood alone, would compel us to inquire if no other interpretation could be maintained.

But we have historical evidence, accepted by all critics as genuine, which proves conclusively that a community of Christians, more especially of Hebrew Christians, to whom St Peter is assumed to have confined his personal ministrations, did not and could not exist in that city or the adjoining district at the time in question. Up to the time of Caligula the Jews formed a large and very influential community in Babylon. They were staunch religionists; bigoted adherents of all Hebrew traditions; they supplied Palestine with some of its most distinguished teachers; Hillel, a descendant of David, came from that city before our Lord's birth; and the school in that district continued to flourish in all branches of rabbinical doctrine. Christianity, had it been introduced there at any time, would have encountered fierce and persistent opposition, of which traces would certainly have been found in the traditions of the Babylonian Talmud.

But about A.D. 40, towards the end of Caligula's reign, the whole Jewish population in Babylon was exterminated by a series of calamities, of which a full account is given by Josephus in the last chapter of the 18th Book of his Jewish Antiquities.

We learn from that account that after the total destruction by the Parthians of the warlike colony of Hebrews at Nearda—a most remarkable and interesting episode in the history of the province—the old and bitter enmity between the native Babylonians and the Jews residing among them burst out; the Babylonians set upon the Jews, who being unable to resist them by arms, or to endure their insults, migrated in great numbers to Seleucia; and that six years later, in consequence of losses caused apparently by a fresh outbreak, those who had remained left the district of Babylon. At Seleucia 50,000 of the fugitives were afterwards massacred. There can be no doubt that, as Josephus expressly states, the Jews abandoned the whole province; and though at a later time we find them in adjoining districts, there is no indication of their presence within the precincts of Babylon¹.

It is in short utterly incredible that a Christian Church, consisting as critics assume chiefly, if not wholly, of Hebrew converts, should have been established in Babylon within less than a quarter of a century from that catastrophe.

With regard to the probability of St Peter's own presence and active work in that district, or, speaking generally, near or beyond the Eastern limits of the Roman empire, it must be observed that although we know nothing definite of the Apostle's movements after the dispute between him and St Paul at Antioch, probably in the year A.D. 53, yet that intimations in St Paul's Epistles², and

² The most distinct allusions to St Peter's presence or action in Corinth are found in St Paul's First Epistle to the Corinthians. In the first chapter, v. 12, he states that certain persons at Corinth took the name of Cephas, as also his own name and that of Apollos, nay, even of Christ Himself, as a badge of party; of course, without any concurrence on his own part or on the part of Apollos or Cephas. In the third chapter, v. 22, St Paul names Cephas, together with himself and Apollos, as ministering to the Church in Corinth. We may add that the reference to the wife of Cephas, ch. ix. 5, implies personal knowledge on the part of the Corinthians. In no passage of that Epistle does St Paul suggest, or permit the suggestion, that St Peter countenanced his opponents. It is also to be remarked that in the long and very grave series of charges that St Paul brings against certain members or parties in the Church of Corinth, none are connected with questions between Hebrew and Gentile Christians, but in the earliest Christian writers, point distinctly to his presence and activity in Europe; as for instance at Corinth, where the most ancient and trustworthy notices shew that he preached, as a joint founder¹ with St Paul, and at Rome², where, as it is generally admitted and is positively asserted by the writer above all others competent to speak with authority, he was accompanied by St Mark³. St Mark would certainly not have been needed as an interpreter in a Hebrew Christian Church at Babylon; at Rome he may have been and probably was almost indispensable. We find also in the mention of Silvanus a further and most cogent argument against the supposition that the writer was resident at Babylon. Nothing more probable than that Silvanus should be drawn to Rome by St Paul's presence in that city; nothing more probable than that in that city he should have been directed by St Peter, or induced spontaneously, to undertake a mission to the quarters where he had laboured of old in company with St Paul; and certainly nothing more suitable to St Peter's purpose, whether or with errors of doctrine and corruptions of practice, which had their source in Gentile laxity of morals and pseudo-scientific speculations. Compare the notices of dissensions at Corinth in the Epistle of Clement of Rome, c.g. ch. 48.

¹ So Dionysius, Bp of Corinth, about A.D. 170. It is inconceivable that the positive statement of this Bishop in reference to his own city, and to Rome, with regard to which his statement is confirmed by Irenæus, should be slighted in deference to conjectures "aping the truth." We have abundant testimony in the Epistle of Clement Rom., in the Epistle of Ignatius to the Romans c. 1., and in Irenæus, that the memory of both Apostles was cherished with grateful affection at Rome and Corinth. In a most important passage, ch. 44, Clem. R. attributes to our Apostles, i.e. St Peter and St Paul, the organization of the Christian ministry at Corinth. In this sense the word joint-founders may properly be applied to both, as by Irenæus and Dionysius.

not he acted with the direct and open concurrence of St Paul, or guided only by his own Christian feelings, than to send this missive of encouragement, exhortation, and earnest injunction to steadfastness in the faith as the readers had received it first, by the hands of Silvanus, under the sanction of both Apostles, and with St Peter's personal attestation to his faithfulness.

An argument in favour of the Babylonian hypothesis has been drawn from the order in which the provinces addressed by St Peter are enumerated in the beginning of the Epistle. It is remarked that they do not begin with the west and proceed eastward—as might be expected had the letter come from Rome—but that they begin with the east and end with Asia and Bithynia. But on close examination the argument tells in the opposite direction. The first district mentioned is Pontus. Now Pontus was a district in constant communication with Rome; a vessel proceeding from Rome would probably proceed there directly if its course was determined by the lines of traffic; and whether we suppose that it was sent on public, or on Christian business, the sea-ports of Pontus would be equally convenient. On the other hand, had the messenger of St Peter started from Babylon it is impossible that Pontus should have been the first district which he reached, or that which would naturally present itself first to the Apostle's mind.

The foregoing arguments seem to leave no alternative but to accept the old unvarying testimony of the Fathers, who must have known the sense in which the statement was understood throughout Asia Minor, that St Peter designates Rome by the name of Babylon.

The objection however is strongly urged that it is highly improbable St Peter should have used a mystic term in an Epistle dealing not with apocalyptic visions but with simple matters of fact.

But we should observe that the whole clause in which this appellation occurs must be understood in a symbolical sense. This salutation is given, not—as is elsewhere the case where Churches are distinctly specified as sending or receiving greetings—by the Church in Babylon, but by the co-elect, a feminine adjective, to which the literal reader would naturally supply the word woman or lady. In fact some expositors have adopted this interpretation and suppose that St Peter sends the salutation in the name of his wife, elect together with himself—an interpretation rejected by the common sense of Christians, and too unreasonable to need refutation; for who could imagine that he should name his wife on such an occasion, or speak of her as co-elect in Babylon? This expression must be accepted as a mystical designation of the Christian community, dwelling in a city which the Apostle styles Babylon, the head-quarters of idolatrous worship, the abode of antichristian and persecuting powers; such as Babylon was in the times of the prophets, to whose voice St Peter was ever listening; such as Rome, and Rome alone, was in his own time. What could be more natural than that the Christians of Rome should send such a greeting to their co-elect brethren, just at a time when the “vanward clouds of evil days” were gathering thickly and threatening to burst over both?

But would the designation be understood by those to whom it was addressed? Of course if explanation were needed it would at once be given by the bearer of the Epistle; but we know for certain that the inhabitants of Asia Minor became familiarly acquainted with the expression before the close of the first century, and we must therefore admit as probable that, when the Revelation of St John first reached them, it found them prepared to receive the name of Babylon as symbolically designating Rome. We may safely assume that the great majority of commentators are right in the interpretation of the name Babylon, which is given in the commentary on the Revelation in this volume. The Christians must have had constant occasion to refer to the imperial city as the central hold of idolatry and persecution; and they might naturally use language which would not expose them to Gentile indignation.

St Peter indeed appears in this clause to have intentionally used very guarded expressions. The term “co-elect,” as applied either to an individual or a Church, has no parallel in Scripture or in early Christian writers. It would not be understood by any heathen who might hear or read it; nor give occasion to a charge of disloyalty to the Empire: a charge equally perilous to the Christians of Asia Minor and to those of Rome. It had moreover a peculiar suitableness in an Epistle addressed to Christians who had been converted by St Paul. It would remind them that the Church in which St Peter was residing and in whose name he spoke, owed its origin probably, and certainly its full development, to St Paul their own Apostle. “Fellow elect” in all senses, fellows in the Divine purpose and foreknowledge, elect together from heathenism and Judaism, and brought to the knowledge and realization of their election by the same instrumentality. This is in fact one more point supporting the view insisted upon throughout these pages, that St Peter was specially intent upon confirming the Churches in their acceptance and maintenance of Pauline doctrines.

But it will be said, late critics are all but unanimous in upholding the literal sense. We are however dealing here not with authorities, but with reasons: were we indeed to listen to authorities we might argue fairly that the testimony of Fathers nearly contemporary with the writer, and certainly competent witnesses to the belief of those who received the Epistle, would be entitled to preference over views founded on conjecture or questionable interpretations. We might further argue that the opponents of the old view were certainly influenced in the first place by strong party feelings. Calvin¹, the first maintainer of the modern view, says that the old interpretation is “a stronghold of popery;” a statement which is at once controversially dangerous in reference to Romanists, who would justly claim the support of all Christian antiquity, not to speak of internal evidence, in their favour, and subversive of his own position; for who would attach weight to an argument suggested by such a consideration? Luther, whose vigorous intellect guided him safely, felt that it would give a vantage-ground to his bitter opponents were he to forsake the old view, and he maintained it fearlessly. In fact there is nothing in this closing salutation like an assumption of authority, much less of supremacy. St Peter does not speak in his own name, nor in the name of the Apostolic body, to which he never alludes as recognising his authority or even primacy, but simply conveys the salutations of the Christian body, of which every member is entitled to the highest of all designations—one of the Elect of God. We must also observe that among the latest commentators some of highest repute for critical discernment and absence of party feeling¹ accept the old tradition as well founded both on external evidence and internal grounds.

§ 5. CHARACTERISTICS OF THIS EPISTLE.

We first remark the extreme simplicity of the general structure. It is divided broadly, at the 11th verse of the 2nd chapter, into two sections. The first presents us with a portraiture of the Christian in his high privileges, elect by the Divine will, in full possession of the means of salvation, animated by a new life in virtue of his regeneration, overflowing with spiritual emotions, rooted in faith, abounding in hope, full of unfeigned fervent love, especially developed in the relationships of the new family; we have the dogmatic truths of the pre-existence, the divinity, the majesty, of the Head of the Church set before us with a vividness and completeness unsurpassed in the sacred writings, while the Church stands out as a temple of which every stone is instinct with spiritual life, the home and realization of the ideal Israel, ever present to the mind of God's heralds and interpreters, in which the old people became a true spiritual people, and those who had been for ages wholly alien were made full partakers of all blessings, brought out of the darkness of heathenism into marvellous light, shewing forth the praises and thanksgivings which attest their union with each other in Christ.

In the following section, to the close of the Epistle, the Apostle dwells in detail upon the duties which spring from that new relationship, with special reference to the temptations to which at that time all classes of his converts were exposed. In the foremost and central place we find the inculcation of purity¹ as the condition of victory, both in the desperate struggle between the flesh and the spirit (ii. 11), and in the great work assigned to Christians of evangelizing the Gentile world (ii. 12, see note). Then come in order the duties of Christians as subjects and citizens (ii. 13—17), recalling the exhortations of St Paul, but dwelling with peculiar force upon the possible abuse of Christian liberty—a point urged elsewhere by the younger Apostle, but here introduced with singular aptness in reference to civil and political subordination.

Next come exhortations to Christians in a state of servitude, again reminding us, and doubtless recalling to the readers' minds, the exhortation of St Paul in the Epistle to the Ephesians, but having one most impressive peculiarity. In that Epistle St Paul dwells on the relation of all classes to Christ, and on the future reward; St Peter, in his special capacity as "witness of the sufferings of Christ",² fixes attention upon Christ as the one example of all Christians, especially of those who are called upon to suffer in His name and for His sake, and who are thus made true followers of Him who by His death accomplished the redemption of man. Wives and husbands next receive counsels and admonitions, those to the former based on their adoption into the family of Sarah, to the latter with special reference to the new inheritance of which husbands and wives are equally partakers, and to the development of their new spiritual life in common prayer.

Then follows a singularly complete and condensed summary of the duties of men called to inherit a common blessing³, and warnings against undue terror and despondency, remarkable not only for force and persuasiveness, but for their combination with a survey of the deepest mysteries of grace, with a presentation of the Saviour's work on earth and in the unknown region of spirits, and of His present exaltation to dominion over all the powers of the universe¹. The same strain of exhortation to all Christian good works, mingled and blended with references to present or impending afflictions, and to the mighty truths of Revelation, is preserved to the end of the 4th chapter. It is followed in the 5th by an admonition to the leaders of the Christian community, whose position is at once defined and limited, as sharing the duties and prerogatives of the ministry with the Apostle himself (who claims but to be their fellow presbyter), and who are strongly warned against their special temptation to undue assumption of lordship. The whole is wound up with exhortations, and warnings, remarkable for intense concentration, and with an ascription which presents in the most condensed and completest form the claims of the Father as the source, and of the Son as the channel of all spiritual strength and life.

With a salutation corresponding in brevity and completeness to that which introduces the Epistle, St Peter closes what he himself describes as a brief summary of Christian doctrine and admonition, once more and emphatically enjoining perseverance in the true grace of God, of which his readers had already been made partakers; taking occasion to name two persons, Silvanus, well known to all as the old fellow worker of St Paul, and St Mark, an attendant of that Apostle both at the commencement, and towards the close of his career, and then commending all to the peace which is in Christ.

When we consider the purport and bearings of the Epistle, as thus briefly indicated, and look more closely into each portion of it, endeavouring to realize the character and intentions of the inspired writer, certain points, sometimes strangely overlooked, strike us with exceeding distinctness and force.

We observe that not only does St Peter, like St Paul and indeed all inspired teachers, give equal prominence to the duties and the privileges of Christians, to dogma and to practice, but that he keeps them throughout in the closest imaginable connection. In this we find, not a point of difference between the two Apostles, but a remarkably vivid illustration of the principle common to both. Not one thought connected with the mystery of salvation is presented without an instant and emphatic reference to what a Christian ought to feel and what he ought to do. No place in the spiritual temple is so humble that he who holds it has not before him the loftiest sphere of spiritual action and thought. Injunctions which touch the heart most powerfully are impressed upon us as we contemplate the eternal glory, the manifestations of Christ's love: Christ's power and majesty flash out most vividly as we follow His workings in the heart of the slave.

This characteristic of the Epistle requires close and repeated study to appreciate duly, but it forces itself upon the mind and works upon the feelings of all who read with open and devout hearts. If among Christian teachers St Peter ranks as one thoroughly and conspicuously practical, it is because he is thoroughly spiritual and evangelical. Christ suffering is at once the example and the salvation of believers, Christ in glory at once the object of devout contemplation and the exceeding great reward of His followers. Among commentators, who have brought this aspect of St Peter's teaching to bear upon the conscience and life of Christians, Archbishop Leighton stands foremost, a man who himself combined the resources of learning with the truest and most vivid appreciation of the lowliest graces and loftiest gifts of God's people.

But one characteristic, not in fact different, but yet distinct, from this harmonious intertwining of doctrine and practice, has yet to be considered. We refer to the very remarkable comprehensiveness of St Peter's representation of the work of Christ and the privileges of His Church, and the extreme completeness and conciseness of his statements, both as regards doctrine and practice. Thus for instance when he brings before us the mystery of salvation, he at once points out that it is the end of the faith which is fixed intently upon Christ and developed in perfect love and unspeakable joy: but he does not rest there; he directs our thoughts to the ages past; there he sees, and makes us see, the Spirit of Christ—thus regarded as eternally coexisting in the Godhead—dwelling as giver of life in the prophets, distinct from their own spirit, informing and enlightening them, and making them feel themselves to be, what the Church has ever acknowledged them to be, the channels and agents of a salvation, which they and the Angels contemplate with intense interest and unwearied admiration. This point, though according with all Apostolic teaching, is in its form and development peculiar to St Peter. See note on i. 10.

For other instances of complete and condensed statement we may refer the reader to notes on chh. i. 4, ii. 17, iii. 8, 18, 22, iv. 3, 19, v. 10.

Here we would however call special attention to the bearing of this point upon the most obscure, but certainly most deeply interesting passage in the whole Epistle, iii. 18—22. The Apostle sets before us Christians undergoing every species of trial and persecution, and calls upon them to defend the truth fearlessly by reasoning, and above all by the manifestation of genuine Christian principles and entire blamelessness of life (vv. 13—17). He points at once, as before in addressing servants, to the example of Christ's suffering; and then, having Christ thus present to his mind, he follows Him from the scene of that suffering into the intermediate state: he fills up the gap between the death on the Cross and the Resurrection; and he gives us a glimpse, not an obscure glimpse, into the interval passed by the human spirit of our Lord in the unknown realms of the departed. He sees and hears Him preaching, and singles out, as special objects of that preaching, the multitudinous souls who in every stage of disobedience had been swept from the earth at the Deluge—thus, as ever, bringing the past and greatest judgments to bear upon present trials and future accomplishment. In this representation St Peter stands, so to speak, alone¹: other passages of Holy Scripture point in the same direction, but to him it was given to indicate a part of Christ's work, which was appreciated most thoroughly by the greatest teachers of the early Church, and which has a special interest for minds now anxiously exercised by questionings touching the condition of disembodied spirits. But St Peter deals with it, according to his usual system of complete statement, as a link between the work done on earth and the following glories: the Resurrection, the Ascension, and the culmination of all that had been anticipated by prophets, the Session on the right hand of God, the inauguration of the everlasting kingdom of Him to whom the highest created powers are ministers and slaves. It is the same St Peter who, in the Gospel of St Mark written certainly under his influence, and in his speeches recorded in the Acts, ever reverts to the first announcements of Gospel truths, and points onward to the accomplishment of all in the conversion of the world and the manifestation of the kingdom of God.

§ 6. EVIDENCES OF AUTHENTICITY. A. EXTERNAL EVIDENCE.

In the case of a writing, which is admitted by all critics to have been ranked among those whose authenticity was unquestioned in the early Church, it might suffice to refer to the brief but conclusive statements of Eusebius 'H. E.' III. 25. 3, and to a few passages from the most ancient Fathers upon which the statement rests, or by which it is confirmed.

But independently of the advantage of having a ready and, to unprejudiced minds, a conclusive answer to cavilling objections, a somewhat full inquiry into the writings of the Fathers, which bear upon this point, may serve to shew, not only the general reception of the Epistle in the first and second centuries, but the deep impression which it made upon those who best represent the mind of early Christendom.

The notice in the second Epistle of St Peter, iii. 1, is admitted, even by those who impugn the authenticity of that Epistle, to be conclusive as to the fact that this one was known and generally accepted at the beginning of the 2nd century, the latest time which critics assign for the composition of the second Epistle. Accepting, in common with all the Churches of Christendom, that Epistle as genuine, on grounds which will be stated in the Introduction to it, we have the highest possible attestation, that of the Apostle himself.

We learn from Eusebius¹ that Papias of Hierapolis quoted this Epistle in writings no longer extant. Now Papias, as we learn from Irenæus, v. 33. 4, was "a hearer of John, and a companion of Polycarp²." The statement is conclusive as to the reception of the Epistle in that district of Asia Minor to which it was specially addressed.

But passing on to those Fathers whose works are in our hands, and who are the best representatives of the early Church, we find a remarkable series of testimonies, whether we turn to the city, from which, as we have argued, the Epistle was sent, or to those communities to which it was addressed. It must always be remembered in consulting the earliest Fathers for information that it was not their custom to quote any books of the New Testament with scrupulous accuracy, or to name the writers. In addressing heathens such a process would have been utterly useless, in addressing Christians familiar with the Apostolic writings they would seem to have deemed it needless. What we do find in the case of those portions of Scripture, which are accepted as genuine by the most unscrupulous critics, are allusions, adaptations of striking thoughts and utterances, words and sentences embedded, so to speak, in exhortations or addresses to the heart and conscience of Christians, indications of familiarity with the works so noticed both on the part of the writers and of those to whom they were writing. If we bear this in mind we shall find, as the result of careful inquiry, that, compared with any other portion of equal extent, we have a most unusual quantity of such allusions in reference to this Epistle, sufficient, if not to convince those who start with a fixed opinion of its irreconcilableness with their own theories, yet to satisfy all other critics, however free and bold in their inquiries, of its acceptance by the early Church.

Rome, for instance, is represented most perfectly by St Clement. Addressing the Corinthians he abounds, as might be expected, in allusions to the Pauline Epistles. Yet if we apply the broad test of indices, compiled, as in the edition of Gebhardt and Harnack, without any view to controversy, we find in that Epistle no less than seventeen passages bearing more or less satisfactory indications of familiarity with St Peter's words and thoughts, a larger number in proportion than even the references to Romans (18), to 1 Cor. (23), 2 Cor. (5), Gal. (6), Eph. (12): larger even than to the Epistle to the Hebrews, with which, as is well known, the mind of St Clement was so thoroughly impregnated that critics of high authority have attributed to him its authorship. Nor is this general impression materially weakened when we examine the references in detail. Some of these passages are cited in the following commentary, see notes on chh. i. 16, 19, ii. 21; they leave a distinct impression that the writer had St Peter's Epistle present to his mind, and had reason to believe that it must have been known to his readers. There are two references to 1 Pet. ii. 13, 15, in the newly-discovered portion of St Clement's Epistle. See §§ LIX. and LXI.

The only other writer of very early date who represents in any sense the Church of Rome is Hermas. In his well-known, but fanciful work, the 'Shepherd,' very few clear quotations are found from any books of the New Testament. His vague and inaccurate style, both as regards thought and the expression of thought, would seem incompatible with what is called diplomatic exactitude. Still the traces of familiarity with this Epistle are numerous and tolerably clear. He adopts figures of speech common in St Peter, expresses doctrinal views in similar language, and though he cannot be relied upon as an independent authority, he must be regarded as one whose notices harmonize with those which, as all admit, in the course of the next century prove the universal reception of this Epistle by the Churches of Christendom.

¹ This notice of Papias is of great importance. Eusebius, 'H. E.' II. 15, says that, according to Papias, St Peter mentions Mark in his first Epistle, which he wrote in Rome itself, and that he calls Rome Babylon, metaphorically. See also Euseb. 'H. E.' III. 25.

² This statement, so far as regards St John, has been questioned, but abundant proof of its credibility is given by Bishop Lightfoot; see his two articles on Papias in the 'Contemporary Review,' 1875.

We turn to the East; to those Fathers who represent the Churches of Asia Minor most completely. There we have positive and most important results. Of all the early Fathers none stand higher in character and position, none are entitled to, or have received, more reverence than Polycarp¹, the faithful disciple of St John, saint and martyr, Bishop of Smyrna at the close of the first century, a man who won the crown of life promised in the book of Revelation, ii. 10, to him who in the hour of trial should "be faithful unto death." Now in the Epistle of that great Bishop addressed to the Philippians there are quotations from our Epistle so distinct and so accurate, that no critic questions the fact. Their only resource is a reckless, and, we must add, futile attempt to disprove the authenticity of Polycarp's Epistle, in spite of all the strongest imaginable attestation to its unquestioned reception in early ages. The reader need but glance at the passages from that Epistle referred to in this Commentary or conspicuously marked in the margin of the editions of Bishop Jacobson, of Hefele, and of Gebhardt and Harnack, to be satisfied that St Polycarp, the disciple of St John, the staunch follower and admirer of St Paul, dwelt with special earnestness upon the teaching of St Peter in our Epistle².

We need not discuss the question whether Justin Martyr had read this Epistle. It is well known that in addressing heathens and unconverted Jews that writer had no occasion for quoting Christian works, and that the evidence of his familiarity with the Gospels and the Pauline Epistles rests on deductions rather than on positive data. Yet traces there are—scarcely less distinct than those which in other cases have satisfied most critics—of familiarity with our Apostle's teaching and language. Without claiming him as a witness we hold that his testimony is far from adverse to the general reception of our Epistle in his time.

¹ On Polycarp see the exhaustive article by Bp. Lightfoot in the 'Contemporary Review,' May, 1875; he deals thoroughly with the internal as well as external proofs of the authenticity of this Epistle. The date of Polycarp's death has been lately established, in a manner satisfactory to all critics (e.g. Hilgenfeld, Lipsius, and E. Renan), by inscriptions of which a full account has been given by M. Waddington. It must have taken place between A.D. 154 and A.D. 156. We know from Polycarp's own statement that he had then been 86 years a Christian; and he was probably not much less than 100 years old. We have thus a practically contemporary testimony to the reception of our Epistle in Asia Minor. See the note in Vol. II. p. 163 of 'Patres Apostolici,' Gebhardt and Harnack, and Bp. Lightfoot, l.c.

² It is somewhat remarkable that Polycarp has a larger number of passages evidently taken from this Epistle than from any of the Pauline Epistles. This shews the peculiarly strong impression which it had made upon the minds of Christians in Asia Minor.

In the second and early part of the third centuries we have a host of unquestioned and unquestionable attestations. Foremost stands Irenæus, a man representing both the East and the West. Born in Asia Minor, and educated under Polycarp, Presbyter and, after Pothinus of the same great Johannine school, Bishop of the Church of Lyons, well known at Rome where he represented as ambassador the Churches of Gaul, Irenæus combines every claim upon our acceptance of his testimony; and that testimony is positive and conclusive. His quotations are clear and copious: in fact they are admitted as such by all critics. But in Irenæus we have, in all questions of Scriptural canonicity, the authoritative testimony of the whole Church.

Were any adverse testimony¹ from writers of the second century alleged, it might be worth while to adduce Clement of Alexandria, Tertullian and Origen as witnesses; it certainly is worth observing that each of these writers proves that he and his readers were not less familiar with our Epistle—which they quote repeatedly and either expressly, or what is of equal, if not higher importance, in half-unconscious allusions—than with the Evangelists and the writings of St Paul. Origen indeed states positively, in speaking of doubts raised as to the authenticity of the Second Epistle, that the first was acknowledged by all as genuine: he quotes it frequently, and especially in reference to the most characteristic points in the Apostle's teaching, e.g. ch. iii. 18—21.

The testimony of the early Church is summed up by Eusebius, 'H. E.' iii. 23. 3. He places it among those writings about which no question was ever raised, no doubt ever entertained by any portion of the Catholic Church¹.

B. INTERNAL EVIDENCE.

This depends upon a variety of points, to most of which attention will be directed throughout the following Commentary. Here it may suffice to notice, (1) The indications of personal character, brightness of hope, fervour of love, strong personal attachment to the Saviour, singular humility, shewn—as in the Gospel of St Mark written, as most critics admit, under his influence, if not personal superintendence—by a studious omission of all reference to his unquestioned position as foremost among the Apostles, nay, even to the special marks of Divine approbation conferred upon him by our Lord². (2) The harmony of his teaching, and mode of citing the ancient Scriptures, with what we have remarked in his speeches recorded in the Acts, a point of great importance, on which see 'Introduction to Acts,' p. 339 f. (3) The notices of the constitution of Churches which he addressed; it is evidently the same as that with which they were left by St Paul. Presbyters are recognised as the governing body in each community. Subordinate officers, probably deacons, are mentioned, but not so distinctly as to imply their general existence as a separate order; see notes on ch. v. 1 f. If in any cities Bishops as distinct from Presbyters were already appointed, they are not so addressed or designated in this Epistle.

² See notes on ii. 4, and v. 2.

But there is no reasonable ground for doubting that within a very few years from the date of this Epistle, if not in every Church, certainly in all the most important Churches of Asia Minor, the powers, first exercised by presbyters collectively or individually, devolved upon Bishops, most probably under the influence and authority of St John¹. In fact, to whatever cause it may be attributed, the Epistles of Polycarp and Ignatius, the contemporary evidence of Hegesippus, and the concurrent notices in all extant writings of the second century, prove the existence and recognised position of Bishops as depositaries of Apostolic authority. The notices in this Epistle belong beyond controversy to the primitive and as yet undeveloped constitution of the Church. (4) Arguments from style, usage of words, correspondences with other contemporary portions of Scripture would require a special treatise to deal with them adequately. It may be hoped that the reader of this Commentary will find sufficient to satisfy him, and that the investigation, if pursued fairly and thoroughly, will issue in the confirmation of all preceding arguments, and others of a similar character which have long satisfied unbiassed critics. It will be felt to be certain that in this Epistle we have the teaching of that Apostle who is at once the special representative of the original Apostolic body, and, together with St Paul, conspicuous among the chief founders and teachers of the Christian Church.

§ 7. BEARING ON THE STATE OF THE APOSTOLIC CHURCH.

This Epistle, if we admit the points here advanced and defended, gives us a lively illustration of the relative position of the Apostolic body represented by St Peter, and of the Apostle of the Gentiles: that Apostle whose vast field of labour, occupied independently of the original body, might be held to suggest, if not to justify, views which of late years have been vigorously maintained, and have exercised a deleterious influence upon the leaders of opinion in some quarters of the Church.

What we have seen is a distinct recognition by St Peter of the soundness and completeness of the younger Apostle's teaching, a recognition which at that time was most important, if not indispensable to the general reception of that Apostle's claims. We may perhaps be justified in attributing to this recognition the fact that those Epistles, which are regarded by some critics as antagonistic to Petrine doctrine, were accepted by all the Churches of Europe and Asia Minor, in short by all Churches represented by the early Fathers, e.g. Polycarp and Irenæus, to whom we owe the strongest attestations to the reception of the Canonical Scriptures. Nor is this recognition less important as completely cutting away the grounds on which modern speculation has attempted to overthrow the authority of the elder Apostles, representing them as imperfectly imbued with the true Christian principles which St Paul consistently and powerfully upheld. The doctrines of salvation by faith and grace, and the supremacy of God's will, in fact all Divine truths vindicated by St Paul, are declared so plainly by our Apostle that—as we have seen—some critics mainly for that reason have affirmed that this Epistle could not have been penned by any one not belonging to the Pauline school. This Epistle presents us with the clearest possible proof of the fundamental accordance of principle and the thorough unity of spirit in those two Apostles, in whom the earliest and best representatives of Christian life recognised "the most righteous and most noble columns" of the Church¹.

It may be objected that some doctrines specially characteristic of St Paul have no certain or distinct place in this Epistle; that of justification by faith alone being the most conspicuous instance. To this a satisfactory answer may be given. The Epistle is much shorter than either Romans or Galatians, in which alone St Paul explicitly sets it forth, having special reasons for dwelling upon the doctrine in opposition to those who maintained the sufficiency of the law. It would not indeed have been possible within so small a compass to develop or even to state every application of the central truth, to which in common with all essential doctrines, that of justification by faith must be referred¹. Now that truth of truths, vital union with Christ, and hearty reception of the inseparable truths of atonement and redemption, stands out with singular distinctness in the highly wrought representation of the Church as a spiritual temple, and with as singular completeness in the summary statements of doctrine which have been noted above as specially characteristic of this Apostle. Had there indeed been any repugnance to the form in which the great doctrine of justifying faith was preached by St Paul, assuredly St Peter would not have hesitated to indicate his apprehension that it was liable to be misunderstood and misapplied. He was not likely to be less outspoken than St James; nor, had such been his feeling, would he have withheld the warning which he afterwards gave, probably elicited by Antinomian teaching, in his second epistle².

In conclusion we would briefly call attention to these facts. The Epistle is admitted in its principles, its form and substantial bearings of doctrine, to be at once Petrine and Pauline; that at least is the outcome of most careful, and, it must be added, most jealous scrutiny. We would simply add that the unity of spirit thus manifested accords with all the notices of the mutual relations between the two Apostles which are to be found (1) in St Paul's own writings, (2) in the other books of the New Testament, specially in the Acts of the Apostles, and (3) in Christian writers in all quarters of Christendom within the period when the Apostolic tradition is held by the soundest critics to have been retained without intermixture or deterioration.

¹ See note on v. 12. At present it is a very common and exceedingly mischievous habit to assert or suggest that points of fact, or of doctrine, not expressly stated in any book in the N.T., are unknown to the writer. Applied to any one of St Paul's shorter Epistles, indeed to any except Romans and Galatians, the results would be confessedly misleading. Applied to this Epistle, shorter than Galatians or Ephesians, it is used to justify the astounding assertion that St Peter knew not the deepest and most fundamental principles of the Christian faith. That assertion is the more remarkable, inasmuch as it is urged most vehemently by critics who reject the central truth on which the doctrine specially in question rests.

² See note on 2 Pet. iii. 16.

(1) St Paul tells us (Gal. i. 18) that fifteen days of his visit to Jerusalem, the first after his conversion, were spent in personal intercourse with St Peter, probably in the same house, if not in St Peter's own home; that on the next occasion of his visiting that city, at a crisis of exceeding interest and importance, St Peter in common with the two Apostles who are equally calumniated, St John and St James, accepted his doctrinal teaching as complete and sound, needing no addition and calling for no amendment¹; that they gave him the right hand of fellowship, and distinctly recognised his peculiar position as called to evangelize the vast realms of heathenism; and that on the solitary occasion when the two Apostles, each acting in accordance with his own position and temperament, stood out in open opposition, St Paul had not to maintain a different principle, but to appeal with full confidence to the deepest feelings of St Peter and to the identity of principles maintained by both. See Gal. ii. 11 f. Observe also the explicit affirmation by St Paul touching the entire correspondence between his teaching and that of the other Apostles, 1 Cor. xv. 11.

(2) In the Acts (ch. xv. 7—9) we find St Peter, in exact accordance with these statements, vindicating the proceedings of St Paul which had been assailed by the party which St Peter is said to have countenanced, and most materially influencing the decision of the Apostolic council which attested the soundness in the faith, and confirmed the authority, of the beloved Barnabas and Paul. It should be remembered that St Peter had himself been specially assailed by the representatives of the Pharisaic party after the Baptism of Cornelius; see Acts xi. 2, 3.

(3) The testimony of Polycarp, Irenæus, Dionysius of Corinth, Clement of Alexandria, Tertullian, and in short every Christian writer of the first three centuries, is beyond all question in perfect agreement with these utterances of inspiration. Foremost and most distinct among them we have the words of St Clement of Rome, addressed, within some 30 years, to a Church in which, if in any Church of Christendom, traces of the assumed antagonism of the two Apostles might be looked for. Those words in part we have already quoted in the Introduction to the Acts, p. 326, note 1, but cannot refrain from citing here at length as they now stand in the edition of Bryennios, and as they are accepted by Bishop Lightfoot and other critics. They convey the strongest imaginable attestation to the judgment of the early Church touching the mutual relations of St Peter and St Paul. "But to pass from the ancient examples let us come to those athletes who are very near to us in time: let us take the noble examples of our own generation. Owing to jealousy and envy the greatest and most righteous pillars (cf. Gal. ii. 9) were persecuted and suffered even unto death. Let us set before our eyes the good¹ Apostles: Peter who, owing to unrighteous jealousy, endured not one or two but numerous sufferings, and thus, having borne witness as a martyr, departed to the abode of glory which was due to him. Owing to jealousy and strife Paul exemplified the reward of patient endurance. Seven times he was a prisoner in chains, he was exiled, he was stoned, he preached both in the east and in the west, and attained the noble renown of his faith, having taught righteousness to the whole world; and finally having arrived at the boundary of the west, and borne witness as martyr before the governors, he was then released from the world, and departed unto the holy place, having become the greatest pattern of endurance."

'Clem. Rom. to the Corinthians,' c. vi.¹ These two Apostles are thus held up together as the two great examples for the imitation of all Christians, with special reference to the maintenance of the unity of the Church and to the suppression of all unseemly antagonism².

² Bishop Lightfoot has an important statement in the Appendix to his edition of the Epistle of St Clement. "In the close of the epistle

mention is made of the bearers of the letter, two Romans, Claudius Ephebus and Valerius Bito. —These delegates are described as 'faithful and prudent men who have walked among us from youth unto old age unblameably'—they must have been close upon thirty years of age when St Paul first visited Rome. They must therefore have had a direct personal knowledge of the relations between the two Apostles, St Peter and St Paul (supposing that St Peter also visited Rome, as I do not doubt that he did), and of the early history of the Roman Church." We owe this among other facts of exceeding interest to the late discovery, by Archbp Bryennios, of the missing portion of St Clement's Epistle. Bishop Lightfoot further adds, "to this theory (sc. the Tübingen theory of antagonism between the teaching of the two Apostles) the Epistle of Clement, the one authentic document which has the closest bearing on the subject, gives a decided negative."

THE FIRST EPISTLE GENERAL OF PETER.

CHAPTER I.

1 He blesseth God for his manifold spiritual graces: 10 shewing that the salvation in Christ is no news, but a thing prophesied of old: 13 and exhorteth them accordingly to a godly conversation, inasmuch as they are now born anew by the word of God.

THE SALUTATION (I. 1, 2).

CHAP. I. 1. Peter] In addressing Christians the Apostle here calls himself by that name which was most precious to himself and most impressive for them, inasmuch as it was given to him by his Lord, Matt. xvi. 18. In the Second Epistle he uses the two names, Simon, or Symeon, Peter.

an apostle] A Roman Catholic commentator (Estius) remarks, as an instance of modesty, that St Peter does not call himself the Prince of the Apostles. He might have also drawn the obvious inference that the Apostle neither claimed nor recognised any distinction of rank or authority between himself and his colleagues.

to the strangers...] Lit. "to the strangers, or sojourners, of the dispersion." The word rendered "strangers" means persons sojourning for a brief season in a foreign land. See Note at the end of the Chapter. The question whether it here applies exclusively or chiefly to the Jews, or includes all believers, is of considerable importance for the right understanding of the Epistle. There can be no doubt that the expression did primarily apply to Hebrews dispersed throughout the world, whether they were voluntary or involuntary exiles. But it is equally certain that the Apostles and intelligent Christians of the Apostolic age understood such designations in a wider and more spiritual sense. See Bp Lightfoot on Clem. Rom. '1 Cor.' p. 32. They knew that Israel was a type of the Church, and that every one of its special privileges and peculiar circumstances has a true and far more perfect fulfilment in Christians. These words, therefore, apply to all believers, Jews or Gentiles, whose true home, whose citizenship and conversation, is in heaven, and who, like their prototypes the patriarchs, are strangers and pilgrims upon earth. Hengstenberg (on Revelation xi. 13) remarks that "the words as here used include all Gentile converts, and exclude all unbelieving Jews, for the Apostles always understand

PETER, an apostle of Jesus Christ, to the strangers scattered throughout Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia, and Bithynia,

2 Elect according to the foreknowledge of God the Father, through the elect of God, even His Church, when they use words which, in their primary sense, belonged to the people of Israel." Thus too Grimm, 'Lex. N. T.' s.v., holds that the name is applied to Christians dispersed among the Gentiles. Cf. John xi. 52. So also Hilgenfeld, 'Einl.' p. 627. In this Church there is neither Jew nor Gentile, nor did St Peter, when he wrote this Epistle, admit or recognise any peculiarity of position or privileges in the converts of the circumcision. He was their Apostle, but, as such, it was his special work to complete the fusion which had been commenced by his special ministry in the case of Cornelius.

Pontus...] Some commentators consider that the order in which these countries are named shews that the Apostle directed his Epistle to them from the East. (Bengel and Steiger.) This is very doubtful. The provinces are not geographically situate in an order corresponding to this enumeration. In that case, as Ewald observes, Cappadocia would have come first. It is possible that St Peter may have had in mind the route which his emissary would pursue, but that route was determined by considerations which we have no data to appreciate. His messenger may have gone by sea to Pontus, which had lately been made a Roman province (cf. Sueton. 'Nero,' c. XVIII.), and thence to Galatia and Cappadocia, and afterwards proceeded to Ephesus, the capital of the province then called Asia, and thence to Bithynia. In all these provinces would be found numerous Churches, planted by St Paul. See notes on Acts ii. 9 and xvi. 7.

2. Elect] (On the probable construction see Additional Note.) The question will of course be raised whether St Peter addresses all baptized and professing members of the Church, elect to the means of grace and to the hope of glory, or those only who are elect unto final salvation. But it is clear that he speaks to all who require exhortation, reproof and correction, and that he considers all sanctification of the Spirit, unto obedience and sprinkling of the blood of Jesus Christ: Grace unto you, and peace, be multiplied.

to be in a state of salvation, but far from being assured of the same result.

according, &c.] We have here the origin of election, viz. the foreknowledge of God the Father. It is a weighty question whether this expression necessarily implies that election depends upon personal qualities in individuals foreknown to God, or rather upon the use which they will make of the means of grace offered equally to all. This appears to have been generally the opinion of the early Fathers, and without an exception of the Eastern Church for ages. See Additional Note. The Latin Fathers, however, who are followed by the great majority of modern divines, especially by those who represent most faithfully the tradition of the Western Church, held that foreknowledge is inseparable from predestination. As Augustine says, God foresees nothing of good which He does not effect. There is no difficulty so far as regards the general purposes of God with reference to His Church. That He foreknew, or that He predestined the gathering of the Church of the elect from Judaism and heathendom, is not a proposition which can be controverted or which could give offence. This we believe to be the meaning of the Apostle. It accords with one principal object which St Peter keeps in mind throughout this epistle, that of shewing the perfect harmony in doctrine between himself and St Paul. Cf. Introd. to Ephesians. It must also be remembered that the categories of time and space do not apply to God or to His eternal acts. Thus Dionysius Alex., 'Ο μὲν θεὸς ἔστιν αἰὲν, καὶ σύμπας ὁ αἰὼν ἐνέστηκεν ὅλος αὐτῷ καὶ πάρεστιν. ap. Routh, 'Rel. Sac.' IV. p. 442. It should suffice for His creatures to know that their salvation depends upon His infinite justice, which is absolutely identical with His love.

through sanctification] Sanctification is the cause, condition, and means of the admission into the inheritance. The precise meaning of the word, in fact the sense in which it would naturally be understood by the Jewish, as well as Gentile converts, is separation from an evil world and dedication to God. (Hence שְׁרָטָה is explained שְׁרָטָה by the Rabbins. See Schoettgen 'Hor. Heb.' I. p. 487.) The expression is not without ambiguity as it may mean sanctification of the Spirit, bestowed by the Holy Ghost, or sanctification of the believer's spirit. This ambiguity may represent the certain truth that sanctification is the result of a complex work wrought by the Spirit on the consenting will.

N.B. Remark the force of the three prepositions, (κατὰ) in accordance with the foreknowledge and eternal will of the Father, (ἐν) through or, more exactly, in the initiative act and the progressive course of spiritual sanctification, (εἰς) unto the effect and end of that election and work. Observe also that the word sanctification (ἀγιασμός) is used eight times by St Paul, but does not occur elsewhere in the N. T.

unto obedience and sprinkling] The end, so far as our actual state is concerned, is twofold. We are brought into a state of obedience, prompt and willing obedience to our Lord, and of purification from guilt by virtue of His atoning blood. It is perhaps singular that St Peter should make obedience precede the sprinkling. Since, however, obedience is the immediate result of the sanctifying work of the Spirit, this order may be taken to indicate that the first movement of the awakened will is to obey the call (cf. Acts ix. 6), and so to approach the cross, of the Redeemer. Obedience is therefore the first act, as well as the permanent characteristic of true faith.

and sprinkling] The sprinkling of blood, according to the terms of the eternal Covenant, has the special effect of cleansing from the guilt of sin. It is applied to the conscience by the Spirit in Baptism; thus "Arise, and be baptized, and wash away thy sins," Acts xxii. 16. The blood of the paschal lamb, and of other sacrifices, especially of the heifer, typified this expiatory efficacy of Christ's blood, and also the propitiation which it ensures: cf. Heb. ix. 13, 14, 22. Our Lord expiated our sins by pouring out His blood, i.e. the life-blood of the human nature which He assumed, and federally represented. At the same time, and by the same act, He propitiated the Father, inasmuch as He then and there, on our behalf, and in our stead, exemplified the entire fulfilment of the fundamental principle of His Law, absolute, entire, all sacrificing love. Faith makes Christians partakers of that act, represents and applies to the conscience the shedding of that blood; being thus sprinkled with it they have remission of sins and entire acceptance, for "God hath set Him forth to be a propitiation through faith in His blood, to declare His righteousness for the remission of sins that are past." Rom. iii. 25.

Observe the mode in which each Person of the adorable Trinity is represented as concurrently acting for our salvation, the Father foreknows, the Son atones, the Spirit applies the work of the Son to the conscience.

Grace] St Peter, like St Paul, Rom. i. 7, and St Jude, combines the two beautiful salutations of the Greeks (χαίρε) and of the He-

3 Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, which according to his ¹ abundant mercy hath begotten us again unto a lively hope by the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead, brews (ברכה), but gives to each the true and full Christian significance. Grace, that is not merely favour with man, and earthly joy, but spiritual blessing bestowed gratuitously by a loving Father (thus Theophylact and Œcumenius); and peace, not merely security and tranquillity in temporal matters, but peace with God, peace in Christ accorded to those who were enemies to God, peace applied to the conscience by the Spirit, and pervading the whole existence of believers. Thus the Angel, who announced the Incarnation, saluted the Virgin, Hail thou who art highly favoured, or endued with grace, and thus our Lord saluted His disciples after the resurrection, Peace be unto you. St Peter adds "be multiplied," an expression which has a peculiar fitness, for they to whom it was addressed were elect, called, and sanctified, and had therefore the firstfruits of the Spirit, needing only continuance and increase.

N.B. Πληθυνθεῖν is used in the New Testament only by St Peter—in both epistles—and by St Jude; cf. Daniel iii. 31, LXX. St Polycarp uses it in the salutation of his Epistle to the Philippians. The same form is found in Rabbinical writers, quoted by Wetstein; Sanhedrin f. 11. 2, Scribit fratribus filius meridiei: pax vestra multiplicetur.

3—12. St Peter now introduces the great subject of his epistle (a. 3—5) with a thanksgiving for the privileges of Christians, sc. regeneration, living hope, a future inheritance and preservation unto final salvation. (b. 6—9.) He passes on to the feelings which characterize true Christians in seasons of severe trial, such as were then afflicting them; they rejoice in sufferings which are needful for the attestation of faith, and by which it is fully developed, giving a sure earnest and foretaste of salvation.

3—5. THANKSGIVING.

3. Blessed, &c.] St Paul begins the second Epistle to the Corinthians and that to the Ephesians with the same form of words. If, as we believe, St Peter had seen one or both of those epistles, he must have adopted the words expressly to indicate the perfect harmony of feeling, as well as of doctrine between himself and the apostle of the Gentiles, an object which he had very specially at heart. See Introd. §§ 2 and 5.

Father of our Lord Jesus Christ] It is a peculiar characteristic of the Christian revelation that it makes God known to us in those personal relations upon which the economy of our salvation is based. It is because the Father is the Father of our Saviour that we bear to Him the relation of adopted children, that He is our merciful, forgiving and loving Father.

N.B. Εὐλογητός in the New Testament is always used in speaking of God, εὐλογημένος in speaking of man.

which... hath begotten] Rather, who... begat. St Peter refers our regeneration to the act, by which Christ completed His work. This passage teaches us (1) that the original cause of our regeneration is the will of the Father, determined solely by His own great mercy: thus St James "of His own will begat He us," and St Paul "not for works of righteousness which we had done, but according to His mercy He saved us." (2) That the effective cause, i.e. the agency by which that purpose was carried into effect, was the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead. In the same way as His death both represented, and virtually effected, the death of the old man in Christians, so His rising both represented, and assured, as a pledge and means, their resurrection from the death of sin, when being regenerate, they were born again unto the life of Holiness. It was a pledge, inasmuch as He lived again unto righteousness, to become a sanctifying as well as justifying principle of life; it was the means, because He rose to take possession of His throne, there to receive, and thence to bestow, gifts upon men, that the Lord God might dwell among them. "He rose again for our justification;" see note on Rom. iv. 25. Nay more, the whole Church is declared to have risen again in the resurrection of Christ, in virtue of that spiritual union which identifies Him with His members. That resurrection recommences, or is repeated in the regeneration of each Christian, it will be completed in the ultimate glorification of all true believers.

N.B. This construction connects δι' ἀναστάσεως with ἀναγεννήσας, not with ζῶσαν, compare Rom. iv. 25, and this Ep. iii. 21. Thus Estius, Calvin, Huther. The other construction however is preferred by Œcum., Luther, Bengel, Steiger, De Wette, &c., and it gives an excellent sense—the hope of the Christian lives and is quickened by the power of our Lord's resurrection.

lively hope] Or, a living hope, i.e. a hope having in it the principle of spiritual life, springing as from a root, from the resurrection of our Lord, and producing the fruits of life. It has been often remarked that St Peter dwells with peculiar earnestness and frequency on the doctrine of the Resurrection, and on the hopes and blessings which it involves; and also that he loves the epithets, lively and living, for us.

4 To an inheritance incorruptible, and undefiled, and that fadeth not away, reserved in heaven ¹ for you,

5 Who are kept by the power of God through faith unto salvation ready to be revealed in the last time.

and the mention of hope, so much so that a late commentator observes that if St John may be called the apostle of love, and St Paul of faith, our Peter is especially the preacher of hope. It is remarkable that the word hope does not occur in the synoptic gospels. As a Christian grace it is derived from the Resurrection. In fact in classical writers the word rendered hope means simply expectation.

(Bengel. Amat Petrus epitheton vivus, et mentionem spei. Thus also Pott and Steiger. Heidegger. ζῶσα quia et fructus vitæ edit, et spes vitæ est et permanet.)

4. To an inheritance] The Christian is born again not merely to the subjective, or inward, change from despair to living hope, but to the objective change from the mortality, corruptible, polluted, and withering, which he inherited from Adam, to the immortality incorruptible, not liable to dissolution—undefiled, not subject to pollution—that fadeth not away, having in it the principle of eternal youth, which is his inheritance in Christ. Each word is emphatic and refers to a special blessing and privilege of the Saints in light. This redundancy of epithets, with a remarkable fulness of spiritual meanings, is characteristic of St Peter. In each of these expressions there appears to be a tacit reference to the temporal, and therefore typical, inheritance bestowed upon the people of the ancient covenant.

reserved in heaven] The ancient commentators infer from this that Christians are not to look forward to a state of millennial felicity on earth. The inference may be evaded, but it is obvious, natural, and in accordance with many important declarations of Holy Writ. The expression “reserved” is remarkable. It implies (Est.) that the care of God for His elect is from everlasting, and that in founding the heavens He reserved a portion for the inheritance of His children, not like Paradise open to the assaults of the evil one, but having salvation for its walls. Some have believed that the ancient Paradise was taken up into heaven at the Fall, and is there “reserved” until the Second Advent, an opinion which, though fanciful and unfounded, typifies the great truth, that the paradisiacal state of bliss and innocence will be restored, and that the purposes of God remain unchanged.

N.B. Thus Didymus, Theophylact, and Œcumenius, who uses the strong expression μυθώδης ἡ χιλιότης ἀποκατάστασις “the millennarian restoration is purely fabulous.” The vehemence with which all the Fathers, from the third century downwards, attack all modifications of the millennarian doctrine is most remarkable. See especially S. Basil ‘Ep.’ 263, c. 4, S. Greg. Naz. T. 11, p. 92 and 95, and Dionys. Alex. ap. Eus. ‘H. E.’ VII. c. 24. The passages of the earlier Fathers are collected, and carefully examined by the Oxford translator of Tertullian, Vol. I. p. 120. He holds that they generally, indeed without exception before Origen, believed in a Millennium, but not a carnal one, a spiritual reign of resuscitated saints preparatory to the entire fruition of the Godhead. It is difficult to reconcile that view either with such passages as this in Scripture, or with the statements of Hegesippus and Polycrates ap. Eus. ‘H. E.’ III. c. 20 and V. 24. N.B. Schoettgen quotes a passage from the Sohar which bears some resemblance to this, Beata est portio illius hominis (ירידת אחסנתא) (רא ונפיר לה) qui accipit hæreditatem hanc; et cui illa adservata est; נפיר corresponds very accurately to τερηρημένην. Sohar Exod. f. 36, col. 142. See also the passage quoted by Schoettgen on Rom. xi. 16.

for you] There is a great preponderance of authority for this reading.

5. Who are kept] An expression which suggests a warning, for it excludes those who do not remain in the faith, but which is full of comfort, since it assures us that the Father who preserves the inheritance, also protects and guards the heirs. The word for kept here used in the original is a military term, and means such a guard as is maintained by a powerful garrison to protect a fortress from assault or surprise. The Christian is thus kept by the power of God and by His hosts, for “the angel of the Lord encampeth around them that fear Him.”

by the power] The original has “in the power,” a striking and peculiar expression, which here implies that the believer is kept within the sphere of God’s special manifestation of power. He is encircled by the everlasting arms. “He lives and exists in the power of God, and within this he is kept.” Steiger.

through faith] Lit. “through the faith,” that is the subjective condition, not that faith has any power in itself, but it constrains us to keep within the fortress, trusting in His protection.

ready to be revealed] The Apostle thus speaks of the salvation, unto which we are kept, as already accomplished, though not yet fully manifested. The inheritance is already secured, but it will not be bestowed until the last time. Even to departed saints who are secure of salvation, if the ancient Fathers are right, that glory will not be fully manifested

6 Wherein ye greatly rejoice, though now for a season, if need be, ye are in heaviness through manifold temptations :

7 That the trial of your faith, being much more precious than of gold that perisheth, though it be tried with fire, might be found unto praise and ho-until Christ who is their life shall appear, and they with all believers will appear with Him in glory. Can such an anticipation be reconciled with a preliminary manifestation of the Messiah upon earth? Whether St Peter and the other apostles believed that the last time was close at hand according to our ordinary notions is quite uncertain, nor should we attach weight to the arguments of commentators who always adopt that interpretation of Holy Scripture which is most unfavourable to the inspiration of the sacred writers. The word "ready" proves absolutely nothing. The salvation was "ready" in the eternal counsels of God. See note on ch. iii. 7. (T. Burnett was among the first, if not the first, who held the notion that the Apostles, mistaking the meaning of our Lord's prediction, believed in a speedy termination of the world. 'De statu Mort. et Resurg.')

6-9. FEELINGS OF CHRISTIANS.

6. Wherein] This word may refer either to the last time, or to the whole sentence enumerating the Christian's privileges. The contemplation of the last time is always represented as a source of rejoicing to believers, for, notwithstanding all the terrors of judgment, the predominant idea is that of a manifestation of the sons of God (Rom. viii. 19), which will accompany the full revelation of the glory of Christ: so that believers may truly be said to rejoice greatly in the contemplation of the last time. It is however more probable that "wherein" refers to the statement of present and future blessings, the lively hope and the assured inheritance. There is no real incompatibility between the two states of rejoicing and sorrow. The sorrow is on the surface only, the joy pervades the very depth and centre of the believer's being, "Blessed are they that mourn;" blessed even now, who are "rejoicing in hope," "as sorrowful, yet always rejoicing." Rom. xii. 12; 1 Cor. vi. 10.

for a season] Literally, "for a little," which may mean, little in degree, slight in comparison, or, as is more probable, brief in duration; brief, that is compared with eternity, although the affliction might, and very generally did in those days, extend over the entire earthly existence of believers. Their light affliction which was but for a moment, worked for them "a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory." 2 Cor. iv. 17.

N.B. 'Ολίγον is not used thus in the N. T., excepting in v. 10 of this Epistle, in the same connection. Syr. ܐܠܝܟܝܢ, Vulg. modicum;

New Test.—VOL. IV.

i.e. in a moderate degree. Ecumenius says, μικρὸν ἄπει ἐπει μικρὸς καὶ ὀλίγος ὁ παρὼν βίος. It seems not improbable that St Peter combined both notions in one word, as St Paul keeps both in view in the beautiful text which is quoted above.

if need be] This implies that afflictions do not come unless they are necessary conditions of the accomplishment of God's work, whether they be for the salvation of the suffering believer, "for through much tribulation we must enter into the kingdom of God," Acts xiv. 22, or for the advancement of the kingdom of Christ, the blood of martyrs being the seed of the Church. Both motives concur in teaching, not merely resignation, but cheerful acquiescence in this trying proof of His love, who "doth not willingly afflict" any.

N.B. The passages from Lysias and Antiphon quoted by Wetstein do not correspond to, or serve to explain, this phrase. In the one passage εἴ τι δέοι, "whatever might betide," is an euphemism for death; in the other εἰ δέον ἐστὶ means since it is needful, and does not involve any notion of contingency. Ecumenius gives the true interpretation, "If need be," because not every believer is tried by affliction, not every sinner. Luther remarks that the phrase is equivalent to that which best explains it, "if such be the will of God," iii. 17.

ye are in heaviness] This should rather be translated, have been afflicted. St Peter does not refer to possible, or general trials, but to afflictions which actually had befallen the churches planted by St Paul.

7. That the trial, &c.] The result of all temptation to the faithful is uniform. It at once purifies them and attests the sterling qualities of their hearts. If gold, which is a material and therefore a perishable thing, is benefited by the purifying fire, much more must this be the case with the imperishable man. The fire of affliction can only affect the accidents of his external condition, it will prepare him for a state of grace, and entitle him to those rewards which, though proceeding from free grace, are bestowed conditionally—the reward of praise, for then "every man shall have praise of God," 1 Cor. iv. 5; of honour, "for them that honour me will I honour," 1 Sam. ii. 30; and the reward of glory, "for glory, honour and peace shall be to every man that worketh good," Rom. ii. 10. The order in which these rewards are mentioned depends upon their internal relation. Commentators have not been generally careful enough, nour and glory at the appearing of Jesus Christ :

8 Whom having not seen, ye love ; in whom, though now ye see him not, yet believing, ye rejoice with joy unspeakable and full of glory :

9 Receiving the end of your faith, even the salvation of your souls.

10 Of which salvation the pro-

in explaining these words ; but "praise" means the approbation of God, the immediate result of triumph over temptation ; "honour" refers to the distinction conferred upon the good soldiers of Christ in the Church militant ; "glory," which includes both the preceding, and raises them to their highest intensity, is already their portion, now reserved in heaven, and to be manifested when the Church triumphant will be enthroned with the Lord, and share that glory which was His "from the beginning of the world."

N.B. Τὸ δοκίμιον, a good classical word used by Plato in the sense of "touchstone." Here it means the result of the trial. Calvin observes, there is a twofold trial of gold by fire, one when it is purified of dross, the other when it is assayed. Both are here included. This metaphor is so common among classical writers that it had become proverbial. Wetstein collects numerous passages, to which may be added this older and more forcible one. Pindar 'Pyth.' x. Ep. iv. πειρώντι δὲ καὶ χρυσὸς ἐν βασάνῳ πρόπει καὶ νόος ὀρθός. This passage also from St Augustine is worth quoting. Sicut sub uno igne aurum rutilat, palea fumat—ita una eademque vis irruens bonos probat, purificat, eliquat: malos damnat, vastat, exterminat. Tantum interest non qualia, sed qualis patiat. 'De Civ. D.' i. c. 8. Greg. Nyssen also has a fine passage on repeated trials of gold compared with those of Christians. 'Vit. S. Macrin.' ii. p. 187. There is some difference of opinion as to what is meant by gold being perishable. Perit aurum vel a furibus ablatum, vel certe morte domini. Wetstein. Quod aliquando perituum est. Grotius. Aurum cum mundo perit, nec tum juvabit quemquam. Bengel. The word rendered "which perisheth," is omitted in some editions and MSS. of the Vulgate, probably on account of this difficulty. There is no doubt of its genuineness. Cf. Irenæus, iv. 9.

at the appearing] Or, revelation. The word implies that a glory now complete will be unveiled, and manifested. See iv. 13; Rom. viii. 18, 19; 1 Cor. i. 7; 2 Thess. i. 7.

8. having not seen] St Peter seems to refer to our Lord's saying, "Blessed are they who have not seen, and yet have believed." The Gentile converts in Asia Minor could not have seen Him, nor probably had many of the Jews resident in those parts. The expression is rightly understood to imply that the writer had himself seen the Lord, and it is therefore a mark of authenticity. This passage is quoted by Polycarp, 'Ep. Ph.' i.

9. Receiving] This represents believers as already receiving, if not in complete possession of, the object and reward of faith. The Christian who is virtually dead with Christ is also virtually risen with Him, and in a very true, though inchoate, or incomplete sense, does receive salvation. "By grace ye are saved through faith," Eph. ii. 8, "According to His mercy He saved us," Tit. iii. 5. "We have peace with God," Rom. v. 1.

N.B. Thus Clemens Alex. 'Strom.' vii. p. 727 A, says of the mature Christian χαίρει μὲν ἐπὶ τοῖς παρούσιν ἀγαθοῖς, γέγηθε δὲ ἐπὶ τοῖς ἐπηγγελμένοις ὡς ἤδη παρούσιν. In the preceding page he says very beautifully that their souls not yet arriving unto the absolute good dwell, as it were, in the vestibules of their Father's Palace, near to the Great High Priest. Τέλος includes the two ideas "result" and "reward." This is admitted by Calvin and Beza, a point of some importance, since the interpretation is sometimes objected to, as not Protestant.

even the salvation] Some have inferred from this text that Faith which secures justification is indefectible. Of course if we were to take "rejoice" in the future sense (see note above), the interpretation would fall, and with it the inference. This, however, is not necessary, for in truth the participle "receiving" has an imperfect sense, very different from "having received." It implies that in proportion as the Christian realizes by faith, he appropriates and enjoys by anticipation, the ultimate blessings of salvation. De Wette says untruly that "salvation" is a word and an idea peculiar to St Paul. There is not a book in the New Testament in which the word, either as a verb, or as a concrete noun, does not occur. The idea is the very foundation of the Gospel. See the Concordance for "save, Saviour, salvation," &c.

10. the prophets] No sacred writer refers more frequently to the prophetic Scriptures than St Peter, both in his speeches and epistles. The view of prophetic inspiration in this passage is peculiar and striking. The words and declarations which the prophets were commissioned to utter are represented as subjects of diligent inquiry to themselves ; so far were they from being the products of their own intelligence. Doubtless had the prophecies been the result of reflection, or of a certain instinctive intuition, in minds quickened by the Spirit of God, they would be truly represented as inspired. This passage, however, goes much farther. It certainly implies phets have enquired and searched diligently, who prophesied of the grace that should come unto you :

11 Searching what, or what manner of time the Spirit of Christ which was in them did signify, when it testified beforehand the sufferings of Christ, and the glory that should follow.

that the Spirit of Christ presented images to their minds, and put words into their mouths, which so far from originating they were unable to comprehend. Thus we read of Daniel inquiring of the Angel as to the meaning of the revelations which he received, Dan. vii. 16. Some of the earlier commentators (Ecumenius and Theophylact, followed by Est) consider that this inquiry and diligent searching refers to the movements of the prophets' spirits before and during the process of inspiration, and that having found what they sought, they recorded it in the sacred oracles. The former interpretation seems preferable. The Targum on Ecclesiastes i. 8 says, the ancient prophets inquired earnestly about all events that were preordained in the world, and were unable to discover their limits, and Rashi on Numbers xxiii. 23 represents the Angels as inquiring from the Saints, what is God doing?

of the grace] De Wette says that "grace" is an expression so entirely Pauline that its occurrence in a work attributed to any other Apostle makes its authenticity questionable. That it is Pauline is true, but it is Pauline because it is thoroughly Christian. In the controversy against Judaizers the mind of St Paul was especially directed towards this aspect of Christ's religion, but the grace and truth which came by Jesus Christ are the common treasure of the faithful. There is no point which such writers as De Wette are more anxious to establish than the radical discrepancy of Pauline and Petrine doctrine, a notion which is completely overthrown by this Epistle, and by the frequent use of such expressions as "grace," "salvation," &c. See Introduction to Acts, p. 330.

11. what, or what manner] The points, about which the prophets are said to have been specially anxious, are the date and the circumstances of our Lord's Advent in the Flesh. There seems to be a special reference to Dan. ix. 25. It is certain that believers in prophecy were convinced from the study of that and other passages that the Messiah was to come about that very time; a persuasion which extended far beyond the borders of Palestine, and was noted by the historians of Greece and Rome.

N.B. eis riva refers to the simple date, eis riva to the characteristic features of the time. Thus all commentators of any weight from Ecumenius downwards.

the Spirit of Christ] In this most important text we have to consider in the first place the exact meaning of the expression "Spirit of Christ." In some passages it might signify the Spirit, as communicated to Christ, the Incarnate Mediator, and through Him, to His people; in others, the higher or spiritual principle of life in our Lord's humanity; but neither signification can apply to Him before the Nativity. Here it must mean the Spirit proceeding from the Father and the Son, who therefore is called indifferently the Spirit of God, the Spirit of the Father, and here, the Spirit of the Son, or, as in Rom. viii. 9, of Christ. See also Gal. iv. 6. We have therefore the strongest possible declaration of the Godhead of Christ, for none ever doubted that the Spirit which dwelt in the prophets was the Spirit of God. The text is of great weight in the controversy with the Eastern Church, which does not hold the procession of the Spirit from the Father and the Son; but of still greater, as expressing in the clearest and most convincing form that truth, on which all the early Fathers dwelt so lovingly, that the Spirit, which dictated the laws, inspired the seers, and animated the heroes of patriarchal and Jewish times, was the same Spirit by Which the Son even now lives and works in His Church, bestowed then indeed partially, manifested but in figures, speaking in enigmatical utterances, but still the same Spirit then preparing the hearts and understandings of men for His coming in the Flesh, even as now It is preparing them for His second coming in glory.

N.B. St Athanasius states a doctrine held by the greatest doctors of old that the Spirit bears a special relation to the Son, Εἰ γὰρ ἐφρόνουν ὁρθῶς περὶ τοῦ Λόγου, ἐφρόνουν ὑγιᾶς καὶ περὶ τοῦ Πνεύματος, ὃ παρὰ τοῦ Πατρὸς ἐκπορεύεται, καὶ τοῦ Υἱοῦ ἰδίον ὃν παρ' αὐτοῦ δίδονται τοῖς μαθηταῖς καὶ πᾶσι τοῖς πιστεύουσιν εἰς αὐτόν, 'Epist. ad Serap.' pp. 518, 519, Tom. II. ed. Bened. In the same treatise he quotes this and other passages, in which the Spirit is specially called the Spirit of the Son. See also Didymus 'de Spiritu Sancto,' who takes great pains to shew that the Holy Spirit is equally called the Spirit of the Father and of the Son.

when it testified] It was a saying of the Jews that the prophets universally and exclusively prophesied of the days of the Messiah.

the sufferings of Christ] St Peter was especially concerned to shew that the sufferings were foretold, because one of the very chiefest points of controversy with the Jews referred to the question whether Christ was to suffer. (See Acts iii. 18, and xxvi. 23, and Justin Martyr, 'Dial. with Trypho,' cc. 22 and 68.) Our Saviour had declared repeatedly before the end for the grace that is to be brought unto you at the revelation of Jesus Christ ;

14 As obedient children, not fashioning yourselves according to the former lusts in your ignorance :

15 But as he which hath called you is holy, so be ye holy in all manner of conversation ;

setting out on a journey, or undertaking a great work, gathered up their loose robes with a girdle, that their movements might be unimpeded, so Christians must bring all loose thoughts and feelings under restraint, and brace all the powers of the inner man, or, as the word (διάνοια) signifies, the "thinking faculty, the soul as the living intellectual principle of our nature," in order to meet the trials and fatigues of a pilgrimage towards heaven. The metaphor is scriptural, cf. Luke xii. 35; Eph. vi. 14; and classical; but the word here used does not occur elsewhere in the New Testament. This passage is quoted verbatim by Polycarp, 'Ep. Ph.' § 1.

be sober] This may be a practical explanation of the metaphor; but more probably it points to the sobriety of spirit, specially characteristic of Church teaching, which Divine grace alone makes compatible with fervent zeal and lively hope. Enthusiasm combined with self-control and perfect self-possession is found in such a Christian warrior as St Paul, who when accused of madness for preaching doctrines which to the cold man of the world savoured of fanaticism, could answer: "I speak forth the words of truth and soberness," Acts xxvi. 25.

hope to the end] Rather, hope perfectly, i.e. with a perfect and enduring hope. The exhortation applies specially to the grace offered to you, and bestowed upon you by the revelation of Jesus Christ.

that is to be brought unto you at the, &c.] Rather, "which is (now) being brought unto you in the revelation of Jesus Christ." The A.V. takes the word as referring to future salvation, but the Greek is clear, and grace is a present blessing. The word "revelation" here does not mean simply the disclosure of saving truth proclaimed by Christ, but the manifestation of Himself; the highest truth, which involves all other truths. Cf. John i. 14.

14. As obedient children] Lit. "children of obedience," an emphatic Hebraism, denoting the inherent and inseparable union between the soul and its motive principle. The Christian is not merely an obedient child, so that if he ceased to be obedient in will and intention, he would still be a child (the adjectival form not implying, of necessity, an essential and characteristic attribute), but he is a child of obedience; his obedience makes him a child, first, as above, in the act of obeying God's call, and it keeps him a child, by preserving his union with God.

N.B. In Hebrew and Arabic two distinct words are used in such phrases as these; the one (meaning "possessor") denotes an accidental, the other (meaning "son") a permanent connection of ideas. The reader who would judge for himself of this not unimportant point may consult the long list in Freytag's 'Arabic Lexicon,' Tom. I. pp. 7, 54 and 161. He will find exceptions, but the principle seems to run through the whole series of examples.

not fashioning] Or, not conforming yourselves, a distinct allusion to Rom. xii. 2; cf. Eph. ii. 3. The expression implies that the soul becomes similar to, all but identified with, the object which it pursues. Contemplating Christ it becomes Christlike, pursuing sensuality it becomes gross, sensual, devilish.

according to the former lusts in your ignorance] This refers to the state of the unconverted, and doubtless applies to Jews as well as Gentiles, but it has a special force and significance as applied to the latter. The unconverted Jew sinned against light, the Gentile without direct or sufficient light (ἐν τῇ ἀγνοίᾳ, a state of absolute, but not wilful ignorance; see Eph. iv. 18 and Acts xii. 30): nor can it be questioned that the strange grossness of Gentile sensuality called for special warnings, such as we find most strongly urged by St Paul in Epistles addressed to Gentile converts. So Hilgenfeld, 'Einl.' p. 448. Bleek notices the bearing of this passage on the date of the Epistle. It is addressed not to the descendants of converts, but to men themselves recently converted. 'Einl.' § 215.

lusts] The Greek Fathers are most careful to point out the distinction between inordinate lusts and strong but natural appetites. Even the word here used is regarded by Chrysostom in very different aspects when connected or not connected with unjustifiable excess (πλεονεξία). We do well to confine the word which is here used, exclusively to inordinate sensuality.

15. he which hath called] Or, He who called you. I.e. God the Father, to whom the calling and election of believers are always attributed. The Christian is called upon to look up to God as his example, an exhortation in accordance with our Saviour's word, Matt. v. 45. Compare also Eph. iv. 24; Col. iii. 10. The special end of God's calling and election is "holiness" (see 1 Thess. iv. 3, and 7), consisting characteristically in entire separation from sin, and here, most probably with reference to sensual defilement.

conversation] The word (ἀναστροφή) here

^a Lev. 11. 44 & 19. 2. & 20. 7. 16 Because it is written, ^a Be ye holy; for I am holy.

17 And if ye call on the Father, who without respect of persons-judgeth according to every man's work, pass the time of your sojourning here in fear:

18 Forasmuch as ye know that ye were not redeemed with corruptible things, as silver and gold, from your used applies peculiarly to the outward course of life, the discharge of relative duties. It occurs twice in the Apocrypha, thrice in St Paul's Epistles, once in St James. St Peter uses it very frequently, six times in this, and twice in the second Epistle.

16. Be ye holy] Or, according to all the best MSS. Ye shall be holy, as in the Septuagint version of the five passages in Leviticus to which St Peter refers. This injunction involves the necessity of conformity to God, a spiritual change going farther even than submission to His will. Bp Lightfoot compares Clem. Rom. '1 Cor.' xxx.

17—21. EXHORTATION TO GODLY FEAR, FOUNDED UPON CERTAINTY OF GOD'S JUDGMENT, AND KNOWLEDGE OF REDEMPTION BY CHRIST'S BLOOD.

17. And if] The word "if" does not imply doubt, or contingency, but marks an indispensable condition. It is not quite equivalent to "since," but means that you cannot be Christians if you do not pray.

if ye call on the Father] Or, if ye invoke as Father Him who. So every Christian does who uses the Lord's Prayer: in doing so he must bear in mind that his Father is his Judge; and that He judges every man according to his own work, without reference to his nation, his position, or his privileges—points specially applicable to Jewish converts, cf. Rom. ii. 1—3—but of practical importance to all. The word here used by St Peter without respect of persons, is peculiar to our Apostle, cf. Acts x. 34, to St Paul and St James, and as such is a characteristic of style; see also Clement of Rome, '1 Cor.' i., and 'Ep. Barn.' iv. 12; but the corresponding idiom is found in Luke xx. 21; and is not uncommon in the Old Testament. Steiger takes great but unsuccessful pains to reconcile this statement with the doctrine of absolute justification by faith, as exempting the believer from judgment to come. It is evident that St Peter, in that agreeing entirely with St Paul (Rom. xiv. 10; 2 Cor. v. 10), inculcates a godly fear, in this life a preservative from sin and a guide of conduct, as inseparable from the sense of an ever-present Judge. "Man" in fact, as St Augustine, speaking of the struggle between the flesh and the spirit, observes, "is ever in peril until the hour of his death," 'Serm.' 151. 6. It is also to be observed that in this passage St Peter refers not to the

of your sojourning] See note above, on v. 1, and cf. Eph. ii. 19.

18. A second and not less cogent argument; ye ought to be holy because your deliverance from the bondage of inherited guilt has been effected at an infinite cost. You have not the excuse of servitude, for the bonds are broken, the ransom has been paid.

redeemed] Or, "ransomed." All theologians agree that the ransom was the life-blood of Christ, and that the bondage from which we were thus delivered was subjection to the power and guilt of sin, specially from the evil spirit that worketh in the children of disobedience, and leadeth them captive according to his will. The principle underlying the act of redemption is variously apprehended, see Thomson's 'Bampton Lectures,' and the note on Rom. iii. 24. Here it may suffice to remark (a) that our Lord took not a man, but man's nature into His Person, and that He so completely identifies Himself with His own that His blood becomes, mystically, but to all intents and purposes, their blood; and (b) that His offering represents and virtually effects an entire surrender of that nature in and by Him to God. This passage of St Peter expresses, more fully than any other in which the word occurs, the special object of the Redemption, viz., deliverance from sin. It is also remarkable as resting the duty of obedience and holiness on the highest and most sacred ground.

vain conversation] Or, "manner of life." See note on v. 15. It is here described as insensate; wickedness and folly are synonymous terms in Holy Scripture: the word rendered vain has generally a special reference to idolatry and is equivalent to beaten (cf. Acts xiv. 15 and note on Rom. i. 21), a point of importance in reference to the following statement that it was "received by tradition from your fathers." St Peter here uses an idiom common in Rabbinical writings which speak of heathen rites and customs as to some extent excusable, being derived by tradition from their fathers: see 'Meg. Esther,' and 'Cholin,' quoted by Wetstein. Thus the Koran represents idolaters as generally rejecting God's messengers because they preferred to follow the traditions of their fathers: cf. Sur. x. 79. It can therefore scarcely be doubted that Gentiles are specially addressed in this passage. Of course St Peter would not have vain conversation received by tradition from your fathers ;

19 But with the precious blood of Christ, as of a lamb without blemish and without spot :

20 Who verily was foreordained before the foundation of the world, but was manifest in these last times for you,

21 Who by him do believe in God, that raised him up from the dead, and exempted the Jewish converts from the charge, but it applied to them far less forcibly than to idolaters practising cruel and licentious rites without compunction or remorse.

19. But with the precious blood] The doctrine of atonement by Christ's blood, typified by that of the paschal lamb, is thus stated with the utmost completeness and distinctness. It was the doctrine which the Apostle had learned originally from John the Baptist, John i. 29, where see note. The correspondence between the type and the Anti-type, and the distinction, are expressed with equal clearness. The lamb was without blemish and spot, a law which applies to all sacrificial offerings, see Lev. iv. 32; to the peace-offerings, Lev. iii. 6, xxii. 22—24; and to the burnt-offering, Lev. i. 10, xii. 6, xiv. 10; Num. xxviii. 3, 11. The first condition of an atoning sacrifice is that it shall be free from the pollution which it expiates; so our Paschal Lamb, in a sense peculiar to Himself, was without all taint of sin. The word "precious" intimates the fundamental distinction between all legal sacrifices and Him who was not only sinless Man, but One with God. Isaiah undoubtedly referred to the paschal lamb when he represented Christ under this image, ch. liii. 7. Compare Clement of Rome, '1 Cor.' c. vii, "Let us fix our thoughts intently on the blood of Christ, and know how precious it is to God His Father, because being poured out for our salvation it brought the grace of repentance to the world." Again in ch. xii., "Through the blood of the Lord there will be redemption to all who believe and hope in God." See too chh. xxi. and xlix. These passages indicate familiar acquaintance with our Epistle on the part of St Clement, and shew how deeply the doctrine of Atonement was impressed upon the consciousness of the primitive Church.

20. foreordained] Lit. "foreknown;" but the knowledge of God is inseparable from His will.

before the foundation of the world] Not in time, which began with creation, subject to vicissitudes and change, but in eternity, resting upon the unchangeable will of God, and determined by considerations which cannot be fully understood by His creatures. The events by which the determination was effected, were simply manifestations of eternal realities. The sacrifice of Christ has been from the beginning the only meritorious cause of salvation. Thus Quenstedt, "the eternal contemplation of Christ's sacrifice is the ground of all divine grace." See the fine remarks of Augustine, 'Confess.' vii. 1. No spiritual work of God falls under the categories of time or space. This is a truth of vital importance, for it teaches Christians to rest with confidence on the eternal and unalterable goodness of the Father who sent His Son to be the propitiation for our sins; and it refutes the erroneous notion that the sacrifice thus offered in accordance with His will was the cause of a change in His purposes. Both Jews and Gentiles thus learned that the election of the whole body of believers was not a new thing, but the accomplishment of an eternal purpose; see the Introduction to the Ephesians.

in these last times] Or, at the end of the times, i.e. in the period which appertains to the final dispensation of God. The "last," because it is not to be superseded by any further manifestation until the end of time. N.B. The reading ἐν ἑσχατοῖς follows the best MSS. and is undoubtedly correct.

for you] The manifestation had for its special object those who through faith should receive Christ as their Saviour, i.e. all believers, Hebrews and Gentiles alike, without reference to any previous qualifications or privileges. It is contrary to the principles held alike by St Peter and St Paul to limit this declaration to the one or to the other. Faith in the Resurrection levels all distinctions.

21. Who by him do believe] Or, according to two principal MSS., "Who through Him are faithful to God." Our version however gives the true meaning. The expression applies with special force to Gentile converts, who learned to know and to believe in God through the Gospel of Christ; but St Peter certainly includes all his readers, Jews as well as Gentiles; both receiving from Christ the only saving knowledge, that which is inseparable from living faith.

N.B. The reading πιστοῦς is supported by A, B, but πιστεύοντας rests on high authority, and yields at least as good a sense as the other reading.

that raised him up from the dead] The two main truths which effected the conversion both of Jews and Gentiles were the Resurrection of Christ and His Ascension. To these, considered as one in substance, St Peter in his first address to the Jews, and St Paul in the beginning of his great doctrinal Epistle, Rom. i. 4, appeal as proofs of Christ's relation to gave him glory; that your faith and hope might be in God.

22 Seeing ye have purified your souls in obeying the truth through the Spirit unto unfeigned love of the brethren, see that ye love one another with a pure heart fervently:

23 Being born again, not of corruptible seed, but of incorruptible, by the word of God, which liveth and abideth for ever.

24 ^{Or, For} ^{that} For all flesh is as grass, and all the glory of man as the flower of grass. The grass withereth, and the flower thereof falleth away:

the Father. Salvation is purchased by the death of Christ, justification is appropriated by the faith which was established by His resurrection. Observe that the Scriptures indifferently represent the Father as raising the Son, thereby recognising Him as His true Son, Rom. i. 4, and the Son as raising Himself, thereby declaring the absolute oneness of the Godhead in both, and the unity of Their work.

that your faith and hope might be in God] Or, more accurately, so that your faith and hope are in God. The A.V. follows the generality of the old versions and early commentators, and the construction, though not common, is certainly admissible, cf. Matt. xxiv. 24, xxvii. 1: but the idiom is more probably explained as referring to fact rather than to intention. St Peter shews that inasmuch as the proof and completion of Christ's work was the resurrection, effected by the will and power of God, all Christian faith and hope rest upon the Godhead, and are therefore like Him steadfast and unchangeable.

22—26. EXHORTATION TO BROTHERLY LOVE, AS A RESULT AND PROOF OF OBEDIENCE AND REGENERATION.

22. Seeing ye have purified, &c.] St Peter argues thus. The souls of Christians are purified, an actual process begun at conversion and going on through life (such is the force of the perfect part. ῥηνικότες), having one permanent and paramount object, the unfeigned love, in which our Apostle, like St John, St Paul, and St James, recognises the true fulfilment of the law of righteousness, see therefore that ye so love one another, heartily and fervently. Here we must notice the force of the expression "in obeying the truth," i.e. in the obedience which has for its object truth as made known by Christ, that is the condition and the effective instrument of Christian sanctification. Two sayings of our Lord are thus illustrated: "sanctify them by Thy truth," John xvii. 17, and "hereby shall all men know that ye are my disciples if ye love one another." John xiii. 35. The best MSS. omit the words "through the Spirit." They are probably a gloss, stating a true doctrine, but not needed in this passage, where St Peter is dwelling throughout on the living power of God's truth. Again, the word "pure," though found in some ancient MSS. and versions, is omitted in the oldest, and, like the preceding, was probably a marginal gloss. The word rendered "fervently" is emphatic; it involves the idea of intensity, and, as used in later Greek, persistency; Grimm, 'Lex. N. T.' intentus, assiduus.

The exhortation throughout may possibly imply that St Peter felt anxious about the state of his readers, who in all regions, and it may be more specially in the districts which he specially addresses, were moved by various and conflicting influences; but there is no indication of his making any distinction between them; Jews and Gentiles equally need his pastoral monition and are equally its objects. The earnestness indeed is but the outcome of his own loving and affectionate heart.

23. Being born again, &c.] A further and even deeper appeal, not merely to an intellectual, though spiritual process, but to the very principle, root and origin of the Christian life. They must love one another, and thus fulfil "the royal law" of Christ by reason of their "having been born again," become regenerate. The spirit of sonship is the spirit of brotherhood: becoming children of one Father we become brethren, members of one family, of one body, members each of the other: this in a far higher sense than that of natural relationship, since we are born, not as in our first birth of corruptible seed, with sensual affections, but of incorruptible, the germ of spiritual life, of which the giver and planter is the living and eternal Word of God. Here the question rises whether by the Word of God (in this verse λόγος, in the 25th ῥῆμα) St Peter refers to the will of God expressed and revealed in the Gospel, or to the Personal Word incarnate in Christ Jesus. Comparing our Apostle's own words in Acts x. 36, we infer that the preaching, not the person, of our Lord is here meant; but the connection between the word uttered and the Son, the Divine Word who utters it, is invariable, and is always distinctly recognised by St Peter and St Paul. See note on James i. 18. No teacher of the early Church ever dissociated the ideas of the Word and the Son, as was done at a later period on the one hand by Paul of Samosata and Photinus, on the other by Marcellus of Ancyra: see S. Basil, 'Ep.' 235, 263. and Euseb. 'c. Marcell.'

24. For all flesh is as grass, &c.] The 25 But the word of the Lord endureth for ever. And this is the word which by the gospel is preached unto you.

immediate object of St Peter is to enforce the preceding argument. As men born of flesh, merely natural men, your feelings of love might be transient and fickle, like the nature to which they belong, and however attractive and specious they would perish without result; that nature is like grass that is scorched by the sun, and flowers that fall off yielding no fruit: but the Word of God being eternal must produce durable effects, and, as the Apostle declares in the next verse, that is the word which has been preached to you in the Gospel. The whole passage however and its application suggests other considerations of the highest importance in their bearings upon the general purport of the Epistle and the question to what class of readers it was specially addressed. In the first place St Peter follows the Septuagint so closely as to prove that he addressed persons who would be more familiar with it than with the original Hebrew, omitting one verse, Isai. xl. 7, which is not found in the Septuagint, but which, though omitted in some MSS. probably influenced by the LXX., is unquestionably genuine. It is true that it does not bear directly upon the argument here, but the omission indicates a feeling in St Peter that it would be strange to most of his readers. Thus too the adoption of "glory" for "comeliness" or "grace," of "grass" in the second clause for "the field," and "falleth off" for "withereth," is best accounted for by assuming either Gentile or Hellenistic readers, to whom the Hebrew was unknown. On the other hand, two changes are highly significant: instead of "all glory of man" in the LXX. St Peter has all its glory, agreeing with the Hebrew, thus shewing his own knowledge of the original; and again, in the concluding clause he substitutes "the Lord" for "our God," a most important point, for it proves that St Peter identifies the Lord, that is our Lord Jesus Christ, according to the usage of the New Testament, with Him whom Jews and Christians alike call "our God:" see the following note. These considerations may not prove, but they are thoroughly in accordance with, the view that St Peter has in mind the position, feelings and knowledge of a class of readers, all of whom were familiar with the Old Testament, especially with the great Messianic prophecy of Isaiah, but of whom the great majority knew it only through the medium of the Septuagint version.

25. But the word of the Lord] As it was observed in the preceding note, St Peter substitutes "the Lord" for "our God," as it stands in the Hebrew and in most, though not all, copies of the LXX. Both Hebrews and Gentiles would see in this a distinct recognition of the Godhead of Christ, and that in reference to the grand attribute of God as source and giver of revealed truth. Having brought his readers so far, St Peter clinches his whole argument with a declaration, bearing upon the point which lay especially near to his heart, viz. that this Word, eternal in duration, is that which had been preached to his hearers and had been received by them. The expression which he uses is singularly forcible, this word is the joyous tidings or Gospel which was declared unto you. Now there is no question as to the person by whom the Gospel had been introduced into the districts; what St Peter here asserts is that in the form in which it was presented to them it was substantially and essentially the very Word of God. So that here, as in the close of the Epistle, we have the attestation of St Peter to the absolute integrity of Gospel truth as it had been preached in the Churches of Asia Minor by St Paul. Such an attestation would be specially needed, it may be, by that portion of the converts which may have still retained aught of the old leaven of Judaism, to whom however no distinct allusion is ever made in this Epistle; but it would be unspeakably precious to all true-hearted Christians, who looked up with equal love and reverence to their own converter St Paul, and to St Peter as the recognised mouth-piece and representative of the Apostles, to whom our Lord first committed the ministry of the Word.

ADDITIONAL NOTES on CHAP. I. 1, 2, 6, 8.

1. (a) παρεπίδημος is used by the LXX. as a translation of עֲרֵמָה, Gen. xxiii. 4; Ps. xxxix. 12. The Syriac uses the same word here ܡܕܢܐܝܐ. It is nearly equivalent to παροικος, Acts vii. 6, 29. Ps. cxx. 5, οἱμοι ὅτι ἡ παροικία μου ἐμακρύνθη. Both words are used together in Ps. xxxviii. 17, quoted by Ecumenius. Some commentators consider that the prefix παρὰ has no special force: but Ecumenius is quite right in maintaining a distinction. παρεπίδημος, one who sojourns without any fixed home or special right in an alien land. The παρὰ in composition is here not local, but denotes transitoriness. See Bp Lightfoot on Clem. Rom. p. 32. Mangold observes that the word indicates persons attached to the Jews of the dispersion, not

CHAP. II. 1—5. EXHORTATIONS AND WARNINGS FOUNDED ON THE PRECEDING VIEWS ON THE CONDITION AND NATURE OF CHRISTIANS.

1 Wherefore] This word connects the following exhortations closely with the last four verses of the first chapter. Inasmuch as you have been regenerated by the word of God (i. 23), and have received it from your spiritual teachers (i. 25), you must in the first place lay aside, put away from you, all evil passions, especially those which are opposed to brotherly love. Compare Eph. iv. 22—31, where most of the words and all the topics occur which St Peter here uses. They are common to all, bearing equally upon Jewish and Gentile converts, and are pressed with equal force by the two Apostles.

malice] St Peter takes this first, as the main cause of dissensions, whereas St Paul places it last, as the climax of all offences against brotherly love, Eph. iv. 31. The Greek (κακία) refers specially to malignity, and is best rendered by the word malice.

all guile, &c.] There is a connection of sequence between the three vices included in this group; guile the inward disease, hypocrisy its outward manifestation, and as a result of the consciousness of evil, envy in its various forms, specially directed against those who have the peace in which the hypocrite knows that he is lacking, a feeling which sooner or later breaks out in calumnious aspersions, for which St Paul, Eph. iv. 31, uses the words clamour and evil speaking (κραυγή και βλασφημία). The comparison with Ephesians is important as bearing upon the question whether St Peter has one class only of readers in mind; the evils were common to all, not even, as might be supposed, peculiarly prevalent in the Churches of Asia Minor, but equally prominent at Corinth, see 1 Cor. i. 10—12, iii. 3, 4, and indeed in all Churches. The word rendered "laying aside" or "putting off" (ἀποθέμενοι) is used twice by St Paul, Eph. iv. 22, 25, in reference to the same or similar vices, and stands in antithesis to putting on (ἐνδύσασθαι), v. 24. καταλαλῆς is a rare word, used by Clem. Rom. '1 Cor.' xxx., and by Polycarp.

2 As newborn babes] Referring to i. 23 the Apostle addresses Christians as newly regenerate. The metaphor was not unknown to Hebrew writers, who call disciples "sucklings; see Targum on Job iii. 18; and Song of Sol. viii. 1. It is common in St Paul; and in the mind of both Apostles was undoubtedly associated with our Lord's saying; cf. Matt. xviii. 3; Mark x. 14, 15.

desire the sincere milk of the word] Each word is emphatic; desire means long for earnestly as a babe cares for milk and for that only; it is its proper nourishment; so yours, as spiritual babes, is pure unadulterated doctrine, which is conveyed in and by the Word. Our translators properly refer the adjective (λογικόν), rendered elsewhere "reasonable," Rom. xii. 1, to the Word, ch. i. 23; as "bodily" refers to the body, psychical to the psyche (living to life), spiritual to spirit, so (λογικός) lit. logical, but equivalent in sense to "rational," refers to the Word, which is the true and proper nourishment of the "inner man," "renewed," and "created" after God in the holiness of truth. The nearest equivalent word is spiritual, which however could not be used here, as it would disguise the reference to the Word.

sincere] Lit. "without guile," or deceit, in antithesis to the guile which must be put away. The Greek order of words is "logical guileless milk;" doctrine derived from the Word, unadulterated by any falsehood. The Personal Word, who is the Truth, informs the intellect, and quickens the spirit, for in Him are hidden all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge. Whether St Peter identified the Son of God with the Word may be questioned, but that he regarded Him as its source, and it as His perfect manifestation, is certain. The teaching of the early Fathers is deeply interesting. Irenæus, l. iv. c. xxxviii. p. 699, ed. Stieren, "And for this reason (viz. the incapacity of man to receive Christ in the fullness of His glory), He, who is the perfect Bread of the Father, gave Himself as milk, as to babes—that by this milky diet, being accustomed to eat and drink the word of God, we might be enabled to retain in ourselves the bread of immortality which is the Spirit of the Father." See also Origen 'c. Cels.' iv. c. 18.

that ye may grow thereby] Lit. "therein," in the Word as the element wherein the Christian life is developed. The oldest and best MSS., N, A, B, C, and oldest versions, add "unto salvation," possibly an early gloss, yet important as indicating the true end of spiritual growth; cf. Rom. i. 16. "The word of God," as Tertullian says, "must be desired for the sake of life, devoured by the hearing, ruminated by the understanding, digested by faith."

3. If so be ye have tasted] Rather, IF ye tasted; St Peter refers to the first experience of converts. The conjunction if, according to Greek usage, here implies that such a desire must exist in those who, as may be assumed in the case of Christians, have known experimentally (for sensible apprehension produces clearer knowledge than any mere reasoning, (Ecum.) the sweetness of spiritual food, and learned from it to appreciate the graciousness of the Lord. The word here used by St Peter (χρηστός) has the special meaning of benignity; some have held that the Apostle refers to the name Christ; but this is hardly probable, though the two words chrestus and Christus were confused at a very early time, as in the well-known account of Christians by Tacitus. It has been suggested, but seems unlikely, that there is a reference to Eucharistic food, administered at that time immediately after baptism. The passage is taken verbatim from the LXX. of Ps. xxxiv. 8.

the Lord] In the New Testament, as a rule, the Lord Jesus Christ; here it represents the Hebrew, Jehovah: an important point in its bearing upon St Peter's Christology.

4. To whom coming, &c.] St Peter passes on to another and distinct metaphor in order to shew the necessity of perfect union with, and conformity to, Him from whom spiritual life is derived. St Paul has the same metaphor in Ephes. ii. 20—22, and elsewhere. The Christian comes to Christ to be built up in the faith, and He to whom he comes is conceived of as the head corner-stone, instinct with life, holding together the building and felt as the principle of stability in every part. St Peter refers explicitly to our Lord's own saying, Matt. xxi. 42. It should be observed that he omits altogether to notice the place in the building assigned to himself by Christ, Matt. xvi. 18, the whole mind and spirit of believers being directed exclusively to the only source of life. The epithet "living" points out, of course, the metaphorical sense of the expression, but it is emphatic; that stone is all life in itself, and the cause of life to all the stones that are joined to it. Christians come to Him as living and life-giving that they may live on and by Him.

disallowed] St Peter could not allude to this passage without reference to a point, not bearing upon his immediate argument, but constantly present to his mind, viz. that the precious] Not the same word as above, i. 19; that (τίμιος) referred to intrinsic preciousness, this (ἐντίμιος) refers to the recognition of that preciousness by the Father.

5. Ye also, as lively stones, are built up] Rather, as the grammatical structure and the inner sense indicate, Be ye also built up as living stones. Both words "coming" in v. 4 and "be built up," or, "let yourselves be built up" (lit. "be built up upon"), intimate the concurrence of an active will in all true converts; they are drawn to Christ, but follow willingly. The epithet living, not lively (which obscures the connection of thought), shews that we receive life from Him who hath life in Himself, and must therefore be fellow-workers with Him. Cf. Hermas v. iii. and ix.

a spiritual house] The antitype of the material house of God, the temple, of which the glory, together with the uses which it prefigured, is transferred to the Church of Christ. The frequent use of this metaphor by St Paul in epistles specially addressed to Christians of Gentile origin sufficiently proves that St Peter may have had, and makes it probable that he really had, such believers present to his mind, though not to the exclusion of Hebrews. He had long learned the lesson that in Christ Jesus there is neither Jew, nor Gentile; cf. Acts xv. 9.

an holy priesthood] The best MSS., N, A, B, C, and late critical editions insert the preposition for (εἰς) before these words. There can be little doubt as to the correctness of this reading; Christians built up in Christ are made a spiritual house, or temple, for a special purpose, that they may become a holy priesthood, qualified and empowered to offer spiritual sacrifices. The term "holy priesthood," here and in v. 9, is not precisely the same as "holy priests," but points to the great truth that Christians constitute a corporate unity, collectively possessing and exercising the functions of the priesthood. In reference to the preceding statement, St Augustine says, "Simul omnes unum templum, et singuli singula templa sumus," 'Ep.' 187, § 20; so Christians are one priesthood collectively, and individually in a limited, but definite, sense they are priests, see Rev. xx. 6; thus too Barnabas, 'Ep.' 4, "Let us become spiritual, a perfect temple to God." The priesthood of Christians does not trench on the peculiar province of our one High Priest, nor on the priesthood, to offer up spiritual sacrifices, acceptable to God by Jesus Christ.

6 Wherefore also it is contained in the scripture, "Behold, I lay in Sion a chief corner stone, elect, precious :

and he that believeth on him shall not be confounded.

7 Unto you therefore which believe he is ^{1 Or, an honour. . .} precious : but unto them ^{2 Paul. 118.} which be disobedient, ^{32. Matt.} the stone ^{31. 42.} which the builders disallowed, the ^{Acts 4. 12.}

other hand does it exclude the office of a vicarious priesthood, representing and acting on behalf of the body corporate; this is sufficiently proved by passages in the Old Testament, which at once recognise the people as priests, and yet restrict certain functions to the Aaronic priesthood. Augustine 'de Civ. D.' xx. c. 10, "Sicut omnes Christianos dicimus propter mysticum Chrisma, sic omnes sacerdotes, quoniam membra sunt unius Sacerdotis." Irenaeus, dwelling on the other point, expresses the mind of the early Church, "Sacerdotes sunt omnes Domini Apostoli—qui semper altari et Deo serviunt," 'c. Hær.' iv. c. xx. By parity of reasoning all ministers and stewards of the mysteries of Christ constitute a true, though vicarious and representative, priesthood. On the whole subject see Waterland, 'Distinctions of Sacrifice,' § XIV. vol. VIII. p. 341.

by Jesus Christ] Or, through Jesus Christ. The spiritual sacrifices of prayer, praise, and all Christian works, are offered through Him as the One true High Priest; they are also acceptable to God through Him, by reason of His One perfect oblation of Himself. The construction admits of either sense; the former corresponds to ch. iv. 11; Heb. xiii. 15; Rom. i. 8, vii. 25; but it is probable that the expression as here used includes the whole statement; so Didymus, Bede, Schott, and De Wette.

6—10. IN THESE VERSES THE PRECEDING STATEMENTS ARE CONFIRMED, EXPANDED, AND ILLUSTRATED.

6. Wherefore also it is contained] The meaning of the idiom here employed, which is somewhat peculiar, seems to be, "with reference to the previous statements compare the following passages." N.B. The verb περιέχει, lit. it contains, is held to be equivalent to "there is this passage" (περιοχή); cf. Acts viii. 32, where A.V. renders the word "place." A similar usage is pointed out in Josephus, 'Arch.' XI. 4. 7: περιέχει is thus taken as an impersonal verb.

Behold, &c.] This passage is quoted freely, still more freely by St Paul, Rom. ix. 33. The original text is correctly rendered in our Version, cf. Isai. xxviii. 16; but the Septuagint comes very near to St Peter's quotation; it omits "a tried stone," a "sure foundation" (מוֹסָד מוֹסָד), and for "shall not make haste," it has "shall not be ashamed," or, as A.V. here renders it, "be confounded." The last expression, however, probably expresses the true sense of the original; the intimate connection between the words "hasten," "fear," and "be ashamed," is best shewn in the Arabic, in which the verb which exactly corresponds to the Hebrew has these three significations, see Pocock, 'Port. Mos.' p. 67. It seems clear that St Peter quoted from the Septuagint, and that memoriter.

7. precious] Or lit. is the honour, not as in the marg. an honour; i.e. that preciousness, spoken of in the preceding passage, appertains to you who believe. As living stones, consolidated by faith, and mystically in union with that corner-stone, you partake in its excellency.

but unto them which be disobedient] Another reading, "which are unbelieving," has the support of the three oldest MSS. A, B, C, and some versions. It agrees better with the context, in antithesis to "you which believe," but it may possibly be an early gloss.

the stone] St Peter, as is not uncommonly the case in the New Testament, combines references to two texts, Ps. cxviii. 22, and Isai. viii. 14; the former, cited by our Lord, Matt. xxi. 42, bearing upon His rejection by the Jews, and the completion of His work in building up the Church, and by St Peter himself, Acts iv. 11; the second predicting the result of that rejection to those who incurred the guilt. The passage from the Psalms means that the persons upon whom the duty of completing the edifice properly devolved, viz. the rulers and priests of the Hebrews, rejected and cast out the living stone, which was proved by the event to be the only one on which the building could rest; but in consequence of that very act, by virtue of the sufferings which He then underwent, that same Christ became (A.V. is made) at once the very corner-stone on which and by which the two great divisions of mankind, Jews and Gentiles, were compacted into one harmonious whole; but at the same time He, whom they were called upon to recognise as the corner-stone, became to them who rejected Him, as such, "a stone of stumbling," not, that is, a stone at which they stumbled, being unwilling to acknowledge its goodness, but against which they came into collision; and "a rock of offence," it being, as Simeon (Luke ii. 34) states, set for the fall and rise of many in Israel. They had the option of

This passage is omitted in the Syriac version, and rejected as an interpolation by some critics—wrongly for it is extant in all the best MSS., and the omission is easily accounted for by a common error of transcribers in passages when the same word recurs after an interval.

8. even to them] The construction is more simple than might appear from this rendering. Lit. who being disobedient, that is, who by reason of their disobedience, or rebellious unbelief, stumble at the Word. Here the Word is clearly identified with Christ, if not with His person, yet with His doctrine, the truth of which He is the manifestation.

whereunto also they were appointed] i.e. to which result of unbelief; sc. utter overthrow, they were appointed. The immediate object of the Apostle is to shew that the rejection of the Jews, brought about by their disobedience, was not a new thing, but had been foreseen and predetermined. Commentators are divided, rather in accordance with their doctrinal views than as a result of grammatical and critical inquiry; some referring the words to the unbelief of the Jews, others to the punishment which followed justly upon their unbelief. The former view may be defensible on the ground that the infatuation of the Jews, their utter blindness to the evidences of Christ's Truth, was a judicial infliction, as it is represented in many passages of the Old and New Testament; but the other view, which refers to their punishment as a just and inevitable consequence of wilful unbelief, fully meets the requirements of the Apostle's statement. Thus Wetstein concisely, "non ut peccent, sed ut peccantes puniantur;" so too Benson, Hammond, Glass, Grotius, Hensler, Steiger, and Huther. Vorstius quoted by Huther, "increduli sunt designati vel constituti ad hoc, ut poenam sive exitium sibi accersant sua incredulitate."

9. But ye] The ye is emphatic; but as for you, who in contradistinction from the unbelieving Jews have received the Messiah, ye are the new generation consisting of the "remnant of grace" among the Israelites and of all Gentiles who are united to the Head of the Body by faith. St Peter does not address or regard them as separate bodies, but as one Body in Christ.

a chosen generation] Thus "the Lord had a delight in your fathers to love them, and to choose their seed after them," Deut. x. 15. This applies in a higher sense to those "who are born again not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God," John i. 13; and who are therefore "counted to the Lord for a generation;" thus again Isai. xliii. 20, 21, "My people, my chosen; this people have I formed for myself; they shall shew forth my praise."

a royal priesthood] See above on v. 8. Here instead of "holy" St Peter has "royal," in reference to Exod. xix. 6, "Ye shall be unto me a kingdom of priests." The expression in Greek follows the Septuagint. Christians are in a peculiar sense all "kings and priests," or "a kingdom of priests," Rev. i. 6, where see note, and v. 10, by virtue of their mystic union with the One King and One Priest of the universe. See Augustine 'de C. D.' x. 10. Didymus on this passage says, "Wherefore we also are named a chosen generation, being the offspring of a king and priest; for since He who begat us hath both offices, we must needs also as of a king hold the kingly office, and as of a priest the priestly." The term "royal" might mean either "belonging to the king," or "having royal prerogatives;" the former explanation is more probable, according with the other designations of Christians, and with the principle that all their rights and dignities depend upon their relation to their King. The Fathers dwell much upon the necessary connection between the royalty and the priesthood; cf. Irenæus, IV. c. 20. It is also observable that Rabbinical writers recognise the application of the foregoing texts to both dispensations, the old and the new covenant. Thus 'Tanchuma' ap. Wetstein, in which treatise Num. iii. 12, xviii. 6, and Exod. xix. 6 are quoted, with special reference to the expression "unto Me" in those passages.

an holy nation] "A nation" applies to Christians collectively, as forming a distinct polity, or society. The Hebrews were a holy nation, as being separated from the heathen by moral and ceremonial law; Christians in virtue of spiritual association with each other, and of renunciation of all evil heathenish habits. They are sanctified by the blood of Christ applied to the conscience by His Spirit. Steiger observes that "generation" in the preceding clause refers to spiritual descent, forth the ^{praises} of him who hath called you out of darkness into his marvellous light :

10 ^{Which} in time past were not a people, but are now the people of God: which had not obtained mercy, but now have obtained mercy.

"nation" to unity of customs; a possible distinction, and involving the true thought that as Christians derive their life from one King-Priest, they must have customs and morals in accordance with their descent.

a peculiar people] Lit. "a people of acquisition," equivalent to a people acquired and possessed as a special and peculiar treasure. The passages to which St Peter refers are Deut. vii. 6, "a special" or peculiar people, Mal. iii. 17, where A. V. has "jewels," a peculiar treasure; and especially Isai. xliii. 21 (where the Septuagint has a word equivalent to that which is here used by St Peter, ὁ περιποιήσας [sic]). "This people which I have formed unto myself; they shall shew forth my praise."

N.B. The words ἐκ περιποίησιν, περιούσιος, and גָּלוּל, of which the first is used here, the second by the LXX. in rendering Exod. xix. 5, and by St Paul, Tit. ii. 14, and the third in the Hebrew of Exodus and Malachi, convey the same idea under different aspects; all imply possession, the first as an acquisition, the second as an excellent, the third as a special and peculiar, possession. The Chaldee use of the verb גָּלוּל, acquisivit, probably determined the version here adopted by St Peter.

The appropriation of all these epithets, in their fullest and most spiritual meaning to Christians, shews how distinctly the Apostles, St Peter and St Paul, who are often misrepresented as taking different positions, inculcated the truth that all the promises made to Israel, as the seed of Abraham, were fulfilled in the Church. Judaism was absorbed and transfigured in Christianity, in which Gentiles and Jews became one race, one nation, and one body.

should shew forth] Or, "proclaim," tell out, or abroad. The Greek word does not occur elsewhere in the N. T., but it is classical, and here singularly expressive.

the praises] Lit. "the virtues" or perfections; but the LXX., whose language is here adopted by St Peter, use the word (ἀρεάς) as equivalent to "praises" in Isai. xliii. 21, the passage here quoted, and in Isai. xlii. 12, and לְמִלִּין 7. The praises are the recognition of the divine attributes; and the end of the election of Christians is to manifest by their lives and to celebrate by their thanksgivings the wisdom, power, mercy, and love of Him who called them, a point most distinctly brought out in the passage of Isaiah here referred to. Compare also Isai. lx. 3, where it is said of the multitude of the Gentiles who come to the glorified Jerusalem and to the light, and brightness of its rising, that they shall bring gold and incense, and shew forth the praises of the Lord. Here St Peter explains the spiritual meaning of that prophecy and shews its fulfilment. See however note on 2 Peter i. 3.

who hath called you out of darkness] This applies with special force to Gentile converts brought out of the total night of heathenism, and they appear to have been more immediately present to the Apostle's mind; not that reference to Jewish converts is excluded, of whom the best informed had been but partially enlightened, a veil being over their hearts, cf. 2 Cor. iii. 14, and of whom the great majority were in total darkness. It was a special promise that they should have light at the coming of Christ, Isai. ix. 1 f.; cf. Matt. iv. 16; thus again Isai. lx. 1, "Arise, shine, for thy light is come." Cf. Clem. Rom. xxxvi. 2. 30.

marvellous] As transcendent and inconceivable; the glory of Him who dwelleth in unapproached light, 1 Tim. vi. 16.

10. Which in time past] No passage in this Epistle indicates more distinctly the Gentile converts as specially the objects of St Peter's address. He agrees with St Paul, Rom. ix. 25, 26, who applies the passage of Hosea ii. 23—which primarily referred to Israel—specially and distinctly to Gentiles; and he adopts the same order, transposing the words of the prophet. Had St Peter directed his Epistle specially to Jewish Christians it seems impossible, or to say the least highly improbable, that he should have chosen this text, and have followed St Paul, whose Epistle was certainly present to his mind, both in the form of the quotation and in its application. Hilgenfeld observes that every unprejudiced reader must needs infer from this passage that St Peter addresses Gentile Christians; 'Einl.' p. 628.

not a people] A singularly strong expression, implying that they who in Christ are one people had no real existence as such before their conversion. Bengel, "ne populus quidem, nedum Dei populus." This is in a peculiar sense true of the heterogeneous mass of Gentiles, aliens from God and separated from each other by race, language, customs, and religion—true also of the whole body of converts, Jews and Gentiles, previously antagonistic.

11. This verse marks the main division of the Epistle. From the beginning St Peter has been concerned mainly with the privileges, blessings and dignity of believers, and with the general fundamental principles which follow as a necessary consequence from their relation to God: he now passes on to exhortations about their relative duties to each other and to those with whom they come into contact, with special reference to the circumstances of the times, to the temptations to which they were peculiarly exposed by their previous habits, and to the effects which their example would have for good or for ill upon the heathen. The first injunctions dwell upon the purity of life, which would specially affect the reputation of Christians and their influence upon Gentiles.

beloved] Emphatic, a form of address used thrice by St Paul, 1 Cor. x. 14, xv. 58; 2 Cor. vii. 1; by St John, i. iii. 2, and by St James. Here it introduces the special exhortations, most fittingly, as an assurance of good will and affection, tempering reproaches and adding force to entreaties.

as strangers and pilgrims] Cf. i. 17, where the word "sojourning" represents the condition of those who are here called "strangers," but more properly "dwellers in a strange land," (παροικοι). "Pilgrims" does not exactly represent the second word, which in i. 1 is rendered "strangers;" see notes there; it denotes specially persons who take up their abode for a short time, not as settlers, but as visitors in a foreign city or land. The home, the true country of the Christian, is heaven; wherever he may be living on earth he is equally a stranger. All his rights, privileges, and dignity are derived from his citizenship (see note on Phil. iii. 20) which is in heaven; so that the very exaltation of the believer in spiritual things separates him the more completely from earthly things; because he is a citizen of heaven, belonging to a holy nation, he is a stranger on earth; because he is consecrated he must abstain from pollutions; because he is a soldier of Christ he must war against lust. Thus Abraham "sojourned in the land of promise as in a strange country," and all the Patriarchs "confessed that they were strangers and pilgrims (sojourners) upon earth," Heb.

xi. 13. The word "pilgrim" introduces a different, though in itself a true, metaphor.

from fleshly lusts] the fleshly lusts. Cf. Gal. v. 16 and Rom. vii. 23. The extent and limitation of this injunction are equally important; it does not, as Calvin assumes, include all natural desires, but all that in their tendency are destructive to the soul, that is, the principle of life, or rather the inner man, not as renewed by grace, but as the principle capable of union with the spirit, yet liable to assaults: by the lusts are meant, not the natural, but those inordinate, appetites which wage an incessant war against the soul, tending to reduce it to a state of slavery, and finally to destroy it everlastingly. Abstinence is the first movement in the conflict against them, equivalent to "putting away" in the first verse of this chapter. The Greek word (σαρκικός) rendered "fleshly" occurs frequently in St Paul's epistles, but not elsewhere in the N. T.

which war] The proper meaning of this expression is "inasmuch as," or "such as war against it" (αἰτῖνες, not αἱ). The word "war" implies active aggression, not simply a state of antagonism. Cf. Polycarp, Ep. v.

12. conversation honest] Conversation is used here as in ch. i. 15, 17, in its proper sense, as outward conduct, habits of life, by which the inner principle is manifested and attested. It must be "honest," lit. "beautiful," or "fair," an expression common in classical Greek, such as may attract and command admiration and esteem.

among the Gentiles] to whom you formerly belonged, or among whom you lived, partaking in their excesses.

whereas] Or, wherein. This expression elsewhere, Mark ii. 19, means "at what time" (A. V. as long as); here it has rather the definite sense, "in what," i.e. in the very point which now is aimed at by calumnious misrepresentations. So in Rom. ii. 1, where it is properly rendered "wherein." The point which was the object of such attacks was and is the special mode of life distinguishing Christians, as such, from men of the world, whether Jews or Gentiles.

they speak against you as evildoers] Christians were specially attacked by Gentiles, generally at the instigation of Jews, on political grounds as enemies of the state (cf. Acts xvii. 6, 7); on religious grounds as atheists, i.e. rejecting the objects of heathen worship; on ethical grounds as introducing unlawful customs, and, as it was believed, abominable dinance of man for the Lord's sake : whether it be to the king, as supreme ; impurity, Acts xvi. 20, 21. These points are commonly alleged by opponents of Christianity, and are specially noticed by apologists in the first two centuries. See Athenagoras, 'Ap.' p. 6; Clem. Alex. 'Strom.' vii. p. 701, and the large collection of passages by Spencer on Origen, 'c. Celsum,' I. i, p. 319, ed. Ben. Justin Martyr attributes these calumnies to Jewish emissaries sent about for the express purpose of defaming Christians, see 'Dial. c. Tryph.' c. xvii. Suetonius uses the Latin word malefici, which exactly corresponds to this, in describing Christians at the time when this Epistle was written. Hebrew and Gentile Christians were of course alike objects of such calumnies, but the latter were peculiarly hateful to the Gentiles as apostates from their own religion; and considering the character of many converts before they were rescued from the unspeakable pollution of heathenism (cf. 1 Cor. vi. 9, 11), it is not surprising that strong prejudices were entertained, and that calumnies invented by the deadly enemies of the Cross were readily believed by the Gentiles. St Peter has each point distinctly present to his mind in this and in the following exhortations.

by your good works] The same word good, or best, used above. A good conversation manifested in good works.

which they shall behold] The entire phrase implies that as a result of good works which Gentiles observe as spectators—the word is emphatic, implying careful inspection (Grimm, spectando observo)—they may learn to glorify God, to recognise His work with grateful admiration “in the day (rather, a day) of visitation.” This last expression might imply either a visitation of judgment, the judgment of the last day—a meaning, however, quite unsuitable to the context, for the Gentiles would certainly not then bring to mind the good works of Christians, or their own observation of them—or as in other passages “a visitation of grace” (so Luke xix. 44; Gen. i. 24; cf. Wisd. iii. 7, 13; xviii. 19; see also Clem. Rom. '1 Cor.' L.), i.e. when God shall visit their souls, when like yourselves they shall return to this Shepherd and Bishop, or Visitor (ἐπισκοπος). Then the Gentiles would acknowledge the glory of God which had previously been manifested through the works of Christians; thus Erasmus, Calovius, Calvin, Steiger, Huther. St Peter probably has in mind, certainly he recalls to our minds, Matt. v. 16, “Let your light...that they may see your good works and glorify your Father which is in heaven.” The omission of the article before “day” indicates the uncertainty of the time; but its probable occurrence when unexpected is a point of extreme importance, urged constantly by Christian apologists and illustrated by the influence of Christian example in early ages. Another interpretation is defensible, but less suited to the immediate context. It takes the day of visitation to be the time of persecution then impending over Christians, to which reference is made throughout this Epistle. See especially ch. iv. 16—18. It is true that conversions of Gentiles were common at such visitations, and effected by the example of Christian sufferers; but in this passage St Peter is speaking of the general life and demeanour of believers as preparing observers for their own conversion.

13—17. EXHORTATIONS TO SUBMISSION TO CIVIL AUTHORITIES, OR MORE GENERALLY TO DUE OBSERVANCE OF THE DUTIES OF CITIZENS.

From the general exhortation to good works St Peter passes on to special applications of the principle, dwelling in order upon those points which were most likely to affect Gentile observers in judging the tendency of Christian doctrine.

13. ordinance of man] Lit. “every human creation,” here taken in the sense of institution, or as in A.V. ordinance; i.e. every authority constituted or appointed by man. This meaning rests on the authority of the ablest Fathers, e.g. Dionys. Rom. ap. Athan. ‘de Syn. Nic.’ p. 276; Euseb. c. Marc. ap. Socrat. ‘H. E.’ II. 21, and is adopted by late commentators.

for the Lord's sake] Both because “the powers that be are ordained of God,” Rom. xiii. 1, to which St Peter certainly refers in the next verse; and because submission to legitimate authority is a most effectual means of removing obstacles to the advance of his kingdom; a principle powerfully urged by Justin Martyr and other early apologists.

to the king] The emperor, specially styled king by Greek writers; the one supreme authority in the lands which St Peter has in mind. The emperor at that time was Nero, not only notorious for unspeakable crimes, but the first persecutor of the Christians, the man under whom both St Peter and St Paul suffered a long-foreseen martyrdom. The precept is therefore universal, binding on the conscience of all Christians in their private capacity as subjects; the sovereign is supreme by the ordinance of man, as the personal representative of all power inherent in the state.

14 Or unto governors, as unto them that are sent by him for the punishment of evildoers, and for the praise of them that do well.

17 ¹Honour all men. Love the ¹Or. brotherhood. Fear God. Honour the king. ¹Estem sent by him] The natural sequence refers "him" to the king, since magistrates are to be obeyed simply as his representatives and delegates. Cf. Clem. Rom. '1 Cor.' xxxvii., who apparently alludes to this passage. The reference to "the Lord" adopted by some commentators rests upon a great truth, and accords with St Paul's argument in a passage very closely corresponding with this, Rom. xiii. 1—5, but it is less obviously connected with the preceding words.

for the punishment, &c.] This passage distinctly recognises the twofold object of the magistracy—not lost sight of under heathen rulers—to check crimes by punishment and to promote good works by rewarding and protecting the agents. Whether it referred to the Divine source of all authority, or to the supreme authority in the state, this injunction is a remarkable instance of the large and liberal principles maintained by the Apostles. Late writers, e.g. Boissier, Renan, have shewn the substantial soundness of Roman legislation, and the actual progress of social order, even under Nero at the period now under consideration, and especially in the provinces of Asia Minor.

15. For so is the will of God, &c.] It is God's will that by such conduct you should silence calumniators, who in their ignorance—a guilty because wilful ignorance (ἄγνοια, not ἄγνοια)—of the true principles of Christians, assume that they lead to evil deeds, not to good deeds; and who because of that ignorance must be regarded as foolish (a strong word used by St Paul, 1 Cor. xv. 36), senseless—a defect not merely of mind, but of heart. This applies, not to the magistrates, but to those who invent or disseminate false reports. In the Greek the definite article is here used, implying, it may be, that St Peter points to a well-known class of accusers. The word rendered "silence" is very strong, "stop their mouths as with a gag" (φίμωσιν, see 1 Cor. ix. 9; 1 Tim. v. 18; Matt. xxii. 12).

16. As free, and...] St Peter reminds the Christians that, although they are truly free, indeed the only truly free men—a point ever present to the minds of the Apostles—yet that freedom did not imply license to break the laws of men, being in fact another word for subjection to God. What he warns them against most specially was making that liberty a pretext for maliciousness, a word which designates any kind of evil (equivalent in the LXX. to ἡλικία), most frequently malignity, malice, as in Rom. i. 29; Eph. iv. 31, and in the first verse of this chapter; here it evidently refers to the evil and refractory spirit shewn in violation of law. False teachers inculcated two main errors. Judaizers claimed exemption from human law; Gentile sophists confounded liberty with libertinism, and held that grace implied deliverance from the restraints and penalties of divine law. St Peter is careful, as throughout the Epistle, to reiterate and enforce the exhortations of St Paul, see Rom. vi. throughout; Gal. v. 13 f.; and cf. Irenæus iv. 16. 5. N.B. The word rendered "cloke," lit. "a covering," is not found elsewhere in the N.T., but it is used by Menander, who says of wealth that it is the covering of evil deeds.

17. Honour all men] An universal precept, not, as some would have it, limited to persons with whom Christians are brought into contact as citizens. It has probably a special reference to the narrow and exclusive spirit common in all ages to mere professors of religion, and inculcates reverence for man as such, bearing the impress of his divine origin. Honour must be taken in this natural sense, neither involving undue subservience nor mere regard to social and political distinctions. Few precepts have been more needed or more neglected.

Love the brotherhood] The general honour must be transformed into Christian love of those who form one brotherhood—a word peculiar to St Peter, but expressing the truth most strongly inculcated by our Lord—being regenerate and children of one Father in Christ. The precept in this connection was probably suggested by the fact that false teachers, whether Jews or Gentiles, were conspicuous for schismatical tendencies. See 1 Cor. i. 10 f. N.B. Clem. R. has this word (ἀδελφότης) '1 Cor.' ii.; so too Polycarp, Hermas, Irenæus, and many later writers. St Peter seems to have first used it.

Fear God. Honour the king] The fear of God is urged not only as the beginning of wisdom, but in reference to the preceding precepts. The distinction between submission to authority and fear due only to the Giver and masters with all fear; not only to the good and gentle, but also to the froward.

19 For this is thankworthy, if a man for conscience toward God endure grief, suffering wrongfully.

20 For what glory is it, if, when ye be buffeted for your faults, ye shall take it patiently? but if, when ye do well, and suffer for it, ye take it patiently, this is 'acceptable with ^{Or, thank.} God.

Lord of life (cf. Matt. x. 28) was specially to be borne in mind, as exemplified by St Peter himself, Acts iv. 19, and by all Christian confessors and martyrs. The antinomian had to learn the fear of God, the zealot his duty to the king. "Honour" in the last clause is emphatic, due in the highest human sense to the head and source of all authority. The pregnant conciseness is characteristic of St Peter's style.

18-21. DUTIES OF SERVANTS; THE EXAMPLE OF CHRIST.

18. Servants] Not, as in other passages, (Eph. vi. 5; Col. iii. 22) "slaves," but servants, properly domestic servants. The term (which occurs but thrice elsewhere, Luke xvi. 13; Acts x. 7; Rom. xiv. 4, where see note) is at once more general—since it includes "freedmen," who formed a large part of most Christian churches at that time, and possibly, according to Greek usage, other dependent members of a household—and more courteous; for both reasons noticeable and important in its bearings upon practical teaching. Slavery was a condition contrary to inherent human right, and as such doomed to pass away under the influence of Christianity; servitude tempered and regulated by Christian principles is inseparable from social order. St Peter's precept applies to both conditions; but at that time the temptation against which it warns was a peculiarly trying one. It was hard to reconcile temporal bondage with spiritual liberty; hardest when masters were infidels, and as such likely to treat their slaves with peculiar cruelty. The difficulty may have been enhanced in the case of Hebrew converts, by the Rabbinical maxim that "a Jew ought not to be a servant to a heathen," and on the other hand by the principle of the Exodes, that it is contrary to the law of nature to be a servant to any one. The sobriety of apostolical teaching stands out in marked contrast to that of fanatics in all times. The gradual transformation tending to the final extinction of slavery is well brought out by P. Allard, 'Les esclaves chrétiens.'

be subject] Lit. "submitting yourselves." to the froward] Lit. the "crooked," but in the sense "perverse," which is exactly expressed by "froward," Anglo-Saxon framward, aversus, perversus; here it is in antithesis to "gentle," or, as the word so rendered means, equitable and kindly. The duty is thus enforced in its fullest extent, including even "fear" in all its legitimate working: but it does not include evil compliance, such as was held by Roman legists to be a duty on the part of freedmen and of necessity on the part of slaves. Cf. Seneca 'Contr.' iv. Prol. and Boissier, 'La religion romaine,' II. p. 389, and see note on Rom. vii. 15.

19. thankworthy] Lit. "a grace;" which might mean it is one effect and proof of divine grace; but here more probably "acceptable to God," as in the last clause of the following verse.

conscience toward God] Lit. "conscience of God," an expression which probably means "consciousness of the presence and power of God;" cf. 1 Cor. viii. 7, where "conscience of idols" means "a conscious belief in the reality of false gods." Such consciousness in the Christian involves the recognition of all duties flowing from our relation to God. The word is peculiar to St Peter and St Paul, see Introd. to Acts, p. 342, n. 2. Our A. V. expresses the truth in its most practical bearings; cf. 1 Cor. x. 25, 27.

suffering wrongfully] This may not refer directly to the case of Christian servants persecuted for their faith; but it undoubtedly includes them, and was probably suggested in this connection by the frequency of such occurrences.

20. For what glory is it] "Glory" here does not mean "cause of boasting," a different word being used for that, but refers to the effect produced upon others by good conduct. They will think and say nothing of such conduct if the punishment be provoked. The word (κλέος), common in classical writers, does not occur elsewhere in the N. T.

if, when, &c.] The original brings out the antithesis more forcibly "if sinning and buffeted," "if well doing and suffering." It may seem strange that the Apostle appears to recognise no merit in patient endurance of afflictions brought on by our own faults. The truth seems to be that although this is a peculiarly difficult work, and as such characteristic of Christians, it is simply a duty; whereas when the Apostles "rejoiced that they were counted worthy to suffer shame for His name," when after cruel and illegal scourging "they sang praises unto God," Acts xvi. 25, they won the crown of righteousness. In both cases the power of grace is felt, in the latter it is manifested to all observers and wins "glory." Cf. Isidor. Pel. 'Ep.' Lib. v.

acceptable] The same word which above, v. 19, is rendered "thankworthy." The meaning appears to be that such conduct implies a state of grace in reference to God; scarcely, as some hold, an act meriting thanks from God. Cf. Luke ii. 52.

21—25. The Apostle passes on from the duty to the motive. Upon the lowliest Christian he presses the highest principle; thus combining practical every-day work with the sublimest mystery of redemption.

21. hereunto] Not to suffering only, though the kingdom of God must be entered "through much tribulation," but to patience under suffering.

suffered for us] Rather, for you; so the oldest MSS. and early versions, both in this and in the next clause. St Peter has those whom he addresses present to his mind. He is urging upon maltreated servants the most difficult of all duties. N.B. Reiche has strong arguments in favour of adopting us as the true reading in this clause, and you in the next.

leaving us an example] Or, leaving you: both words, "leaving" and "example," are peculiarly emphatic. The word example means properly "a line or sketch traced by the teacher over which the scholar was to write a letter or draw a figure;" a model therefore not merely to be contemplated, but exactly copied, line for line, feature for feature. The word is peculiar to St Peter, and is characteristic of his own close minute adherence to his Master's teaching and imitation of his Master's example. It is also noticeable as being adopted by early Christian writers, especially by Clement of Rome, a younger contemporary of the Apostle, fellow-worker with him and with St Paul. See his 'first Epistle to the Corinthians,' v. 7, with Bp Lightfoot's note; xvi. 17 and xxxiii. 8. Thus also Polycarp, 'ad Phil.' viii. 2, evidently alluding to this passage, "Let us therefore imitate His patience—for He gave us this example (set us this pattern) in Himself."

follow] The Greek word so rendered occurs but thrice elsewhere (1 Tim. v. 10, 24; Mark xvi. 20). It is emphatic and implies close and diligent following.

22. Who did no sin] St Peter, in speaking of His Master, ever reverts to the utterances of the "Spirit of Christ," dwelling on the prophets, "which declared beforehand the sufferings of Christ and the glory which should follow," i. 11. Here he adopts the words of Isaiah as completely describing His acts and feelings, with special application to servants. The servant is tempted to deceit—in His lips was no guile: the servant is provoked to insolent and passionate words—when He was reviled and suffered He neither reviled nor threatened: as the Lord committed His cause to the one righteous Judge, so the servant has to look up to Him as at once his Example and his Judge. It has been justly remarked that Isaiah in that passage speaks of Him specially as the Servant of the Lord.

24. Who...bare our sins] The word rendered "bare" has a singular fulness of significance: it is a sacrificial term, constantly used in the Septuagint for offering sacrifice; here it includes two meanings, our Lord took up our sins, and in His own body which He offered on the cross He expiated them. This explanation is admitted and proved by De Wette, Huther, Grimm, and indeed all critical commentators. (Grimm 'Lex N. T.': tollere peccata in crucem, sc. ad ea patiundo, moriendoque expianda.) It must also be noted that when He took up our sins, He took them away, enabling us to be rid of them.

on the tree] The same word, rather a peculiar one, is used by St Peter in the Acts, ch. v. 30; see Introduction to Acts, note, p. 340.

that we, being dead] The word rendered "dead," and that very probably as the best equivalent, means "having ceased to exist," or to be liable to sins, our old, or besetting sins. The temptation may be terribly strong—had it not been so it would not have needed a dying Saviour, and had not that work been effectual He would not have undertaken it. To use the words of a living teacher, "A lifelong ministry of sacrifice, finished by the crucifixion, has bought for man freedom of conscience for the past, freedom of will for the future." Thomson, 'Bampton Lectures' for 1856.

by whose stripes] Lit. By whose bruise, properly, by whose wale, specially the livid mark left by scourging, for the severity of which in our Lord's case, see note on Matt. xvii. 26. The application to servants whose scourging, however cruel, would fall short of that inflicted before crucifixion, is natural and obvious.

25. as sheep going astray] Another image from Isai. liii. 6. Cf. Ps. cxix. at the end. It implies that wild and perilous courses might have been natural, as they were in fact all but universal, before converts were brought into the fold and placed under the guidance and care of the heavenly Shepherd.

but are now returned] Or, "but ye turned back," sc. at the time of your conversion; St Peter refers to an act then accomplished, of which the effects must still continue. You then left all devious and perilous courses, you are under a sure and safe guide if you follow in His steps. Christ's twofold office is here marked. He is our Shepherd because He feeds, guides and protects us; He is our Bishop because He inspects, exercises vigilant control over us and over all subordinate shepherds and bishops to whom for a season He commits the charge over Christians. It is noteworthy that St Peter neither here nor in any part of the Epistle, nor in his speeches, makes any reference to his own special position in the Church (Matt. xvi. 18, 19), or to the special office assigned to him by his Master, cf. John xxi. 17. As shepherd and bishop he has one work, to bring the people, whom he now addresses, to the One true Shepherd.

CHAP. III.

1-8. DUTIES OF CHRISTIAN WIVES.

The Apostle proceeds in his enumeration of relative duties, not from servants to masters, as might here be expected, but to wives. This is not to be accounted for by supposing that, in the district to which this Epistle was addressed, there were few free men or heads of families among the converts to Christianity. That argument would have applied equally to St Paul who, in his pastoral admonitions to communities in Asia Minor, makes special mention of masters, see Eph. vi.

9; Col. iv. 1. It seems to be a natural result from the general plan of this Epistle: here St Peter's main object is to inculcate submission, resignation, and avoidance of conduct which might exasperate or alienate persons in authority or in a position of social superiority. Certainly in that age and country, especially in Asia Minor, no persons were in more need of advice, encouragement and exhortation than married women. The Greeks, in accordance with the views of their highest philosophers—see the references in Wetstein in loc. and Aristotle 'Pol.' i. § 2—regarded a wife as holding an intermediate position between a free person and a slave; if not as a chattel, or mere property, yet as an absolute dependent, and at best, as a trusty instrument for the management of his household; as the mother but not the educator of his children, the agent but not the partaker of his counsels. Among barbarians generally, as Aristotle l. c. points out, the wife and the slave were in the same position.

In addition to these general facts it must be observed that in the partially civilized districts in the north of Asia Minor the treatment of a wife was rough and unmanly; her whole life was embittered by the intemperance and licentiousness of her master. In northern Africa, where the general condition resembled that of Asia Minor pretty closely, and at a much later time, when Christianity had materially softened the old habits, St Augustine mentions, as a singular proof of his mother's admirable character, that her husband did not beat her. But when to all other causes of disorder there was added that of religious difference, when the husband felt that his wife scorned the observances which he usually left to her care, when the wife knew that her husband's religion was destructive of his moral character, it is evident that without the most perfect sacrifice of self, without the most prudent, as well as most virtuous conduct on her part, the disruption of family ties would have ensued upon the introduction of the truth; the name of Christ would have been blasphemed, and a fierce persistent spirit of antagonism would have been aroused which, deriving its strength from natural feelings, would have imperilled the fabric of Christianity. Hence the need of wise, precise, and earnest exhortations, such as are given most fully and forcibly in this passage.

LIKEWISE, ye wives, be in subjection to your own husbands; that, if any obey not the word, they also may without the word be won by the conversation of the wives;

2 While they behold your chaste conversation coupled with fear.

3 Whose adorning let it not be that outward adorning of plaiting the hair, and of wearing of gold, or of putting on of apparel;

4 But let it be the hidden man of the heart, in that which is not corruptible, even the ornament of a meek

1. Likewise] Emphatic, "in the same manner" as slaves are bound to submission so are wives. The Apostle uses the same word for due and orderly submission, and in the same form; lit. being in subjection: this denotes a voluntary act, or rather habit.

that, if any obey not the word] Or, that even if some are disobedient to the word. The expression implies that the Apostle expects that most husbands of believing wives would themselves be Christians, but that exceptions would be found, perhaps not uncommon. Women did, in point of fact, take the lead very frequently in conversion; and the antagonism which thus sprung up was the immediate cause of some of the earliest and fiercest persecutions. See Justin Mart. 'Apol.' II. § 2; Eus. 'H. E.' IV. 17, §§ 2—13.

the word] Equivalent to the "Gospel," see above, i. 23, note; and ii. 8.

without the word] For "without" the Greek has two expressions: one simply denotes the absence of a truth; the other, which is here used, implies its rejection. The statement therefore means not that the husbands had not heard of, but that they had rejected Christianity. The exposition that the Apostle means "without any argument," such as might be adduced by a Christian wife, is certainly incorrect, and the inference drawn from it by Renan, viz. that women ought not to discuss such questions with their unbelieving husbands, has no place here. Clement of Alexandria lays down the true principle and rule for conduct. 'Strom.' IV. p. 523 C (p. 621, ed. Pott.) "A discreet woman would desire in the first place to persuade her husband to be a partaker with her of those things which conduce to blessedness, but should this be impossible let her strive only for virtue, obeying her husband in all things, so as never to do anything without his consent, save only those things which are held rightly to appertain both to virtue and to salvation." This injunction is admirably illustrated by the passage in Justin Martyr above referred to.

may...be won] The same word used by St Paul, 1 Cor. ix. 19, 21, implies to gain as converts to Christ. Won expresses this, if understood in its literal and full sense.

conversation] As above, ii. 12, the whole conduct, habits and demeanour; see too i. 15.

2. While they behold] As above, ii. 12, the word means having observed as eye-witnesses, and having special opportunities for ascertaining—a metaphor from admission to sacred and mysterious rites.

chaste conversation] St Peter repeats the word, adding two expressions which fix attention on a special point, "chaste" implies extreme purity of heart and conduct; and fear, reverence for the rightful and inalienable authority of the husband, as defined by Clem. Alex. in the passage above quoted. The union of the two principles, equally difficult to observe in cohabitation with a heathen husband, characterizes the perfect Christian wife.

3. Whose adorning let it not be] Or, whose adorning should be, not &c. This form of expression is a common Hebraism and implies, not a prohibition of outward adorning, but a declaration of its worthlessness if opposed to, or separated from, inward graces.

plaiting the hair] Excessive care in wreathing the hair is constantly noted by contemporary satirists; not merely as a symptom of vanity, but as a common occasion of cruelty to slaves.

of gold] Rather, of gold ornaments, necklaces, &c., which are still in the East used to an extent beyond all proportion to a woman's means.

of apparel] Costly raiment, such as is reckoned among household riches by sacred and profane writers. All these expressions justify the inference that many Christian converts belonged to the middle or even opulent classes, as was certainly the case at a very early period.

4. the hidden man] This is not quite synonymous with the new or regenerate man, the soul renewed by Divine grace, but is here equivalent to the soul, the inner principle of life, as distinguished from the outward, material body. Thus Athanasius, 'De Incarn.' p. 626 B, "our inner man is the soul," and Clem. Alex. 'Pæd.' III. 1, says, "the inner man is the rational nature which rules the outer man;" a passage noteworthy as being full of reminiscences of this part of our Epistle. Here it must be observed that in the case of the women addressed by St Peter "the inner man" had been renewed in conversion, so that the injunction specially applies to Christians.

in that which is not corruptible] Lit. "in

a meek and quiet spirit] Or the meek and quiet spirit, viz. that spirit which in the sight of God is the true and truly precious jewel becoming and characterizing the Christian wife. The use of the article in this passage led Athanasius ('ad Serap.' 1), and probably Clem. Alex. ('Pæd.' III. c. 10, p. 291, ed. Potter) to interpret "of the gentle and quiet Spirit," as referring to the Holy Spirit; but St Peter is evidently speaking here not of the source, but of the manifestation of this characteristic grace. Both words, meek and quiet, seem to refer to the Christian Beatitudes in Matt. v.

which is in the sight of God of great price] St Peter is careful to notice that the Christian temper which wins the affection of the creature has the infinitely higher reward of God's approval.

5. after this manner] That is, such were the ornaments worn by matrons of old. To precept the Apostle, as usual, adds example.

who trusted in God] Rather, who hoped in God, whose hope was Godwards. That hope in all times enabled truly religious women to bear with humility and patience the yoke made cruel and grievous by human laws, or more especially by undisciplined and tyrannical passions. Hope is often noted as the characteristic grace of our Apostle; here we have its special bearing on resignation under a peculiarly heavy trial noted. The condition of the Christian wife has undergone a change, scarcely less complete than that of the Christian domestic, in each case from slavery, yet leaving the duty of subordination intact, and the Apostolic injunctions universally applicable.

6. calling him lord] A term that denotes supremacy, such as was enforced by the sentence of God; Gen. iii. 16 and xviii. 12, the passage to which St Peter evidently refers.

whose daughters ye are] Rather, "whose daughters ye became." This undoubtedly implies that the majority of those whom St Peter addresses were Gentile converts, not Hebrews by birth. The argument stands thus, just as you became children of Abraham, being regenerate on the condition of faith, so ye became daughters of Sarah on the condition of following her example. It must be borne in mind that St Paul (Gal. iv. 22-31) had taught converts in Asia Minor that Sarah was a type of the true Church, which is free. The conditions are twofold,—activity in all good work; and superiority to vague, groundless terrors.

amazement] The expression, which is somewhat peculiar, rightly understood gives the true sense of the original, which is usually translated "terror." It means properly nervous terror, such as produces or indicates bewilderment. It occurs often in the LXX., corresponding to Hebrew words signifying terror, shuddering. The fear of the Christian wife must be carefully distinguished from nervous terror, the one leads to faithful discharge of duty, the other to misapprehension of what is really her duty, or to inability to discharge it.

DUTIES OF HUSBANDS.

This short address to husbands seems to be introduced, as it were, parenthetically, the general purport of this part of the Epistle being the inculcation of submission upon those Christians who were in a position of dependence or subordination. It is evidently so introduced in order to guard against any abuse of the preceding advice to wives: and to enforce the truth that the relation of the husband to the wife is not merely, or even essentially, one of authority but of mutual affection to be regulated by Christian principle. Hence the Apostle does not dwell upon the obvious duties of protecting and supporting the wife, but upon those higher duties which devolve upon the husband spiritually in Christ. Compare the singularly profound and beautiful exhortations of St Paul, Eph. v. 25-33.

7. Likewise] I.e. with the same regard to Christian principle; or, as some explain the word, in the same spirit of obedience to the law of Christ. Possibly the word may simply mean, As I have exhorted wives, so now I exhort husbands.

dwell with them according to knowledge] The true construction of this clause seems to be—"Living together, according to knowledge, with the woman as the weaker vessel,"—in which statement are involved certain special principles: "according to knowledge" might be taken generally as an injunction to rational giving honour unto the wife, as unto the weaker vessel, and as being heirs together of the grace of life; that your prayers be not hindered.

8 Finally, be ye all of one mind, having compassion one of another, ^{1 Or, in to the brethren} love as brethren, be pitiful, be courteous :

intercourse, but in this passage, which deals with Christians, as such, "knowledge" must be that which is a necessary result and reward of faith ("intellectus est merces fidei," Augustine), and leads to clear views of all the bearings of relative duties. It points specially to the duty of forbearance and kindness to the wife as weaker in body, or more generally in physical and mental constitution. (The word "vessel" corresponds very nearly to the old Rabbinical word yetser, for which two other words mana מַנָּה, and keli כֵּל, signifying vessel, are also used.) Upon the obvious disparity of natural powers heathenism founded the law of despotic power universally claimed for the husband; while Christianity derives from it a peculiar obligation to love and cherish.

giving honour, &c.] Here too the words are properly taken in a different connection from that adopted in our A. V. Rendering honour as due to those who are also fellow-heirs of the grace of life. The word (ἀπορέμουντες) rendering, which does not occur elsewhere in the New Testament, and but once in the LXX., in a different sense, has a special significance. It is common in classical writers, always in reference to what is due from one to the other party: so that the rendering of honour is not a mere act of favour, but the recognition of a due. The principle is recognised by some Rabbinical writers, quoted by Wetstein; but in its full development is essentially Christian, founded here upon the perfect equality of coheirs of the kingdom of heaven, or, as here described, "the grace of life," the spiritual and eternal life bestowed by grace. N.B. We adopt the punctuation of most commentators, as more logical and satisfactory than that of our Version. The reading συγκληρονόμοις, which rests mainly on the authority of B, is accepted by Tischendorf, and Brückner. The received text is not unsatisfactory, since it implies that husbands feeling that they are fellow-heirs with their wives are bound to render them the honour due to them in that high relationship; but the other reading is more natural, and is held by Reiche to be far preferable.

that your prayers be not hindered] As they would be were the true relations disturbed by the husband's unchristian demeanour, or disregard of his wife's claim to due reverence. Two hearts at variance with each other will not offer the common incense of prayer, nor can husband or wife bring singly and separately an acceptable offering, while labouring under the sense of unrepented or unforgiven wrong. This principle then applies to all the intercourse between husband and wife; including, but not confined to, the ebullitions of unseemly passions, regarded by some ancient and modern commentators as the point chiefly intimated—thus the Scholiast, "for disturbance in a house is a hindrance to all religious works;" and Ignatius, 'ad Phil.' § 8, "where there is division and wrath God dwelleth not"—nor on the other hand specially, if at all, referring to mutual abstinence during certain periods for devotional purposes, a view commended by Cæcumenius, Jerome, 'c. Jovinian.' I., and Estius, and to a certain degree countenanced by the expression, "according to knowledge," but having no real support in this or any other passage in the New Testament. The feelings of the early Fathers on this point are, perhaps, best expressed by Clem. Alex. 'Strom.' II. p. 423 C. N.B. The MSS. vary between ἐκ- and ἐγκόπτεσθαι, the latter, which is represented by our A.V., is preferred by most commentators, but Schoettgen shews that the former corresponds more closely to the Hebrew idiom.

8—11. GENERAL EXHORTATIONS.

The Apostle passes from special injunctions to the great Christian principles which underlie and regulate all relative duties.

8. Finally] The word is emphatic; as the final end and true object of all injunctions attend to these principles.

all of one mind, &c.] St Peter sets forth those principles in five words, which lose somewhat of their force in our rendering—the first fundamental principle is unity of thought and feeling. For this the Apostle has a word new in its application to Christians (ᾑ. λ. in New Testament, and not found in the LXX.), but common in classical writers; here deriving its full significance from the new mind derived from Christ.

having compassion one of another] Rather, as expressed in a single word sympathizing, involving interchange of fellow-feeling whether in joy or sorrow; so St Paul, Rom. xii. 15, "Rejoice with them that do rejoice, and weep with them that weep." The word (συμπαθεῖς) is peculiar to St Peter.

love as brethren] Again in one word, "brother-lovers," i.e. lovers of brethren, that special feeling of brotherly love which unites all children of God in Christ. This word too is used by St Peter only, condensing in one pregnant expression a whole series of Christian admonitions.

pitiful] Lit. "good-hearted," having viscera of heart thoroughly right, full of mercy and love. St Paul uses this word once, Eph. iv. 32. It occurs once in Hippocrates, in the technical sense, "with strong healthy viscera." The noun from which it is derived is very common in the New Testament, and (as has been frequently noted) means not "the bowels," as our A.V. unhappily renders it, but the nobler intestines, the heart, liver, lungs, &c., the seat of strong emotions. It is also used by the Greeks, but specially as the organ of angry vehement passions, among the Hebrews of tenderness and specially of pity.

be courteous] This expresses very nearly the common reading, and yields a true and very attractive meaning, which we should gladly retain, were it not that all the best MSS. and critical editions have another word, humble-minded—the point which St Peter, having his Master's teaching ever in mind, is specially anxious to impress upon all Christians, here in connection with the whole tenour of the Epistle.

9. Not rendering, &c.] St Peter now applies the principles of Christian life to intercourse with those without; having more immediately in mind the temptations to which believers were exposed in contact with the heathen, at a time when persecution was near at hand and already making its approaches felt by evil acts and evil words.

evil for evil] Cf. Rom. xii. 17.

but contrariwise blessing] Blessing is here a participle; but do the very reverse, "bless them that curse you," Matt. v. 44; a word which St Peter of all the apostles was specially careful to bear in mind.

knowing that] Or (omitting the word "knowing," as not extant in any of the oldest MSS., and not required by the sense), for ye were called unto this, viz. to bless others in order that ye may yourselves inherit blessings; or ye were called unto this, that is, to a state of blessing in order that ye may bless others. The argument is cogent in either case; and commentators are divided as to which is preferable. In favour of the second it may be argued that it is rather in accordance with the principles of the Gospel to deduce duties from privileges, the duty of blessing others from the privilege of inheriting blessings ourselves, than to inculcate duties as the means of obtaining privileges; and this comes nearer to the argument in Eph. iv. 1 f., where we find the same kind of Christian duties based upon the calling of Christians. Still the former construction is more obvious, and in addressing persons in various stages of spiritual life, the Apostle may have dwelt upon what all would feel as a powerful inducement. This too seems more probable when we compare the exhortation and promise with Matt. v. 44, 45, which was evidently present to the mind of St Peter, and consider the close connection of this exhortation with the following passage quoted from the xxxivth Psalm.

10-12. THIS CITATION ENFORCES THE DISCHARGE OF ALL CHRISTIAN DUTIES BY REFERENCE TO THE ALL-SEEING JUDGE, and that not merely to the future judgment, but to His abiding presence and constant dealings with the evil and the good.

10. be that will love life] There is a singular deviation from the Septuagint (which throughout the rest of the quotation is followed closely by St Peter) in these words; and the rendering of the Apostle presents some difficulty. The LXX. have, "he that desireth life and loveth to see good days," slightly differing from the Hebrew, "and loveth days that he may see good." St Peter's rendering gives the sense "he whose will is set on loving true life and having good, i.e. happy and well-spent days." A slight change of order would bring this passage into exact agreement with the LXX.; but the MSS. and some of the earliest versions agree with the received text, and leave no room for doubt as to its genuineness. We have four conditions for a happy and good life; the first is that on which special stress is laid by St James, the tongue must be restrained not merely from evil-speaking, but from all deceit and falsehood. The suppression of angry feelings stands foremost both in connection with the preceding clauses, and as presenting peculiar difficulty at that time and under the circumstances of the Christian converts.

11. Let him eschew] Lit. "turn away from" evil; the old word eschew is singularly expressive, implying anxious shrinking, the Anglo-Saxon sceob, our "shy," and the German scheu. Thus the Psalmist passes on from the outward expression of bad feelings to the principles regulating the Christian life, renunciation of evil, active goodness, earnestness in the maintenance of peace; in other words, repentance as the beginning, and charity, exemplified in act and feeling, as the completion of the life which has its root in faith.

seek...and ensue] Both words are emphatic;

12 For the eyes of the Lord are over the righteous, and his ears are open unto their prayers: but the face of the Lord is ^{† Gr. upon.} against them that do evil.

13 And who is he that will harm you, if ye be followers of that which is good?

14 But and if ye suffer for righteousness' sake, happy are ye: and ^{Isai. 12, 13.} be not afraid of their terror, neither be troubled;

15 But sanctify the Lord God in your hearts: and be ready always to give an answer to every man that asketh you a reason of the hope the last implies earnest pursuit. The English form "ensue" does not occur elsewhere in our A.V., but the original is used nine times in the Pauline Epistles in the same metaphorical sense. This accords with classical usage.

12. In connection with outward acts the Psalmist has promises of temporal blessings, but in reference to the great Christian principle of charity he appeals to the highest spiritual motive. The eyes of the Lord are fixed on the righteous—He hears their prayers.

that do evil] St Peter omits the words that follow in the Psalm, "to cut off the remembrance of them from the earth," evidently because he would fix attention exclusively upon the spiritual and eternal consequences of evil-doing.

13. will harm you] The word is emphatic, do you any real evil. Cf. Isai. l. 9, where, as in many other passages, the same word is used in the Septuagint. It stands in direct antithesis to "good."

that which is good] Lit. "the good," which might mean, as our translators take it, "that which is good," but more probably points to Him who is good. The choice depends to some extent upon the other word, rendered "be ye followers." The reading followed by our translators and found in most of the oldest MSS. means zealous in the pursuit, or zealous for, an expression equally applicable to zeal for goodness or for God; cf. Acts xxii. 3. Another reading, which has good support, sc. "imitators," would almost necessitate the rendering, "of Him who is good." Cf. Matt. v. 45, 48.

14. But and if ye suffer] "But" is emphatic; if however it should happen that ye should suffer, i.e. notwithstanding the general promise of exemption from harm, it may happen, and you must expect that it will happen, that you will be called upon to suffer. The extent to which St Peter intends this as a warning, not merely of possible, but of probable, and nearly impending sufferings, depends upon the general or special bearing of the Epistle. Taken, as seems by far the most probable view, as specially intended to prepare Christians for what the Apostle distinctly foresaw, we must understand this phrase as explained above; "but remember that although none can really harm you, yet should you be, as you soon must be, called on to suffer," &c.

for righteousness' sake] Either for the profession of the Christian faith, or for the conduct which becomes that profession. It must be remembered that the faith and the life of Christians were equally odious to heathens. Some of the fiercest and the earliest persecutions were brought on directly by hatred of their purity of life. See Justin Martyr, 'Ap.' i.

happy are ye] That lesson St Peter had learned from his Master, Matt. v. 10, and had learned it thoroughly; see Acts v. 41. Christians too took it thoroughly to heart. 'Ep. ad Diogn.' c. 5, "Doing good they are punished as evil, being punished they rejoice as made to live;" Tertul. 'ad Scap.' i, "magis damnati, quam absoluti gaudemus."

be not afraid of their terror] This is commonly explained as the terror which their menaces might excite; but considering the undoubted reference to Isai. viii. 12, 13, it seems probable that St Peter means such terror as dismays those who do not fear God supremely.

15. But sanctify the Lord God] On the oldest and best reading, the Lord ~~the~~ Christ, instead of God, see the Additional Note. Here we have to press the truth that a man who sets up God in his heart as the only true object of reverence and fear, is exempt from all other fear.

and be ready] Omit "and be," which obscures the close connection with the preceding injunction. The first effect of the abiding sense of Christ present as the object of holy fear in your heart will be a constant readiness to meet inquirers.

to give an answer] Lit. "for an apology;" a word peculiar in the New Testament to St Paul and our Apostle. See Introd. to Acts, p. 342, n. 2. It means a complete and satisfactory account, and, consequently, defence, of the principle questioned or assailed. It is the word afterwards formally adopted by those who undertook to set forth the principles of the Christian faith in answer to heathen opponents—the age immediately following the Apostolic has been designated as the Apologetic age. The modern usage unfortunately obscures the meaning of the word, that is in you with meekness and fear:

16 Having a good conscience; that, whereas they speak evil of you, as of evildoers, they may be ashamed that falsely accuse your good conversation in Christ.

17 For it is better, if the will of which is fairly expressed by our A.V. *to give

to every man that asketh you a reason] The words "reason" and "answer" in our version correspond to each other more closely in the Greek. To any man who asks for an account, a rational principle, of the hope which is in you, you must be ready to give a satisfactory and rational account. To so much he is entitled for his own sake, so much you are bound to give upon demand, for the sake of the truth on which your hope is based. The answer must be ready when the question is put by an inquirer, as seems here to be specially implied. It may be doubted whether it applies to questions merely captious or put in order to elicit grounds for persecution. Such questions are commonly and best met, as they were in our Lord's case, by dignified and reverent silence. It must however be remembered that it was a charge often brought by heathens that Christians were not able to adduce any rational arguments in proof of the truth and doctrine which they professed (μηδὲν ἔχειν ἡμᾶς λέγειν εἰς ἀπόδειξιν ἀληθείας της καθ' ἡμᾶς κ.τ.λ., Theophil. Ant. 'ad Aut.' III. 4, p. 383, ed. Bened. Thus too Julian, Porphyry, and some of the earliest heretics, as Sim. M., cf. 'Recog. Clem.' 2, and the note of Lacerda on Tertullian, 'De Res. Carnis,' c. v.). This charge was sufficiently refuted by the great writers of the second and third centuries. The precept however must be cautiously applied. It goes very far, for it applies to all fair questions; it does not by any means imply that the Christian should be willing or able to deal with sophistical arguments, but it does imply that as he does not hope without a reason, that reason he must be ready to produce. It may be personal experience of the power of Christ, of the suitability of His Gospel to man's needs and infirmities, and as a remedy for sin; but whatever reason is alleged it must be a true and sound, and so far a sufficient reason.

with meekness and fear] Here our A.V., following the received text, unfortunately omits the emphatic word but; of two Greek words so rendered the more forcible is found here in all the best MSS. and ancient versions. St. Peter presses this condition most urgently; of all dangers that of angry, arrogant and irreverent demeanour on the part of men closely, and often captiously, questioned, is the most common and subtle. Sweetness coupled with awe, remembering whose cause is defended, will commend true reasoning, and they will be in themselves evidences calculated to impress and often to win opponents. The word "fear" may also include anxiety to avoid giving offence by inconsiderate or intemperate arguments, but it certainly does not mean fear of magistrates. The Christian is bound to submit to law, but is released from all fear of personal consequences when put on his trial. Reverence is due to all lawful authority; cf. v. 2.

16. Having a good conscience] This clause is directly connected with the preceding injunction—a good conscience is the only security for an effectual defence of the truth. The word rendered "conscience" occurs very frequently in the Pauline Epistles, once in the Acts xxiii. 1, where St Paul is speaking (see Introd. to Acts, p. 342, note 2), and uses the word precisely in the same form, a good conscience, and in reference to unjust accusations. This is one among many instances of exact conformity of thought, feeling, and even expression between the two Apostles.

whereas] Or wherein, i.e. in reference to the point on which you are attacked; see note on ii. 12.

they speak evil of you] Or, according to the reading generally adopted, "may speak against you." St Peter refers not to a certain, but a probable form of accusation. The Christian may be, as was indeed often the case, arraigned not for his faith, but for his conduct misunderstood or wilfully misrepresented. The reading however is doubtful. Tischendorf follows B, which has "ye are spoken against." It is of course possible that the common reading may be derived from the corresponding passage, ch. ii. 12.

they speak evil] Or, in one word, "calumniate," or revile. St Peter has in mind our Lord's words, Matt. v. 11.

they may be ashamed] Or, "put to shame;" convicted of falsehood.

good conversation] Note the repeated use of the words good and "conversation" in the specific sense of conduct.

in Christ] In this expression the name "Christ" is always used by the Apostles. It denotes the divine nature in which the Christian, as such, moves and lives, and has his true being.

17. if the will of God be so] See note on i. 6, and ii. 20. Here the phrase is somewhat different, "should the will of God so will it;" thus bringing out two points prominently; whatever may be done will be in accordance with God's will (cf. Matt. xxvi. 39, and the God be so, that ye suffer for well doing, than for evil doing.

18 For Christ also hath once suffered for sins, the just for the unjust, that he might bring us to God, being put to death in the flesh, but quickened by the Spirit :

19 By which also he went and preached unto the spirits in prison ; parallel passages, specially St Luke xxii. 42), and must therefore be for the good of those who suffer. For the general sentiment compare the noble words of Socrates in the 'Phædo.'

18 to end of chapter. THE PRECEDING EXHORTATIONS ARE NOW ENFORCED BY REFERENCE TO THE EXAMPLE OF CHRIST.

18. For Christ] Here, as usual, in addressing Gentile converts, St Peter uses "Christ" as a proper name. In passages intended for Hebrews the writers of the New Testament generally use the other form, the Christ; i.e. the Messiah.

bath once suffered] Rather, suffered once for all. St Peter refers to the one act by which pardon for sin was procured. The points of likeness and contrast are equally striking. Christ suffered not for His sins, but for sins in general; so must the Christian suffer, not for evil-doing, but remembering that he has been saved from sins. Some MSS. here add, "for you" or "for us," either of which readings expresses an apt thought, but was probably supplied as a gloss. Again instead of "suffered" some old MSS. have "died" (ἀπέθανεν instead of ἔπαθεν), a reading which obscures the very distinct reference to the sufferings of Christ's people.

the just for the unjust] The omission of the article in Greek brings out the contrast more forcibly; but it is required by English idiom. We should observe that the Christian, like his Master, must be just, but that, unlike his Master, he suffers not for others, but to discharge his own duty. Compare St Paul's elaborate statement of this great doctrine, Rom. v. 6—8.

that he might bring us to God] St Peter then states, as usual, concisely but distinctly the great end and effect of the atoning death of Christ; it gives man access to God, i.e. restores him to communion with God; cf. Rom. v. 1, 2; and, still nearer in expression, Eph. ii. 18, and iii. 12. Hence follow the duty and the power of following the example of Him who procured such access. The word "bring" is not that which is used in speaking of a sacrificial offering, a thought which might naturally occur, as it did to Luther. The Christian is here regarded not as a victim, but as an offender on whose behalf the Victim has suffered, and who thereby finds the way open to his Father.

being put to death...the Spirit] The exact rendering of this very important text has given occasion to much controversy, see Additional Note. The meaning however may be regarded as fully established. We have two statements: (1) Christ underwent death in the body, lit. in flesh (not the flesh), i.e. the material and visible form which He assumed in the Incarnation; cf. Rom. i. 2, where his bodily descent from David is mentioned, and note on 1 Cor. vii. 28. (2) He was quickened in the spirit, lit. "in spirit," which certainly refers not to the power by which He was quickened, but to the higher spiritual nature which belonged to the integrity of His humanity, and which was the medium through which the lifegiving energy from God was communicated to that humanity. The best rendering would therefore seem to be, "who died in flesh and was quickened in spirit," were it not that the English idiom requires the before flesh.

The connection of this statement with the preceding exhortation appears to be this. Every Christian like his Master is called upon to die; his material body must undergo that process; but the spiritual principle within him, by virtue of which he is regenerate in Christ, receives a new, indestructible life at the very moment of dissolution. Our Lord's spirit, thus endued with life, at once manifested its lifegiving power; so it may be inferred, will each Christian spirit in and by its suffering win converts.

19. By which also] See Additional Note. The points which stand out distinctly in this difficult and much controverted text are these. 1. "By which" must be rendered in which, i.e. in which spirit, disembodied and quickened with the new undying life. 2. He went and preached; the word rendered "went" is always used in reference to a personal act, and specially in connection with preached; thus in Mark xvi. 15, Go ye and preach; both words the same as are here used. We must therefore understand St Peter to say that after death our Lord in His own human spirit went forth and preached, i.e. proclaimed certain tidings. 3. "To the spirits in prison," or in custody; i.e. to certain spirits, specified afterwards, who when He thus came among them were, not in bonds or penance (which would be ἐν δεσμοτηρίῳ) condemned criminals, but in custody, as prisoners awaiting their doom.

The reason why St Peter specially refers to the deluge was evidently because this catastrophe was a prelude and type of the general judgment, to which the Apostle would here direct the attention of his readers.

20 Which sometime were disobedient, when once the longsuffering of God waited in the days of Noah, while the ark was a preparing, wherein few, that is, eight souls were saved by water.

21 The like figure whereunto even baptism doth also now save us (not the putting away of the filth of the flesh, but the answer of a good conscience toward God,) by the resurrection of Jesus Christ :

22 Who is gone into heaven, and is on the right hand of God ; angels and authorities and powers being made subject unto him.

20. Which sometime were disobedient] I.e. who at a former time had disobeyed, sc. the announcement or command then given to them.

when once] Rather (omitting "once," which represents a word not found in any good MS.), when, specifying the time of that disobedience.

the longsuffering of God waited] Or, was waiting. The word, which St Paul uses frequently, implies attentive and patient waiting, or expectation. The exact interval is further specified; it lasted while Noah was building the ark, a period of many years.

while the ark] Lit. while an ark was being prepared.

wherein few] This marks the extent of the old disobedience. None obeyed the call of Noah, all perished save the few, his own family, who entered the ark. They were saved by the water which destroyed the others. So that the persons to whom Christ went and preached were those who had neglected or rejected warnings in life uttered by a human prophet. They had perished in the water which bore those who entered the ark in perfect safety. Cf. Clem. Rom. '1 Cor.' VII. and IX.

21. The like figure whereunto] This rendering expresses the general sense, but does not accurately represent the statement in the Greek. It may be rendered "which also saves you now as baptism being antitypical." That is, "water which saved those who listened to the preaching of Noah now in baptism, which is the antitype of that water, is the means or instrument of your salvation." The same water, which drowned those who disobeyed Noah, saved those who entered into the ark; so also baptismal water, which potentially drowns and destroys the old man, or our sinful nature, saves all who are brought into, and remain in, the true ark with Christ.

N.B. The reading δ instead of ϕ T. R. is unquestionably correct.

not the putting away] Rather, "not a putting away." This passage is parenthetical, inserted to guard against a possible misunderstanding, or rather, a probable misrepresentation of the nature and effect of baptism. Baptism saves us, not as an external operation, sc. the putting away uncleanness of the body; (for that though a sacramental symbol is distinguishable in idea, and separable also in fact from the spiritual efficacy of the mystery, which requires certain conditions) but as an inward process attested by the appeal which the conscience, being purified, makes to God. See Additional Note on the whole of this passage.

St Peter may of course refer, as Chrysostom (Tom. II. p. 228 c), Justin M. 'c. Tryph.' p. 114 D, and other expositors hold, to the inefficacy of the old ceremonial ablutions; but his meaning is clear when confined to Christian baptism. It is effectual spiritually; the virtus sacramenti is one thing, the res, i.e. the outward form, is another; both are necessary, but the one is common to all partakers of the rite; the other is confined to those who fulfil the conditions.

but the answer] Or, lit. "the question" in the sense of a prayerful questioning, a petition or supplication. The antithesis stands thus. Contrasted with "the flesh," or omitting the article, "flesh" is "conscience," the inner man contrasted with the outer man. The ($\alpha\nu\theta\epsilon\sigma\iota\varsigma\ \rho\acute{\iota}\pi\pi\omicron\upsilon$), the putting off all bodily defilement is the act of the outer man, the questioning in prayer is the act of the inner man. The word $\alpha\nu\theta\epsilon\sigma\iota\varsigma$ is peculiar to St Peter, cf. 2 Pet. i. 14. N.B. Both $\sigma\alpha\rho\kappa\acute{o}\varsigma$ and $\sigma\upsilon\nu\epsilon\iota\delta\eta\sigma\epsilon\omega\varsigma$ are the subjective, not the objective genitive.

by the resurrection of Jesus Christ] The resurrection of Christ is thus stated to be the cause why baptism saves us. He was thereby declared to be the Son of God with power, Rom. i. 4, and as St Paul again says Rom. iv. 25, "He rose again for our justification." Thus in the first ch. St Peter has said that we are regenerated by His resurrection. Both Apostles therefore attribute our regeneration, justification and salvation in a special sense to the Resurrection. Baptism is the instrumental cause, Christ's death the meritorious cause, His Resurrection, brought to bear upon the heart by His Spirit, is the efficacious cause; of which the movement of the conscience in prayer to the Father, calling Him Abba, Father, is the attestation, as Ecumenius puts it, "the pledge, assurance, and manifestation."

22. Who is gone into heaven] The same word which is used above, v. 19, to denote a personal movement; as He went to Hades, as His Apostles went into the world, so in His human form He went up into heaven.

and is on the right hand of God] In St

Peter's discourses and in the Petrine Gospel the Ascension is presented as the culminating point, the end and completion of Christ's work. See note on Mark i. 1.

angels and authorities and powers] As He declared before His ascension, Matt. xxviii. 18, "All power is given unto Me in heaven and earth," so here all the powers of heaven are said to have been made subject unto Him; as the word (ὑποταγέντων) denotes, before His Ascension, i.e. at His Resurrection. It may be questioned whether in this passage reference is made to "the powers and principalities of darkness, as well as of light," but considering the near resemblance of this passage to Ephes., cf. i. 20—22; and corresponding statements in other Pauline Epistles, it seems not improbable. It is no slight consolation to know that not only all good spirits are wholly subservient to Christ, ministering therefore to those who are heirs of salvation, but that Satan and his powers are absolutely subject to Him, acting only by His permission, and even when inflicting punishment, doing it for the benefit of the church. Cf. 1 Cor. v. 5; 1 Cor. xii. 7; and 1 Tim. i. 20. See also Rev. xx. 2.

Attention should be specially given to the completeness of St Peter's Christology in this remarkable passage. See Introduction, § 5.

ADDITIONAL NOTES on CHAP. III. 15, 18, 19, 21.

15. Instead of θεόν the oldest and best MSS., N, A, B, C, have Χριστόν. So too all the best ancient versions. It seems presumptuous to reject a reading so authenticated, and it may be added, so unlikely to have been introduced in what must have been regarded as a quotation. It is a text of great importance, since it leaves no doubt as to the identification of the Christ, the Son of God, with the Lord Jehovah, manifested in the Second Person in the Trinity. It has been objected that Κύριος without the article is not used of our Lord in the New Testament, an observation which, if true, would be scarcely applicable to a quotation. The LXX. however have Κύριον δὲ αὐτόν for "Jehovah of Sabaoth," so that in any case St Peter alters their rendering, and in addressing Christians he urges the special claim which the Christ, whose name they profess, has to their devout and fear-excluding reverence. St Peter uses Χριστός twice with the article, though more commonly, as is usual in addressing Gentiles, without the article. Here it is emphatic, Κύριον, Jehovah, "the Christ." On the whole the oldest and best supported reading should certainly be retained.

18. The only various reading, τῷ πνεύματι, which is unfortunately that of the received text, followed by our A. V., has no support in the Uncial MSS. It imports an alien thought into the statement. St Peter does not say that Christ was quickened by the Spirit, which is implied in that reading, and by the capital letter in our A. V.; but that as He died in body, so He was quickened, endued with new life, in spirit, i.e. as explained above, in His spiritual nature, the true inner man, which after God is renewed unto true holiness. Both σὰρξ and πνεῦμα must be constructed as the casus modalis, indicating the mode and principle in which the several processes of life and death are accomplished. The πνεῦμα in speaking of Christ is called by St Paul πνεῦμα ἀγιοσύνης, not τὸ π., and as here is directly connected with restoration to life after or in death. See Additional Note on Rom. i. 4.

19. Most of the questions raised by theologians and commentators are disposed of by adherence to the literal meaning of each clause, as given in the footnote. Our A. V. leaves the whole construction obscure and ambiguous; but while differing materially in the inferences drawn from the statement, commentators are now all but unanimous as to its literal import.

Ἐν ᾧ was formerly explained away, either as meaning in which, or by the agency of which Holy Spirit, taken personally according to the old reading τῷ Πνεύματι; but it certainly means "in which." "He went" undoubtedly implies a personal advent or going forth, as shewn specially by the passage above quoted from Mark xvi. 15, and by John xiv. 3. Ἐν φυλακῇ certainly means "in custody," as in Rev. xx. 7: not necessarily as a place of suffering, but as a place where, according to their several demerits, evil angels (see 2 Pet. ii. 4; Jude 6) or sinful men are kept awaiting the final judgment.

He preached. The word is invariably used in the New Testament of a public announcement, a heraldic proclamation, so to speak, and specially of the Gospel tidings. St Peter says nothing as to the subject-matter or effects of such an announcement, but the natural inference is that it was not simply and exclusively a denunciation, for which another word, not hallowed like this by associations of merciful tidings, would probably have been employed. It should, however, be noticed that Clement of Rome, '1 Cor.' c. VII., says that Νῶε ἐκρυψε μετάνοιαν καὶ οἱ ὑπακούσαντες ἐσώθησαν, which seems a reminiscence of this passage: see also a similar statement in c. ix. Josephus, 'Arch.' I. 4, gives the old Hebrew tradition; and it is quite possible that Clement might have had that tradition present to his mind, rather than our passage, which would have suggested other considerations. Ἀπειθήσασι ποτε, ὅτε; this distinctly marks the long past time when the sin of disobedience had been incurred.

If in such a passage as this, where the literal statement presents a clear, though in its bearings a mysterious sense, it were necessary to go further, we should turn in the first place to the early Greek Fathers, who were most unlikely to misunderstand the words, and had ample means of knowing in what sense they were received by the hearers and followers of the Apostles. It is certain that with one consent they held that St Peter here speaks of the descent into Hades, recognised by the Apostles' Creed and universally taught by the Church. The passages bearing on this are collected by Cotelier 'Patt. Ap.' Tom. I. p. 117. As to the objects of that descent they differed widely. Clement of Alexandria, as usual, going farthest in that direction, held that this preaching extended to all the Gentiles who had lived righteously before our Lord's coming, cf. 'Strom.' II. p. 379. Most of the early Fathers considered that it was limited to those who had believed in His future advent; thus Irenæus III. 23; IV. 29, 45; V. 31; Justin M., Origen, Hippolytus, Greg. Naz.; or more strictly to the souls of the patriarchs, Tertullian 'de Anima,' p. 260 C. Some few believed that He offered salvation to all who would receive Him, an opinion stated and not altogether rejected by Augustine, who in the 164th Epistle, § 11, 12, discusses the question with great care, and as usual with great ability, and acknowledges his uncertainty as to the true meaning at the time, A.D. 415, when he wrote that Epistle. But whatever they taught or conjectured as to the persons to whom the proclamation was addressed, all agreed that it was an announcement to spirits of the departed, and moreover that it was an announcement of deliverance to the penitent. One of the strongest statements is found in Athanasius, 'c. Apollinar.' I. § 14—a passage which, although somewhat obscure, distinctly asserts our Lord's personal presence in Hades.

This interpretation was first contested by Augustine, who in the Epistle to Evodius, above quoted, gives an explanation, which was afterwards generally adopted by mediæval writers of the Western Church, sc. Bede, Thomas Aquinas, N. de Lyra, and by many divines after the Reformation, e.g. Beza, Saliger, Hammond. As stated by Augustine, i.e. it stands thus. The spirits shut up in prison are the unbelievers who lived in the times of Noe, whose spirits, i.e. whose souls were shut up, as it were in prison, in the flesh and in the darkness of ignorance. Christ preached to them not in the flesh, for He was not yet incarnate, but in spirit, i.e. in His divine nature, "secundum divinitatem." This appears to have been the view taken by our English translators. It is obviously irreconcilable with the Greek. Beza's modification, "who now in prison are suffering due punishment," meets one objection only, and that but partially. As was shewn the sense thus given to the words is forced and arbitrary.

The preaching of Noah certainly cannot mean a personal act of the Spirit of Christ, even supposing that the word Spirit here refers to the Divine Word, which is, to say the least, wholly improbable. The expression ἐν φυλακῇ certainly does not mean "in the prison of ignorance," but a state of duration. The Greek ἀπειθήσασι necessarily refers to a period antecedent to the announcement, and ἐκήρυξε indicates a single act, not a series of admonitions.

Hence all modern commentators concur in the exposition given in the footnote; differing only in the inferences drawn from it, though not necessarily involved in it. It is clear that it tells us nothing of the effects of the announcement, and affords no ground for speculation as to the present or future condition of those who now await their judgment in the intermediate state, having rejected or not having known the Gospel of Christ. All orthodox writers agree that the text cannot apply to spirits already condemned to eternal punishment. The expression "in prison," or more exactly, in custody, does not imply or suggest a state of purgatorial torment; though that doctrine, when once introduced, first, as seems probable, by Augustine, was supported, in the absence of direct authority, by reference to passages which by reason of their incompleteness or obscurity, might be open to speculative interpretations.

It must be borne in mind that the whole passage forms part of a general statement of the result of the sufferings of Christ. He died for sins, the just for the unjust. By that death He opened access for us Christians to God; after that death in the body He preached to the captives in His spirit, and by the baptism which He instituted He assured salvation to all who should fulfil the conditions: an institution followed by His Resurrection and Ascension.

21. The rendering follows two readings found in all the best MSS., ὅ, which; referring to ὑδωρ, not ῥ, rendered in the A. V. "whereunto;" evidently a gloss, intended to facilitate the construction, which presents some difficulty, and is scarcely capable of exact reproduction. Again, ὑμᾶς with N, A, B, instead of ἡμᾶς, which has fair support. It must be observed that the word ἀντίτυπον is an adjective, rendered in German "gegenbildlich," which, being either adjectival or adverbial, evades the difficulty to some extent. The Vulgate is happy in its rendering, Quod et vos nunc similis formæ salvos facit baptismā.

In the questions on the Parables of Scripture attributed, but wrongly, to Athanasius, the Flood is called the first Baptism for the extirpation of sin, 'Opp.' II. p. 426; Tertullian calls it the Baptism of the world; and Origen, 'c. Cels.' vi. 58, says "The destruction of men in the flood is the purification of the earth," and refers to an old saying of the Greeks to the same effect.

As to the rendering of the A.V., the answer of a good conscience, it must be remarked that ἐπερώτημα means in classical usage a question or questioning. The passages quoted from Herodotus and Thucydides are clear and decisive. The verb from which it is derived ἐπερωτάω occurs frequently in the New Testament and in the LXX., first in the sense of simply asking a question, then specially of consulting God, as in Isai. lxx. 1, quoted Rom. x. 20, and still more commonly of addressing a petition, asking in prayer, a meaning derived from the Hebrew לָנֶשׂ, to which it corresponds in many passages: see Tromm. 'Concord.' Thus too the simpler form ἐρωτάω means to pray, to seek in prayer, a sense, which, as Grimm, s.v. observes, is unknown to classical writers. The single passage in which the word ἐπερώτημα occurs in the Septuagint, viz. Dan. iv. 14, identifies it in meaning with נִלְתָּנָה, which Rödiger in Ges. 'Thes.' explains "decretum," but which our A.V., in common with most expositors, renders by the word "demand." See Kranichen in loc. This rendering of the word has therefore a primary claim for acceptance. The Vulgate adopts it "Conscientiæ bonæ interrogatio in Deum." Thus the Vulg. has interrogavit in Domino and in Deo repeatedly, for the Septuagint ἐπερωτάω and the Hebrew לָנֶשׂ: so that the natural rendering of the word as used by and to persons conversant with the LXX. would be "the petition, prayer, or prayerful address of a good conscience to God." Thus Bengel, 'Gn.' Salvat ergo nos rogatio bonæ conscientiæ. The objection (Meyer) that this is too vague is scarcely valid. The object of the prayer addressed by a conscience, pure under the influence of the Holy Spirit, the efficient cause of conversion, must needs be salvation, including its conditions and ultimate result. There may also be reference to the spiritual washing. See Ps. li. 2. Grimm, 'Lex. N.T.,' proposes another rendering, viz. the demand or entreaty for a good conscience. This is scarcely admissible.

2. The exposition of the old Scholiast in Eecumenius comes near the true meaning; ἐπερώτημα, ἀρράβων, ἐνέχυρον, ἀπόδειξις, i.e. baptism is an act in which the conscience being pure pledges itself to God. It is however not easy to shew the connection of the word with the meaning thus assigned to it.

3. The meaning "stipulatio" is advocated by Bishop Bull, 'Apol. p. Harm.' p. 23, "Stipulatio idem significat quod συγκατάθεσις ap. Basil. 'De Spir. S.' c. II. nimirum in Baptismo interrogabat Episcopus ἀποτάσσει τῷ Σαρανᾷ; respondebat baptizandus ἀποτάσσομαι." The objection that this refers to a later form has not much weight; the form was simply the expression of an old truth: but no valid authority for this sense of ἐπερώτημα can be adduced.

4. In some inscriptions referred to the beginning of the second century a formula occurs not unfrequently, which might suggest a plausible explanation of this passage; sc. κατὰ τὸ ἐπερώτημα τῆς σεμνοτάτης βουλῆς, "according to the decision of the Senate." This implies that after careful questioning and examination a decisive answer has been given. Thus in baptism the conscience is questioned, considers the question and deliberately pledges itself, without the admixture of impure motive, to the fulfilment of the universal conditions, repentance and faith. This process corresponds with the external act by which the man cleanses himself from outward pollution. It scarcely seems a reasonable objection that the use of the word is not demonstrable in the time of St Peter; it is a common and legitimate use at a period not far distant, and seems to express his thought not inadequately. Upon the whole, however, the explanation given above, no. 1, is decidedly to be preferred.

CHAPTER IV.

1 He exhorteth them to cease from sin by the example of Christ, and the consideration of the general end that now approacheth: 12 and comforteth them against persecution.

CHAP. IV. 1—11. St Peter resumes the argument from v. 18 in the preceding chapter, after the important digression which there followed the general statement. From the fact there stated and here repeated, viz. that Christ suffered in the flesh, i.e. in the body, he now deduces practical inferences, shewing that He suffered not only to bring us into a state of reconciliation, but also into a state of holiness. His death at once represented and effected a complete conquest over sin. He died in the flesh to save us from the penalty due to sin, and at the same time by that death He represented and potentially effected the mortification of our carnal nature. This line of argument is followed by St Paul in the Epistles to the Romans and Colossians, see following notes. Hence St Peter enforces the duty of eschewing all old heathenish habits, with special reference to the judgment which awaits the quick and the dead.

FORASMUCH then as Christ hath suffered for us in the flesh, arm yourselves likewise with the same mind: for he that hath suffered in the flesh hath ceased from sin;

2 That he no longer should live the rest of his time in the flesh to the lusts of men, but to the will of God.

3 For the time past of our life may suffice us to have wrought the will of the Gentiles, when we walked in lasciviousness, lusts, excess of wine,

1. for us] These words are omitted in the oldest MSS. and versions. The statement though true, does not bear upon the immediate object of the Apostle, who is drawing out the practical and spiritual inferences from Christ's death. Observe the correspondence with the expressions used above, ch. iii. 18, and ii. 21, 24.

arm yourselves likewise with the same mind: for] Or more probably, do you also (emphatic) arm yourselves with the same thought; the word refers to the thought which was in the mind of Christ, viz. that death, met and undergone in the same spirit which actuated Him, puts an end to contact with sin, in His case with the sins of others, which were then blotted out, expiated, and done away with, but in the case of those who are baptized into His death, to contact with personal sins; here St Peter adopts the argument developed by St Paul in Rom. vi. 6, 7, which was undoubtedly present to his mind and would be remembered by his readers.

The word rendered "mind" A.V., or more properly "thought" or way of thinking, occurs but once elsewhere in the New Testament, Heb. iv. 12, where it is used in the plural. The classical usage is uncontested. The injunction reminds Christians that they have to wage battle against "fleshly lusts that war against the soul," ii. 11; they must therefore put on as the only perfect armour of defence that principle which was exemplified in the death undergone by the Saviour, and is spiritually shared by the true believer. It is, as usual with St Peter, a condensed and pregnant summary of Pauline exhortations, most fully developed in Eph. vi.

for he that, &c.] Or, "that he who hath." This is the more obvious construction, but that which is adopted by our A. V. is well supported, and is probably correct.

hath ceased from sin] Christ having suffered for sin, abolished sin, had no more to do with it in the way of atonement; the Christian must follow that example, see the following note.

2. That he no longer] This is closely connected in structure with the preceding clause, "hath ceased from sin," to the effect that being dead to sin the Christian must live the rest of his life in the flesh, not as heretofore following the lusts of men, but the will of God. "In the flesh" in this clause refers simply to our bodily life. The word rendered "live" has a somewhat emphatic meaning, being never used of animals; henceforth the life must be a true life, such as befits man.

3. For the time past] The words "of our life" and "us" after "suffice" are not found in the oldest MSS. and should be omitted. St Peter certainly does not identify himself with those who had lived in the abominations of heathendom, specially pointed at in the following words. Another reading, "you" for "us," has some support in old MSS. and versions (cf. 1 Cor. vi. 11), but is not to be adopted. St Peter leaves to his readers the application of his statement.

the will of the Gentiles] This implies that the mass of St Peter's hearers had formerly lived as Gentiles; Gentiles among Gentiles. The statement would be but partially applicable to converts from Judaism. The evil habits enumerated were prevalent among all Gentiles, and especially in the eastern provinces of the Empire, to an extent hardly to be realized by Christians, and certainly not shared by Jews.

when we walked] The pronoun "we" must be omitted; "having walked" is better; our English idiom almost requires a pronoun, but none can be used without modifying the Apostle's statement.

in lasciviousness, &c.] St Peter gives here an enumeration strikingly characteristic of his style, remarkable for fulness and condensation; see Introduction, § 5. Six forms of gross sensuality are pointed out. Of these three are personal, applying to individuals as such: each denoted by a word accurately discriminating the principle and character of the sin: first, "lasciviousness," or more exactly, lascivious actions or habits, such as fill the pages of satirists and licentious poets of that age; secondly, "lusts," the inner principles of licentiousness; thirdly, "excess of wine," a strong word, occurring here only in the New Testament, but not uncommon in classical writers, indicating crapulousness, drunkenness. Whether solitary or not these three sins are personal. The three following are social evils, (1) "revellings," a word which has the special sense of riotous processions of wild youths such as were common in all Greek cities at that time; (2) "banquetings" or "drinking bouts," often prolonged through the night, and noticed not without commendation by the most thoughtful heathen. Cf. Plato, 'Symp.' ch. XIII., XXXI. and XXXIX. Lastly revellings, banquetings, and abominable idolatries :

4 Wherein they think it strange that ye run not with them to the same excess of riot, speaking evil of you :

(3), abominable idolatries, lit. illicit idolatries, not as contrary to human law, but to the eternal principle of right (ἀθέμιτος). After the persecution of Nero Christianity itself was an illicita religio. Here it is evident that St Peter specially refers to the general, all but universal connection of the grossest sensuality with idolatrous practices, such as all his Gentile readers must have shared, but from which the Jew recoiled. This passage, among many others, is decisive as to the nationality of his readers.

4. Wherein] This refers to the former course of life now abandoned by Christian converts.

they think it strange] The Gentiles, not regarding any or all the sins so abjured as unnatural, or harmful, felt and expressed the utmost surprise at the abstention of Christians, and looked upon them as morose, superstitious bigots, misanthropists, equally opposed to the enjoyments of man and to the worship of their own Gods. This feature is constantly alluded to by Christian apologists.

that ye run not with them] implies more than mere compliance, an eager pursuit of the same object.

excess of riot] Both words are emphatic ; the former used here only means an overflowing, a surging up, or outburst ; the second, common in classical writers, expresses utter dissoluteness, ruinous profligacy. It occurs in Eph. v. 18, where see note.

speaking evil of you] Lit. blaspheming ; a word which ought to be kept, omitting the words "of you," as including evil-speaking not only against the persons, but the religion of Christians.

6. The interpretation of this verse depends upon that of the passage, vv. 19, 20, in the preceding chapter, with which it corresponds substantially. According to the most ancient, and now most generally received, view of that passage, the sense of this verse must be that the Gospel, i.e. the glad tidings of the triumph over death by our Lord's death and resurrection, was preached to the dead—a term which certainly extends further than to those who perished in the Deluge, and possibly to all past generations—with the intent and object of teaching them that although they should have been judged according to the law of nature and of God to suffer death in the body, they might be quickened, according to a special putting forth of Divine grace, in the spirit, and stand

5 Who shall give account to him that is ready to judge the quick and the dead.

6 For for this cause was the gospel preached also to them that are dead, that they might be judg-with spiritualized bodies before the judgment-seat of Christ. Cf. Rom. viii. 10. If this interpretation is correct it is evident that we must take the verse in connection with the first verse of the chapter ; it shews that the law there laid down is universal ; no one can be admitted into the kingdom who has not suffered in the flesh, undergoing the penalty for sin, and who has not also been spiritually quickened. This view does not imply that those to whom the announcement was made were transferred into a different state from that in which they had died, but that the meaning and effect of their punishment was made known to them, and the access to God, which Christ's death opened to all, was offered to them. This is connected also with the preceding verse as shewing the universality of the Final Judgment.

Points of exceeding importance are thus drawn out : 1, The death of Christ affects all, not excluding those who died before His coming ; 2, All must share His death in order to be made partakers of His life.

was the gospel preached] This necessarily refers to a definite and past act, not to a continued preaching. It corresponds to the word "preached" in ch. iii. 19, but differs from it ; that word meant simply "He proclaimed ;" this explains the nature and bearing of the proclamation ; it was evangelical, a message of glad tidings. For the statement see Justin M. 'Dial.' LXXII. and Otto's note ; Irenæus, IV. 33, and v. 31.

them that are dead] This does not give the exact sense of the Greek, which rather implies "to them that were dead when the Gospel reached them." We may assume as certain that the word refers to physical, not, as some have held, to spiritual death. The announcement was made not to the quick but to the dead ; those dwellers in Hades who, whether as "prisoners of hope," or, so to speak prisoners of fear, awaited the coming of Christ.

that they might be judged] The construction presents some difficulty, increased in our version by the omission of the word indeed. The Greek makes a distinction between the two propositions ; the former does not apply to the effect of the tidings, but to the condition of those who were addressed ; they were to learn that they had, as a natural law to undergo death, the wages of their sin ; the next proposition, but live, tells us what was the ultimate and perfect effect upon the ed according to men in the flesh, but live according to God in the spirit.

7 But the end of all things is at hand: be ye therefore sober, and watch unto prayer.

8 And above all things have fervent charity among yourselves: for charity ¹shall cover the multitude of ¹Or, will. sins.

9 Use hospitality one to another without grudging.

who were prepared to receive it. According to God, as above explained, according to the divine law of grace and life. The literal rendering is that they may be judged: but the term is evidently used with reference to their previous state, not to the time of the announcement.

It must be borne in mind that St Peter's great object is to shew the universality and absolute character of the principles with which he is here specially concerned. It might have been objected that physical death and the option of spiritual life could scarcely be universal, if all past generations were exempted from the law. That objection he meets, not to lead us into speculative inquiry, but to vindicate the righteousness of God and take away every pretext for misrepresentation.

7—11. PRACTICAL EXHORTATIONS CONNECTED WITH IMPENDING JUDGMENT.

7. But the end of all things] The order of the Greek words is emphatic, Of all however the end is near; all might apply both to men and things, here probably to both, for our "own end" is the main point in warning. The words stand out in striking contrast to the preceding verse; we are not to be drawn aside from contemplating our own responsibility by speculating about the lot of others; we and they have the ultimate and complete judgment to look for, and that without delay.

at hand] Lit. has drawn near. It is the word constantly used in reference to the coming of Christ and His kingdom. We have to understand it either as referring to the very brief period which must intervene before we are called individually to give account for the things done in the body—a view which however is rather an application than a proper explanation,—or to the great judgment certainly then impending over the Hebrew and Gentile world, to which expressions resembling this very closely must be referred; or literally and properly to the day which will usher in eternity. To this last the only possible objection is that the Apostle's statements are held to be incompatible with the vast interval which has already elapsed. But the last day is spoken of as near, not with reference to our chronology, but to the development of God's purposes in His various dispensations. We live in the last times, under a dispensation which is final in the history of humanity, and will have its termination at the coming of Christ. That termination has drawn near (ἤγγικε), so near that there is absolutely nothing between it and us.

be ye therefore sober] Rather, "be ye therefore sober-minded;" referring to a general state of wise and sober mind. The Greek (σωφρονεῖν) is explicitly opposed to all ill-regulated and unwise thoughts and feelings.

and watch unto prayer] The word rendered watch (νήφω) implies sober, thoughtful, abstinence, giving the mind in a calm composed state to the great duty of prayer. A different word is used in the exhortation which naturally presents itself to our minds; see Mark xiii. 37. St Peter had in mind the special temptations of a people and time addicted to excess in habits and emotions.

8. above all] Lit. before all things. Omit the conjunction "and," which rather obscures the earnestness of St Peter's style. Charity must not only be supreme, but it must precede all acts which manifest the Christian life. It is scarcely needful to point out that "charity" is the Christian grace of love, and that the word was adopted here and elsewhere in our A. V., partly because it is a new and exclusively Christian name for a Christian grace, corresponding closely to the Greek, partly because it was familiar to the Christian mind as the equivalent and representative of the Vulgate "caritas."

have fervent charity] The Greek is even stronger, "having or keeping your charity intense;" the charity they must needs have as Christians; they are bound to keep it in a state of energy or intensity.

shall cover] Or, covers. This reading has far better support than shall cover; and is important as meaning that earnest charity casts a cloke over many offences, refuses to see or to expose them. The future tense might rather imply that it will be a protection or defence in the day of judgment, a thought alien to the Apostle's mind. In the original passage, Prov. x. 12, the former is the undoubted meaning. Here the injunction and the motive have a special significance; the preservation of peace being the best and indeed the only effectual preparation for impending trials and the final judgment. See note on James v. 20.

9. hospitality] The word must be taken in its proper sense, not directly referring to friendly intercourse among equals—a social

10 As every man hath received the gift, even so minister the same one to another, as good stewards of the manifold grace of God.

11 If any man speak, let him speak as the oracles of God; if any man minister, let him do it as of the ability which God giveth: that God in all things may be glorified through Jesus Christ, to whom be praise and dominion for ever and ever. Amen.

12 Beloved, think it not strange concerning the fiery trial which is to and temporal duty having its own immediate and temporal reward—but specially to the kindly reception of strangers (cf. Matt. xxv. 35) and of all who need comfort and help. Such hospitality involved considerable expense in an age when no regular provision was made for the destitute, great and sudden vicissitudes from opulence to poverty were common, and wayfarers bearing commendatory letters from Christian pastors frequently presented themselves at the houses of the rich. Hence the repeated exhortations of St. Paul and our Apostle.

grudging] Or “murmuring,” impatient outbursts. The word indicates the commonness of the temptation and the necessity of a special caution. Cf. 2 Cor. ix. 7.

10. the gift] Or, a gift. From temporal the Apostle now passes to spiritual duties; the word rendered “gift” means specially a spiritual endowment, whether miraculous or ordinary, whether personal or ministerial. This exactly corresponds to St. Paul’s exhortations, 1 Cor. xii. 7; see also xiv. 12. Compare Clem. Rom. ‘1 Cor.’ xxxviii.

as good stewards] The proper office of the steward, as understood by the readers of St. Peter, was rightly to administer and dispense his master’s goods, providing for the due maintenance of all the household. The word “manifold” in Greek specially refers to the great variety of gifts and graces of which each Christian recipient is bound to be a liberal dispenser.

11. If any man speak] Or, “If any man speaks;” i.e. When any one speaks. It is not implied that some may not have to speak. Here St. Peter refers to two kinds only of the manifold gifts, but they include all that is needed for the edification and organization of the Church. Speaking includes all kinds of instruction given by Christians to each other, whether ordinary, extraordinary, or official. A man who speaks thus must speak not as using his own natural uninspired utterances, but as being a bearer of divine utterances.

the oracles] Not “the oracles,” an expression which would imply in conformity with the Scriptures, but as oracles, being themselves entrusted with such utterances. The exhortation is singularly impressive, implying a complete surrender of the speaker’s self to the movements of the Holy Spirit, as in our Lord’s exhortation, Mark xiii. 11. The ministering officers of the Church are to depend entirely on the strength given them by God. Thus all the glory of the success of exhortations or of ministrations will be referred to God through Jesus Christ, by whose effectual working the speaker and minister are enabled to do their duty.

minister] This does not refer to ministrations in the Church, but to the distribution of gifts spoken of in the preceding verse.

to whom] The question, whether this refers to God the Father or to the Lord Jesus Christ, is differently answered by commentators. On the one hand, it is said truly that all glory is ascribed to the Father as the primal source of grace, and in this passage the great subject of the sentence; on the other, it may be pointed out that the most natural construction connects the words with those immediately preceding it, and that the ascription of glory and power to the Son is thoroughly in accordance with the principles and the style both of St. Peter and St. Paul. Clem. Rom. § xx. applies the ascription indiscriminately to the Father and, as here, to the Son. See the note of Lipsius on that passage in the edition of Gebhardt and Harnack. That doxology refers specially to the grace and goodness of God manifested through Christ to the Church.

12—19. St. Peter now recurs to the train of thought which marks the beginning of his Epistle, i. 3—9; and points to the certain hope of glory which awaits those who are partakers of Christ’s sufferings. The expressions employed throughout imply that severe persecution is imminent, to be looked for as immediately to come, if not already begun.

12. think it not strange] The word, as here used, is peculiar to St. Peter, who uses it twice, here and above, v. 4. The feeling deprecated is that of strangeness, as though suffering was not the home-portion, so to speak, of a Christian. Gentiles felt unable to understand the feelings of Christians, and were therefore estranged from them, Christians must not feel themselves unable to realize their position as sufferers. They are to be at home in suffering.

concerning...to try you] This may be more exactly rendered, “at the fiery affliction which is taking place among you for trial.” The word (πύρωσις) is emphatic; it is used in the LXX. as equivalent to “fiery.”

try you, as though some strange thing happened unto you :

13 But rejoice, inasmuch as ye are partakers of Christ's sufferings ; that, when his glory shall be revealed, ye may be glad also with exceeding joy.

14 If ye be reproached for the name of Christ, happy are ye ; for the spirit of glory and of God resteth upon you : on their part he is evil spoken of, but on your part he is glorified.

15 But let none of you suffer as a murderer, or as a thief, or as an evildoer, or as a busybody in other men's matters.

16 Yet if any man suffer as a nace ;" and certainly refers to ch. i. 7. The A. V. is ambiguous and may be understood to speak of a future trial ; the Greek decisively shews that it is already going on among Christians.

some strange thing] This refers to the verb, rendered "think it not strange." The following verse shews that such sufferings cannot be strange to Christ's followers.

13. But rejoice, inasmuch] The word "inasmuch" must be understood in its full and proper sense, "to the extent in which." So far as the Christian's sufferings are of the same kind, proceeding from the same causes, as those undergone by his Master, he is called upon to rejoice, for that present participation in suffering secures future participation in His glory. See again ch. i. 7.

that] This refers to the rejoicing in suffering which is a pledge of future rejoicing in glory.

14. If ye be reproached] Rather, If (or "when") ye are reviled. The Greek does not imply a contingency, but asserts a fact.

for the name of Christ] Lit. "in Christ's name," i.e. simply because you confess Christ as your Lord. Thus in the Epistle of the Churches of Vienne and Lyons, "they were imprisoned as Christians, no other charge whatever being brought against them."

for the spirit] Hence the blessedness of the Christian who when suffering has a special sense of the abiding presence of the Spirit of God, bringing with It the assurance of future glory, and of actual favour with God. The word rendered "resteth" has a special significance, being used in the LXX. of the abiding presence of the Spirit of the Lord, Isai. xl. 2.

on their part...glorified] This clause is omitted in all the best MSS. and ancient versions. It was probably a gloss, a very correct one, in the margin of an early MS., and taken into the text by a transcriber. The oldest MS. which has it is of the ninth century, but it is found in some very old versions, the Sahidic and Italic. It contrasts the blasphemies (for evil spoken of should be rendered blasphemed) with the glory attributed and proved by its effects on suffering Christians.

15. But] Read "for." St Peter touches evidently upon charges often brought falsely and maliciously by persecutors.

a murderer] This probably stands first, not as a charge likely to be made, but as standing first in the decalogue, in dealing with duty to man. Possibly the heathens might found such a charge upon the reception of criminals into the Church upon their repentance.

or as a thief] A special sin of slaves, against which we find unusually explicit warning in Eph. iv. 28, where see note.

an evildoer] A legal term, equivalent to "malefactor" or criminal ; a word summing up all offences against the law. It is a word common in classical writers, but in the New Testament used only by St Peter, ii. 12, 14, iii. 16, and St John xviii. 30.

a busybody in other men's matters] This expresses a single word in the Greek, one which does not occur elsewhere in the New Testament, and twice only in later Christian writers. The exact meaning is "one who usurps authority in matters not within his province." St Peter gives a special point to this injunction ; it stands apart, as differing in kind from other offences. The question is whether he alludes to the propensity to interfere with other persons, specially with heathens, in religious matters, as a warning against indiscreet zeal on the part of Christians, a view taken by Renan, 'Antech.' p. 42 ; or whether, as the form of the Greek word certainly implies, his object is to warn Christians against assuming authority in purely secular matters alien to their calling. Ps. Dionys. Areop. uses it in the sense of one who intrudes upon an alien office. The word of which it is compounded "episcopos" with its derivatives in the LXX. always refers to official duties or works, specially to the work of inspection. It certainly does not bear upon missionary undertakings. But were Christians likely to incur the charge of taking undue part in secular matters with which they were not personally concerned ? The answer must be, Very probably they were. We read of an application to our Lord Himself to take upon Him the office of a secular Judge, and His indignant refusal, Luke xii. 13, 14. In fact we have instances of Christians having a widespread reputation for equity and discernment Christian, let him not be ashamed; but let him glorify God on this behalf.

17 For the time is come that judgment must begin at the house of God: and if it first begin at us, what shall the end be of them that obey not the gospel of God?

18 And if the righteous scarcely be saved, where shall the ungodly and the sinner appear?

19 Wherefore let them that suffer according to the will of God commit the keeping of their souls to him in well doing, as unto a faithful Creator.

among their unbelieving neighbours, and on that account being appealed to to settle difficult cases, i.e. to act as overseers or arbitrators in external matters. Thus in a Talmudic notice of the second Gamaliel we read that he with his sister applied to a Christian for a decision in a question of contested rights of property. (See 'Tract. Shabbath,' f. 116, quoted in the 'Expositor,' April, 1879, and by Hilgenfeld on the 'Evang. Heb.' p. 21, 22.) Such a position, whether rightly or wrongly used, would expose Christians to misrepresentation, and be a pretext for persecution. This seems to be the true meaning of the warning. It agrees with, but is more precise than the explanation of Cæcumenius, or of Cyprian, who renders it "alienas curas gerens," 'Ep.' IV. 6. Plato has a corresponding word, ἀλλοτριπραγμοσύνη, 'Rep.' IV. Hilgenfeld takes the word to mean delator, an interpretation certainly incorrect, and evidently adopted in order to support his view as to the late date of the Epistle; see his 'Einl.' p. 652.

16. on this behalf] This rendering follows the old and common reading; but the best MSS. have in this name, which may be explained as an idiom not differing in meaning from the one adopted in our A. V.; but which more probably has a distinct and definite bearing upon the charge brought, as the real substantial charge against Christians, that of professing the Name of Christ. It need not be inferred that St Peter alludes to the name "Christian," but since it was first given at Antioch, long before this Epistle was written, and must have been well known to the Apostle, the reference is, to say the least, highly probable. Thus Clem. Alex. 'Quis D. S.' ch. 36, "worthy of the name which they wear as a kingly diadem."

17. For the time is come] Lit. For it is a season; the critical time is now come when the judgment, which impends on all, must have a beginning, and that beginning must take place in God's house. The cleansing of the sanctuary, i.e. the Church of Christ, must be the very first act in the process of judgment. All its severe trials therefore are to be regarded as intimations and preludes to the general judgment. The sifting involves a separation of the sound from the unsound, which must needs bring suffering to all, and ruin to those who do not endure to the end.

that obey not the gospel of God] Cf. Rom. i. 5.

18. the righteous] This word is rarely applied to Christians, but St Peter is quoting from the Septuagint version of Prov. xi. 31, and retains the word as specially applicable to the occasion. The Christian, as such, is clear from the guilt which incurs condemnation; but if he being righteous is saved only on the condition of passing through affliction so terrible, affecting life, property, character, what must be the position of a wilful offender against God and His law?

the ungodly] Or, impious, a term specially applying to false worship rather than to denial of God.

sinner] in the special sense of transgressor, for "sin is the transgression of the law." Rabbinical writers quoted by Wetstein observe as a general law of divine chastisements that "they do not come upon the world unless there be impious persons in it, yet that they always begin with the righteous—when power is given to the destroyer he makes no distinction between the righteous and the wicked, and not that only, but he begins with the righteous."

N.B. The LXX. render the Hebrew of Proverbs inaccurately; our version gives the true meaning. It is evident that St Peter addresses persons who were not acquainted with the Hebrew. He would regard the truth of his statement rather than its verbal agreement with a passage which he adduces without indicating its source.

19. Wherefore] Lit. "So let them also who suffer," &c. St Peter sums up the argument with singular power. What the Christian has to remember throughout is that he suffers according to God's will, and therefore necessarily for a wise and loving purpose. What he has to do is simply to commit his soul to his Creator, trusting not only in His power, but in His faithfulness. The word "as" before "unto a faithful Creator," must be omitted, being found only in later MSS. St Peter certainly refers to our Lord's own words, Luke xxiii. 46 (where all the best MSS. have παρὰ τῷ θεῷ). He is careful to add "in well doing;" in order to have and to justify that absolute reliance on God's faithfulness, Christians must have good and holy works to offer as proofs of their faith. "Then

CHAPTER V.

¹ He exhorteth the elders to feed their flocks, & the younger to obey, 8 and all to be sober, watchful, and constant in the faith: 9 to resist the cruel adversary the devil.

THE elders which are among you I exhort, who am also an elder, and a witness of the sufferings of Christ, and also a partaker of the glory that shall be revealed:

2 Feed the flock of God ¹which ¹Or, as much as ^{is} among you, taking the oversight ^{in you is} thereof, not by constraint, but will-works do follow them," Rev. xiv. 13. The good works are not the effectual or meritorious cause of acceptance, but they afford the only assurance that believers are accepted. The word, as it stands in this passage, is peculiar to St Peter; it accords with his style to condense a whole series of injunctions into a single pregnant word; see note on ch. iii. 8.

CHAP. V. 1—4. EXHORTATIONS TO THE OFFICIAL HEADS AND LEADERS OF THE CHURCH. These exhortations are strictly confined to the discharge of their special duties.

1. The elders] The word therefore is introduced here on good MSS. authority; but it seems unnecessary and scarcely in accordance with the course of St Peter's argument, unless it be understood as a special application of the word which in the Greek immediately precedes it, viz. "in doing good works." The elders here addressed unquestionably represent the highest authorities in the Churches. The term includes those who afterwards, within a few years, were formally designated as Bishops. They exercise all the functions of that office, which are included in the word inadequately rendered by "feed" in the next verse, where see note. On the New Testament usage see notes on Acts and Philippians. The use of the word in this place is one among many conclusive proofs of the early date of the Epistle, which must have been written before the organization of the Churches in Asia Minor was substantially completed under the government of St John.

I exhort] This text has been misused as a proof of St Peter's supremacy, but it is commonly used not only by Apostles (as by St Paul most frequently), but by all Christians exhorting their fellows in the faith. In fact the word though often used for admonition and even command never loses its primary and most common sense, that of persuasion. St Peter gives three reasons to enforce, we might almost say to excuse, the earnestness of the exhortation; (1) community of office, (2) the fact that he was a witness of the sufferings of Christ, (3) that he shared with them the hope of glory. The first and third reasons are studiously put forward so as, it might seem, to avoid the appearance of such claims as were afterwards advanced in his name; the second gives a peculiar pathos to his exhortation to tend the flock of God "which He bought with His own blood," Acts xx. 28.

There is, as might be expected, a striking resemblance between his arguments and those used by St Paul in the great discourse recorded in Acts xx. 18—35.

a witness] In the special sense of one called to bear witness of what he had seen.

a partaker of the glory that shall be revealed] This refers to ch. i. 7. The word rendered "shall be" implies certainty, but not an immediate manifestation.

2. Feed the flock] The word rendered "feed," rather tend, includes all the duties of a shepherd, specially those of tending, guiding, and bringing to good pastures. It was a word deeply impressed upon St Peter's consciousness, being the special duty imposed upon him as a proof of love, John xxi. 16, where the A.V. improperly, as here, renders the word (ποιμαίνει) "feed," for which a totally different word (βόσκει) is twice used in the 15th and 17th verses. It is important to observe that neither here nor elsewhere in this Epistle, or in the speeches of the Acts, does St Peter allude to that or to the still higher distinction conferred upon him by our Lord. Cf. Matt. xvi. 17—19.

the flock of God] Thus all the best MSS. A various reading "of Christ" or of "the Lord" is scarcely deserving of notice, except as bearing upon the similar passage in Acts xx. 28. The Church is the flock of God the Father as the maker and possessor; of God the Son as the purchaser and restorer; of God the Holy Ghost as the feeder and guide.

which is among you] Equivalent to "under your care," or in your province. The expression is somewhat peculiar, and certainly represents a close inward union.

taking the oversight thereof] The word (ἐπισκοποῦντες) thus paraphrased is omitted by the two oldest MSS., but it is found in the great majority of MSS., and in all the oldest versions. There is no sufficient reason for following those two MSS., N, B, which are conspicuous for such omissions. The word is important, for it means "acting as overseers or Bishops," an expression which at a very early period was appropriated to the actual governors of the Church, and which soon became their formal official designation.

not by constraint] Not only or chiefly because it is a bounden duty, involving a heavy ingly; not for filthy lucre, but of a ready mind;

1 Or, over-ruling.

3 Neither as ¹being lords over God's heritage, but being ensamples to the flock.

4 And when the chief Shepherd shall appear, ye shall receive a crown of glory that fadeth not away.

5 Likewise, ye younger, submit yourselves unto the elder. Yea, all penalty if neglected, but with a willing spirit, moved not by fear but love. Cf. 1 Cor. ix. 16, 17. The word here used in the Greek does not occur elsewhere.

not for filthy lucre] Not with a disgraceful view to profit. There seems evidently a reference to St Paul's words in the verse immediately following those referred to in the preceding note, What is my reward then? the answer being that the only reward for which he cared is to preach the Gospel without charge. It must be observed that the warning implies a right to maintenance which might be abused. At a very early age, and indeed throughout the history of the Church, neglect of this warning led to the worst schisms and usurpations.

of a ready mind] The word is emphatic, implying not merely willingness, but earnest desire.

3. Neither as being lords] Rather, "acting as lords," lording it over. The word implies that the Presbyter-bishops had real authority, but warns them against an arrogant domineering spirit in its exercise. It is obvious that abuses in this direction would arise at a very early period; see a singularly strong instance in the third Epistle of St John, v. 9. The very existence of a governing power has been denied by writers resting on the misapplication of this text, an opinion which might seem to be countenanced even by St Bernard, "Planum est, Apostolis interdicitur dominium," 'De Consideratione,' II. 6: but dominium implies more than constitutional authority. Compare Clem. R. '1 Cor.' XVI.

God's heritage] Lit. "heritages," an expression which occurs only in this passage, and presents some difficulty. Some understand it as referring to the clergy, an early usage of the word, but not resting on scriptural authority. The more probable and generally accepted meaning is that the several churches under the charge of the presbyters addressed by St Paul are spoken of. Thus Grimm 'Lex. N. T.' s. v. κληρος, and Hilgenfeld. Thus too Bengel and Estius. Cyprian's view agrees with this, "The Church of God is one, the separate portions of which are governed each by its own Bishop as a common inheritance." Ritschl, 'Die Enst. d. A. K. Kirche,' p. 192, holds the word to mean the orders of which the flock consists. The word God's ought not to have been inserted in our A. V.

ensamples] Lit. types in the special sense of examples, for which St Peter uses two words, one taken from the art of painting (ὡρογραμμός, see above, ii. 21), the other from the sister art of sculpture. Each head of the flock must stand out as a distinct representative of the unseen Master to whom he and his people must be conformed. Thus Greg. Naz. says of his own father, "He humanized the manners of his wild people, both by words of pastoral wisdom, and by setting forth himself an example, so to speak a spiritual image, exquisitely finished so as to exemplify the beauty of every good work," 'Or.' XVIII. c. 16, p. 341 A. Tom. I. ed. Ben.

4. the chief Shepherd] St Peter thus points out the true and only origin of all authority in the Church. Presbyters or Bishops are true shepherds, but only as delegates of our chief Shepherd, cf. ii. 25. This great word is used by St Peter only; the last thing he could have dreamed of as possible would be its misapplication to himself or his so-called successors. It is here to be observed that the words "shepherd" and "tend" are peculiar to St Peter and to St John, who stand in a peculiarly near relation to each other and to the Church.

a crown of glory that fadeth not away] Lit. "the unfading crown of the glory." A similar but not exactly the same word is used above, i. 4. It means not liable to wither, a metaphor suggested by the wreaths of flowers in common use, and specially awarded as crowns to victors in public games. Cf. James i. 12; 1 Cor. ix. 25; Wisd. v. 16. In 2 Tim. iv. 8 we are told that the crown of righteousness will be given not only to Apostles, but to all who love His appearing.

5. EXHORTATION TO YOUNGER MINISTERS.

5. Likewise, ye younger] The younger thus spoken of would seem to be the subordinate ministers of the Church; for the word "likewise" implies a certain analogy or correspondence, so that as the elders were certainly officials, the younger were in all probability their subordinates. Whether the term includes "deacons" may be questioned, but it seems improbable that the Apostle should omit all notice of an order, first established under the authority of the Twelve, see Acts vi. 2—6; and this was the natural place for addressing them. It is certain however that at a very early time and in those districts subordinate offices were called into existence, and Polycarp 'Ep.

of you be subject one to another, and be clothed with humility: for God resisteth the proud, and giveth grace to the humble.

6 Humble yourselves therefore under the mighty hand of God, that he may exalt you in due time:

7 Casting all your care upon him; for he careth for you.

8 Be sober, be vigilant; because your adversary the devil, as a roaring

Ephes. c. VIII. specially distinguishes "the younger" from the deacons, to whom as well as to the elder he exhorts them to be obedient. We may understand by the term all subordinate ministers of the Church, as distinguished from the members who are generally addressed in the next clause. The due relation between the young, and the elders, is often dwelt upon by Clem. R. in language which seems adopted from St Peter.

Yea, all of you be subject] The last word rendered "be subject" is omitted in the oldest MSS., and seems to be transferred from ch. ii. 18. If it be a gloss it is a very good one, and should not hastily be dismissed, especially as it is almost necessary for the grammatical construction with the following words "one to another," which are retained in all MSS.

be clothed] The expression in the Greek, which occurs nowhere else in the New Testament, has a singular force. It means to be clothed as with a white scarf worn by slaves, and in a manner which intimates promptitude in the discharge of menial duties. The word is admirably illustrated by Fritzsche, see Grimm, 'Lex. N. T.' (s.v. ἐγκομβόομαι). So that the words may be paraphrased, Put on humility as a garb of slaves indicating the mutual subjection of all true Christians. Nothing is more remarkable in the accounts of early Christians than their willingness to adopt the once odious name and acts of slaves. See especially P. Allard, 'Les esclaves chrétiens,' p. 239 f.

for God resisteth] This passage, quoted also by St James, iv. 6, is taken from the Septuagint version of Prov. iii. 34. The Hebrew has in the first clause, "surely he scorneth the scorners." The subject 'God' in our Epistle, and 'Lord' in the LXX., is supplied in the translation.

6-9. FINAL EXHORTATION TO HUMILITY, PATIENCE AND WATCHFULNESS.

6. Humble yourselves...under the mighty hand] The words "mighty hand" refer specially to a putting forth of power in the form of chastisement. The Christian yields humbly and submissively, with a certainty that every visitation is intended for his good, and must therefore be followed by a great deliverance and exaltation. St Peter doubtless refers to our Lord's saying, "He that humbleth himself shall be exalted," (cf. also Matt. xviii. 4,) but he has in mind specially such submission as was shewn by our Lord in Gethsemane.

in due time] This follows the version of Erasmus, and accords with classical usage; but here the word evidently refers to the time when our Lord at His second coming will give a crown of glory to the humble.

7. Casting all your care...be careth] Two very different words are used here in reference to man's care—which involves anxiety, and is to be suppressed or thrown off—and God's care which is loving and providential. The expression rendered, casting all your care, should therefore be understood, "casting all your anxiety upon him," though the rendering of the A.V. may be preserved. St Peter refers to Ps. lv. 22, but he does not quote exactly either the Hebrew (which has a peculiar and difficult word for "care," see note in loc.), or the LXX., which in the second clause follows the Hebrew, whereas our Apostle introduces a new and very affecting thought, indicating the fulness of Divine sympathy. Such references are not to be regarded either as direct quotations, or as imperfect reminiscences, but as expressions of thought worked out in Christian consciousness.

for] Omit this word, which is not found in the oldest MSS.

8. Be sober, be vigilant] The sobriety of mind and spirit is here indicated, without which watchfulness would degenerate into anxiety. "Watch" is the last word in the last general exhortation of our Lord before His Passion, Mark xiii. 37.

your adversary the devil] The two words point to the special forms in which the Christian must look for trial. 'The adversary' is the maintainer of the opposite side in a trial for life or death; 'the devil,' taken in its proper sense, means calumniator, one who knowingly advances false charges; the most formidable designation of Satan, exactly expressing the Hebrew name.

The expression, "goeth about," is peculiarly graphic, describing the evil one as "prowling about, not daring to enter the fold, but ready to seize any wanderer and to devour him." The craft as well as the ferocity of Satan is distinctly set before us. The word rendered "roaring" is specially used to indicate the howl of the lion or wolf in fierce hunger (cf. Hesychius, κυρίως ἐπὶ λιμῇ ἢ λύκων ἢ λέον-lion, walketh about, seeking whom he may devour :

9 Whom resist stedfast in the faith, knowing that the same afflictions are accomplished in your brethren that are in the world.

10 But the God of all grace, who hath called us unto his eternal glory by Christ Jesus, after that ye have suffered a while, make you perfect, stablish, strengthen, settle you.

11 To him be glory and dominion for ever and ever. Amen.

12 By Silvanus, a faithful brother των), and it has the effect of utterly prostrating the animal energies of those whom it does not rouse to exertion. Under this most striking image the Apostle describes the temptations which ever beset the Christian, and most specially in times of persecution. The roaring of the lion finds its counterpart in the menaces and writings of fanatic Jews and heathens, and Wetstein, who quotes a passage from the Talmud, 'Aboth' 36, to the effect that evil angels run to and fro from one end of the world to the other, takes it here as referring specially to calumnious accusations before heathen magistrates. This however but partially represents the meaning. The exhortation applies to all times and all classes of Christians.

9. Whom resist stedfast in the faith] Without dwelling upon the metaphor, so completely wrought out by St Paul, Eph. vi. 13 f., our Apostle evidently has it present to his mind. The one great point however, on which the "rock-man" Peter concentrates attention, is the firmness, solid, rock-like stedfastness, which has its root and sustenance in faith. He well knew the effects of the presence and of the loss or failure of that central principle.

knowing] This implies that persecutions were already breaking out in all parts of the Roman empire; but the word, "are accomplished," requires attention. It means not that the afflictions have been accomplished, or more properly "fulfilled," but that they were, at the time when St Peter wrote, in process of fulfilment. The word fulfilment refers especially to the sufferings as in accordance with the Divine purpose, a thought of which an echo is heard in the beginning of the 'Iliad.'

your brethren that are in the world] Lit. "your brotherhood (a word used in the New Testament only by St Peter, cf. ch. ii. 17), in the world," i.e. in different parts of the world, whether extending beyond the Roman empire is uncertain: but there are no records of persecutions at that time save within the dominions of Nero.

10, 11. END OF THE EPISTLE; summing up its whole purport in a prayer singular for its completeness, and followed by an ascription of glory due to God.

10. But the God...called us] Or, according to all the best MSS., "who called (om. hath) you." The God of all grace, to Him the origin and perpetual source of all grace, the calling of Christians is invariably attributed in the New Testament.

by Christ Jesus] More literally, in Christ (the two oldest MSS. omit "Jesus," which however stands on good authority, and would hardly have been left out by our Apostle in this great prayer). The word in includes, but extends farther than by. Christ is the life, head, and very principle of all existence to the Christian.

after that ye have suffered a while] This rendering obscures the reference to the beginning of the Epistle, i. 6, in which the shortness and comparative lightness of the sufferings of Christians are spoken of. The word rendered "a while," lit. "a little," includes both the brevity of the time and the comparative lightness of the sufferings.

make you perfect...settle you] Or, "will make you," &c. The MSS. vary between the future and the optative. Good reason may be alleged for either, the former expresses a certain conviction, the latter a strong desire and trust. The former however seems preferable; cf. 2 Cor. ix. 10; Phil. iv. 19, where the future is used, though some MSS. have the same variant as here.

Here we have another instance of St Peter's habit of condensing a whole series of lofty thoughts in a few pregnant words. Each of the four words which he uses has a distinct sense; the first rendered make you perfect is properly applied to a thorough process of amendment, bringing for instance a damaged net into perfect order, the occupation of the fishermen when our Lord called them, Matt. iv. 21; Mark i. 19. Stablish, elsewhere rendered confirm, is the second step in the process of conversion, used to denote the object of Apostles in a second missionary journey; strengthen (the Greek word is used only by St Peter) refers to the imparting of spiritual strength, cf. Eph. iii. 16; settle (cf. Ephes. iii. 17, where it is rendered "grounded") is an emphatic word: looking upon the Christian as corrected, confirmed, strengthened, St Peter sums up all in the one great thought that he must be "founded on the rock," Matt. vii. 25, where the same word is used. N.B. Here the word is omitted in two old MSS., but is to be retained as in accordance with St Peter's style and with the context.

11. be glory and dominion] This ascription unto you, as I suppose, I have written briefly, exhorting, and testifying that this is the true grace of God wherein ye stand.

13 The church that is at Babylon, elected together with you, saluteth you; and so doth Marcus my son.

seems to have undergone a slight interpolation, not unnatural, as common in other passages, but here somewhat obscuring the connection of thought. Read to Him be the might. The prominent feeling in St Peter's mind is that all the power and might, in virtue of which the Christian can alone maintain his integrity, belongs to God, and is derived from Him only.

12—14. SALUTATIONS, as usual, after the proper close of the Epistle, follow and complete St Peter's object.

12. By Silvanus, a faithful brother unto you, as I suppose, I have written] For the correct rendering see the following note. This notice is of extreme importance, but two points require attention in considering the precise meaning of the words.

as I suppose] scarcely represents the mind of St Peter; his word (λογίζομαι) implies no mere conjecture, or opinion, but an estimate resting on rational and sure grounds. Cf. Rom. viii. 18. He gives this expression of well-grounded confidence in order to satisfy all his readers that the Silvanus whom they knew well as the companion of St Paul, was equally esteemed and trusted by himself; a point never lost sight of in this Epistle is the existence of perfect harmony of principle and feeling between himself and St Paul. The words unto you are referred in our version to the opinion or feelings of the Churches to whom Silvanus bore the Epistle; but it is far more reasonable to connect it with the verb I have written: St Peter was not concerned to tell his readers that Silvanus was well known and trusted by them; he was concerned to tell them that in his deliberate opinion Silvanus was a true, faithful brother in Christ. This connection comes out distinctly if we adopt the rendering, By Silvanus, the (not a as in A.V.) faithful brother, as I judge, I write unto you in few words. 'I write,' not 'I have written,' lit. I wrote; in accordance with Greek usage St Peter uses what is called the epistolary aorist, lit. I wrote, i.e. when I penned the Epistle. He is careful to call attention to three points; that he writes using Silvanus as his messenger, that Silvanus is well known to his readers, and enjoys his perfect confidence; and that his Epistle, compared probably with the great doctrinal Epistles to the Romans and Corinthians, is studiously short, not so much expounding or discussing, as stating concisely the funda-

exhorting, and testifying, &c.] Both words have special force, the first implies an earnest and persuasive form of address, see note above on v. 1; the next a strong attestation. St Peter has in mind the necessity above all things of attesting the completeness and soundness of the faith as already received by them. This is the true grace of God—that is the grace which they had been taught by St Paul. It is as forcible and convincing as St Paul's own emphatic declaration in Gal. i. 11, 12; and coming from St Peter it carries with it the whole weight of Apostolic authority.

wherein ye stand] The oldest MSS. here have in which stand. St Peter changes his tone, as it were involuntarily and unconsciously passing from attestation to a vigorous admonition. This is the true grace of God, see to it that ye do not fall from it. The common reading yields a sound and true sense, the grace in which ye now stand is the true grace; but the transition is singularly effective. It is probable that St Peter refers to St Paul's own words, 1 Cor. xv. 1; enforcing his statement by the change from the indicative to the imperative mood.

13. The church that is at Babylon] Lit. "the co-elect in Babylon." These few words present considerable difficulties. The word "church" is not in the Greek, but is accepted by nearly all commentators ancient and modern as the true meaning.—The church in Babylon elect together with the churches to which the Epistle is addressed. But for the consent of old and modern interpreters the word lady or woman would naturally be supplied; and the elect lady of 2 John 1 comes nearest to the expression. There however the lady probably means the Church addressed by St John. In either case therefore the sense would remain substantially the same, but it must be noticed as a mystical or symbolical expression, and as such bearing upon the interpretation of the next word.

at Babylon] See Introduction, § 4. We have here to remark (1) that the city of Babylon at that time was certainly not the seat of a Christian community; (2) that no ancient record has the slightest trace of St Peter's presence or work in Chaldaea; (3) that all ancient authorities are unanimous in the assertion that the later year or years of his life were passed in the west of the Roman empire. On the other hand, Babylon was well known in Asia Minor during the lifetime of St John as the sym-

a kiss of charity. Peace be with Amen.

bolical designation of Rome, and, as was before pointed out, the whole phrase has a symbolical form or tone. Accordingly we find an absolute consensus of ancient interpreters that here Babylon must be understood as equivalent to Rome. There was good reason why such a name should be here given to it. All the persecutions then impending, in fact already in progress, came from the city, which succeeded Babylon as the type and centre of antichristian forces. The Church elect together with other Churches suggested the remarkable contrast; from that little community, faithful and loved by all, came the salutation of peace in antithesis to the howlings of persecution. We adopt without the least misgiving this explanation of the word as alone according with the mind of the Apostle, and with the testimony of the early Church. So also Thiersch, Ewald, and Hilgenfeld very positively, 'Einl.' p. 683.

Marcus my son] It is generally, all but universally, admitted that 'John whose surname was Mark' is here meant. He was probably converted by St Peter, who was on terms of affectionate and close intercourse with Mary his mother; and at the latter time of the Apostle's life he was employed by him as his amanuensis, so the oldest tradition asserts. This mention adds somewhat to the form of the preceding arguments, which identify Babylon with Rome, there being ample proof that St Mark wrote his Gospel in that city. The salutation would have a special interest considering the early relations between Mark and the Churches of the East. For instances of the very common idiom 'son'=pupil or disciple, see Potter on Clem. Alex. 'Str.' I. p. 317.

14. with a kiss of charity] Cf. Rom. xvi. 16, and notice the connection between this and the reiterated exhortations to brotherly love.

Peace...Christ Jesus] Or, Peace to you all who are in Christ. The name Jesus stands on fair authority, but is omitted in the oldest MSS. Who are in Christ does not imply a suggestion that some only of those whom St Peter addresses are true Christians, a thought which, however true, was not probably in the mind of the Apostle, who embraced all in loving trust, and prayed for the peace of all who bore the name of Christ and had been baptized into Him.

Argument of the Epistle	233

IN dealing with this Epistle it will be most convenient to notice (1) The external evidence which relates to it; (2) The internal marks of its genuineness and authenticity.

The former of these enquiries will be very brief, for though included among the Canonical Books of the New Testament at the Council of Laodicea¹, the second Epistle ascribed to St Peter was not generally accepted in the early Church as a part of Canonical Scripture, neither are allusions to it nor quotations from it of frequent occurrence in the early Christian writings. Eusebius probably represents the sense of a large part of the Christian Church of his time, when at the beginning of the fourth century he writes², "One Epistle of Peter called his first is generally accepted, and this the presbyters of old have quoted in their writings as undoubtedly genuine; but that which is circulated as his second we have received to be not canonical; nevertheless as it appeared useful to many it has been diligently studied along with the other Scriptures." And later on³, when he divides the books of Scripture into three classes, those undoubtedly accepted; those not canonical, but disputed; and those that are spurious; he places the Second Epistle of St Peter among the disputed books.

For though the Epistle undoubtedly was in circulation long before the time of Eusebius it was not widely known, as far as we can find, nor much quoted. The earliest coincidence with its language is found in the first Epistle of Clement of Rome to the Corinthians, a work written about the close of the first century. In chapter xxiii. of that Epistle we read, "We have heard these things even in the days of our fathers, and behold we have grown old and none of these things has happened unto us." The same statement is quoted also in the second Epistle of Clement, written perhaps in the middle of the second century¹, but with some modifications. There we find "We have heard all these things even in the days of our fathers, but though we have expected day by day, we have seen none of them²." These words are very like 2 Pet. iii. 4; and when we see how the two passages vary in expression we can understand how a writer giving, as was the custom with the early Christian Fathers, the substance rather than the precise language of the older Epistle might bring St Peter's words into the forms in which they here appear, yet we cannot be certain that the quotation is made from our Epistle¹. Of like uncertainty is the language of Polycarp², where he says, "neither I nor any other like me can follow the wisdom of the blessed and glorious Paul," words which may be an echo of 2 Pet. iii. 15, but about which it is impossible to speak surely. So too with the words³ of Melito, bishop of Sardis (A.D. 170): "There was once a flood and chosen men were destroyed by a mighty north wind.....so also it will be at the last time: there shall be a flood of fire, and the earth shall be burnt up together with its mountains and men shall be burnt up together with their idols.....and the sea together with its isles shall be burnt; and the just shall be delivered from the fury like their fellows in the ark from the waters of the deluge." This passage may have been suggested by the language of 2 Pet. iii. 5—7, but it is not possible to affirm that it was so.

Next in order of time comes Theophilus, bishop of Antioch (A.D. 168—180), who writes⁴ thus: "The ordinance of God is this, His word, shining like a lamp in a house which encloses it, illumines the whole world under heaven." Here we have a comparison which St Peter employs (2 Pet. i. 19), but the language of the Apostle in that passage is so striking and unique that it is hard to believe Theophilus is drawing from him, with so little imitation of his precise words, a simile that he might have found in many places besides. There is however another sentence in the same treatise⁵ which has the look of a paraphrase of 2 Pet. i. 20, 21: "Men of God moved by the Holy Ghost, and becoming prophets inspired and made wise by God Himself, became taught of God;" and the occurrence of this passage, in which the original words⁶ bespeak, more than

⁶ 'The πνευματοφόροι πνεύματος ἁγίου of Theophilus seems to be drawn from the ὑπὸ πνεύματος ἁγίου φερόμενοι of the Epistle, while the expression αὐτοὶ τοῦ Θεοῦ ἀνθρώποι is not unlike the

the English can be made to do, an acquaintance with St Peter's Epistles, gives us fair ground for believing that Theophilus was acquainted with this second Epistle.

When however we come to Clement of Alexandria (A.D. 165—220), we seem to gain some sure evidence of the existence of our Epistle. It is true that in the extant works of that Father we have no reference to it, but Eusebius has preserved for us¹ a notice of his labours which seems conclusive for his knowledge of the Second Epistle of St Peter. The words are "In his Outlines, to speak briefly, Clement has given concise explanations of all the Canonical Scriptures, not omitting the disputed books (ἀντιλεγόμενας), I mean the Epistle of Jude and the remaining Catholic Epistles, also the Epistle of Barnabas and the so-called Apocalypse of Peter." Now as Eusebius elsewhere (III. 25) gives us a list of these disputed books, using the same word to designate them, and includes among them the Second Epistle of St Peter, there can be little doubt that he intended it to be included here under the phrase "the remaining Catholic Epistles." We seem therefore to be safe in concluding that our Epistle was known to, and had a short exposition written on it by, the Bishop of Alexandria.

In the writings of Hippolytus, bishop of Portus (A.D. 220), we find allusions to the Second Epistle of St Peter. Thus²: "these fathers (the prophets) were furnished with the Spirit and largely honoured by the Word Himself.....and when moved by Him they announced what God willed. For they spake not of their own power (let me not lead you wrong), neither did they declare what pleased themselves, but first of all they were rightly gifted with wisdom by the Word, and then were duly instructed about the future by visions. So when convinced they spake those things which God had revealed to them alone." These words may almost certainly be taken as an expansion of 2 Pet. i. 21.

Further in a letter³ of Firmilian, bp.

Apostle's phrase, at least according to some MSS.

³ The letter is preserved with those of Cyprian, Ep. 75, Oxf. edit.

of Cæsarea in Cappadocia, to Cyprian, bishop of Carthage, we have an undoubted reference to 2 Peter. The writer is speaking of Stephen, bishop of Rome, and says that in breaking the peace of the Church he is "defaming Peter and Paul, the blessed Apostles, as if the very men delivered this rule, who in their Epistles execrated heretics and warned us to avoid them." There is no sentence in St Peter's first Epistle to which these words would apply, they must therefore be referred to the exhortations against false teachers, of which the second Epistle is full.

It is also clear that Origen, who died A.D. 253, knew of both St Peter's Epistles, for we have first his statement preserved for us by Eusebius¹: "Peter, on whom Christ's Church is built, against which the gates of hell shall not prevail, has left one Epistle generally accepted. Grant also a second, for it is a matter of question." And in the Latin version (which alone is preserved to us) of a Homily on Joshua², he says "Peter moreover sounds loudly on the twofold trumpet of his Epistles." And in another Homily³ he is represented, by his translator, as writing "Peter says, Ye have been made partakers of the Divine nature." Beyond this amount of recognition we have no external evidence concerning the second Epistle before its acceptance into the Canon at the Council of Laodicea. For the supposed allusions in Justin Martyr⁴, Athenagoras⁵, and Methodius⁶, bishop of Tyre, are not certainly to be cited as drawn from this Epistle, nor can hardly be called citations in any proper sense.

Yet even this small amount of evidence testifies to a wide circulation of the Epistle. In the far separated districts of Alexandria, Palestine, Cappadocia, Proconsular Asia, Italy and Carthage, were Christians into whose hands the Epistle had come, and they shew by their allusions that they supposed those for whom they were writing to be able to appreciate citations drawn from it and therefore to have seen and read it. We shall not then be wrong in assuming that much more evidence than we now possess was laid before the Fathers at Laodicea when they admitted this second Epistle into the Canon in spite of the doubts which in certain quarters had been cast upon it; and its acceptance, after having been classed among the disputed books so distinctly, is the best possible assurance that there was satisfactory proof then existing that the Epistle was what it professes to be.

In the absence of any more external evidence we must turn to the Epistle itself, and see what testimony can be deduced from its own language. And we may with advantage take the points to be considered in the following order:

(1) The author's statements concerning himself, and the manner in which these are made.

(2) The persons for whom the Epistle professes to be written.

(3) The sentiments contained in it compared with those of the First Epistle of St Peter.

(4) The style and language of this Epistle as compared with

(a) St Peter's first Epistle.

(b) The language ascribed to St Peter in the Acts of the Apostles.

(c) Such traces of St Peter's language and manner as can be gathered from the Gospels.

(5) A comparison of the language with the New Testament diction generally.

(6) Other internal evidence of genuineness and authenticity.

(1) The author of our Epistle calls himself Symeon [Simon] Peter and claims to be an Apostle of Jesus Christ (i. 1, iii. 2). He further states that he has already written an Epistle to those whom he is now addressing (iii. 1). He speaks as an old man, whose death is near at hand (i. 14), and claims on this ground the right of calling to the remembrance of those to whom he writes the solemn lessons which they had learnt both from the Old Testament prophecies, and from those who had spoken to them in the name of Jesus Christ (iii. 2). The whole of the Epistle, in its illustrations and quotations bears evidence that the writer was a Jew. But the most solemn portion of the letter is that wherein he asserts that he was one of those who had been present at the Transfiguration. For the naturalness of the manner in which he introduces this personal notice, and the tokens of truthfulness which the statement contains, see the notes on i. 14—19. It is difficult to believe that any one could have made the declarations which there appear, in an Epistle specially directed against false teachers, if he were merely writing in an assumed character, and using a name of repute to gain currency for a letter which under his own name might have been less acceptable.

When such are the claims of the writer, made in such solemn manner, we cannot reject what he says without comparing the Epistle with everything else which may bear upon it, and enquiring whether the character of the writing will allow us to receive it for what it claims to be. And especially should we compare it in every particular with the first Epistle, which is on all hands accepted as a veritable letter of St Peter.

(2) If St Peter wrote this second letter, it is addressed to the same persons to whom he sent the first. Now this Epistle is written to Christians of whom a large portion had been converted from Judaism¹ but who appear to be living amid non-Jewish populations (ii. 18). That they had many of them been Jews either by birth or as proselytes and were known to be familiar with the writings of the Old Testament is clear from the use which the writer makes of the Scriptures of the older Covenant to illustrate and enforce all that he has to say. Even allusions to Jewish tradition (ii. 4) are presumed to be quite understood by these converts, and they have access to the same prophecies as the Apostle himself, and have been taught by them, and also to value them most highly. But they were also acquainted with St Paul's Epistles (iii. 15), and to some of those here addressed that Apostle had written. They knew too that St Paul's Epistles were numerous. The affectionate terms in which the writer speaks to them, calling them brethren (i. 10), employing language which betrays marked personal interest (i. 12, 13), and repeatedly using 'the epithet "beloved" (iii. 1, 8, 14, 17), bespeak great affection on the part of the author; while some of his words (i. 18) can hardly mean anything but that he himself had preached and laboured among those to whom he now sends his second letter of exhortation in his old age. Throughout the whole Epistle he appears to be well acquainted with their spiritual condition (i. 1—4, 12, iii. 14, 17) and knows that they are still steadfast in the faith, and writes only to remind them that danger is near, and to bid them be watchful against it.

As far as all this is concerned the recipients of the second Epistle may very well have been the same persons as those to whom the first was sent. For among these latter were also many Jews dispersed in the lands of the Gentiles (παρεπίδημοι διασποράς, 1 Pet. i. 1) in the districts of Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Proconsular Asia and Bithynia¹. They also can be appealed to by the writings of the prophets (1 Pet. i. 10), and the Apostle can illustrate his teaching to them from the Old Testament Scriptures (i. 16, ii. 6, 10, iii. 6, 20) with full assurance that he will be understood, and he writes to them as to men who had received traditions from which they needed to be redeemed (i. 18), while the minute exhortations given throughout the whole letter not only to the Christian congregations in general, but to citizens on their duty as such (ii. 13—17), to servants (ii. 18), to wives (iii. 1—8), to husbands (iii. 7), to elders (v. 1—4), to the young (v. 5), betray an intimate personal acquaintance with the condition of those to whom the Epistle is sent, which without any express statement would leave the impression that St Peter had visited and preached among those for whom he is so minutely anxious. And he addresses them in the like affectionate tone used in the second Epistle (ii. 11, iv. 12), while we may be sure that those who received a letter by the hands of Silvanus, and were greeted by Mark, could not fail to be acquainted with what St Paul had both written and taught. Judging therefore from the contents of the Epistles there is no reason why the latter should not have been sent to the same people as the former.

¹ On this point see Introduction to 1 Peter § 3. There can be no doubt that the Second Epistle was equally general with the First, and though we may suppose St Peter by birth more attached to the Jews, there can be no question that our Epistle is intended for both Jews and Gentiles. There was no faction among those to whom it was addressed.

¹ On this point see Canon Cook's instructive notes on 1 Pet. i. 1. I should agree with all that is there advanced to shew that there was no opposition between the two Apostles, or among the converts to whom they wrote, for both had alike written to these Christian congregations; but the addition of the names of districts in the opening verse of the first Epistle makes it appear to me more probable that a literal rather than a figurative sense should be given there to the word διασπορά.

(3) And while from internal evidence we may allow both the Epistles to have been directed to the same readers, we can see also from their contents that they breathe the same spirit, and convey the same teaching. The writer of both expected that the end of the world was near. Cf. 1 Pet. i. 5, of the "salvation ready to be revealed in the last time," and 1 Pet. iv. 7, "The end of all things is at hand," with 2 Pet. iii. 3, 10, "There shall come in the last days scoffers," and the times of the scoffers were close at hand; and "the day of the Lord will come as a thief in the night." In both Epistles the writer teaches that prophecy does not bear with it its own interpretation (cf. 1 Pet. i. 10, 11 and 2 Pet. i. 20). Both alike dwell on the small number who were saved at the Flood (1 Pet. iii. 20 and 2 Pet. ii. 5, iii. 6); both have the same sentiments on the nature and right use of Christian liberty (1 Pet. ii. 16; 2 Pet. ii. 19) and dwell with equal emphasis on the value of prophecy (1 Pet. i. 10—12; 2 Pet. i. 19, iii. 2). Both alike attribute ἀπειρή to God (1 Pet. ii. 9; 2 Pet. i. 3), and herein employ the word as it is nowhere else used in the New Testament. Hence we gather some additional indications that the Epistle may be accepted for what it claims to be, the work of him who wrote the first Epistle.

(4a) But it is when we compare the actual words of both Epistles minutely that the evidence that they were both from the same hand becomes strongest. They are both alike full of graphic expressions, words which call up a picture to the mind as we read them. Thus in 1 Peter we have παρακύψαι (i. 12), "to stoop down that a good view of anything may be obtained;" ἀναζωσάμενοι (i. 13), of the "girding up" the loins of the mind; φιμοῦν (ii. 15), properly "to muzzle," of putting men to silence; ἐπικάλυμμα (ii. 16), for "a veil," not a material one, but of maliciousness; σκολιός (ii. 18), "crooked, twisted," used of the froward in temper; κολαφιζόμενοι (ii. 20), "slapped with the hand," of men buffeted for faults; ὀπλίσασθε (iv. 1), "put on armour," though it is used of mental resolution; ἐγκομβώσασθε (v. 5), a word which indicates the putting on of a tight robe well rolled up, such as a slave would wear for hard work, is used to indicate the way in which humility is to be the everyday wear of the true Christian; while ὠρυόμενος (v. 8) is a most picturesque word to express the fierce howling of a hungry lion to which Satan's conduct is compared.

The same picturesqueness of diction is equally abundant in the second Epistle. Thus (2 Pet. i. 9) μυωπάζων, "one who cannot see afar off," is literally "one who has his eyes tight closed, either from intention or weakness of sight;" σκήνωμα (i. 13, 14), of the body, as the tabernacle of the soul; φωσφόρος (i. 19), the light-bringer, for "the day-star;" πλαστός (ii. 3), that can be moulded or bent in any way, plastic, of "feigned" words; νυστάζειν (ii. 3), "to slumber," literally "to nod in sleep;" τεφρώσας (ii. 6), "turning into ashes;" βασανίζειν (ii. 8), "to vex," literally "to put to torture;" βοιζήδον (iii. 10), "with a great noise," but the word implies the hurtling of weapons or the plash of many waters; στρεβλοῦν (iii. 16), "to wrest," really "to put on the rack."

Again, if we compare the two Epistles in the matter of ἀπαξ λεγόμενα and rare words we shall find a like correspondence in their diction. The list in the first Epistle comprises ἀνάχυσις (iv. 4), ἀναγεννάω (i. 3), ἀμαράντινος (v. 4), ἀμάραντος (i. 4), ἀνεκλάλητος (i. 8), πατροπαράδοτος (i. 18), ἐκτενής (iv. 8), ἀρτιγέννητος (ii. 2), ἄδολος (ii. 2), ἱεράτευμα (ii. 5, 9), ὑπολιμπάνω (ii. 21), ὑπογραμμός (ii. 21), μώλωψ (ii. 24), ἐποπτεύω (ii. 12, iii. 2), ἐμπλοκή (iii. 3), ἐνδυσις (iii. 3), οἰνοφλυγία (iv. 3), ἀλλοτριοεπίσκοπος (iv. 15), ἀρχιποίμην (v. 4), συνεκλεκτός (v. 13). Now many of these words are specimens of that strong figurative diction which is not unfrequently found among unlearned but still vigorous and thoughtful men. Had it been an imitator who had set about writing the second Epistle we may be confident that a close study of the language of the first would have made him aware of this characteristic of St Peter's diction, and we should have been sure to find some of the unusual words of the first letter reproduced in the second. A writer who meant to pass his work off as St Peter's composition must have set such a stamp upon his writing. But the actual case is not of that nature. The second Epistle abounds like the first with unusual or unique words, but there are none among them which connect it with the previous letter. The peculiarity of style is as prominent as ever, but it is developed in entirely new materials. The unique words of the second Epistle are mainly these: ισότιμος (i. 1), μυωπάζω (i. 9), επόπτης (i. 16), αὐχμηρός (i. 19), διανγάζω (i. 19), φωσφόρος (i. 19), ἐπίλυσις (i. 20), ταχινός (i. 14, ii. 1), ταρταρόω (ii. 4), πλαστός (ii. 3), ἐκπαλαι (ii. 3, iii. 5), σειρά (ii. 4), βλέμμα (ii. 8), μῶμος (ii. 13), ἐντρύφω (ii. 13), ἀκατάπαυστος (ii. 14), παραφρονία (ii. 16), ἐξέεραμα (ii. 22), κύλισμα (ii. 22), ροιζηδόν (iii. 10), κανσώω (iii. 10, 12), δυσνόητος (iii. 16), ἀστήρικτος (ii. 14, iii. 16), στηριγμός (iii. 17).

It will be seen that many of these words are of the same character in every respect as those used in the first Epistle, words which would be employed by a writer who had a very graphic manner of expression, and gave word-pictures in all that he said or wrote, but they are not those which an imitator of the first Epistle would have chosen that he might impress the reader with the notion that the author of one letter was the author of the other.

(4 b) If we turn now to the language which is ascribed to St Peter in the Acts of the Apostles, we shall find that there are many indications that the speaker was the same person, to judge from his words, as the writer of the Second Epistle. In 2 Pet. i. 1 we have λαγχάνειν used of those "who have obtained the like faith." The word is found in the same sense Acts i. 17, where Peter speaks of Judas having "obtained part of this ministry." But in this sense the word is found nowhere else in the New Testament. So εὐσέβεια, holiness (A.V. godliness), is used 2 Pet. i. 7 of a potentiality in exercise, which will make its possessor fruitful in good works, just as St Peter says (Acts iii. 12), "Why look ye on us as though by our own power or holiness we had made this man to walk." In like manner the use of ἀνομος (unlawful) concerning things and not persons is confined to St Peter in the Acts and to the writer of this Epistle (cp. 2 Pet. ii. 8 with Acts ii. 23). Everywhere else in the New Testament the word is used of persons. In 2 Pet. ii. 9 we have εὐσεβής of godly persons. In the Acts (x. 2, 7), in a description which can hardly have come in the first instance from any other than St Peter, we find the same word employed twice over in describing Cornelius. The word occurs nowhere else in the New Testament, for in Acts xxii. 12 the best MSS. and editions read εὐλαβής. Of the same kind is the writer's use (2 Pet. ii. 16, 18) of φθέγγομαι, a very unusual verb for to speak. It is found (Acts iv. 18) in the report of the injunction given to St Peter and his companions "not to speak nor teach in the name of Jesus," but nowhere else, and this report was most likely to be gathered first of all from the spokesman of the Apostles. So ἡμέρα κυρίου, the day of the Lord, is found only in Acts ii. 20 and 2 Pet. iii. 10, and once in St Paul's Epistles (1 Thess. v. 2), but the whole passage in St Peter's second Epistle should be read along with the quotation in the Acts, and the thoughts will be seen to run in one and the same channel. A further and most remarkable instance of the use of the same words is found in Acts i. 18 compared with 2 Pet. ii. 13, 15. In the first passage St Peter is speaking of Judas buying a piece of ground with the wages of iniquity (μισθὸς τῆς ἀδικίας), and in the Epistle the same expression is used of Balaam and of the sinners whom the writer compares with him: while the words are to be found nowhere else. These instances do not exhaust the points of similarity in diction, for λαλεῖν (Acts iii. 21 compared with 2 Pet. i. 21) is used in both books in the same way for God's message spoken to man, and ἐπάγειν of 2 Pet. ii. 5 is like the use of the word in Acts v. 28. So too καλάζεσθαι of Acts iv. 21, compared with the use of the same verb 2 Pet. ii. 9, and in no other passages. All these examples in the Acts occur either in St Peter's own speeches, or in narratives in which he appears as principal actor, and of which he must have been the first relater, and when brought together and compared with our Epistle they furnish a large amount of evidence such as could hardly be derived from any writings except those drawn from the same source.

(4 c) If we turn now to the Gospels we find some indications of a like nature. Tradition describes St Mark as the ἑρμηνεύτης of St Peter. If this be true, we should expect in the second Gospel to find points of language which resemble our Epistle. Of such we have the verb δωρέομαι used Mark xv. 45 and nowhere else in the New Testament, except 2 Pet. i. 3. So too βασανίζω in the same figurative sense in 2 Pet. ii. 7, 8, and Mark vi. 48. In the same way both these writers employ τρέμειν, a word uncommon in the New Testament (cf. Mark v. 33 with 2 Pet. ii. 10). Again, nowhere else is the word (λαίλαψ) tempest used. Storms and tempests are often enough spoken of in the Gospels, but only in Mark iv. 37 and 2 Pet. ii. 17 does this word appear.

There are also several instances of close resemblance between the other Gospels and this Epistle. Thus the swine and dogs are spoken of together (ii. 22) exactly in the same way as in Matt. vii. 6. The day of the Lord is compared to a thief in the night (iii. 10) as in Matt. xxiv. 43. The way in which St Peter alludes to the Flood and to Sodom and Gomorrah recalls the mention of them by Christ (Matt. xxiv. 37; Luke xvii. 26—30), while in the κολαζομένους of 2 Pet. ii. 9 we have the echo of the κόλασις in Matt. xxv. 46; and the same may be said of 2 Pet. ii. 20, "the latter end (τὰ ἔσχατα) has become worse than the beginning (τῶν πρώτων)," which is drawn from our Lord's words, Matt. xii. 45. But perhaps the most striking passage of this kind in the whole Epistle is the allusion (i. 17, 18) to the narratives of the Transfiguration. Closely joined with these verses we have two words in the Apostle's letter which revive the story of that great manifestation of Christ's glory. In v. 13 we read "as long as I am in this tabernacle." Now it was St Peter who at the Transfiguration had said, "Let us make three tabernacles." Then in v. 15, alluding to his own death, he writes, "after my departure" (ἔξοδον), and at the Transfiguration Moses and Elias talked with Jesus of his "decease" (also ἔξοδον), which he should accomplish at Jerusalem. The two words seem to have revived the memory of the past, and immediately the writer passes to the mention of the vision of Christ's glory in the Holy Mount. Such a train of thought is natural in St Peter, but would be marvellous in any other than one who had been a witness of the Transfiguration.

(5) In comparing the Second Epistle of St Peter with the other New Testament writings, the most important to be noticed are the Epistles of St Paul. We maintain that our Epistle is directed to congregations of Jews and Gentiles, among whom the latter had first ministered, but among whom St Peter also had laboured. Of course the employment of the same words and phrases in their letters is not conclusive in respect of their joint interest in the persons addressed, but it is of great importance as evidence that St Peter's Epistle is not a composition of late date and of the second century. At that time the circumstances of the Christian Churches had entirely changed, errors which in St Paul's day were only just raising their heads had then grown into magnitude, and topics of discussion had become prominent of which the Apostolic age knew little or nothing. If St Peter's Epistle therefore deals with the same subjects and in exactly the same spirit as those of his fellow Apostle, it is only just to suppose that the letter which has come down to us was written under the same circumstances and at the same time as St Paul's. Now St Peter (2 Pet. i. 2) speaks of "ever growing knowledge" (ἐπίγνωσις) exactly as St Paul does in Rom. i. 28, iii. 20, and in many other places which have been alluded to in the notes. In a like tone does he deal (i. 16) with the "fables" (μῦθοι) of which St Paul speaks 1 Tim. i. 4 and iv. 7. The same covetousness (πλεονεξία) characterizes the false teachers in the experience of one Apostle and of the other

(cf. 2 Pet. ii. 3 with 1 Tim. vi. 5; Titus i. 11): they make the same large promises of liberty to those whom they desire to mislead (cf. 2 Pet. ii. 19 with 1 Cor. x. 29 and Gal. v. 13). The long-suffering of God and the end for which it was displayed St Peter (iii. 15) speaks of in words which seem to be derived from Rom. ii. 4, and with them also may be compared Rom. ix. 22. The "false brethren unawares brought in who came in privily to spy out our liberty" (Gal. ii. 4) have their counterpart in those who "privily bring in heresies of destruction" (2 Pet. ii. 1), and indeed the whole position assumed by St Peter in reference to heretical teaching is very exactly that which is set before us in St Paul's Epistles. The errors are of the same kind, their development is in the same stage, the artifices of their propounders are alike, and the whole pictures have so much in common that it seems unreasonable to place them at different periods of the Church's history. Those who have studied the fertile growth of various phases of false teaching in the Ecclesiastical history of the second century, will find it difficult to believe that by a writer of that period, in a letter devoted in the main to a warning against errors of doctrine, so little should have been said of other forms of false teaching which then existed, and no hint given of any thing more than the earliest stages of Gnostic errors in teaching and in practice.

It is worth while also to notice that the seducing teachers have no name in St Peter's Epistle, whereas the same persons in the Revelation (ii. 14, 15) are called Nicolaitanes. The offenders there, as here, are those that hold the doctrine or follow the errors of Balaam the son of Beor, but by the date of the Revelation they had further gained a more definite appellation. "Thou also, as well as Israel of old," it is said to the Church of Pergamos, "hast such teachers that hold the doctrines of the Nicolaitanes." Now whatever date is assigned to the Revelation, it was written long before the time at which those who dispute the authenticity of 2 Peter would fix its production. Yet it is strange that the definite title of these teachers does not appear in it, but only their description in connexion with the name of the false prophet in whose steps they were treading. For this reason among others we should place 2 Peter before the Apocalypse, and as the date of the Apocalypse is most likely before A.D. 70, this suits well with the genuineness and authenticity of the second Epistle of St Peter.

(6) But beside these points of resemblance in the language of the second Epistle both to the other writings of the New Testament, and to the acknowledged words of St Peter, there is a feature of likeness between the first and second Epistles which deserves to be specially noted, and which contributes much to the evidence that they are both by the same hand. The mind of the writer in both letters continually becomes retrospective, and his recollections fashion the language which he uses. In the first Epistle we have this characteristic exemplified in several instances. In chap. v. 5 he writes, "be clothed with humility." But no mere translation can give the force of the verb there used. It signifies "to wrap tight round you a kind of overdress which servants used when engaged in rough or dirty labour." Now in the use of this word the writer seems to be carried back in mind to that occasion (John xiii. 4) when Jesus "laid aside his garments and took a towel and girded himself" and washed his disciples' feet. The words of the Apostle are in an exhortation which begins "All of you be subject one to another," and his thoughts appear to revert to the way in which Christ had taught the same lesson, and he frames his language by a single word to point back to that scene, "Wrap your humility tight about you, as a robe for work and wear," and so follow the example of Jesus when he washed the feet of his disciples.

Exactly in the same way does he seem to look back to words of Jesus (Luke xii. 35), "Let your loins be girded and your lamps burning," when he says (i. 13), "Gird up the loins of your mind." So too when he gives his exhortation to the elders (v. 2), "Feed the flock of God which is among you," he is mindful of that interview of his with Christ which is related John xxi. 15, 16, where a like charge was given to himself, and he fulfils to the best of his power the command (Luke xxii. 32), "when thou art converted strengthen thy brethren." In i. 17 too we have recalled most clearly St Peter's own picture of the life of Cornelius (Acts x. 2) when we read, "If ye call on the Father, who without respect of persons judgeth according to every man's work, pass the time of your sojourning here in fear." We may trace too a remembrance of his own inability to watch even a short time with his Master, when "the hour" of his enemies and "the power of darkness" arrived, in those earnest exhortations to watchfulness (v. 8) which he gives against the attacks of the devil.

But most of all does he dwell on the sufferings and resurrection of Jesus. His great claim to be heard is (v. 1) that he is "a witness of the sufferings of Christ." He remembers the last prayer, "Father, into thy hands I commend my spirit," so he exhorts those who have to suffer (iv. 19) to "commit the keeping of their souls to God in well-doing as unto a faithful Creator." And he makes special and constant allusion to the Passion. The whole scene of Christ's trial is before his eyes as he writes the words (ii. 19—24), "What glory is it, if when ye be buffeted for your faults ye shall take it patiently?" The Greek word means "smitten with the palm of the hand" as Christ was smitten. And the one word recalls the whole scene, and he applies it at once for the purpose of his exhortation. "Christ," he continues, "suffered for us, leaving us an example that ye should follow His steps: who did no sin, neither was guile found in His mouth, who when He was reviled, reviled not again, when He suffered He threatened not, but committed Himself to Him that judgeth righteously; who His own self bare our sins in His own body on the tree, that we being dead to sins should live unto righteousness, by whose stripes ye were healed." These words shew as we read them that all the terrible events of that sad day were minutely revived. The mockery and the blows, the scorn of the High-priest and his colleagues, the submissive silent Jesus, are all depicted in his graphic words. He uses too for "tree" (ξύλον) an unusual word, which he also employs in like manner in two of his addresses in the Acts (v. 30; x. 39), while in the word for stripes (μώλας) we have the eye-witness clearly presented to us. It means properly "a wale or bruise" rising under the skin after a severe blow, and as we read the passage with this in mind, we can see that the writer's thoughts were on that mangled form which the hard blows had made to seem like a single bruise.

Such is St Peter's way of thought and writing in the first Epistle. Of like kind in our second Epistle we may note the use of (δελεάζειν) to catch with a bait, only employed here (ii. 14, 18) and by St James (i. 14) of the alluring of sinners unto evil ways, but in which the thought goes back to the fisherman's life on the Lake of Galilee. We can see too how he recurs, when he speaks of false teachers, to those words which only he and three others appear to have heard from Jesus (cf. Matt. xxiv. 3 with Mark xiii. 3), "Many false prophets shall rise and shall deceive many, and because iniquity shall abound, the love of many shall wax cold." Peter had seen, yea been part of, such a turning away; and now when men are arising again "to deny the Master who bought them," he almost uses Christ's own words for the warning of his readers. Also he has strong in his mind the terms of that same discourse (Matt. xxiv. xxv.) when he writes (iii. 3, 4) that "in the last days there shall come scoffers walking after their own lusts, and saying, 'Where is the promise of his coming?'" while Christ's solemn words on the same occasion, "Immediately after the tribulation of those days shall the sun be darkened, and the moon shall not give her light, and the stars shall fall from heaven and the powers of heaven shall be shaken, and then shall appear the sign of the Son of Man in heaven," are echoed in the exhortation (iii. 10) of the Epistle, where the words also look back to St Peter's Pentecostal sermon, "The day of the Lord will come as a thief in the night, when the elements shall melt with fervent heat, the earth also and the works that are therein shall be burned up."

Further, he seems ever to have in his mind the charge (Luke xxii. 32),

"Strengthen (στηρίξον) thy brethren." No version can give the force of the original, but the Apostle reproduces the thought when he says (i. 12), "I will not be negligent to put you always in remembrance of these things though ye know them and be established (ἐστηρικμένους) in the present truth." He had fulfilled his Apostolic duty and strengthened them, but he would not through any neglect let them fall back into weakness. Once more, those who wrest the Scriptures (iii. 16) are "unlearned and unstable" (ἀστήρικτοι), having no strength or firmness of hold on the truth, while the better condition to which the Apostle hopes to have brought his hearers is noticed again by a form from the same word (iii. 17), "Beware lest ye...fall from your own steadfastness" (στηρικμοῦ).

This feature of resemblance between the two Epistles has been dwelt on at more length because it is what an imitator would be most unlikely to reproduce. Such a writer may carefully study and imitate the external marks of style in the author whom he intends to copy, but to enter into the man's mind, to look back with the vision of another over a life of which he has had no experience, and to reproduce touches the same in kind but different in particulars, yet such as would have been natural to the thought of the true writer; this is beyond imitator's work.

And there are not wanting other indications that our writer was not a forger. A forger would never have written "Symeon Peter" (i. 1), nor have varied from the terms of the heavenly message, at least as reported in some of the Gospels, when he was describing the Transfiguration. He would also hardly have ventured to claim so solemnly for himself a share in that scene, while he is writing against teachers of falsehood, if his words had not been true, nor would he have glided so naturally from the singular number to the plural in that narrative, just where the change is most suitable, nor would he have allowed, as he does, any testimony of prophecy to be counted of more certainty than the vision from heaven which he was professing to have seen. A second century imitator would hardly have spoken as our Epistle speaks (iii. 15) of "our beloved brother Paul," but would have used terms of greater honour and respect, such as were common in writers of that date¹, nor would he have failed to conclude his Epistle with a solemn ascription and Doxology as is done in the close of the first Epistle. Once more, the very difference of tone on some points in the two Epistles seems to mark them both as genuine. For example, in the first, where the object is to give comfort under trial, and to exhort unto patience "those who are being kept by the power of God unto salvation," the second coming of Christ may fitly be spoken of as a Revelation (ἀποκάλυψις, 1 Pet. i. 5), for they were preparing to welcome his appearing with the cry of the writer of the Apocalypse, "Even so, come, Lord Jesus." But when false teachers are abroad it is a time for Christ's coming to be set forth in another light. To those who fall away it will be a (παρουσία) coming, 'a presence,' but not one to which they have looked with joy. To them it will be "the great and terrible day of the Lord" and the "day of judgment" (iii. 7).

We can see too why Christ is so often called Saviour (σωτήρ) in the second Epistle from the same consideration. He had bought, redeemed His people, this constituted Him their Saviour, this was the great claim He had upon their love, and this is the reason why by the name which he so delights to apply to the Lord, the writer of the second Epistle gives emphasis to the work of Christ in man's redemption, and to His claim on man's love.

Then our Lord's sufferings are much dwelt on in the First Epistle, hardly at all in the Second. But is there not good cause for the change of tone? It was not the time to urge on men to imitate Christ in His humility and patience when they were being persuaded to deny Him altogether. The different circumstances sufficiently explain the difference of the language.

Combining all these points of internal evidence we seem to have many good grounds for accepting the second Epistle as the work of the same writer who composed the first. The tone of the two letters is the same on a great many points, and where there are variations, these can be sufficiently accounted for by the times in which, and the objects for which, each was composed. The language of the two letters exhibits in large abundance the same peculiarities which differ entirely from those which an imitator of the first would have endeavoured to introduce into the second. The language also of the second Epistle has many points of resemblance to words which must have come from St Peter in the Acts, and to some which most likely did so in the Gospels, while the mental characteristics of the writer of 2 Peter so completely agree with those exhibited in the earlier Epistle, that to suppose them different persons is very difficult. There are at the same time many things to be found in the second Epistle which we can hardly conceive an imitator introducing or allowing to appear. If both letters be by St Peter all that we find in them may be explained naturally, to ascribe the second to an imitator raises difficulties which seem to pass solution. For these reasons, not indeed amounting to proof, but when combined with the decision of the Laodicean Council affording most strong presumption, it seems right to accept the verdict of antiquity and to receive our Epistle for St Peter's.

There are a few other points in connexion with the Epistle which need to be noticed, and foremost among them is its relation to the Epistle of St Jude. In several places in the notes occasion has been taken to remark on such forms and expressions as seem to shew that St Peter's Epistle was the first written. But it will be well to set the whole case before the reader here.

In the first place comes the grammatical evidence. St Peter (ii. 1) says: "There shall also be false teachers among you, who shall privily bring in heresies of destruction...and many shall follow their lasciviousnesses, by reason of whom the way of truth shall be blasphemed, and in covetousness shall they with feigned words make merchandise of you." Here the future aspect of the coming heresies seems most strongly emphasized. The writer proceeds to describe the judgment of these sinners as being prefigured by examples in the Old Testament, and in so doing completely identifies the false teachers who shall come hereafter with those who have been their types in the past. Thus he says, "they are not afraid to speak evil of dignities," "they speak evil of the things which they understand not," and other like sentences in the present or aorist tenses, but this is just what a writer would do who was figuring at the moment the future from a consideration of the past. And when he comes to conclude his admonition (iii. 1—4) on this subject, and to turn to things as they are, he shews again that the inroads of error are only dreaded in the time to come. For he writes, "I stir up your pure minds by way of remembrance: that ye may be mindful of the words which were spoken before by the holy prophets...knowing this first that in the last days scoffers shall come in their scoffing." The whole position assumed here is that of one addressing Christians who were still free from admixture with error, and who only needed to be put in mind of what they had heard, to keep safe from the danger which the Apostle saw was growing up around them.

In St Jude's Epistle the language refers to a different time. The writer there says, "There are certain men crept in unawares," as though these were already carrying on the mischievous designs among the Christian community. They are "spots" now existing "in the feasts of charity," they "feast" among the brethren "without fear" and "pasture themselves." All this is in a different tone from St Peter's more predictive language. And when we come to verses 17 and 18 we have what appears to be a direct allusion to St Peter's words: "Remember ye the words which were spoken before of the Apostles of our Lord Jesus Christ; how that they told you there should be mockers (ἐμπαῖκται) in the last time." This word for mockers is found nowhere else in the New Testament except 2 Pet. iii. 3, and the whole passage in St Jude wears the appearance of a quotation from that verse. And in St Peter the sentence is the Apostle's own language. He has said, "I stir up your minds...that ye may be mindful of the words which were spoken before by the holy prophets and of the commandment of your Apostles...as ye know this first that in the last days mockers shall come." So that the portion quoted by St Jude is a direct utterance of St Peter, and not a quotation from any other source which might have been equally accessible to another writer. On the score of language therefore the second Epistle of St Peter appears to have been written before that of St Jude.

And when we look at the characters portrayed in the two Epistles this position is strengthened. St Peter speaks of those against whom he writes as "teachers," men, that is, who by the lessons which they gave were likely to induce others to accept their opinions, and in consequence to follow their practices. They bring in "heresies of destruction," "with feigned words they make merchandise of" their hearers, "they beguile unstable souls," "they make promises of liberty while they themselves are the servants of corruption." But in St Jude's Epistle the picture is much darker, the mischief has grown apace. There is no more mention of the offenders as teachers or setters forth of any doctrine. They are simply degraded in their life by wicked lusts. "They turn the grace of God into lasciviousness," "these men dreaming defile the flesh." "What they know naturally, as brute beasts, in those things they corrupt themselves." "They are spots in your feasts of charity" (he continues), "feasting with you without fear, pasturing themselves," "they walk after their own lusts," "they are sensual, they have not the Spirit." They are such that it is only with fear and trembling that men may try to save them, their deeds are to be loathed as a defiled garment.

Here then we have another indication that St Jude wrote after St Peter. None will doubt that they are both addressing their exhortations against the same evil, and that one writer knew of the other's Epistle; and granting this, there can be little doubt that the letter of St Jude was composed when the evil teaching had found its natural consequence in evil doing, and that bad practices were encouraged without much outward show of a party of teachers in the Church.

Once more, when we look at the form of the sentences in the two Epistles, we seem able to trace St Jude's expansions, and in some cases to judge of the reason for them. This will be best seen if we place side by side a few of those verses which seem to bear out the view that St Jude takes his text from St Peter, but uses it as seems most fitting for his need. Comparing 2 Peter ii. 4 with Jude 6 we find

2 Pet. ii. 4. For if God spared not angels when they sinned, but cast them into Tartarus, and delivered them into chains [pits] of darkness to be reserved unto judgment...

Jude 6. And the angels that kept not their first estate, but left their own habitation, he hath reserved in everlasting chains under darkness unto the judgment of the great day.

Here is a manifest comment upon "the angels that sinned," and it suits exactly with the relative position of the two Epistles as we think them to have been written. St Jude wishes to speak strongly of those who had utterly fallen away from Christian living, and therefore he charges the picture more deeply, and speaks of the angels as keeping not their first estate, but leaving their own habitation. So again,

2 Pet. ii. 6. Turning the cities of Sodom and Gomorrah into ashes condemned them with an overthrow, making them an ensample to those that after should live ungodly.

Jude 7. Even as Sodom and Gomorrah, and the cities about them in like manner, giving themselves over to fornication, and going after strange flesh, are set forth for an example, suffering the vengeance of eternal fire.

Here too St Jude has a scene of grosser character in his mind, and he uses the example which St Peter had employed, but gives it a stamp which fits it for the more corrupted days in which he is writing.

And we have another example of expansion,

2 Pet. ii. 11. Whereas angels, which are greater in power and might, bring not railing accusation against them before the Lord.

Jude 9. Yet Michael the archangel, when contending with the devil he disputed about the body of Moses, durst not bring against him a railing accusation, but said, The Lord rebuke thee.

Both these passages are meant to illustrate the inconsistency of those sinners in the Christian communities who "rail against dignities." St Jude wishes, as we believe, to make his illustration even stronger than St Peter's, for the times were grown more evil. The latter had said, "Angels bring not railing judgment against evil persons." St Jude goes further with a concrete instance, and says, "Michael, the greatest of angels, did not bring a railing judgment even against Satan himself, the prince of evil."

So too if we set side by side

2 Pet. ii. 17. These are wells without water, and mists driven about by a whirlwind, to whom the blackness of darkness is reserved.

Jude 12. Clouds they are without water, carried about of winds; autumn withering trees, without fruit, twice dead, plucked up by the roots; raging waves of the sea, foaming out their own shame; wandering stars, to whom is reserved the blackness of darkness for ever.

Here as before we recognize the darker condition of those against whom St Jude is giving his warnings. These sinners now gloried in their shame and minded only earthly things. They cast their shame forth to the public gaze with no feeling of regret for the better state which they had lost. But perhaps the strongest phrase is that which speaks of them as trees doubly dead: there has been no more blasting in their case of one year's promise, leaving hope that in another they may bloom again. All hope of such men is past, and it is "for ever" that for them the blackness of darkness is reserved.

These are not all the instances of such treatment which could be produced, but these examples are enough to illustrate the Midrash-like exposition which St Jude seems to have given to St Peter's text. The contrary process, viz. St Peter abbreviating St Jude's letter, is not easy to conceive, especially in view of the existence of those graver evils which are clearly indicated and spoken against in the latter Epistle, and which of themselves imply some time, if not a long time, since the false teachers of St Peter seemed near at hand.

ARGUMENT OF THE EPISTLE.

This may be summarized as follows:

CHAP. I. It is addressed to those who hold the like precious faith with the writer (1, 2), who are urged because of God's gracious gifts unto them, to labour with all diligence for a steady advance in holiness (3—7). The graces to be cherished increase men's knowledge of our Lord Jesus Christ, and those who do not thus grow are blind, and lose the memory of former spiritual blessing (8, 9). Therefore be ye diligent (he continues) and I will not be negligent to keep you in mind of these things. For I shall soon be taken away, and I desire that after my death you may recall what I have said (10—15). For we have good warrant for our teaching, since we saw the Lord in His glory at the Transfiguration (16—18). And there is beside the word of prophecy, which is to other men more sure than our vision. Take heed to this and follow its light, for the words of the prophets are God's own words, for these men spake from Him, being moved by the Holy Ghost (19—21).

CHAP. II. But of old there were false prophets, and there shall rise false teachers among you, and shall lead many astray, and cause the truth to be evil spoken of (1, 2). But their judgment has been foreshewn long ago, for they shall no more be spared than were angels when they sinned, or than the world before the Flood or the cities of the plain. The destruction of these was a type of the end of the false teachers, just as the deliverance of Noah and of Lot teaches us that God can deliver his servants out of their trials (3—9). The marks by which the false guides both in past times and in times to come can be discerned are these: they walk after the flesh and despise dominion and are self-willed; they speak evil of glories, blaspheming things which they cannot understand, and while they destroy others they shall be destroyed (10—12). They delight to revel in the day time, and are blemishes among your company; they beguile the unstable, and in their covetousness follow the example of Balaam of old (13—16). They give promise but perform nothing, like fountains without water, and clouds without rain. They allure by their fine speeches, and promise liberty to their followers, but themselves are slaves of corruption (17—19). They have once known the right way, but have fallen back into evil, so their latter end is worse than their beginning. They fulfil the proverbs of the dog and the swine by returning to the evil from which they had been cleansed (20—22).

CHAP. III. I write this second Epistle to put you in remembrance of what you have been taught, for the times of danger spoken of both by prophets and apostles are near. The scoffers will come with their scoffings, and ask, Where is the promise of his coming (1—4)? These men wilfully forget that the earth has been destroyed, and its future destruction is pronounced. Do not you be like them, and count God slack because he does not strike sinners at once. He is long-suffering that men may repent (5—10). But the day will come when men look not for it, and those portents shall be seen which Christ foretold. Men ought therefore to walk in all holy conversation and godliness, that they may always be ready (11—13). We Christians look for new heavens and new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness; we then should labour that we may be fit to dwell there and be found ourselves without spot (14). Think that God's long-suffering is meant for man's salvation. St Paul teaches us this, but there are portions of that Apostle's words which the unstedfast wrest to their own destruction (15, 16). But as ye are warned and instructed take heed that ye fall not away, but grow in grace and in the knowledge of Christ, to whom be all glory (17, 18).

TIME AND PLACE OF WRITING.

On these two points little can be said. St Peter was expecting his death soon to come, but we have no certain evidence in what year he suffered martyrdom. The traditions on which most reliance can be placed make it very probable that he died in Rome, and that his death was after A.D. 63 and before A.D. 70. Further than this we cannot go, nor need we, because there is no allusion to the destruction of Jerusalem in his Epistle, necessarily conclude that he died before it was destroyed. It seems almost certain that by "Babylon" in the first Epistle (v. 13) Rome is intended¹, and if this be so, we can hardly conclude otherwise than that he was in the same city when he wrote the second letter. It was not written so long after the first as to make the former out of mind, and as tradition places the death of the Apostle in Rome, it seems likely that he laboured there during his last years on earth, as one of the greatest centres of life, and so a place whence his influence would be most widely spread.

LANGUAGE.

Some attempts have from time to time been made to demonstrate that Second Peter and Jude were both originally written in Hebrew, and that the supposition of such Aramaic originals will explain many of the difficulties which meet us in the comparison of the two texts. But though highly interesting, no such speculations have yet been made convincing. One of the most recent of these discussions is by the Rev. E. G. King². But though Mr King's remarks support strongly the position that St Jude wrote after St Peter, and was, as it were, an expounder or commentator on part of his text, yet the fact that both writers were Hebrews writing in Greek, and so, sure to give their thoughts a Hebrew turn, seems enough to account for the greater portion of the instances which are there brought forward.

CONCLUSION.

From all that has been here said it will be seen that, looking at the external evidence alone, we cannot arrive at certainty concerning the authorship of this Epistle. The internal evidence has been shewn to point very clearly to St Peter as the author. But there rises the question: What shall we say concerning its non-acceptance in the earliest days of Christianity? The Epistle was known in many quarters among the early Christians, and they could see, as we do, that it claimed to be the work of the chief among the Apostles. It will be said, 'Had they believed it to be really a writing of St Peter, could they ever have regarded it as uncanonical?' Yet holding it for uncanonical, many, as we see from the words of Eusebius, still considered it of value, and our only reply must be, that the circumstances of the time and the conditions under which writings came before the world in those early times were such as made it possible for works to be circulated and obtain only a doubtful acceptance without any suspicion of what we in modern days call literary forgery. We know from the preface to St Luke's Gospel that many Christian writings, and of varied value, came into circulation during the infancy of the Church, and it is not difficult to understand that our Epistle, sent probably from Rome to Asia, may have remained for a good while in partial obscurity, and when it began to be more widely known the circumstances under which it was first sent may have been in some degree hard to discover. Thus the Epistle would come to be classed with a multitude of other works about whose origin some uncertainty prevailed. But time brought it into its proper estimation. It was first found useful, and when the day of closer enquiry arrived it was accepted as canonical by the Laodicean Council. And when we remember what works were rejected from the Canon, and by what names they were known, names which in Canonical Scripture were highly distinguished, if not so highly as St Peter, we may rest sure that the evidence adduced before the Fathers of Laodicea was such as to make the external testimony bear out the claims made in the text of the Epistle.

It may therefore suffice us concerning this second Epistle, claiming to be St Peter's, to know, even though we have not all the evidence preserved to us, that in old time there was warrant found for accepting it as what it claims to be. We ourselves can see that it accords in sentiment with the teaching of the Gospels and the Epistles concerning which we have no doubt; that its view of the Christian Church is in agreement with that of other writings of the Apostolic age, that it fits in, in short, in its place among the Canonical Scriptures. We have seen that the internal evidence which would incline us to accept the Epistle as St Peter's is very strong, while the difficulty of finding a theory on which all the features that mark this letter could have been exhibited in the work of any imitator is well-nigh insurmountable. Therefore we receive it as St Peter's writing in spite of the doubts of the early Church, for we feel confident that they were cleared away before the book was included in the Canon. But above all we take it as part of our Christian Scriptures because of its harmony with what Christ taught. It bears its witness in itself.

THE SECOND EPISTLE GENERAL OF PETER.

CHAPTER I.

1 Confirming them in hope of the increase of God's graces, 5 he exhorteth them, by faith, and good works, to make their calling sure: 12 whereof he is careful to remember them, knowing that his death is at hand: 16 and warneth them to be constant in the faith of Christ, who is the true Son of God, by the eyewitness of the apostles beholding his majesty, and by the testimony of the Father, and the prophets.

SIMON Peter, a servant and an apostle of Jesus Christ, to them

TITLE.

The title of the Epistle as given in the A.V. is only found in some late MSS. It is that which is given by Stephens, while the Textus Receptus adds "the Apostle" after "Peter." The MSS. of greatest authority (N, A, B) and most recent editors give merely "Of Peter ii."

CHAP. I. 1—11. The apostolic salutation and prayer for a blessing on those for whom he writes, followed by an earnest exhortation. Seeing that God has granted unto you all things which pertain to a godly life, take good heed that ye provide with all diligence such graces as may prove you to be not unfruitful, for thereby shall be provided for you an entrance into the eternal kingdom of Christ.

1. Simon Peter] In the first Epistle we have only the one name Peter given. Without admitting in any sense that there was a Petrine and a Pauline party in the early church, it may be gathered from what St Paul says (Gal. ii. 7) of the "Gospel of the circumcision being committed unto Peter," that while both Apostles laboured in the same spirit and walked in the same steps, the son of Jonas was recognized most completely by the Christians who belonged to his own nation. Among them we can understand that he would be known by his Jewish as well as by his Greek name. Writing to churches of mixed Jews and Gentiles he combines both names and calls himself Simon Peter. The union is a token that Jew and Greek were rapidly being made one in Christ.

The best supported orthography of the name in this verse is Symeon. This is a strong mark of a Jewish hand. It is the form which the LXX. always gives for the name of the patriarch Simeon (Gen. xxix. 33, &c.), and which in the New Testament is written (Rev. vii. 7) as the name of the tribe called after him. It is also found as the name of the son of Harim (Ezra x. 31), though there the A.V. has Shimeon.

In the Apocrypha the name of the Maccabean prince is written Σίμων (1 Macc. v. 17, &c.), though on his coins it stands with the same orthography as the name of the son of Jacob (see Gesenius, s. v.). In the New Testament Συμεών is found (Luke ii. 25, 34) as the name of that aged man who received our Lord in the Temple, also of a son of Juda in St Luke's genealogy (iii. 30), and of Simeon called Niger (Acts xiii. 1). It is also given as the form of St Peter's name in the account of that peculiarly Jewish assemblage, the council held (Acts xv. 14) concerning the circumcision of Gentiles converted to Christianity. From this it would seem that among Jews themselves the fuller form Symeon was most used, and would be the name written on religious occasions and for solemn purposes, while Simon was the form most current in their intercourse with non-Jews, and would be employed in the ordinary transactions of life. Whether we ascribe the use of this form of the name to the Apostle himself or to an amanuensis, its occurrence suits well with what we may conceive to have been the surroundings of St Peter in his later life. We know from Gal. ii. 11 how he was inclined to cling to everything which was Jewish. In his ministry to the converts from his own nation he would be likely to call himself, and to be called of others, by that form of his name which was familiar from their ancient Scriptures, and which occupied a place in their national history. Yet this would only be the case for a little while, until the Gospel narratives had come into circulation. After that time any writer, who might have undertaken to put forth this Epistle under St Peter's name, would have had the best chance of gaining acceptance for it, if he had made use of those forms which the Evangelists employ exclusively. A forger would assuredly have made his form of the name accord with that employed in the first Epistle, and would never have departed from the orthography found in the Gospels.

that have obtained like precious faith with us through the righteousness of God and our Saviour Jesus Christ:

2 Grace and peace be multiplied unto you through the knowledge of God, and of Jesus our Lord,

Thus this first word of the Epistle seems to be an indication that the letter is not the work of any forger. Where so little is known of the history of the Epistle from external evidence, the accumulation of such points of internal testimony seems the best, perhaps the only, answer that can be given to those who would assign this Epistle to a late date and to another hand than that of St Peter.

a servant and an apostle] This precise combination is found in no other apostolic salutation. The nearest approach to it is Tit. i. 1, where St Paul calls himself "a servant of God and an apostle of Jesus Christ." The former word, used often by St Paul (Rom. i. 1; Phil. i. 1, &c.) and more exactly rendered bond-slave, implies the entire devotion of the servant to his Lord, the latter the service in which his devotion engaged him.

like precious faith] Rather, a like-precious. The original is only one word, which does not occur elsewhere in the New Testament, and implies that the faith admits all those who have received it to the same Christian privileges, and is for that reason alike precious to them all. It is also alike precious through all time, to those who first received it, and to all those who shall hereafter do so. The gifts of Christ are like Himself, "the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever." But it is not meant that all who receive the faith profit equally thereby. The faith is the opened door, the progress made in Christian life differs according to the use which is in each case made of the good gift of God.

faith] This is not to be understood of a concrete form or profession of belief, in which sense πίστις came to be used in later times, but of that "substance of things hoped for and evidence of things not seen" (Heb. xi. 1) which alone can be spoken of as the gift of God's righteousness. The word rendered obtained (λαχούσι), literally, received by lot, indicates that this faith, which forms the foundation of the Christian's life, is a gift of God's grace, and not of merit, or by transmission. It should be noticed also that the construction of λαχέτω here with an accusative finds its only parallel in the New Testament in a speech of St Peter (Acts i. 17).

with us] Is this Epistle addressed to the same readers as the first? The writer speaks (iii. 1) as if this were so, calling it a "second Epistle;" also in v. 16 of this chapter it seems to be implied that there had been some previous teaching given. In that case the reference in us may be only to himself and the rest of the Twelve who had been first called into Christ's Church from Judaism. He would say to his readers "We received the faith from the lips of Jesus, but though He has gone into heaven, the faith is the same as ever, and of the same saving virtue." But as there is no statement made about the readers for whom it was intended, we need not narrow the limits, for the dangers against which they are warned would beset all the Church alike; it seems better therefore to take the Epistle as designed for a wide circle, as the later tradition which named it "catholic" implies. Then the expression with us would include the Apostle and all those members of the Christian Church among whom he was labouring when the Epistle was written. If, for illustration, we suppose him writing at Rome to the Christians whom he knew in Proconsular Asia, the words would intimate that the faith was one and the same and of a like power in all the churches, salvation offered to mankind through Christ on whom they have believed.

through the righteousness] Better, "in the righteousness." That is, in the righteous dealing of God with men. The Judge of all the earth will do right, and under the Christian dispensation admits all believers to equal privileges through faith. The causes which prevent them from equally profiting thereby are not of God. He is no respecter of persons.

of God and our Saviour Jesus Christ] In the best MSS. the pronoun is with God. The translation should be, of our God and the Saviour Jesus Christ. It is indeed possible to explain both God and Saviour here as titles given to Jesus Christ, and so to render "our God and Saviour Jesus Christ." But as the Father and the Son are spoken of in contradistinction in the next verse, it is better to preserve the distinction here also. It should moreover be observed that we nowhere else find "God and Saviour" used of Christ. "Lord and Saviour" occurs in this Epistle (i. 11, iii. 18) and elsewhere in the New Testament very frequently.

2. Grace and peace be multiplied unto you] The order of the Greek is, "Grace unto you and peace be multiplied," and is the exact phrase employed in 1 Pet. i. 2. Here however it is further explained how the grace and peace can be multiplied.

through the knowledge] Better, in the knowledge. The noun is one much used by St Paul in the Epistle to the Colossians (i. 9, 10, ii. 2, iii. 10) and in the Epistles to Timothy (1 Tim. ii. 4; 2 Tim. ii. 25, iii. 7) and Titus (i. 1) as well as in other places. It signifies the knowledge of him that hath called us ¹ to glory and virtue :

1 Or, by.

4 Whereby are given unto us ex-

a steady growth in knowledge, an advance step by step, not knowledge matured but ever maturing. We can understand how such a word would come to be chosen by the Apostles to describe Christian knowledge, when the simpler word for knowledge (γνῶσις) had become identified with the heretical teaching of the early Gnostics, and so while γνῶσις is found in St Peter's first Epistle, ἐπιγνῶσις is not, because the need for such a term had not become apparent when the first Epistle was written. Such knowledge as the Gnostics professed to have was a knowledge "that puffeth up," because it claimed to have reached an eminence whence no advance was needed. ἐπιγνῶσις is a protest against such teaching; it implies a constant growth both as possible and indispensable. In this constant increase of the knowledge of God through Christ (no man cometh unto the Father but by Him) shall be found the abundance of peace for which St Peter prays. The steps of this growth in grace, and consequent peace, are set forth afterwards in vv. 5-8.

Jesus our Lord] This is an unusual expression found only here and in Rom. iv. 24. An imitator would have written some more common form, and would have introduced Christ before or after Jesus. There is probably some emphasis intended by the position of the pronoun ἡμῶν with which the verse concludes. Jesus is our Lord (the Lord of us), for His divine power hath granted unto us His precious promises, and He has called us by His own glory and virtue, and so He may claim us for His liegemen and faithful servants.

3. According as his divine power, &c.] Better, Seeing that His divine power, &c. There is no comparison implied in the sentence. The prayer which the writer has uttered in the previous verse needs only earnest zeal on man's part to bring about its fulfilment, since God has given on His side all things that tend to this increase of grace and peace. The construction is the same as in 2 Cor. v. 20, "Now then we are ambassadors for Christ, seeing that (or since) God doth beseech you by us," &c.

his divine power] Here His seems most fitly referred to Jesus. Had the Father been intended there would have been no need for the adjective divine. The divine power of Jesus, and that He is able to grant those things which pertain unto life, had been evidenced by His resurrection, and through that resurrection Christians are begotten again unto a lively hope (1 Pet. i. 3). This divine power of the Son of Man would call for marked emphasis

hath given] The verb so rendered in A. V. is not the ordinary verb translated give, and for that reason a better English rendering here would be hath granted. The word in the original deserves notice, because in the New Testament it is only found here and in Mark xv. 45 of Pilate granting the body of Jesus to Joseph of Arimathæa. The close similarity between the language of the second Gospel and of these Epistles of St Peter has been noticed elsewhere. (See Introduction, p. 227.)

all things that pertain unto life and godliness] Under life is embraced all that is needful for the attainment of eternal life, in possession as well as in reversion, both the soul's support in this life, and the hope for the world to come; godliness refers to those means whereby the blessing of such life is to be cherished, and that growth in divine knowledge attained through which eternal life will become ours. Both are Christ's free gifts for men to treasure and to use. "Do the works and ye shall (ever more and more) know of the doctrine." "And this is life eternal, to know God and Jesus Christ whom He hath sent." And all things that pertain to both these gifts come to us through the divine power of Jesus.

The word rendered godliness occurs only in this Epistle (i. 3, 6, 7, iii. 11) and in St Paul's Pastoral Epistles, and in a speech of St Peter (Acts iii. 12), "by our own power or godliness" (A. V. holiness).

through the knowledge of him] As in the previous verse it is the constant progress of such knowledge which is intended.

that hath called us to glory and virtue] There is no original text which is capable of this translation. Some authorities read through glory and virtue (διὰ δόξης καὶ ἀρεῆς), but the text which is best supported is by His own glory and virtue (ἰδίᾳ δόξῃ καὶ ἀρεῇ). That the word virtue (or excellency) should be applied to a divine Being need not startle us. It is in exact accordance with the usage in St Peter's first Epistle (ii. 9), "That ye may shew forth the virtues (or excellencies) of Him who called you out of darkness into His marvellous light." Glory is the essential subjective conception of the Godhead; virtue, the manifestation of God's working in and for believers. St Paul's teaching (Eph. i. 17, &c.) is of like character. The calling of Christians and their enlightenment is a revelation of the glory of God in Christ, "God... the Father of glory, may give unto you the spirit of wisdom... The eyes of your underceeding great and precious promises :

that by these ye might be partakers of the divine nature, having escaped the corruption that is in the world through lust.

5 And beside this, giving all dilistanding being enlightened, that ye may know what is the hope of His calling and what the riches of the glory of His inheritance in the saints."

4. Whereby are given unto us] The verb is the same, and in the same tense, as in the preceding verse. It is therefore better to render, Whereby he hath granted unto us. Whereby refers to all those things that are requisite for life and godliness spoken of in v. 3. Through these first-imparted aids we are enabled to become sharers in still larger gifts of grace. Christ is first the Way, and then the Truth and the Life. He first bestows those gifts which lead to Life, and then gives Life eternal to those who have rightly accepted His leading thereunto.

exceeding great and precious promises] The best supported text here puts precious in the first place; and the rendering of the A.V. omits any indication of the article (taking the place of the possessive pronoun) which is in the Greek. Read therefore, His precious and exceeding great promises. The preciousness consists in their being not promises merely, but actual present aids to our growth in holiness. So Christ's sacraments are not pledges for the future only, but strength for the present. The word precious (rimios) is used by St Peter in the first Epistle (i. 7, 19) of the trial of the Christian's faith, and of the blood of Christ, applications of the word which link together the diction of the two Epistles.

that by these] i.e. the aids granted unto you towards life and holiness.

ye might be partakers] The tense of the verb shews that the statement is undefined in time and is meant for believers in every age. So read, that ye may become partakers, &c. The idea of growth, which pervades all the language of this clause, is best given by the literal rendering of the verb. The true Christian is ever going onward, becoming "renewed through the Spirit in the image of his mind," and yet constantly looking forward to the day when he shall attain to "the stature of the fulness of Christ."

of the divine nature] i.e. of the holiness which belongs to God. All God's discipline, even His chastisements, are designed for this end, that we may become "partakers of His holiness" (Heb. xii. 10). God's word at first was "Let us make man in our image, after our likeness." His will is still to restore to its pristine holiness that which was at first very good in His sight. We shall be like Christ when we see Him as He is, and nearer to this restoration God is ever leading those whom in His love He has already called "sons of God" through Christ.

having escaped the corruption that is in the world through lust] The literal rendering of the original is, "having escaped from the corruption that is in the world in lust;" for the preposition is in each case the same. The latter makes clear the force of the former. Corruption is in the world, is making its ravages daily, and so has taken an objective shape, and we can see its fatal action; but its fountain is in the lust that dwells within men's hearts (cf. Mark vii. 21). Through in the A.V. should therefore be understood as signifying "consisting in."

The word for escape is peculiar to this Epistle, and is found again ii. 18, 20. It seems meant to convey St Peter's idea of the nature of the Christian's deliverance. He must flee from the corruption which is in the world, as Lot fled from Sodom, fleeing for his life and casting no look behind him, lest he should become again entangled. Such a retreat is the truest valour, "for we wrestle not against flesh and blood."

The Greek word rendered corruption, also has the sense of destruction, and is used with that meaning in ii. 12 of "the brute beasts made to be taken and destroyed." For the full appreciation of the Apostle's meaning both senses should be kept in mind. The destruction is the sure consequence of the corruption, and he who would escape the one must flee from the other. But the language of the text shews that the source of the corruption is not in the natural creation, but in the heart of man. The first sin was a lust to become as gods, and the climax of the guilt of the world before the flood is described by saying, "All flesh had corrupted his way upon the earth," and "Every imagination of the thoughts of man's heart was only evil continually."

5. And beside this, &c.] This rendering cannot be maintained, and interferes with the Apostle's train of argument. It is because God has granted unto Christians His precious and exceeding great promises that they are to be careful, for their part, to give proof that they value these gifts. God has begun the good work, they are to evince a desire that it may be perfected. So render Yea, and for this very reason, &c.

giving all diligence] This is the portion which man is to contribute toward his growth in Christian graces. And the verb, which would be more precisely rendered contributing, intimates that it is only a little which men can do along with the mighty work gence, add to your faith virtue; and to virtue knowledge;

6 And to knowledge temperance; and to temperance patience; and to patience godliness;

7 And to godliness brotherly kind-which is being wrought in and for them. Its literal meaning is "to bring in by the side of," and it is one of the numerous unique words which are found in these two Epistles of St Peter. The spiritual life is begun by faith which is the gift of God. True, it is so much an essential to the Christian's vitality that the Apostle here calls it your faith, but it is that which, as the commencement of all things that are requisite to life and godliness, God must first bestow. Christian graces, growing up in the life of faith, increase by diligent culture expended on them. This diligence it is which man is to bring in as his offering, his share in working out his own salvation, while God is working in him according to His good pleasure.

add to your faith virtue] Literally, provide in your faith virtue. In this sentence the verb (a compound) is one which conveys an entirely Greek notion. It originally meant "to furnish the expenses of a chorus when a new play was to be brought upon the stage." But this word was one not unknown to the writer of the first Epistle, for in 1 Pet. iv. 11 we find the simple verb in the sentence, "if any man minister, let him do it as of the ability which God supplieth." From the primary sense the word came to have the general notion of supplying or providing in any matters. The word is also found in St Paul's Epistles (2 Cor. ix. 10; Gal. iii. 5; Col. ii. 19), and below in v. 11 of this chapter, and in all these places it is rendered minister.

God's gift of faith is to be evidenced by its fruits, and the Apostle begins the enumeration of these with a word in common use among heathen writers for the summit of moral excellence. Beza writes on this word ἀρετή, "Verbum nimis humile si cum donis Spiritus Sancti comparetur." Where unaided morality ends, there God's grace begins. But St Peter by his use of the word, and by his application of it (1 Pet. ii. 9; 2 Pet. i. 3) to God, has shewn that he employs it in a special sense. With him it seems to mean that earnest and living spirit which prompts to action. Glory (δόξα) and virtue (ἀρετή) are connected in 2 Pet. i. 3 exactly as glory (δόξα) and might (κράτος) are in 1 Pet. iv. 11, so that, when used of God, ἀρετή is the energy and power exerted on those whom He calls, that mighty influence by which they are drawn to Him. In the verse before us it indicates a like energy to be exhibited in the life of Christians. For such men will not rest content without deeds which shall bear evidence of the reality of their faith.

But as earnestness misdirected may do harm instead of good, there is to be joined unto it knowledge. Thus the force of the verse becomes: In your faith (i.e. in its exercise) supply virtue, and in your virtue knowledge. Thus good desires may be brought to good effect. Here the word for knowledge is the simple γνῶσις, for what is here intended is but one stage of the Christian's advance, while ἐπιγνῶσις is the gradual progress which goes on through the whole life.

6. And to knowledge temperance] Here also, as the idea is the same, it is best to render: And in your knowledge temperance. Temperance here implies that whole self-control of the life, its feelings, tempers, passions and longings, which enables a man to gain rule over himself. "He that striveth for the mastery is temperate in all things" (1 Cor. ix. 25). The sense of the English word has been sorely curtailed in modern times, and there is a danger that the narrowed sense may be substituted here for that greater and nobler one of which the poet speaks, and to temperance patience] Read, and in your temperance patience. And this patience is to be no mere callous Stoical indifference, but in it (as is shewn in the next clause, which should be rendered, and in your patience godliness), and constituting the main part of it, is to be that true fear of God, which makes men ready to endure hardships and wrongs for His sake and in His service. It will include also steady perseverance, like the constant but imperceptible growth of a fruit-bearing tree, of which the same word is used in Luke viii. 15.

"Unless above himself he can

Godliness is a grace which shews itself in continual exercise, and is profitable to all things both in this life and that which is to come. The word is much used by St Paul in the Pastoral Epistles (as are so many of the words of these Epistles of St Peter), and it is coupled with honesty, faith, love, and patience in those Epistles also. It marks the motive from which our actions should flow, and is equivalent to that fear of God in which St Peter, in the first Epistle, exhorts Christians to pass the time of their sojourning here (1 Pet. i. 17); it is that fear of God which shall make men good servants and masters (1 Pet. ii. 18), and win husbands, by its manifestation in the lives of their wives, to a love of the same Master. No better argument for the accord in all things between St Paul and St Peter can be found than this oneness of tone which pervades what they have left as their legacies to the churches.

7. And to godliness brotherly kindness; and ness; and to brotherly kindness charity.

8 For if these things be in you, and abound, they make you that ye to brotherly kindness charity] Here also we should read, And in your godliness brotherly kindness, and in your brotherly kindness love. When our hearts are filled with that fear of God which is also love towards Him, we shall not rest there. As God is the Father of the whole race, and we all are brethren, our affections will extend themselves to all men. Yet it is both natural and scriptural that our Christian fellow-believers should hold the first place in our hearts. So St Peter mentions foremost brotherly love, that is love towards our brethren in Christ, just as St Paul (Gal. vi. 10) writes, "Let us do good unto all men, especially unto them which are of the household of faith." As members of one household sympathize with and help most those with whom they have most in common, so will it be in Christian societies. But the Lord of Christians has taught us that His servants should do more than others. So both of these Apostles, in the spirit of their Master, follow up the precept that enforces brotherly love, with that of the grander love which St Paul has so highly extolled (1 Cor. xiii.), and which he expressly (1 Thess. iii. 12) prays for as the completion of the Christian character. "The Lord make you to abound in love one toward another and toward all men." Just of the same tone is St Peter's language here. "In your brotherly kindness (supply) love." With the much restricted sense in which charity is often used in the present day there is great loss in rendering ἀγάπη charity, for we thereby put out of sight the Godlike character of this virtue, that it is the love which the Father hath for men (John xiv. 23), that this love is of God, and maketh its possessor "born of God" (1 John iv. 7), yea that "it is an attribute to God Himself," for "God is love" (1 John iv. 8). And as this virtue is so eminent, so it is most difficult to attain unto, and thus fitly forms the climax of this scale of graces. It is no trial to love those who love us, but "to bear all things, believe all things, hope all things, endure all things," is the summit of Christian advancement. "The greatest of these is love." Its fitness to conclude the list of steps in Christian progress is also seen from the language of St Paul (Col. iii. 14), "And over all these things put on love which is the bond of perfectness." Just as here it is set forth as being the highest step of the ladder, so there the Apostle pictures it as the uppermost covering in the Christian dress, that which shall be apparent to all men. "By this shall all men know that ye are my disciples, if ye have love (ἀγάπη) one to another" (John xiii. 35).

The preposition ἐν which St Peter has here employed throughout his enumeration of Christian graces, conveys somewhat the same notion. Each virtue is to be included within the one mentioned before it, and though the order thus appears to be reversed, and love (ἀγάπη) is the last mentioned, and so included within all the rest, it is only so because the character, as St Peter here depicts it, is described as it should appear unto God, while St Paul is describing it as men should see it. "Man looketh on the outward appearance, but God on the heart."

The list of graces enumerated in these three verses comprises first those which form the Christian character viewed in itself, such are virtue, knowledge, temperance, patience; then follow those which mark the follower of Christ (1) as a servant of God, and (2) as a member of the brotherhood of the Church of Christ, and (3) as belonging to the larger brotherhood of all mankind.

8. For if these things be in you, and abound] Rather, For if these things be yours, and abound unto you. Literally, "for these things being yours.....make you," &c. The pronoun though occurring only once in the original, and in close connection with the former of the two verbs, yet belongs to the latter also. And the first verb is one that is constantly used of "possession." Therefore the sense is not, "If these things be in you," as A.V. The difference is that between ownership and tenancy. There is to be no uncertainty in the holding unto these graces, they are to be part of the man himself. There must be no wavering exhibition of them. They are to be firmly fixed, like a plant deeply rooted, and whose growth is constant. This is the sense of the latter verb abound, which perhaps would be better rendered multiply. They are not merely to be abundant and continue so, but are to become daily more and more, growing with the Christian's growth and strengthening with his strength.

they make you that ye shall neither be barren nor unfruitful] Better, they make you not idle nor unfruitful. The italics of the A.V. render the sentence cumbrous without adding to its force, while barren is not the sense of the first adjective. It is used of "idle words" (Matt. xii. 36) and of labourers "standing idle" (Matt. xx. 3, 6), and so it should be rendered here, and thus the tautology of "barren and unfruitful" is escaped. The Apostle's words intimate that such a growth in grace as he has just described cannot be hid, it will work, and make its presence felt. And in the form of his sentence he has expressed the earnestness of such action. He says it will shall neither be barren nor unfruitful in the knowledge of our Lord Jesus Christ.

9 But he that lacketh these things is blind, and cannot see afar off, and hath forgotten that he was purged from his old sins.

10 Wherefore the rather, brethren, make you "not idle" and "not unfruitful," which was a Greek way of expressing "very active" and "very fruitful" in the most emphatic form.

in the knowledge of our Lord Jesus Christ] A better rendering of the preposition would be towards or unto the knowledge, &c. It marks the goal unto which all the Christian's works and their fruits will be tending. Here we have the ever-awaxing knowledge (ἐπιγνώσις) again. The knowledge of the Saviour is never to stand still, and the gifts of the Spirit are all of them helps towards its increase. "He will guide you into all truth;" "He will teach you all things" was said not alone for the chosen twelve. And although this complete knowledge can never be ours in this world, the increase of grace within us makes increase of our spiritual discernment, and we are constantly finding some portion of the darkened glass made clearer, some approach toward seeing Christ as He is.

9. But he that lacketh these things is blind, and cannot see afar off] A literal rendering is, For he to whom these things are not present is blind, seeing only what is near, and this brings out the Apostle's reasoning far better. He wishes to explain the impossibility of spiritual progress, increase in the knowledge of Christ, without the acquisition of the graces which he has before enumerated, and so he begins with a particle for which shall introduce his reasoning. After this he says, "he to whom these things are not present." He has gone back in thought to the initial stage of the course. He speaks not now of the gifts as being the Christian's own, but merely as being present to him. There are many gradations in religious life. Some men cannot be said to have the graces of which St Peter has been speaking. They have made but small progress, only a single step on the upward road. But even the least advanced are in a better state than he to whom these things are not present, to whom no light shines to guide his footsteps on the way of faith. Such a one is blind, continues the Apostle, and then, with another of his unique words, he defines the nature of the defect which he has called "blindness." Such a man "sees only what is near." The word (μυωπάζων), and technically myops, is used of one who has to close his eyes that he may see at all, who is weak-sighted, and to whom the light is painful, whose vision is consequently very limited. By this figurative word St Peter seems to paint for us the condition of such men as having once entered on the Christian life (for soon we read of the man as one who had been cleansed from his old sins) have sought for no help, striven for no advancement, and to whom therefore progress and all which prompts thereto is uncongenial. He first of all calls such a one blind, but correcting this first expression, he gives a definition of it which shews us a state worse than blindness. "If ye were blind, ye should have no sin," says our Lord (John ix. 41), but here is one worse than blind, who having known some light has preferred to fall back into darkness.

and hath forgotten that he was purged from his old sins] More closely, having forgotten the cleansing from his old sins. But the expression (λήθην λαβών) is no ordinary phrase for forgetting. The noun is found nowhere else in the New Testament. Having incurred or accepted forgetfulness would be a literal rendering. The words mark that the condition into which such a man has come is one which he has voluntarily accepted; he has made no effort, given no diligence to contribute anything towards improving the first gifts pertaining unto life and godliness. To him there may be imputed a wilful closing of the eyes enough to justify the Apostle's first expression, "He is blind." To him the Gospel message had at first come, as it came to St Paul (Acts xxii. 16), "Arise and be baptized and wash away thy sins:" and thus far has he gone forward, but no step beyond; and as in the parable, where from the servant who has but hid his talent in a napkin, there is taken away that which was bestowed on him at the beginning, so here if the baptismal washing has been followed by no growth in holiness, the memory of that first blessing is taken away, and the guidance which would have strengthened each endeavour to advance is withdrawn, and the man no longer sees where to go. His spiritual sight becomes weakened, the light of Christ's example is painful, because he has so long neglected to use it; he therefore shuns it, and beholds only the things close around him; in this life and its concerns he becomes wholly entangled.

10. Wherefore the rather, brethren, give diligence] Though separated from the verb by the intervening vocative, the adverb rather (μᾶλλον) belongs closely to give diligence (σπουδάσατε), and the force of the words is better given by Wherefore, brethren, give the more diligence. Wherefore, i.e. because by the possession and constant increase of these graces you become fruitful unto the knowledge of Christ, be ye the more diligent. There are give diligence to make your calling and election sure: for if ye do these things, ye shall never fall:

11 For so an entrance shall be ministered unto you abundantly into the everlasting kingdom of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ.

12 Wherefore I will not be ne-two reasons assigned why this diligence should be given, first, because of the bountiful supply of grace granted from God, and, secondly, because the cultivation of these gifts results in an ever-increasing knowledge of the Lord Jesus. It is after the mention of this latter reason, that the Apostle dwells upon such a result as a motive for still greater zeal.

brethren] A favourite form of address with St James, only used in this passage by St Peter, his usual expression being beloved, which occurs in all the Epistles, but most frequently in St John, St Jude and St Peter. The employment of an unusual word marks the earnestness of the Apostle's exhortation.

to make your calling and election sure] The employment of this adjective indicates that both the calling and the election have reference to conditions which neglect may render insecure. Both words should therefore be taken of the entering into communion with God in this world. St Peter has already addressed the converts to whom he writes (1 Pet. ii. 9), "Ye are an elect race," but that does not prevent him from urging on them to abstain from "lusts which war against the soul," and which will render their walk unworthy of the vocation wherewith they had been called. Thus election (ἐκλογή) is found in St Paul's letter to the Thessalonians (1 Thess. i. 4), about whom yet the Apostle had fears lest the tempter should have tempted them, and his own labour be in vain. The call to which St Peter refers had come through the preaching of the Gospel, the election through the admission of the converts into Christ's Church. They were among those that were "being saved" (Acts ii. 47) and had been "added to the church," and so called out of the world.

for if ye do these things, ye shall never fall] The last verb would be better rendered stumble. And herein is no contradiction of what is said by St James (iii. 2), "In many things we all stumble." In that expression there is implied only such a degree of error, in the words and acts of daily life, as it may be possible to recover from. But the stumbling which shall render the calling and election of Christians insecure, is one from which there is no rising. It is a "stumbling that they should fall," such as that which St Paul (Rom. xi. 11) intimates would have made the restoration of the Jew impossible.

11. For so an entrance shall be ministered unto you abundantly, &c.] More closely, For thus shall be richly provided for you the entrance, &c. The Apostle takes up here the word which he had employed in v. 5, when he spake of what the Christian man should provide on his part. The beginning of the new life, the gift of faith, was from God. This is to be used as a groundwork on which the follower of Christ labours to build up virtue after virtue. And in the end there will be provided for him, also from God, the entrance into Christ's eternal kingdom. Both the beginning and the end of the work are of God. And so are most of the intervening stages also. For in the word entrance (εἰσόδος) is implied not only the final entrance into the kingdom of glory in heaven, but also the power and strength to approach nearer and nearer unto Christ in His kingdom of grace in this world. For a like use of the word cf. Heb. x. 19, where the entrance into the holiest is afterwards defined to be "drawing near" unto God "with a true heart in full assurance of faith."

into the everlasting kingdom, &c.] As αἰώνιος contains other ideas beside that of duration of time, it is better to use for it the word eternal.

12—21. And I will strive while I live to keep these things in your remembrance, and also that ye may not forget them after my death. For it is no fable by which we have been led in our teaching; but we were witnesses of the Transfiguration and heard the heavenly voice which proclaimed Jesus to be the Son of God. And more firm even than the assurance of this voice, heard only once, we have the word of prophecy, unto which we charge you to give heed, for it is the true source of enlightenment, it is a message sent from God through men who spake being moved by the Holy Ghost.

12. Wherefore I will not be negligent to put you always in remembrance of these things] According to the reading of the best MSS., the rendering would be, Wherefore I shall be ready (or sure) always, &c. This sense of the word here used (μελλήσω) is not unfrequent in classical Greek, especially in Sophocles. Thus ('Philoctetes,' 446) where an enquiry is made about Thersites, and Neoptolemus answers, "I never saw him, but I heard he was alive;" the reply is (ἔμελλε), "He was sure to be so." And we may compare the New Testament use of the same verb (Matt. xxiv. 6), "Ye shall hear of wars." It may be that the Apostle intended to say that the letter which he was now writing should be a voice after his death. This sense is countenanced by the word always, and it is not till the following verse that he speaks of glient to put you always in remembrance of these things, though ye know them, and be established in the present truth.

13 Yea, I think it meet, as long as I am in this tabernacle, to stir you up by putting you in remembrance ;

the admonitions to be given while he was alive. So that the connection would be (v. 12), "I will always keep you in remembrance" (vv. 13, 14), both in my lifetime, and (v. 15) after I am dead.

though ye know them, and be established in the present truth] The last clause would be clearer if we read, and are established in the truth which is with you. This means the truth which has been imparted to you by your teachers, and which ye now profess, "the Gospel which ye have received and wherein ye stand." The same word is rendered (Col. i. 6), "The Gospel which is come unto you." Those to whom the Apostle is writing had obtained a like precious faith with himself. The word rendered established, which with its derivatives is a favourite with the writer (cf. 1 Pet. v. 10 ; 2 Pet. iii. 16, 17), is a part of that same verb which our Lord used in his exhortation to the Apostle (Luke xxii. 32), "When thou art converted strengthen thy brethren."

In the words "though ye know them" we have an indication that the letter is written either to those whom the Apostle himself had instructed, or whom he knew to have been taught by St Paul (cp. iii. 12), or by Silvanus (1 Pet. v. 12), to whose brotherly faithfulness allusion is made in the first Epistle. (See note on that passage.)

13. Yea, I think it meet, &c.] Better, And I think it right. It is not the meetness or fitness of his admonition which the Apostle has in mind, but that it is the right and just thing for him to do, the only way in which he can discharge his duty.

as long as I am in this tabernacle] This figurative expression for the body is also used by St Paul (2 Cor. v. 1—4), and it is worth notice that St Peter here employs the same mixture of metaphors which occurs in St Paul's language there. First the tabernacle is viewed as a building, and then spoken of as a garment which must be put off, or rather replaced by another ; so St Peter speaks in the next verse of the putting off the tabernacle of the body.

to stir you up by putting you in remembrance] The literal and better rendering would be, "to excite or keep you awake in (or by) reminding you." The expression occurs again in iii. 1, where it is rendered, "to stir 14 Knowing that shortly I must put off this my tabernacle, even as ^{a John 21. 18} our Lord Jesus Christ hath shewed me.

up (your pure minds) by way of remembrance." The end of such reminding is that they may not be idle, and so unfruitful.

14. Knowing that shortly I must put off this my tabernacle] Better, Knowing that the putting off of my tabernacle cometh swiftly (or is soon to come). These words may refer to the advanced age of the Apostle, from which he was conscious that the fulfilment of Christ's prophecy concerning him (John xxi. 18, 19) could not be far distant. "When thou shalt be old, thou shalt stretch forth thy hands and another shall gird thee, and carry thee whither thou wouldest not." And the adjective ταχὺς (swift, speedy) may also relate to the violent and hastened death which was to close the Apostle's existence. The rendering, "is soon to come," seems to refer more clearly to Christ's words, while the other interpretation would contain something prophetic uttered by St Peter about himself, which would hardly accord with the tone of the whole passage, which speaks of a knowledge derived from what our Lord had shewed to him.

The word ἀποθεοῖς, putting off, is only found here and in 1 Pet. iii. 21.

even as our Lord Jesus Christ hath shewed me] Better simply, shewed me. The verb is an aorist. The allusion is not only to John xxi. 18, 19, quoted above, but to John xiii. 36, "Whither I go, thou canst not follow me now, but thou shalt follow me afterwards," which words find an echo in the words of Jesus (John xxi. 22), "If I will that he tarry till I come, what is that to thee? follow thou me." St Peter had now learnt the full force of Christ's sayings, and to what end the following of Jesus was to bring him.

15. Moreover I will endeavour that ye may be able after my decease to have these things always in remembrance] Better, Yea I will give diligence that at every time ye may be able after my decease to call these things to remembrance. The moreover of the A.V. seems to imply that the Apostle was promising some new care, but he had previously said, "I shall be ready always." It is better therefore to look upon the particles as only an emphatic resumption of something which had gone before. The adverb of time qualifies the first portion of the sentence, and the whole clause signifies that there shall be left behind, when St Peter is dead, some record to which at each occasion, when need arises, they may be able to appeal for a reminder of his lessons, which they would probably not have always in remembrance.

16 For we have not followed cunningly devised fables, when we made known unto you the power and coming of our Lord Jesus

A similar use of the verb to have (ἐχεν) in the sense of "to be able" is found Mark xiv. 8, "She hath done what she was able" (lit. what she had). And for traces of a gradual slipping into this meaning see Matt. xviii. 25, "because he had not to pay," and John viii. 6, "that they might have to accuse him."

"To call these things to remembrance." The phrase, which is only found in this place in the New Testament, is one used by classical writers in the sense of "making mention" (cf. Thuc. II. 54). But St Peter does not mean that his lessons shall be spoken of only, but when called to mind, they shall be acted upon.

The word ἐξοδος=decease (lit. departure) is that which is used by the Evangelist (Luke ix. 31) in the account of the Transfiguration, concerning Christ's decease, and there can be little doubt that the thoughts of the writer are led by the use of this unwonted expression for "decease" to the recollection of that scene of which in the succeeding verses he makes express mention. In that last recorded conversation of our Lord with St Peter (John xxi. 22) the Apostle had been bidden to follow his Master, and it was known that the words of Jesus, in that parting interview, had reference to the death whereby St Peter "should glorify God." St Peter would naturally give the same name to his own death as had there been given to Christ's. He would naturally turn in mind to the wondrous manifestation of which he had been one witness. But to suppose that an imitator or forger would do this is to assume in such writer a subtlety of thought and a power to transfer himself into the position of him whose character he assumed, which would be marvellous in an age of greater literary power than that in which our Epistle appeared.

In the first verb in the verse, "I will give diligence," the writer is looking back to the exhortation in verse 10, "Wherefore, brethren, give diligence." It is as though he would say, "I have urged you to diligence in your Christian course, and I will not be wanting, on my part, to supply you with means for your guidance and encouragement when I am taken away from you."

16. For we have not, &c.] As soon as the writer begins to speak of things with which not only himself but James and John also had to do, he passes at once from the singular into the plural number. He might have continued to use the singular, but the memory of the scene is with him, and in thought he is with his companions on the mountain, and thus they are included in his language.

followed] The verb in the original is a compound form, and thus may be presumed to have a somewhat fuller force. It is found only in this Epistle in the New Testament. In the next chapter we have it in ver. 2, "many shall follow their pernicious ways," and in ver. 15, "following the way of Balaam." Hence some have thought that the preposition ἐξ=from or out of has reference to the wrong character of the guidance which is followed. It seems better, however, not to press such a sense upon the word, but to take it in its usual meaning of "to follow where some one leads." Thus the Apostle is made to assert that he is not merely following the lead of another, speaking at second-hand, in what he says, but is himself the actual witness of and for the whole narrative.

cunningly devised fables] As the mind of the writer is fixed upon that manifestation of the glory of Christ which was revealed at the Transfiguration, it is to be supposed that by "fables" (μῦθοι) he alludes to the heathen stories of the appearance of the Gods among men, or to some of the Gnostic figments concerning emanations from the Divinity. That legends of this kind, as well as Jewish myths concerning the Messiah, were current, and had produced errors in the faith, we can see from the frequent warnings against them contained in the Pastoral Epistles (1 Tim. i. 4, iv. 7; 2 Tim. iv. 4; Tit. i. 14); where alone except in this verse the word (μῦθοι) is found in the New Testament. The same erroneous teaching is here meant as that which (ii. 3) is spoken of as "feigned words" (πλαστοὶ λόγοι), and the adjective there used may guide us to the signification of "cunningly devised" in the text. The stories had been moulded and fashioned by the skill and cunning of their authors, while in the narrative of the Transfiguration all that the writer tells us he had seen for himself.

made known unto you] As this Epistle is addressed to Christians far and wide, and the labours of the other Apostles are included in the expression, these words must not be referred to the first Epistle of St Peter, though the power and coming of Christ are there spoken of, as in all Christian Scriptures, but rather to the preaching of St Peter and his companions. Their account of what they had seen was published orally at first, and though by the time when this Epistle was written, there may have been a Gospel narra-

Christ, but were eyewitnesses of his majesty.

17 For he received from God the Father honour and glory, when there came such a voice to him from the excellent glory, This is my tive circulated among the churches, yet all that is here implied may be only the preaching of the first Christian teachers.

coming] Or, presence. To the presence of the Son of God among men they were the best witnesses who had seen His glory, and heard the voice which declared the divine nature of Jesus. Thus could they with firm assurance teach that He had come into the world. But this first coming was only a pledge of that second coming about which the disciples asked in the same phrase (Matt. xxiv. 3), "What shall be the sign of thy coming, and of the end of the world?"

eyewitnesses] The word is not the same which is so rendered Luke i. 2. In heathen writers the word rendered here eyewitnesses (ἐπόπτης) is very frequently used of those who have been admitted by initiation into the highest mysteries of their religious worship. And the word may have been designedly used here by the Apostle to signify the initiation of himself and his companions on the mount of the Transfiguration into mysteries which they were to make known when Christ was risen from the dead. This noun (here alone) and its kindred verb (ἐποπτεύω) are used by St Peter only (1 Pet. ii. 12, iii. 2) among New Testament writers.

majesty] i.e. as it was displayed when He appeared unto them in His glory. The word is one of rare occurrence in the New Testament, but it is worthy of notice that it is used (Luke ix. 43) in the narrative of the healing of the lunatic boy which took place at the foot of the mountain of Transfiguration, to describe the miracle which had just been wrought, "They were all amazed at the mighty power of God." Thus the wonder of the multitude at once owns the "majesty" of which the Apostles had just been made conscious by the heavenly glory and words from above.

The solemnity of the statement in ver. 16 is such that we cannot conceive that any forger could have made it. The two participial clauses, ἔξακολουθήσαντες, "having followed," and ἐπόπται γενηθέντες, "having been constituted eyewitnesses," are exactly parallel, the first giving an account of what the writer was not guided by, the other of that which did guide him in his teaching. More literally the construction would be expressed thus: "We did not make known, &c., from the mere following of fables, but we did so because we had been constituted eyewitnesses."

17. For he received] The construction in the original is interrupted. The sentence commences with a participle, "For having received," &c., and the strict grammatical sequence would require that the next verse should begin with a finite verb referring back to this participle, e.g. "He had us as listeners thereto when we were with him," &c. There is a similar interruption in the grammar of 2 Cor. v. 6—8.

from God the Father] because the heavenly voice declared "This is my beloved Son."

honour and glory] It seems most probable that these refer here, the first to the voice which declared Jesus to be the Son of God, the latter to the brightness of His body and robes at the time of the Transfiguration. Though glory (δόξα) is used by Christ Himself (Joh. viii. 54) as almost an equivalent to honour (τιμή). "If I glorify (A. V. honour) myself, my glory (honour) is nothing."

when there came such a voice] The literal rendering would be "when such a voice was brought," and the same expression is found in the next verse, "which came," i.e. which was brought. The verb is the same as in Acts ii. 2, where the sound which came from heaven is spoken of, and which, subsequently in verse 6 of that chapter, is called a voice (φωνή), though the rendering of the A. V. "Now when this was noised abroad" does not make this clear.

from the excellent glory] The preposition is that which after a passive verb would be strictly rendered by. The force is seen when the clause is translated literally, "such a voice was brought to him by the excellent glory." The excellent (or majestic) glory is an expression equivalent to the Hebrew Shechinah, the visible manifestation of God's presence above the mercy-seat, and so signifies God Himself. By God was the voice uttered which proclaimed Jesus as divine. The adjective (μεγαλοπρεπής) excellent (or majestic) is used by the LXX. (Deut. xxxiii. 26) as a title of God, ὁ μεγαλοπρεπὴς τοῦ στερεώματος. (The A. V. comes more closely to the Hebrew, and renders "in his excellency on the sky.") The same adjective is applied (2 Macc. viii. 15) to the name of God, and more especially illustrative of the story of the Transfiguration is its application (3 Macc. ii. 9) to the manifestation (ἐπιφάνεια) of God. This noun is applied often by St Paul (2 Thess. ii. 8; 1 Tim. vi. 14; 2 Tim. iv. 1, 8; Tit. ii. 13) to the appearance of Christ in the clouds when He shall come to judge the world; and also (2 Tim. i. 10) to His appearing in the world at His birth, and in like manner μεγαλοπρεπὴς δόξα here describes the magnificent splendour which shone round the whole scene of the Transfiguration, and told that God was there beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased.

18 And this voice which came from heaven we heard, when we were with him in the holy mount.

19 We have also a more sure as when on Sinai (Exod. xxiv. 17) "the sight of the glory of the Lord was like devouring fire on the top of the mount."

This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased] Though the A. V. makes the rendering exactly accord with that of Matt. xvii. 5 (and could hardly do otherwise) yet the Greek of the two passages presents a variation. (The Evangelist writes ἐν ᾧ εὐδόκησα, the text in St Peter has εἰς ὃν ἐγὼ εὐδόκησα; while in the parallel passages (Mark ix. 7; Luke ix. 35) the words ἐν ᾧ εὐδόκησα are omitted altogether.) So that the text before us corresponds literally with none of the records of the Evangelists. Had one been merely writing in the character of St Peter, and making use of the Apostle's name that he might gain more acceptance for what he was saying, it is hardly conceivable that he would not have followed to the letter some one of the Gospel narratives, whereas an actual witness of the scene who cared less for the exact words than for the fact to which he testified, would feel no scruple about the change of form in his language.

18. we heard] As if to mark specially the personal connection which the writer had had with the events which he relates, the personal pronoun is here emphatically inserted, and the first clause of the verse would be both more literally and more forcibly represented thus: "and this voice we ourselves heard come (or brought) out of heaven."

the holy mount] It has been objected that in this expression there is trace of a late date, since such an appellation would not be in early days given to the mount of Transfiguration. But of all places to which special sanctity would be ascribed by Christ's followers, surely that would be the first to be so marked where the most solemn testimony was given to the divinity of Jesus. To the Jewish Christian this would rank with Sinai, and no name would be more fitly applied to it than that which had so constantly been given to a place on which God first revealed Himself in His glory. The "holy mount of God" (Ezek. xxviii. 14) would now receive another application, and he would see little of the true continuity of God's revelation who did not connect readily the old and the new covenants, and give to the place where the glory of Christ was most eminently shewn forth, the same name which was applied so oft to Sinai.

19. We have, &c.] The pronoun may be taken as referring to the Apostles, of whom the writer may say that in consequence of the vision at the Transfiguration the sense of prophecy is to them more clear, and they have a more sure grasp of its meaning. But as the closing words of the verse are an exhortation to his readers to give heed to the word of prophecy, it is better to make the pronoun "we" include both the Apostle and those for whom he is writing. "We are all of us more sure of the meaning of the prophetic writings, because of the revelation which we received and have imparted unto you." Thus would the new light imparted at the Transfiguration be viewed as illuminating the hitherto dark places of the Old Testament prediction, and this sense would be best brought out by rendering "And we have the word of prophecy made more sure."

But the meaning of the text may well be, "We have, as a still more sure ground of confidence than our vision at the Transfiguration, the word of prophecy, which has spoken so fully of the Messiah, and received so complete a fulfilment in the life of Jesus." This would imply that though St Peter laid great stress on the revelation which had been vouchsafed to him and his companions, who were to go forth as the heralds of Christ, yet that the broader view given of the Messiah's office and the life which He should lead on earth is, at any rate for other men, a more sure basis of faith than can be the evidence derived from the narrative of one single vision. With this the sequel of the verse best accords. The Christians are exhorted to take heed to this prophetic word, to use it as a lamp which will guide them in their way to a full knowledge of God as He has revealed Himself, a more sure word of prophecy. The phrase is definite and the adjective belongs to the predicate. Render either (1) we have the word of prophecy made more sure (i.e. by what we have seen and heard when we were with Jesus at His Transfiguration). Or (2) we have the word of prophecy yet more sure (i.e. on which men may rather rest their trust than on our narrative of what we have seen).

This latter rendering is here to be preferred. And to appreciate this we must put ourselves somewhat in the place of those for whom St Peter wrote. The New Testament as we have it was to them non-existent. Therefore we can readily understand how the long line of prophetic scriptures fulfilled in so many ways in the life of Jesus would be a mightier form of evidence than the narrative of one single event in St Peter's life, however mighty the influence of that event might be on the mind of him to whom it occurred. And this is one of those passages which indicate that here we have no work of an inventor. Had such a one been writing he would have been sure to give most prominence to what had been made word of prophecy; whereunto ye do well that ye take heed, as unto a light that shineth in a dark place, until the day dawn, and the day star arise in your hearts:

20 Knowing this first, that no prophecy of the scripture is of any private interpretation.

21 For the prophecy came not ⁱⁿ ^{Or, at any time} old time by the will of man: but known to St Peter directly. The true St Peter acts differently.

ὁ προφητικὸς λόγος is used by Clemens Romanus ('2 Ep. ad Corinth.' 11) of words which are not contained in the Old Testament, and which bear some resemblance to passages in the New Testament (James i. 8, &c.), but we cannot refer the expression here to anything but the writers of the Old Testament, the false prophets under which dispensation are presently referred to in ii. 1.

as unto a light] Better, as unto a lamp. The idea conveyed by the words is of something which can be employed to give light wherever light may be needed. It is not merely a beam of light which shines in where all else is gloomy, but such a means of lighting as can be brought to bear now on one spot, now on another.

that shineth in a dark (or squalid) place. The lamp of prophecy was the source of light to God's servants as they moved through this life, which is a squalid place until it receives the full illumination which a right faith in Jesus brings to the heart. It is clear from the Apostle's exhortation, urging on his hearers to take heed to the word of prophecy, that it is to this life that his words refer, and he is looking forward to an advance in spiritual knowledge for those to whom he speaks. They are Christians, but still they have many things to learn before God's whole dispensation becomes clear, and the words of the prophets will be their best guide towards their complete enlightenment.

until the day dawn] The verb rendered "dawn" is only found here in the New Testament. It differs from the word used by the Evangelists (Matt. xxviii. 1; Luke xxiii. 54), and implies a thorough illumination, and bears out the explanation given above, that in the Apostle's thought there is a course of illumination which must gradually be shed over the believers, and in the end they will attain to that brightness which may be compared to entire daylight. Of course the perfect day will not be reached till this life is ended, and there cannot but be in language like that of the text some looking forward also to that time when we shall know even as also we are known, but the primary reference of the words is to that degree of Christian light and knowledge which may be reached in this life.

and the day star arise in your hearts] "day star" (φωσφόρος) is another unique word, and the picture set before us by this "light-bringer" is of that light which grows within men's hearts as the reward of constant faith, and study of God's revelation, which makes them wise unto things divine, and also gives them understanding concerning a life to come. The world will still remain the "squalid place," but the light which is kindled within the heart will preserve the steps from stumbling, and cheer the dreariness and gloom of the journey.

20. Knowing this first] The sense required is better given by the English verb understanding. The Apostle is laying down a rule for the right use of the prophetic word, and without a due comprehension thereof, there may be error in the use. This they are first to understand thoroughly before they begin to interpret prophecy.

that no prophecy of the scripture] The translation would be made more exact by the omission of "the."

is of any private interpretation] The word rendered "interpretation" is only found here in the New Testament, but the verb from which it is derived is used in St Mark (iv. 34), "He expounded all things to His disciples," and that sense is no doubt the correct one. The force of the whole verse would be better seen if the verb rendered "is" were more fully translated; here it has its proper sense of "becomes," "arises," "originates." Thus we are guided to apply the words to prophecy as it was uttered by those who first gave it forth. It did not arise from the private interpretation of the prophets. The words of the prophets of old were no mere human exposition, no endeavour on man's part to point to a solution of the difficulties which beset men's minds in this life. The prophets were moved by a Spirit beyond themselves, and spake things deeper than they themselves understood. With this may be compared what St Peter (i. 10) says about the prophets enquiring what the Spirit of Christ, by which they were moved to speak, was shewing unto them.

The force of ἰδιος "private" (or special) in other passages of St Peter's Epistles (1 Pet. iii. 1, 5; 2 Pet. ii. 16, 22, iii. 3, 16, 17), where it is generally rendered "own," may suggest that the writer would also have his readers understand, that prophetic Scripture does not become its own interpreter, does not bring its own interpretation with it. It needs for its full comprehension the coming of the day-star. The Spirit of God in men's hearts will continue to illumine words that aforetime seemed dark.

21. For the prophecy came not in old time holy men of God spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost.

CHAPTER II.

1 He foretelleth them of false teachers, shewing the impiety and punishment both of them and their followers: 7 from which the godly shall be delivered, as Lot was out of Sodom:

10 and more fully describeth the manners of those profane and blasphemous seducers, whereby they may be the better known, and avoided.

BUT there were false prophets also among the people, even as there shall be false teachers among you, who privily shall bring in dam-by the will of man] There are several points in the rendering of this sentence which are capable of greater exactness. Instead of "in old time," read rather, "at any time," as in the margin. Next for "came," read "was brought." It is the same verb which is rendered "moved" in the next clause of this verse, and of the voice from heaven mentioned in verse 18, and which is used of the "rushing" wind, indicative of the Holy Spirit's presence in Acts (ii. 2). The article would also be better omitted before "prophecy," and so the clause would read "for no prophecy ever was brought (or imparted) at the will of man." The prophets were only God's instruments, the carriers of His message, a sense well expressed by the frequent phrase in the Old Testament, "by the hand of." (Cf. Isai. xx. 2 (marg.), Num. xv. 23, &c.)

but holy men of God spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost] Here is a variation in the Greek texts. The most authoritative reading would be rendered, "but men spake from God, being moved by the Holy Ghost." It is not meant that the very words were given to the prophets, but that God's Spirit within them was the source and commencement of all their utterances. What to say was given to them, the garb in which it was to be clothed was marked by the individuality of the men.

The verb spake (ελάλησαν) is not unfrequently used in the New Testament writings of words spoken by God or by His prophets. (Cf. Luke i. 45, 55, 70, xxiv. 25; Acts iii. 21, 24; James v. 10.)

CHAP. II. 1—22. The whole chapter forms but one paragraph, of which the connection may be indicated thus. As of old there were false prophets, so shall there be false teachers now. These shall lead astray many, but in the end shall be destroyed. They shall be punished as surely and as terribly as the angels that sinned, or as the world before the flood, or as Sodom and Gomorrah, but, like Noah and Lot, they that are godly shall be saved, for the Lord knoweth how to deliver. The most patent marks of those who shall become false teachers are that they walk after the flesh and are self-willed, despising dominion; they live merely a life of sense, and count it pleasure to revel in the daytime, and being licentious themselves beguile others by their evil ways. Yet they promise boldly that they will give freedom to those who walk with them, whereas they are themselves very slaves of corruption. They have known something of the way of righteousness and had escaped in a measure from the defilements of the world, but now are entangled again therein. So their last state is worse than their first, and they fulfil the proverb, "The sow that is washed has turned again to the mire."

1. But there were (ἄρσεν) false prophets] The language of the Pentateuch (Deut. xiii. 1—5) speaks of such misguiding teachers and proclaims no mercy toward them. The text speaks of the gradual rise and spread of lessons that should lead men astray from the purity of the faith. The writer is standing at the commencement of such an irruption of error, and marks the signs of the times and gives his warning.

also] i.e. as well as the "sure word of prophecy" spoken of in i. 19. In the visible Church, Jewish as well as Christian, the evil is ever mingled with the good.

among the people] i.e. of Israel. The word people (λαὸς) is thus used of the Jews as distinguished from the rest of the world in Rom. xv. 11, and in Jude 5 they are spoken of as a people (λαὸς) whom the Lord had saved out of Egypt. As the whole history of Israel is a type of what should come on Christ's church in later days, so the evils were pictured there as well as the blessings and mercies. That St Peter felt this to be so, cf. 1 Pet. ii. 4—10.

false teachers] Now that He was come of whom all the prophets had spoken, the gift of prophecy was withdrawn and Christ's ministers were to be teachers after another manner, yet their lessons should be travestied for the delusion of men as had been those of the prophets before them. St Paul (Acts xx. 30) had foretold such false teachers rising out of the midst of the Church, and doing harm which none but they were able to do, drawing away disciples after themselves, and Christ Himself (Matt. xxiv. 11) had spoken of these days. The writer of this Epistle was one stage nearer to the appearances of such deceivers, and could see what form their teachings would take, and what their lives would be like.

privily shall bring in] This in the original is one verb, which in addition to the notion of introducing something alongside of something else contains also the idea of secrecy.

nable heresies, even denying the Lord that bought them, and bring upon themselves swift destruction.

2 And many shall follow their ¹per-¹Or, lascivious ways; by reason of whom the ways, as some copies read way of truth shall be evil spoken of.

It is found here only in the New Testament, though the adjective derived from it is employed by St Paul (Gal. ii. 4) to describe the false brethren privily brought in to the Christian community. In Jude 4, we have a different verb, though compounded with the same prepositions, to describe the men who in his day have already accomplished their evil work and are crept in unawares. St Peter foresaw what St Jude witnessed in fact.

The whole question of the relation of the Epistle of St Jude to this second chapter of St Peter's Epistle has been discussed in the Introduction to 2nd Peter. The contrast between παρεισάξουσιν here and the παρεισέδυσαν in Jude is that which most definitely marks the difference in time between the two writers, and it would do violence to the literal meaning of the Greek words did we not place St Peter's narrative anterior to St Jude's. The former says the false teachers will come in, the latter, using the aorist, yet speaks of a thing accomplished, of men who are in the Church and doing their mischief, and he only employs the indefinite tense because he feels that while some are already in the Christian communities yet still more are coming after them. The whole relation of the two passages seems to suit only with the grammatical acceptance of these key-words to the position of their respective writers.

damnable heresies] Better, destructive heresies. The literal rendering of the Greek is "heresies of destruction," signifying "heresies which lead to destruction," i.e. which destroy not only those who are led astray thereby, but those who lead them likewise. Cf. below on v. 12, where the false teachers are spoken of as to be destroyed in their own destroying, and in the final clause of this verse are said to be "bringing upon themselves swift destruction."

even denying the Lord that bought them] The even qualifies the latter portion of the sentence, and the word rendered Lord should be Master. Denying even the Master that bought them would therefore express the meaning of the original more nearly. These self-willed teachers knew that Christians were not their own but bought with a price (1 Cor. vi. 20), and therefore were the bondservants of Christ (1 Cor. vii. 23), for Christ had bought them off from the curse of the Law (Gal. iii. 13), and in that purchase He made them sons of God by adoption (Gal. iv. 5). But both by their lessons and lives they ignored all this. St Jude expands and explains St Peter's phrase, "denying our only Master and Lord, Jesus Christ."

This clause of the verse describes the nature of the heretical teaching, and Bp Wordsworth points out, from the history of the heresies of the Apostolic age, how every phase resulted in a denial of Jesus Christ. The Jewish teachers explained away the doctrine of the Trinity. One form of Gnosticism taught that there were not in the Godhead three distinct persons, but only three different revelations of the same person. Others taught that the body of Christ was but a phantom; others that He was merely man, though the greatest and best of men; others that Jesus was man, but Christ was the divine Spirit, which entered into Jesus at His birth but left Him before His crucifixion; while others in practice, by their dissolute lives, denied Christ as their Master, and used their bodies as their own and not His.

After his own fall and repentance, to deny the Master would be in Peter's mind the strongest term which he could find for apostasy. But when he denied Jesus the Master had not yet paid the price for the redemption of His servants. How much more grievous must be the falling away of Christians; yet for all these who now denied Him, Christ had died. The redemption which He wished to make was to be for all men, "even for the rebellious."

and bring upon themselves swift destruction] The verb is a participle, "bringing upon themselves," and expresses the result of the wrong teaching. These men bring in heresies of destruction unto others, and know not that they are bringing at the same time destruction on themselves. Swift (ταχινός) refers quite as much to the suddenness with which the destruction shall come as to any other characteristic of it.

Ταχινός, like ψευδοδιδάσκαλος and παρεισάγειν, is a word peculiar to St Peter in the New Testament.

2. The rendering should be, And many shall follow their lascivious ways. Cf. below, v. 18, where "by words of vanity" these teachers are said "to entice in the lusts of the flesh by lasciviousness."

In this verse the Text. Rec. reads ἀπωλείαις, but all the earliest MSS. have ἀσελγείαις. And this is now adopted by all editors, for it is easy to see how the former word has come in from the previous verse, while the earlier reading is in the spirit of St Jude's more expanded expression, τὴν τοῦ Θεοῦ ἡμῶν χάριτα μετατιθέντες εἰς ἀσελγείαν.

by reason of whom] This refers no doubt both to those who teach error and to those

3 And through covetousness shall they with feigned words make merchandise of you: whose judgment now of a long time lingereth not, and their damnation slumbereth not.

4 For if God spared not the angels that sinned, but cast them down to hell, and delivered them into chains of darkness, to be reserved unto judgment; who follow them. Both bring the way of truth into dishonour, the former by the words which they speak against it, the latter by deserting it and affording to others an argument that it is not worth following.

The early Church had much to dread from the calumnies which might be cast upon it from the evil lives of any who professed to be in any sense Christians, for charges of immorality were among the most common slanders against which the early Apologists had to defend the Christians, and these no doubt grew out of the licence encouraged and indulged in by these false brethren.

3. And through covetousness] The preposition in Greek is ἐν=in, and the literal rendering expresses exactly the condition of these false teachers as set before us in Scripture. From Simon Magus onward they are described as covetous, and so the Apostle styles them below in v. 14, and Jude (16) expands the idea, "having men's persons in admiration for the sake of advantage." And to Timothy St Paul (1 Tim. vi. 5) had spoken of those who supposed gain was godliness, and to Titus (i. 11) of men who "teach what they ought not for filthy lucre's sake." These false brethren were sunk in covetousness.

with feigned words] The adjective is only found here in the New Testament, and alludes to the lying character of the promises which these men made to those who listened to them. They promised what they could not give because they had it not. (See below, v. 19.) Cf. also Rom. xvi. 18.

make merchandise] As with the Judaizing teachers of whom St Paul speaks (Gal. vi. 13), the glory of these false brethren was to have a multitude of followers. These they are represented as buying, but all the price they pay is "feigned words," promises which never can come true. No doubt there is also a notion that such teachers would be supported by their followers, and in covetousness they aimed to secure such support, and treated in this respect their adherents as objects of traffic out of which they might make gain.

whose judgment] Rather, sentence. Their doom is pronounced already, and their end is destruction. (Cf. Phil. iii. 19.)

ἔκταλαι=now of a long time, is a Petrine word, found only here and in iii. 5, while in ἀργεῖ and νυστάζει, the former of which is unique and the latter occurs only here and in Matt. xxv. 5 (in its literal sense), we have examples of that figurative language of which so many examples can be produced from both the first and second Epistles. Their judgment is not idly loitering, nor is their destruction nodding to sleep, but is sure to come.

and their damnation] Better, their destruction. The original is the same word that occurs twice just before in v. 1.

4. The Apostle proceeds to give examples of the punishment of the ungodly and the deliverance of the righteous. These he draws (1) from angels that sinned, (2) from the world before the flood and the deliverance of Noah, and (3) from the overthrow of the cities of the plain out of which Lot was saved.

For if God spared not the angels that sinned] There is no definite article in the original. Better, spared not angels when they sinned. It has been generally held that the allusion here is to the narrative in Gen. vi. 4, and that the angels here mentioned are those who are there called בְּנֵי הָאֱלֹהִים, but as there is no account given in Genesis of the punishment of those offenders, and as it is the punishment which in the Epistle is mainly dwelt on, it seems better to conclude that the allusion is to some extra-biblical literature in which mention is not unfrequently made of the sins and punishments of the angels (e.g. 'Bk. of Enoch' VII. 1, 2). Such traditional literature was familiar to the Apostles, as we may see from 1 Cor. x. 4; 2 Tim. iii. 8, &c. For instances illustrative of this passage from Rabbinical literature, see Additional Note at the end of the Chapter.

The parallel passage in Jude 6, which expands the statement of St Peter, "angels which kept not their own principality [or dominion] but forsook their proper habitation," seems to give some countenance to the connection of this passage with the story in Genesis, but yet that expansion may equally well be referred to the Rabbinical tradition, for there too a change of abode is mentioned.

but cast them down to hell] The original ῥαπαρώσας, which is not found elsewhere, is literally, "having cast them into Tartarus," which to a Jewish mind would be the same as Hades or Gehenna. That the notion of Tartarus, though strictly a heathen one, was not unfamiliar to the Jews we may see from Josephus, who ('c. Apion.' II. 33) speaks of the oldest heathen gods as ἐν ῥαπάρῳ δεδεμένους=fettered in Tartarus.

and delivered them into chains of darkness] In the verb delivered (παρέδωκε) is the idea of ungodly ;

6 And turning the cities of Sodom and Gomorrha into ashes condemned committing to prison. Cf. Acts viii. 3, xii. 4 and other places.

On the word rendered "chains" the MSS. \aleph , A, B, C have a various reading which might be translated "pits" or "dens," and this reading has been adopted by recent editors. But there are variations of text in A and \aleph which if adopted would require the word to be taken as an adjective, and the variation is so slight ($\sigmaειραις$ for $\sigmaειραις$) that it seems hardly established that "pits" should be the rendering. For the word as found in use signifies a pit where grain can be stored and kept safe for use. Now this is scarcely the notion required by our context, while the expression "chain of darkness" is found Wisd. xvii. 17, and it will be seen that the idea of "chaining in darkness" enters largely into the Rabbinical literature concerning the fallen angels. (See extracts at the end of this Chapter.)

to be reserved unto judgment] Amid such pains as are said in the Gospel (Matt. xxv. 41) to be "prepared for the devil and his angels."

5. And spared not the old (ancient) world] Though the wrong doers and wrong teachers may be many, their number shall not profit them, for God spared only Noah and his family when the flood swept away the world of the ungodly.

but saved (preserved) Noah the eighth person] This is a not uncommon though somewhat abbreviated Greek formula=Noah with seven others. The expression "guarded" or "preserved" ($\epsilonφύλαξε$), is apparently an allusion to the words of Genesis (viii. 16), "the Lord shut him in."

a preacher of righteousness] We have no intimation of this in the Scripture, but we may see from Josephus ('Antiq.' I. 3. 1) that there was a tradition of the kind among the Jews. The whole passage, which illustrates our text, is as follows, "Noah being grieved at the things which were done by them and being displeased at their counsels, urged them to change for the better their thoughts and actions. But seeing that they did not yield, but were mightily mastered by the pleasure of evil, fearing lest they should kill him, he departed from the land with his wife and his sons and the women whom they had married." And in the Midrash, 'Bereshith Rabba,' xxx. 6, we find "There rose up a herald for God in the age of the deluge: that was Noah."

This explanation of the Midrash is noteworthy in the light of St Peter's word "herald" ($\κηρυξ$).

bringing in the flood upon the world of the ungodly] Better, when He brought a flood, &c. There is no article in the Greek, indeed the whole verse is remarkable for having no article in it.

6. And turning...into ashes] The verb so rendered ($\tauεφρωσας$) is unique and is one of the writer's picturesque and expressive words.

condemned them with an overthrow] The dative here, as in Mark x. 33, might be taken =to overthrow. But "overthrow" is not a word of the same character as "death" in that passage, and in the case of the cities of the plain it was by their overthrow that their deeds were condemned, and they made a perpetual warning. The expanded text of St Jude (v. 7) in this notice of Sodom and Gomorrah is worth observation, as a sign of a later date when the licentiousness of these false teachers had become more apparent, and had made the parallel between them and the cities of the plain more complete.

making them] Rather, having made them, and so in St Jude they are said to be "set forth," as if in perpetuity, that men may always be able to point to them.

an ensample unto those, &c.] i.e. a type of the utter overthrow which should come on such offenders.

that after should live ungodly] The word "after" would be better omitted. (It makes a double translation of $\muελλόντων$, the future sense of which is sufficiently given by "should.") The offences of the sinners before the flood and of the inhabitants of Sodom and Gomorrah are described by the same term $\alphaσεβειν$. First they have no fear of God before their eyes, and when that is absent regard for man, either in their own persons or those of others, soon follows it, and so these men may all be classed together.

7. And delivered just (righteous) Lot] He, like Noah, had by his life been a herald of righteousness. Josephus styles him "one who had learnt Abraham's goodness."

vexed] The verb is rather connected primarily with the sense of physical weariness than mental pain. So "worn out" or distressed would be a closer rendering. He had talked to no purpose. "He seemed as one that mocked unto his sons-in-law." The word only occurs in the New Testament again,

8 (For that righteous man dwelling among them, in seeing and hearing, vexed his righteous soul from day to day with their unlawful deeds;)

9 The Lord knoweth how to deliver the godly out of temptations, and to reserve the unjust unto the day of judgment to be punished:

10 But chiefly them that walk after the flesh in the lust of uncleanness, and despise ¹government. ²Presumptuous ³are they, selfwilled, they are ⁴not afraid to speak evil of dignities.

Acts vii. 24, of the Israelite who was wronged by the Egyptian.

with the filthy conversation of the wicked] Literally, "by the life of the wicked in lasciviousness." Conversation in the older English of the A.V. nearly always represents, as here, the Greek ἀναστροφή, meaning "manner of life." Perhaps the best rendering would be, by the lascivious manner of life of the wicked.

The word here rendered wicked is only found in this Epistle (here and iii. 17) in the New Testament, and signifies "those who set law at defiance and so are deprived of its protection."

8. This parenthetic verse is an explanation of the nature of the distress under which Lot suffered. It was by what he saw and heard that he vexed (the word literally means tormented) his righteous soul. The sentence is so framed as to give emphasis to Lot's self-torture because of what he saw. And when we notice the words "dwelling among them," and remember that it was his own choice (Gen. xiii. 11) that selected the plain of Jordan and the neighbourhood of Sodom for his home, we can understand how such self-tormenting might be natural. For it is recorded when he made the choice that "the men of Sodom were wicked and sinners before the Lord exceedingly."

The words seeing (βλέμμα) and dwelling among (ἐγκατοικέω) are not found elsewhere in the New Testament.

9. Here we come to the apodosis of those conditional clauses which commenced in v. 4, and all depend on the conjunction that is only once expressed there.

The Lord knoweth] And God's knowledge implies His power.

to deliver the godly] As He shewed in the instances of Noah and Lot. The temptation in the former case seems not to have been so wilfully entered into as was Lot's, but whether God send the temptation or men choose it for themselves, yet if they resist it and continue to hold fast their integrity, the way to escape will be made for them.

In the next clause the verb rendered by the A.V. "to be punished" is not in the future but in the present tense, and is closely connected with the other verb in the sentence. It is better to render: and to reserve under punishment the unrighteous. For their state is one of chastisement even before the judgment-day comes. Our Saviour's picture in the parable of the rich man and Lazarus reveals this to us.

the unjust] i.e. such as the offending angels, and the ante-diluvian generation, and the Sodomites, of the first of whom it has been already (v. 4) said, that they are "to be reserved unto judgment."

10. But chiefly] i.e. above all others shall God reserve under punishment the sinners now to be described.

them that walk after the flesh] St Jude, who saw to what lengths these offenders had come, describes them as offending in like manner with Sodom and Gomorrah. "Yet" (i.e. in spite of the warning set forth before their eyes) "in like manner these also defile the flesh." Some Gnostic teachers allowed themselves in sensual excesses, and the writer of this Epistle speaks not so plainly indeed as St Jude of their foul lives, but yet shews that he saw clearly whither they were tending.

in the lust of uncleanness] Just as St Paul to the Ephesians (iv. 22) speaks of "lusts of deceit," deceitful lusts, lusts which deceive all who follow them, so the lusts spoken of here are such as defile all who are captivated by them. The word for "uncleanness," as also a kindred word in v. 20 rendered "defilements," is used nowhere else in the New Testament. The former signifies a condition of defilement, the latter the thing which defiles.

and despise government] Better, dominion. The word signifies lordship, and it may be referred primarily to Jesus Christ, but it also includes every form of authority which would exercise restraint upon these offenders. Christ or other authority they utterly disregard.

Presumptuous are they] Better, simply, Daring: though they have known the penalties of sin yet they defy them.

selfwilled, they tremble not to rail at dignities] Here dignities (δόξαι) seems from the context to refer to spiritual powers, God's agents in the government of the world. This is apparent from the κατ' αὐτῶν of the following verse, where the angels are said not to bring a railing accusation against these δόξαι, and a special instance is given in St Jude's more expanded and Midrash-like form of the illustration; for he speaks of Michael the archangel disputing with the devil, and yet bringing no railing judgment. In later times the inhabitants of heaven were ranged in Christian literature into ranks and orders. Such a division was no doubt largely due to the Gnostic teaching with its systems of Æons, each possessed of its own specific powers and office. But speculations on such a subject might find an earlier warrant from words like those of St Paul (Rom. viii. 38), where he speaks of "angels, principalities and powers" as separate classes of spiritual agencies. In the verse before us St Peter means that the daring and self-willed sinners of whom he speaks, though knowing the might of the spiritual powers, yet in contempt of them, whether they be good or bad, proceed on their evil courses, setting at naught the danger into which evil powers may lead them, and disregarding the warnings which may be ministered to them by the good. And though doing this they tremble not.

11. Whereas angels] And St Jude's example is that of the mighty archangel Michael. though greater in power and might] i.e. than the dignities (δόξαι), for in all orders of the hierarchy of heaven, whether founded on Scripture or not, the angels and archangels stand first.

bring not a railing judgment against them] The only apposite illustration in Holy Scripture is Zech. iii. 2, where the "angel of the Lord" appears with Joshua the high-priest under his care, while Satan comes forth as an adversary. There it is said, "The Lord said unto Satan, The Lord rebuke thee, O Satan." In which passage the manifestation of the divine presence under the form and name of "the angel of the Lord" is in harmony with the rest of the Old Testament narrative, and this representative of Jehovah must have been the speaker of the words of rebuke to the adversary. And the very words "the Lord rebuke thee" are put by St Jude into the mouth of Michael (Jude 9).

before the Lord] By some MSS. and editors these words are omitted, but the balance of evidence is in favour of their retention. For such a scene is here hinted at, where Jehovah presides as supreme Judge, hearing all sides before He gives a decision, cf. Job i., and similar descriptions are not unfrequent in the Rabbinical writings. Cf. 'Bereshith Rabba,' p. viii. (on Gen. i. 26).

lessons and practices the Apostle is giving warning.

as creatures without reason. Though professing to have greater light than other men they act with as little reason as the brute creation. The A.V. "as natural brute beasts" is a most expressive rendering of this word and those which follow, but scarcely enables the reader to see the force of the several Greek words.

born mere (or natural) animals. And never advancing beyond the "things which they know naturally as brute beasts" (Jude 10).

to be taken and destroyed] Which, for the harm they do, deserve no better fate. Some have rendered these words, "to take and destroy," as though they looked on to the latter clause of the verse, thus making them a description of the acts of those men who ensnared and ruined all whom they were able to beguile by their teaching. But it seems better to connect them with the description of the animals.

railing in matters whereof they are ignorant. Thus shewing themselves "creatures without reason."

shall in their destroying be utterly destroyed. In this respect too their lot shall be that of mere animals, which by their appetites are led on to destruction, and are taken and slain while attempting to seize some prey. So these men while they are bent on misleading, and so destroying, shall fall themselves into the destruction which they have made for others.

13. And shall receive the wages of unrighteousness] This is another form of expressing that for their work of destruction they shall reap destruction. The wages of unrighteousness can be but ruin, as to Balaam (Num. xxxi. 8, 16) and to Judas (Acts i. 18). Some very ancient MSS. read here, "being wronged in the wages of unrighteousness," and a sense may be obtained from these words, if we think that these deceivers had looked for different wages from their master than they in the end obtained, that the promise made to them at the outset had been as fair-seeming as that which they now make to others.

wages of unrighteousness] The words μισθὸν ἀδικίας are only found here and below in v. 15, and in St Peter's speech concerning Judas (Acts i. 18). The expression is thus peculiar to St Peter, and it is well that it should be rendered by the same English exmen who count it pleasure to revel in the day time. Here begins an enumeration of other features in the character of the false teachers. Hitherto there has been mainly noticed their bearing towards all authority, now we are to hear of their excessive self-indulgence.

τυφή is rather "delicate living" than "riot." Cf. James v. 5, "Ye have lived in pleasure on the earth." Some have understood τὴν ἐν ἡμέρᾳ τυφὴν of luxury which lasted for a brief time, but the design of the Apostle is to describe these false teachers not as simply sinners, but as far worse than other sinners. The day is for honest walking, and "they that are drunken are drunken in the night" (1 Thess. v. 7), but these men give day as well as night to their revels, and find their pleasure in so doing.

Spots and blemishes] An utter contrast to those whom Christ redeemed (1 Pet. i. 19), and who should strive after His likeness Who was as a lamb without blemish and without spot. Cf. for this character of true Christians iii. 14 and Eph. v. 27.

revelling in their deceivings] Here the "deceivings" would signify the things which they have gotten by deceit, and on which they live delicately. For not only self-indulgence and licentiousness but greed of gain is among the offences of these sinners.

Some ancient authorities and some modern editors read here ἀγᾶραις for ἀπάραις, and this is the word in Jude 12. At first sight the pronoun αὐτῶν appears to be an obstacle to the adoption of the same word here. It seems natural enough to say "they revel in (or on) their deceivings," but not quite so to speak of the love-feasts as theirs. But if we hold St Peter's Epistle to be the earlier we can see a reason for the change of the pronoun. In his day these false teachers at love-feasts of their own devising held their riot, but when St Jude wrote the evil had spread farther and from being a practice confined to the few who had crept in unawares was become so extended that he could speak of such men as blots on the agape of the whole Church. But it is impossible to decide with certainty on the true reading here, though the word in Jude is in some degree an evidence that we should adopt the same here.

while they feast with you] The congregations have established these common meals to cheer the hearts and strengthen the affection between their members. The false teachers come and share like the rest, join in the banquet of the Church's bounty, but are spots and blemishes in the body of Christians, for it is no feast of brotherly love which they seek to share, but by their boldness and licence to lead their fellows astray and turn the ἀγάπη into τυφή.

14. Having eyes full of adultery] Literally, as in the margin of A.V., full of an adulteress. A most forcible but singular phrase for expressing that complete absorption in sensual thoughts and desires that the eye, the most expressive feature, seems to realize the presence of some object of the desire and to be intently gazing on it.

and that cannot cease from sin] The eyes have been so schooled to sensual expression that now they never lose it, but seem ever on the watch for opportunity to do evil.

enticing unstedfast souls. The metaphor is from a bait to catch fish, and the word occurs again in v. 18, and is used by St James (i. 14), and would come at once to the minds of the fishermen of Galilee. Unstedfast (ἀσθήπιος) is only found in this Epistle (here and iii. 16), and is a word of much significance for St Peter, for he was charged specially to labour against such unstedfastness (Luke xxii. 32), "When thou art converted, strengthen (στήριξον) thy brethren."

having a heart exercised in covetousness. Here we come on the third evil characteristic of these deceivers. They are greedy of gain. (The Text. Rec. gives πλεονεξίας, which the A.V. renders rightly by the plural, but the best MSS. read πλεονεξίας, and the verb is not uncommonly followed by such a genitive.) The exercise indicated by the verb is that of an athlete for a contest. In like manner have these men trained themselves in their habits of greed.

children of cursing. The A.V. "cursed children" scarcely gives the force of the original. The sense is like that phrase (Eph. ii. 3) "children of wrath," i.e. for whom wrath is prepared, and so these men have a curse in store for them.

15. forsaking the right way] According to Tischendorf's eighth edition the present tense has rather more authority than the aorist, but it is so closely joined with the finite verb which follows in the aorist, that the change does not affect the sense. "The right way" is that which is called (Acts xiii. 10) "the right ways of the Lord," which Elymas (a

they are gone astray] Having at first been deluded, but afterwards giving themselves up to the wrong way into which they have been brought, they are seeking to make others as bad as themselves.

having followed the way of Balaam the son of Bosor] The verb "having followed," which is a strengthened form, is found three times in this Epistle (i. 16, ii. 2, 15) and nowhere else in the New Testament. It gives the idea of following out to the end, as Balaam went on, though he learnt that his way was displeasing to the Lord.

It is noteworthy how many times the word "way" occurs in Num. xxii., the account of Balaam's sinful journey.

Bosor is a form which arose probably from some dialectic pronunciation of the B in the name בלעזר, and it would be better here to conform the English Version to the Old Testament orthography.

In Rev. ii. 14, 15 Balaam is mentioned in such a conjunction with the Nicolaitans that we can hardly help concluding the writer of this Epistle and St Jude had those false teachers in their thoughts when they spake of Balaam's sin as marking the offenders against whom they wrote.

who loved the wages of unrighteousness] See above on v. 13. Balaam's love was for the gain, though on his lips was, "Though Balak should give me his house full of silver and gold." So these deceivers have one thing on their lips but another in their hearts.

16. But was rebuked for his transgression] His offence was a defiance of God's command, which at first spake expressly that he should not go with Balak's messengers. The word for "rebuke" is only found here in the New Testament.

a dumb ass] ὑποζύγιον, literally "a beast of burden," is used of the ass, but in the East that animal and the mule are the only umenta.

speaking with man's voice stayed the madness of the prophet] It was not the ass but the angel who really hindered Balaam on the way, but the clearer vision of the dumb beast was the cause of the first delay, and so the whole result is ascribed to what was but the first step towards it. It is not without purpose that Balaam is styled "the prophet," but thus the contrast is heightened between the wicked folly of him who should have been wise, and the brute beast by which he was rebuked.

The word for madness (παράφρονία) is only found in this place.

17. Having specified the sins which should mark the lives of these false teachers, the Apostle now goes on to notice the vain nature of all which they profess to teach. They promise great things, and men look to them with expectation but are doomed to disappointment.

These are springs without water] It is to bring out as strongly as possible the idea of apostasy that the imagery of this verse is employed. These false teachers bear the semblance of teachers, just as, for a little time, a place in Eastern lands where water has flowed will continue green, but disappoint the thirsty traveller who may be led by a little verdure to hope for water. There was water, and perhaps not long ago, but there is none now, and so with these deceivers. They give promise, but that promise is never realized. And the same notion is in the next clause.

and mists driven by a tempest. These promised showers of blessing, but the wind carried them away, and they did no good to the ground over which they were swept so quickly. The Text. Rec. reads νεφέλαι=clouds (A.V.), but the best MSS. have instead καὶ ὀμίχλαι. ὀμίχλη is not found elsewhere in New Testament.

for whom] i.e. for the deceiving teachers. the blackness of darkness] The words are the same as in Jude 13, and it is better to translate them in the same way in both places.

hath been reserved] The way of the wicked is frequently spoken of as a way of darkness (cf. Prov. iv. 19), but the passage which is most nearly an illustration of the text is Jer. xxiii. 9—12, where false prophets are spoken of, over whose deeds "the heart is broken, for the land is full of adulterers, both prophet and priest are profane...wherefore their way shall be unto them as slippery ways in the darkness."

At the end of the verse the A.V. has "for ever," but these words are not in the original of the best MSS., and appear to have been inserted here in later MSS. to bring the text of St Peter into more exact accord with that of St Jude, where the words are found.

18 For when they speak great swelling words of vanity, they allure through the lusts of the flesh, through much wantonness, those that were clean escaped from them who live in error.

19 While they promise them liberty, they themselves are the servants of corruption: for of whom a man is overcome, of the same is he brought in bondage.

18. For uttering great swelling words of vanity] In the previous verse we had these false teachers described in figures, now we have the application. We see why they are waterless fountains, and rainless mists, because their words are vanity. All that they say must come to naught. Cf. Eph. iv. 17, "The vanity of their mind."

This first clause describes the means employed to beguile the unstable; words which promise much. The "when" of A. V. is not needed. The boastful promises of the deceiver are always there. The adjective rendered "great swelling words" (υπέρογκα), is only found here and in the parallel passage, Jude 16, and the verb φθίγγεσθαι is not the usual word for speaking but rather indicates a public and loud proclamation, and it is to be noticed that it is only found in the New Testament here and above (v. 16) of Balaam's ass, and in Acts iv. 18, a passage of which the language is probably due to St Peter.

in the lusts of the flesh] Here is described the condition in which these men live. "They walk after the flesh in the lust of defilement," and "have eyes that cannot cease from sin."

by lasciviousness. The word is plural in the original and intimates that there is no temptation which they do not offer. This is the bait by which they entice their followers.

those who are just escaping. (The Text. Rec. here is τοὺς ὄντως ἀποφυγόντας, which is well rendered those that were clean escaped, but the oldest MSS. give ὀλίγους with the present participle.) This suits the context better. For they who were clean escaped would not be in so much danger of falling back as would those who were but just getting free.

from them that live in error] With this expression may be compared i. 4, "having escaped from the corruption that is in the world through lust." Those that live in error are the heathen who know not God. Having lived lives according to the flesh hitherto, they are more easily led astray by temptations of that nature, when they have just begun their Christian profession. To such weak brethren the false teachers utter their proud promises, and shewing them a life more like their old one, and calling for less restraint than true Christianity demands, win them to their teaching.

19. Promising them liberty] No doubt these apostates would make a wrong use of words like those of St Paul (Rom. viii. 21) concerning "the glorious liberty of the children of God," and (2 Cor. iii. 17) "where the Spirit of the Lord is there is liberty," leaving out of mind that other admonition (Gal. v. 13), "use not liberty for an occasion to the flesh." And here we have an example of those sayings of St Paul which "the ignorant and unstedfast" (like these backsliding professors) "wrest unto their own destruction."

while they themselves are bondservants of corruption. Here, as in i. 4, there is deep-rooted in the word for "corruption" the other notion of "destruction," as above in v. 12 of this chapter. These false teachers have taken service as bondslaves under a master who uses them to corrupt others, but who at the same time will, in their service, destroy them too. They destroy others and will themselves "in their destruction be destroyed." The verb for "are" in this clause is one which describes their being as a settled condition. It is used below (iii. 11), "what manner of persons ought ye to be in all holy living." The notion is that of being "employed on" or "busy about" anything.

for of whom (or what) a man is overcome, of the same is he also brought into bondage] For the sentiment cf. John viii. 34; Rom. vi. 16. The also, which is in the Text. Rec. as well as old MSS., seems to give force to the sentence. It is possible for a sinner, though he fall, yet to rise again, and try once more to resist temptation, but when he has owned himself beaten, then sin goes further and makes him its slave.

20. In this verse the Apostle gives a reason for calling these false teachers bondservants. They had once got free, or what seemed to be free, from their life in error, but a relapse makes them powerless to struggle into freedom again. They are hopelessly enslaved now.

For if after they have escaped the defilements of the world] These defilements are the corruption that was in the heathen world through lust (i. 4). These teachers by joining the fellowship of the Christian Church seemed to have made this amount of progress.

Here μίσμαρτα is an unique word.

through the knowledge of the Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ] This is that full knowledge (ἐπίγνωσις) on which the Apostle so strongly insists (cf. i. 2), and which he here defines as a viour Jesus Christ, they are again entangled therein, and overcome, the latter end is worse with them than the beginning.

21 For it had been better for them not to have known the way of righteousness, than, after they have known it, to turn from the holy commandment delivered unto them.

knowledge of Jesus Christ as the Lord and Saviour. It was such a knowledge which these apostate teachers appeared once to have had, but now they were "denying the Master that bought them."

they are again entangled therein, and overcome] They called their condition freedom, but the Apostle sees that they are like the fishes (to which by his language he has already compared those whom they entice), caught in the folds of a net from which there is no escape.

the last state is become worse with them than the first] Cf. Christ's language, Matt. xii. 45. The evil spirit that had been cast out has returned and brought with him seven other spirits more wicked than himself. Such applications of the language of Jesus as we find in this verse and the one preceding it, where the words are not literally repeated, as a forger might have been tempted to use them, but given with such modifications as shall retain their spirit, though suiting the form to the occasion which calls for their use, are most interesting because they indicate that the writer knew the circumstances under which Christ spake, and could use His words as they were intended to be used. And more than this, they are in some degree characteristic of a time when the Gospel narrative was being orally delivered, and when living hearers of Jesus were still in the world.

The τούτοις in this verse has by some been made emphatic and referred to the false teachers, and thus the whole sense of the verse modified in this wise. For if (those who are beguiled by these apostates) after they have escaped...are again entangled by these (deceivers)...the last state, &c. But such a rendering seems to suit the context very ill. For those men who were only just escaping from those that live in error (v. 18) can hardly be said in any sense to have attained to the knowledge of Jesus Christ the Lord and Saviour, or to have "known the way of righteousness" (v. 21).

21. For it had been better for them, &c.] For with increased knowledge comes increase of responsibility, and greater condemnation for the misuse of what men know. On the condition of such apostates cf. Heb. vi. 4—6. They crucify the Son of God afresh.

the way of righteousness] This was defined in the last verse as the knowledge of the Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. But the Apostle's use of the present expression as equivalent to the former, shews that faith in Christ was never without works of righteousness.

the holy commandment, &c.] Christ's explanation of the moral law in His Sermon on the Mount may emphatically be called by this name. And some of the precepts which He there delivered were those which these false teachers disregarded in their own lives, and from the restraints of which they promised freedom to those who joined their number. And Christ's interpretation and application of the Mosaic code (which St Paul [Rom. vii. 12] had called holy of itself) had made that law still more worthy of the title.

22. It has happened unto them, &c. The "But" of the A.V., representing δέ in the Text. Rec., seems to be a later addition, and not warranted by the earliest MSS.

proverb] The two proverbs which are here cited are taken from the two beasts held in greatest contempt in Eastern and Jewish thought. The dog to this day is the usual scavenger in Oriental cities, and swine are an abomination. For an instance of the coupling of these two animals as illustrations of what is most profane and degraded, cf. Matt. vii. 6.

The dog turning to his own vomit again] It is better to translate the participle form of the original exactly. This first proverb is generally referred to Prov. xxvi. 11, but it seems very doubtful whether that be the source of the Apostle's words. The LXX., from which he would quote if he were thinking of that verse, has ὡς περ κύων ὅταν ἐπέλθῃ ἐπὶ τὸν ἐαυτοῦ ἔμετον. In which passage neither the verb, the pronoun, nor the final noun are the same as in St Peter. It seems much more likely that the proverbs were both of them in frequent use and in several forms, and that the Apostle has used one, which was well known to his readers. We can see from our Lord's words quoted above that these animals were not unlikely to be chosen as representatives of all that was degraded, and so would come into the proverbial philosophy of the land in many ways.

and the sow that had washed to her wallowing in the mire] The LXX. of Proverbs xxvi. 11 adds to the first proverb the words "and becomes abominable." It has been suggested by some who believe that there was an Aramaic original of 2nd Peter, that under these words of the LXX. we have a trace of some lost Hebrew words, which were the source of the second proverb, but which the LXX. mis-rendered. This however is not very probable. The word for "wallowing" is found of a different form in some texts. The form adopted by the A. V. signifies "a place for wallowing," and to make this somewhat more clear the translators added "her" before "wallowing." The better text means "the act of wallowing." Both forms are found nowhere else in the New Testament, and the same holds good of vomit (ἐξέπαυα) and mud (βόρβορος) in this verse.

ADDITIONAL NOTES on CHAP. II. 4, 11, 15.

In this second chapter, besides those illustrations of the character and punishment of false teachers which he draws from Holy Writ, the writer of the Epistle in three passages makes reference to some things not contained in Scripture, but probably forming part of that traditional teaching of which the Jews had so much, and of which we find traces in other parts of the New Testament (1 Cor. x. 4, &c.). This traditional literature has never been fully collected, but we have great stores of it in the Talmuds of Babylon and Jerusalem, in the various Midrashim and the Zohar. The dates of these different works it is impossible to fix with any exactness, but the traditions, which they have preserved for us, go back far beyond the earliest date assigned to their present form, and may be taken as representing a great deal of what was current teaching among the Jews in the days of our Lord and His Apostles.

It seems worth while therefore to gather such traces of extra-biblical tradition as we find in this literature that we may gain the nearest approach now to be attained to what was in the mind of the writer of this Epistle, and from which he and the Jewish audience he addressed drew their illustrations quite as readily as from the canonical books.

In v. 4 we read, "For if God spared not angels that sinned, but cast them down to hell, and committed them unto chains of darkness to be reserved unto judgment."

In the Zohar (ed. Zolkiew, III. 208 a), we have the following, "Rabbi Isaac opened his lecture and said, 'What is man that thou rememberest him?' (Ps. viii. 4). This verse the Rabbis settled in the following way: that the governors of the world said it at the time when it rose in the will of the Holy One to create man. He called many hosts of the upper angels and placed them before Himself and said unto them: 'I wish to create man.' Then they said before Him, 'Man will not continue one night in his glory' (Ps. xlix. 12). Then the Holy One stretched forth His finger and burnt them. After that He placed other hosts before Him, and said unto them: 'I wish to create man.' And they said before Him: 'What is man that Thou rememberest him?' What is the good of this son of man? And he said unto them: This man shall be in our own image so that his wisdom shall be superior to your wisdom. When God had created man, and he had committed a sin, and had gone forth as a culprit, there came Uzza and Azael and said before God, We have a cause of complaint [lit. an opening of the mouth] against Thee. Here is the son of man whom Thou hast made; he has sinned before Thee. And He said unto them: If you had been among them, you would have done worse than they. What then did the Holy One? He threw them down from the holy position that was theirs, even from heaven."

Then follows a short digression, after which he continues: "After the Lord had thrown them down from their holy place, even from heaven, they erred after the women of the world, and caused the world to err. Here is a point worthy of our meditation. Surely it is written [Ps. civ. 4], He maketh His angels spirits, and surely these were angels? How could they then exist on earth? Come and see [i.e. I will give you an explanation]. All these angels of above do not exist and cannot exist except in the upper light that shines unto them and preserves them, and if this upper light is cut off from them they cannot exist. How much less those whom God has thrown down, and from whom that light of above has ceased? For their glory was altered, and when they came down and the air of this world got rule over them, they were changed into another [i.e. lower] degree. Here is an explanation. The manna that came down to Israel in the wilderness sprang originally from the dew of above (see Canticles v. 2), which comes down from the Ancient One, the hidden of all hidden things. And when it comes down its light shines through all the world, and from it is fed the field of the apples and the upper angels. But when it came down here below and the air of this world had rule over it, it became congealed and its splendour was changed, becoming only like coriander seed [Num. xi. 7] and nothing more. How much more angels? When they came down and the air had power over them, they were changed from their former degree in which they had been. What did God then do? He saw that they were misleading the world, so He bound them in iron chains in the mountains of darkness. In what place do they sit? In the depths of the mountains He placed Uzza, and cast darkness into his face, because at that time when God bound them, Uzza hardened himself and rebelled against the Highest. So God threw him down into the depth up to his very neck and cast darkness into his face. Now Azael, who did not harden himself, God placed near his fellow, but let the darkness be light to him."

And again (Zohar, I. 9 b), the writer speaking of the spirits of light and darkness says, "They dive into the great sea, and when they have arrived at the chain of Uzza and Azael, they rouse them and these spring into the mountains of darkness and think that the Holy One is going to cite them to judgment."

That some traditional teaching of this kind was current in our Lord's day is evident from the petition of the devils (Luke viii. 31), "They besought Him that He would not command them to go out into the deep."

The second passage in which some traditional development of the words of Holy Writ is found is in v. 11, "Angels which are greater in power and might bring not railing accusations against them before the Lord."

On this it will be enough, after the instance cited above of the Lord's rebuke to Satan in Zech. iii. 2, to quote from the Jalkut the comment which the compiler extracts from the 'Agadath Samuel,' on Isai. vi. 3, "And one cried unto another and said, 'Holy, holy, holy.' This teaches us that the angels honour one another; the one says to the other: 'Commence thou, because thou art greater than I.' And some say that they [the angels] are companies, and the one company says to its neighbour, 'Commence thou, for thou art greater than I.'"

And with reference to the special instance given in St Jude of Michael the archangel not railing against Satan, we read in the פטרית סמיה thus: "Samael was the chief of the Adversaries, and every moment was expecting when the time would arrive for him to put Moses to death and take away his life, just as a man expects some great joy. When Michael the prince of Israel saw Samael the wicked one expecting to put Moses to death, he lifted up his voice and wept, while Samael rejoiced and laughed. And he said to him, 'Wicked one, while I weep thou laughest.' And some tell us that he said, 'Do not rejoice against me, mine enemy, though I have fallen I shall rise again; I have fallen in Moses, I shall rise again in the leadership of Joshua.'"

The third passage is where (v. 15) it is said of Balaam that "he loved the wages of unrighteousness." This perhaps might be inferred from the narrative in the Book of Numbers, but there is abundance of evidence that this view of Balaam's character was much dwelt on in Jewish traditional literature. Thus in the Midrash Rabba on Numbers, par. 20, we find, "Behold there is a people come out from Egypt, come curse (qabab) me them." (Balak uses one word for curse (arab), but Balaam in repeating his message before God uses the stronger expression qabab.) This is to teach us that Balaam hated the people more than Balak, for Balak did not say qabab but arab. And the meaning of the qabab is distinctly shewn. For the one (Balak) says, "that I may drive them out of the land," but the other says, "drive them out" [unqualified, i.e.] "from this world and the world to come." And God said unto Balaam, Thou shalt not go with them. Then he replied to Him, "Shall I then curse them from my place?" And He said to him, "Thou shalt not curse the people." Then he said, "Shall I bless them?" "They have no need of thy blessing for they are blessed." As folks say to the wasp, "Neither with thy honey nor with thy sting" (i.e. do we want anything to do). And Balaam rose up early in the morning, and said unto the princes of Balak, &c. Balaam did not say to them, He hath not given me leave to go and to curse, but "He refuseth to give me leave to go with you. God said to me, It is not for thy honour to go with these, but with greater men than these; for (said he) he takes pleasure in my honour." Therefore (we read), And Balak sent again princes more and more honourable (as it says), "For I will promote thee to very great honour, more than thou hast received in times past do I give thee." And Balaam answered and said, "If Balak will give me his house full of silver and gold." From hence thou learnest that Balaam had three qualities: an evil eye, and a proud spirit, and a grasping heart. An evil eye, for it is written, "And Balaam lifted up his eyes and saw Israel dwelling according to their tribes." A proud spirit, for it is written, "Because the Lord refuseth to give me leave to go with you." A grasping heart, for it is written, "If Balak would give me his house full of silver and gold."

The same qualities are ascribed to Balaam in the 'Pirke Aboth,' v. 29 (Taylor, p. 109), and in the 'Midrash Tanchuma,' par. Balak, § 6.

CHAPTER III.

1 He assureth them of the certainty of Christ's coming to judgment, against those scorners who dispute against it: 8 warning the godly, for the long patience of God, to hasten their repentance. 10 He describeth also the manner how the world shall be destroyed: 11 exhorting them, from the expectation thereof, to all holiness of life: 15 and again, to think the patience of God to tend to their salvation, as Paul wrote to them in his epistles.

CHAP. III. 1—7. The Apostle recurs once more to the purpose with which he wrote this second Epistle, and gives an additional mark by which the false teachers may

THIS second epistle, beloved, I now write unto you; in both which I stir up your pure minds by way of remembrance:

2 That ye may be mindful of the words which were spoken before by the holy prophets, and of the commandment of us the apostles of the Lord and Saviour:

3 Knowing this first, that there shall come in the last days scoffers, walking after their own lusts, be known: to their other sins they will add that crowning one of "sitting in the seat of the scornful," in wilful forgetfulness that it is eternally true that "the way of the ungodly shall perish."

1. This is now, beloved, a second epistle which I write unto you. In the conclusion of the letter the Apostle grows still more earnest, and appeals to the affection of those to whom he writes. The word "beloved" addressed to them is found four times in this short chapter. It is difficult to understand how such an expression could be used by any except one who was well known to those whom he addressed, and the writer could scarcely have dared to speak of St Paul, as he is spoken of in v. 15, except he had been a contemporary of that Apostle's. Had our Epistle been written at the date assigned to it by many, such words could have found no place. And the whole subject treated of in the chapter is too solemn to be made the material for a literary forgery.

The "now"—already (ἤδη) intimates that the second Epistle came not long after the first.

and in both of them I stir up your sincere mind by putting you in remembrance. This verse is not, as some have suggested, the commencement of another Epistle, but merely a resumption of what has been said in i. 13. There he had said, "I think it right to stir you up by putting you in remembrance." In the second chapter many examples of the destruction that awaits sinners have been set forth, and he now returns to earnest exhortation. Here the mind (διάνοια) is the faculty which weighs and estimates and so understands. It can be darkened (Eph. iv. 18), but in those to whom St Peter wrote it was still bright and clear (which is the original force of the word rendered sincere), and so prepared to receive pure impressions from his teaching.

2. That ye should remember the words which were spoken before by the holy prophets] Of the value which the writer of this Epistle attached to the teaching of prophecy we have evidence in i. 19. It is noteworthy that St Jude only mentions (v. 17) "the words spoken before by the Apostles." He knew how earnestly this letter of St Peter urged on Christians the study of prophecy, and for him "the words spoken by the Apostles" included the other exhortation of this verse.

and the commandment of the Lord and Saviour through your apostles. The evidence of MSS. is nearly all in favour of your (ὑμῶν) instead of our (ἡμῶν). So that the "us" of the A.V. cannot stand. And the Apostles can rightly be called the Apostles of those to whom they have written or preached. No doubt St Peter includes himself among the number of such Apostles, but the persons for whom he wrote knew the Epistles of St Paul (iii. 15), and to judge from the numerous allusions to it which are contained in St Peter's first Epistle, as well as some in this, they must have been familiar with the Epistle of St James. Therefore, as in i. 16 when speaking of the Transfiguration he did not employ the singular pronoun and say, "I have not followed," &c., so here he speaks of your Apostles, rather than make any direct reference to himself.

The commandment is called in the original "the commandment of the Lord and Saviour," and then with another genitive "the commandment of your Apostles." But the sense of the latter is well given by through. The commandment came through the Apostles from Christ, and is the same which is spoken of before in ii. 21.

3. Knowing this first] He has used the same phrase i. 20 concerning prophecy and its interpretation, and now that he is about to give warning against those who shall mock at the non-fulfilment of the promise of Christ's coming, he repeats the words. For the men against whom he wrote were the men who would expect prophecy to have its fulfilment in strict accord with their private interpretations, and if it were not so, would make it a ground for mockery.

that...in the last days] This expression was used by the Old Testament writers to signify the end of that dispensation. Thus Isaiah ii. 2, "It shall come to pass in the last days that the mountain of the Lord's house shall be established." And so in Micah iv. 1 (the parallel passage). Then in the New Testament it occurs of the coming of Christ in the flesh. Thus 1 Pet. i. 20, "Christ who in these last times was manifest for you" (cf. Heb. i. 2). But specially was the phrase, in some form, employed after the Ascension to signify the, no doubt soon expected, return of Christ to judgment, before which event St Paul (2 Tim. iii. 1) had foretold that "in the last days perilous times should come." And St Peter and St Jude after him, seeing the signs of the times, spake of them as marks

4 And saying, Where is the promise of his coming? for since the fathers fell asleep, all things continue as they were from the beginning of the creation.

5 For this they willingly are ignorant of, that by the word of God the heavens were of old, and the earth ^{† Gr. κτισθῆναι} standing out of the water and in the water :

that the time of the end was near. And there can be little question that these Apostles expected the second coming would not be long delayed, but both St Paul in his Second Epistle to the Thessalonians and St Peter here indicate the proper spirit in which such expectations were to be entertained. Men were not to think of knowing times and seasons. With God one day is as a thousand years, and a thousand years as one day; and if He bring not the end at once, it is because He is long-suffering, and willeth not that any should perish.

mockers shall come with mockery. Of such mockery he gives a specimen in the next verse. The words rendered "with mockery" are not found in the Text. Rec., and the noun does not occur elsewhere in the New Testament, but the MS. evidence is so strong in favour of them, that they are received by all modern editors. Beside which they are an expansion quite in the Hebrew style, of which there are so many traces in the Epistle. The word for "mockers" is only here and in the parallel place in St Jude. The characteristic of this mockery seems to be that the men would profess themselves willing to accept all that was told them concerning Christ, if only they could have the evidence for it framed after their own desire.

walking after their own lusts] And demanding evidence according to their own heart's fancy in consequence. But by reason of following their own lusts, they were too blind to discern the true nature and signs of Christ's kingdom.

4. And saying, Where is the promise of his coming? In the spirit of those mentioned in Isaiah (v. 18, 19), "who draw iniquity with cords of vanity, and sin as it were with a cart rope, who say, Let Him make speed and hasten His work that we may see it." Cp. Jer. xvii. 15; Ezek. xii. 22, 27.

for from the day that the fathers fell asleep] As it is the second coming of Christ which is here spoken of, and as the expectation of that coming could only have been entertained since His ascension, and the promise of the angels that he should come again, the fathers here spoken of can only be the first Christian generation. These had looked for and no doubt often made mention of the approaching Advent, but they had died without seeing it, and the mockers now beheld all things still continuing, and these fathers taken away with hopes unfulfilled, and so they mockingly said that the coming was never to be. Stephen was the first of those who had "fallen asleep," and after him James the brother of John, and then that other James, the bishop of Jerusalem, and many more would rank as "fathers" of the Christian community whose names have not been written for us, but who were well known to the Churches. If these men had died, and the Advent was not yet, was there (asked these mockers) ever to be an Advent?

all things continue as they were from the beginning of the creation] It seems as if while rejecting the hope of Christ's return, these sinners also had rejected the Old Testament record too. They were of those, it appears, who maintained that God did not interpose in the affairs of men and nations. He had created the world and given it a law (this they might admit), but it was unchangeable. The thing which was, was that which ever had been since the creation, and which now for ever would be.

5. For this they wilfully forget. The mockers have spoken of all things as unchanged from the creation of the world. The Apostle brings an example to refute them, and one of which, had it not been from wilful ignorance, they must have been conscious.

by the word of God] Alluding to Gen. i. 6, 9, where the language gives some warrant for the expressions used both here and in the Psalms quoted. The waters covered all things, and from the midst of them the dry land appeared at the word of God, and by the same word were separated from each other the waters above, and those under the firmament. It is unnecessary to observe that neither Genesis nor the Epistle of St Peter was written to go beyond the ideas of those for whose use they were intended. With regard to the former it has been abundantly shewn that scientific advancement has taken nothing from the true worth of its teaching, though it may express what is there recorded in more technical terminology.

that there were heavens of old. The plural is a representation of the Hebrew word for "heavens" which is always a plural form.

The heavens had existed, and the earth too, long ages before the flood, and men at that time might have held the same notions that all things in the world were unchanging. But the flood came. "God spared not the ancient world" (ii. 5).

Of old (ἐκπαλαι) is a Petrine word only found here and in ii. 3.

and the earth compacted out of water

6 Whereby the world that then was, being overflowed with water, perished :

7 But the heavens and the earth, which are now, by the same word are kept in store, reserved unto fire against the day of judgment and perdition of ungodly men.

8 But, beloved, be not ignorant of this one thing, that one day is with the Lord as a thousand years, and a thousand years as one day.

9 The Lord is not slack concerning his promise, as some men count slackness ; but is longsuffering to us-ward, not willing that any should and amidst water. The Apostle speaks in the language of David, Ps. xxiv. 2, "He hath founded (the world) upon the seas and established it upon the floods," and Ps. cxxxvi. 6, "He stretched out the earth above the waters."

6. By which means. The Greek is here in the plural δι' αὐτοῦ, and there has been no plural antecedent. But the reference of the pronoun seems to be to the twice-mentioned water of the previous verse. The waters above the firmament and those under it were alike employed to bring about the deluge. The fountains of the great deep were broken up and the windows of heaven were opened.

the world that then was] The world (κόσμος) must be used here in a limited sense, for it was only the inhabitants of the earth that perished. The destruction was not like that which is to come hereafter when "the heavens being on fire shall be dissolved."

being overflowed with water, perished] The very element out of which and amidst which the earth had been compacted was employed as the means of its destruction. And it is against Him these mockers scoff, at whose word the same agencies become, according to His will, creative or destructive.

7. But the heavens that now are. In contradistinction to the "new heavens" spoken of below in verse 13.

and the earth, by the same word have been stored up for fire. Here some authorities read "by his word." It makes no difference to the sense. The argument is that as in the ancient world, created by God's word, there was, even in the materials whereof the earth was created, a means whereby it could be destroyed, so hereafter the heavens and the earth are to be destroyed by that other element which now tends so much to their conservation. That the future destruction of the world shall be by fire cf. Isai. lxvi. 15; Dan. vii. 10, and especially Mal. iv. 1, "The day that cometh shall burn them up." And point had been given to all these predictions by the language of our Lord, Matt. xxiv. 19, and other similar passages.

It is possible, though not so satisfactory, to construe πυρὶ = "with fire," and then the sense would be that the agency was already prepared by which they should be destroyed. It is better to take πυρὶ with the verb which precedes it, than to render as the A.V. "reserved unto fire against the day of judgment."

being reserved against the day of judgment and destruction of ungodly men. And at that day not only shall the earth be destroyed, but the sun shall be darkened, the moon shall not give her light, the stars shall fall from heaven, and the powers of the heavens shall be shaken. This shall be the birthday of the new heavens and the new earth, wherein righteousness shall dwell, the ungodly having been swept away from it as the sinners from the world before the flood.

"The destruction of ungodly men" is explained (2 Thess. i. 9) as being wrought "by the face of the Lord and the glory of his might, when he shall come to be glorified in his saints," just as (2 Thess. ii. 8) the lawless one is said to be slain "with the breath of his mouth, and brought to nought by the manifestation of his coming."

8—13. The Apostle gives another argument against the mockers. Time is no element in the counsels of Him who is from eternity to eternity. When His promise seems to tarry, it is mercy which holds back His hand. He will have all men to be saved. But the day of the Lord will come suddenly, and the destruction by fire shall come to pass as Christ foretold. The thought of this should be an incentive to godly living, and specially so unto those who look earnestly for the fulfilment of God's promise of a new heaven and a new earth in which only righteousness shall dwell.

8. But forget not this one thing, beloved. Be not ye like these mockers, forgetful of what the older Scriptures should have taught them. The allusion in the verse is to Ps. xc. 4, "A thousand years in thy sight is but as yesterday." For God time, as men regard it, exists not. So His doings cannot be subjected to human standards.

9. The Lord is not slack, &c.] The idea which the Apostle desires to express is that the Lord, who has made the promise, does not, for any reason of His own, delay the fulfilment thereof.

as some men count slackness] Which would be that men might be tardy in fulfilling what perish, but that all should come to repentance.

10 But the day of the Lord will come as a thief in the night; in the which the heavens shall pass away with a great noise, and the elements shall melt with fervent heat, the earth also and the works that are therein shall be burned up.

11 Seeing then that all these things shall be dissolved, what manner of they had promised because they would gain by the delay. God deals not so with men; when He is slow, it is that they may be the gainers.

but is longsuffering to you-ward] All the best authorities are in favour of the pronoun of the second person.

God's delay of the day of judgment is an illustration of that character in which He revealed Himself when He proclaimed His name unto Moses (Exod. xxxiv. 6), "The Lord, the Lord God, merciful and gracious, long-suffering," but even there it is added for the warning of mockers, "that will by no means clear the guilty."

not desiring that any should perish] Man being allowed free-will in his actions may sin, and though God gave man free-will and must have foreseen that he would fall, yet it was not of God's will that he fell, and a way was prepared at once for his redemption; and this provision declares that from everlasting God has been the same, not desiring that any should perish, but offering to the fallen the way of life.

but that all should come to repentance] St Paul (1 Tim. ii. 4) says the same in other words, "He willeth that all men should be saved and come to the knowledge of the truth." And the way unto this "knowledge of the truth" is by repentance (2 Tim. ii. 25), and this repentance is the gift of God, but He offers it to all who will accept it. And this is hinted at in the word χωρῆσαι, which is not the simple word "to come," but contains in itself the notion of "opening for the reception of anything," and so shewing a readiness to accept it.

10. But the day of the Lord] The expression is common in the Old Testament to signify the advent of the Messiah, and is found from Isaiah to Malachi, usually connected with the idea that His coming would be a time of judgment. In consequence it was readily adopted by the New Testament writers (1 Thess. v. 2), and also the form "the day of Christ," to signify the second Advent (cf. 1 Cor. i. 8; Phil. i. 6; 2 Thess. ii. 2).

will come as a thief] The Text. Rec. adds ἐν πυρρί, but the best authorities reject the words, which are probably an insertion to make this verse accord with 1 Thess. v. 2. Both passages are founded on Christ's words, Matt. xxiv. 43.

in the which the heavens shall pass away with a great noise] βοῆς ἡδὸν = with a great noise, is a root which is used to describe the noise of bees, the sound of flights of birds, the whizzing of weapons through the air, and the din of cataracts of water.

shall pass away] is Christ's own word (Luke xxi. 33) of the destruction of heaven and earth.

and the elements shall be dissolved with fervent heat] The so-called elements, viz. fire, air, earth and water, cannot all be included in the term here, for one of them is to be employed as the agency whereby all nature's composition shall be unloosed. Some have therefore confined the word στοιχεῖα here to the sun and the planets, the heavenly bodies, a signification which the word undoubtedly has in some astronomical writings. But this seems too late and technical a sense to be that intended by St Peter. He rather employs it of the whole constitution of the world, and means that as water was the agency of destruction in the ancient world, so at the last day fire shall not be restrained within its own domain, but prevail over and bring to nought all else. The participle translated "with fervent heat" is found only here and in verse 12.

the earth also and the works that are therein shall be burned up] "The works that are therein" refers to all man's creations, and everything which he has done. And in this connection some editors have preferred a reading, which has very early MS. authority, "shall be discovered," instead of "shall be burned up." This sense joins on very well with the question in the next verse, "What manner of men ought ye to be?" and accords with the language of verse 7, where in connection with the destruction by fire we have the mention of "the day of judgment and destruction of ungodly men."

But the use of εὐρίσκειν is of persons seeking to find something out, and its passive could hardly be made to bear the sense "shall be found out" when used of things. So it has been proposed to render this clause interrogatively, "And shall the earth and the works therein be found?" (i.e. remain at such a time). But the reading though undoubtedly old has not been accepted by many editors and is beset with much difficulty.

11. Seeing that these things are thus all to be dissolved. For οὐν = then, good authorities read οὕτως = thus.

what manner of men ought ye to be] The persons ought ye to be in all holy conversation and godliness,

Dr, hast-
ing the ming. 12 Looking for and ¹hasting unto the coming of the day of God, wherein the heavens being on fire shall be dissolved, and the elements shall melt with fervent heat?

13 Nevertheless we, according to word rendered what manner has the primary signification "of what country," and seems to indicate that the life of the Christian should be one which shewed that he was looking for a better country.

in holy life and godliness. The old word "conversation" has lost its meaning, which was an admirable rendering of ἀνατροφή in 1611 (see above, ii. 7). The life of the believer will be in marked contrast to that which these false teachers allow and practise.

12. Looking for and earnestly desiring the coming of the day of God] The second verb in its literal signification = "to hasten." This sense is accepted here by some as intimating that the diligence in holy living among God's people will sooner bring on the day of God, and therefore their lives may in a sense be said to hasten it on. This was the rendering of Erasmus, Expectantes et accelerantes adventum dei. But the conception is not in accord with other parts of Scripture, and the word σπεύδω is elsewhere used in the New Testament only intransitively. Thus the sense of "earnest desire" is to be preferred. The old expression of the A.V. meant this, though it is not clear to a modern reader. The transitive sense is also noticed in the margin of A.V.

the coming] (lit. the presence) is the word constantly used of the second advent of Christ. Thus (Matt. xxiv. 3), "What shall be the sign of thy coming?" And St Peter here expressly names that coming, the day of God, even by his form of words testifying to that teaching which fills the whole Epistle, and was cast off by the false teachers who denied the divinity of Jesus. In all other places "the presence" (παρουσία) is spoken of as the coming of the Lord Jesus Christ, and St Peter, feeling the needs of his day, takes the opportunity of modifying the expression so as to emphasize the truth which was being denied.

by reason of which the heavens being on fire shall be dissolved] The original does not signify "wherein," as A.V., but that the coming of the Son of Man shall be the cause of all these signs and destruction. This is in harmony with the language of St John (Rev. xx. 11), where it is said, "From whose face the earth and the heaven fled away, and there was found no place for them."

and the elements shall melt, &c.] The verb his promise, look for new heavens and a new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness.

14 Wherefore, beloved, seeing that ye look for such things, be diligent that ye may be found of him in peace, without spot, and blameless.

15 And account that the longsufis not the same as in verse 10. It is stronger in force and implies not only the relaxation of all the bonds of nature, but the wasting away of the whole universe from its place.

13. But according to his promise. The promise is that made through Isaiah (lxv. 17), "Behold, I create new heavens and a new earth," and as that only which is righteous can be permanent before God, the prophet says (lxvi. 22), "The new heavens and the new earth, which I shall make, shall remain before me, saith the Lord." It is the coming of Christ which is to destroy that lawless one whom the Lord will consume with the breath of His mouth (2 Thess. ii. 8), and the same shall be the lot of all that is unrighteous. Cf. Rev. xxi. 27. In the city of the Lord, the Zion of the Holy One of Israel, "the people shall be all righteous" (Isai. lx. 21).

14—18. The Epistle closes with an earnest exhortation to holiness of life because Christ's coming is expected, and also to a right conception of the longsuffering of the Lord. The Apostle enforces the latter part of his admonition by a reference to the teaching of St Paul, and exhorts that those who had been thus taught should stand fast in the truth, and strive by adding grace to grace to know still better their Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ.

14. Wherefore, beloved, seeing that ye look for these things] that is, for the promise of the new heaven and the new earth, strive to prepare that you may be fit to be received into those everlasting habitations.

give diligence that ye may be found of him in peace] The thought in the last two words is illustrated by St Paul (1 Thess. v. 23), "The very God of peace sanctify you wholly." By this sanctification alone can men look with peace for the coming of the day of the Lord, and this St Paul shews by the way in which his prayer in that verse continues, "and may your spirit and soul and body be preserved entire without blame at the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ."

without spot, and blameless in his sight. Conformed as much to the likeness of Christ as sinful men may be. He was without spot and blameless (Eph. i. 4), and if God sanctify us wholly we shall then be made like unto Him. It is better to connect αὐτῷ closely with fering of our Lord is salvation; even as our beloved brother Paul also according to the wisdom given unto him hath written unto you;

16 As also in all his epistles, speaking in them of these things; in which are some things hard to be understood, which they that are un-ἀμώμητοι, though no doubt the pronoun relates both to the word that follows and to that which precedes it.

The character of the Apostle's exhortation is framed with reference to the dangers of the time arising from those false teachers whom he has called "spots and blemishes" (ii. 13).

15. And account that the longsuffering of our Lord is salvation] Cf. v. 9. The passage in the writings of St Paul which comes nearest to the language of this verse is Rom. ii. 4, which Epistle, being written to the Jews as well as the Gentile converts at Rome, might by the end of St Peter's life be well known and circulated among the churches of Asia. But the spirit of the words is to be found elsewhere in St Paul's Epistles (cf. 1 Tim. ii. 4; Tit. ii. 11).

even as our beloved brother Paul...wrote unto you] The use of the plural pronoun "our" is very natural, for if St Paul had already written to the churches for which the present Epistle was intended, he would be dear to them as to St Peter; and in his labours among "all the churches" he may have been known by face to some to whom St Peter was writing. "Beloved" (ἀγαπητός) is a word applied four times in this chapter to those to whom the Epistle was sent, and seems to have been like "brother" (ἀδελφός), a term of affection much used among the first Christians. It is found very frequently in St Paul's Epistles, and we can quite understand that St Peter would use it in speaking of St Paul, just as he would of other members of the Christian churches. But it is not easy to believe that a writer in the second century would thus have spoken of one who in the mouths of all who then allude to him is mentioned in terms of highest reverence, as sanctified, blessed, glorious and divine. Some such epithets would have been sure to have been applied at that date in a passage which like the present admits of the largest praise being bestowed on the Apostle of the Gentiles.

For the use of ἀδελφός cf. Acts ix. 17, xxi. 20, and numerous passages in St Paul's Epistles.

according to the wisdom given unto him] St Paul though comparing himself to a wise master-builder, yet speaks of his own labours as wrought "according to the grace of God which was given unto him" (1 Cor. iii. 10). There can be no doubt that his learning and special training in the Jews' religion made him in every way the most prominent and able member of the Apostolate, and that his influence is no more than duly represented by the large share which his writings occupy in the New Testament. To St Peter his wisdom would be the more abundantly apparent after the spread of Christianity so widely among the Gentiles.

wrote to you. The verb is aorist. We cannot tell what Epistle is here alluded to. The Epistles of St Peter were written to Christians scattered throughout Asia Minor, in which region were the churches of Galatia, Ephesus and Colossæ, to which St Paul wrote Epistles that still remain, and of Laodicæa, to which he also sent an Epistle (Col. iv. 16). Now without speculating whether there may not have been other Epistles of St Paul known to St Peter which are not preserved to us (and we know that some of his letters have not come down to us), there is enough in the Epistles to the Ephesians and Colossians, concerning diligent preparation for the coming of Christ, of being without spot and blemish, and of the mercy of God in man's salvation, to give abundant foundation for St Peter's remark. To take only a few instances: (Eph. i. 4) "God therefore chose us in Christ before the foundation of the world, that we should be holy and without blemish before him in love." Eph. ii. 8, "By grace ye have been saved through faith; and that not of yourselves: it is the gift of God." Cf. also Eph. iv. 5, v. 27; also Col. i. 22, ii. 8 (a warning against teachers such as St Peter had in his thoughts when writing).

16. As also in all his epistles] These words shew that St Peter had not in his mind any one single topic on which St Paul had written, but those general lessons and warnings which are found in all his letters, to avoid false teaching, to stand fast in the Lord, to be steadfast, unmoveable, and always abounding in the work of the Lord, knowing that it would not be in vain that they laboured thus in the Lord.

speaking in them of these things] This clause also shews that there were many points of St Paul's teaching in the writer's thoughts on which that Apostle's lessons had been to the same effect, and given with a foresight of like dangers with those which St Peter saw to be coming.

wherein. There is a variation here in the MSS. between οἷς and αἷς. The latter has been more largely adopted by modern editors, and this would make the relative refer to the "Epistles," while οἷς would be connected with τούτων immediately preceding it, and would imply that among the subjects on which St Paul had given his lessons, and for which St Peter was referring to him, there were some hard to be understood. Which certainly would be true; but it seems better to suppose learned and unstable wrest, as they do also the other scriptures, unto their own destruction.

17 Ye therefore, beloved, seeing ye know these things before, beware lest ye also, being led away with the error of the wicked, fall from your own steadfastness.

18 But grow in grace, and in the knowledge of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. To him be glory both now and for ever. Amen.

that the Apostle was here speaking of the general difficulties which are to be found in many parts of St Paul's writings.

are some things hard to be understood] A statement as true now as when St Peter wrote it, though we cannot tell to what difficult matters he may be alluding, except by reflecting on what subjects St Paul's teaching was wrested in the early days of the Church.

which the ignorant and unstedfast wrest. The three principal words in the sentence are peculiar to St Peter and to this Epistle, the first adjective and the verb being found only in this verse. The full sense of the verb is "to put on the rack, to subject to torture," and it is very expressive of the violent methods of those who made St Paul contradict St James, or St Peter, or St John.

There are many points of St Paul's doctrine which might be wrested in this way, as that concerning "the liberty with which Christ makes men free," and also that statement "where sin abounded there grace did much more abound," which some men might conceive to be a warrant for doing evil that good might come.

as they do also the other scriptures] Thus St Peter includes the Epistles of St Paul among the "Scriptures" (γραφαί). This word is used in the New Testament of the Old Testament Scriptures alone, except in this passage. The noun in the singular number may be found applied to some words (James iv. 5) which are not found in either the New Testament or the Old Testament, but the use of the plural is limited to the Holy Scriptures, and indeed the adjective "holy" (ἅγιοι) is not unfrequently joined with it. We may therefore conclude that as the Mount of Transfiguration was beginning to rank side by side with Sinai as "the holy mountain," so there were being gathered even at this date a body of writings concerning Christ and His Church which were to form a new covenant to be set forth to fulfil and in a degree to supersede the older Scriptures, and among these writings the Epistles of St Paul were included.

unto their own destruction] The lessons of the false teachers have been called "heresies of destruction" (ii. 1), and such as should bring on those who held them "swift destruction," and it is said (ii. 12) "in their destroying they shall surely be destroyed." And even when the errors and torturings of Scripture are made by the ignorant and unstedfast without the malicious aim of leading others astray, nothing but destruction can await those who thus abuse what is written.

17. Ye therefore, beloved, knowing these things before] i.e. that false teachers shall come and beguile the unstedfast, and that the end will be destruction both to the deceivers and the deceived.

beware that ye be not led away with the error of the wicked] The same word for "wicked" has been applied (in ii. 7) to the people of Sodom in the days of Lot, and there is no doubt that the sensual indulgence which the Gnostic teachers permitted to their followers was a bait quite as powerful as, if not more powerful than, any pride which they might rouse in men by their profession of superior knowledge.

and fall from your own steadfastness] Which, as has been before noticed, St Peter was specially charged to secure among his brethren. The word στηριγμός is only found here.

18. But grow in grace] The food which shall promote such growth is described 1 Pet. ii. 2, "spiritual guileless milk," which can only be longed for by those who have put away all malice, guile, hypocrisy, envies, and evil speaking; and the steps of this growth are marked 2 Pet. i. 5—7, and there we are told that the result shall be a progress toward full "knowledge of our Lord Jesus Christ."

and in the knowledge of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ] Here he calls Jesus not only Lord (as in i. 8), but Saviour also, this being the doctrine for which from the outset he has been contending, and which the false teachers, some in one way, some in another, denied. Jesus is the Saviour; men through His promises may become partakers of the divine nature, and may enter into the eternal kingdom. Knowledge of Him would help men to escape the defilements of the world, that they may be found of Him, at His coming in the day of the Lord, without spot and blameless. This is what the Epistle teaches from the beginning to the end.

To him be the glory both now and for ever. Amen] The glory for all the gracious gifts and helps which could come from none but God, therefore to Him be that eternal glory which belongs to God alone.

for ever] is literally "into the day of eternity," i.e. not only in time be the glory given to Christ, but also when time shall be no more. When that day of eternity comes there shall be no night to succeed it, and so the glory will be, like the day, eternal.

Analysis.
Conclusion.

The special favour bestowed upon St John by his Divine Master might have led us to suppose that he must have taken an active part in the propagation of the Gospel. But, in the Acts and Apostolic Epistles, St John is almost completely overshadowed by others, especially by St Peter and by St Paul; he is only five times mentioned in these books¹.

In the Acts of the Apostles he walks, in grave and mysterious silence, beside one apparently better fitted to be a pioneer—one of readier speech and more forward deed. If we contrast him with the other great Apostle, St Paul, it has been well said that both these servants of God seem to preserve, with an almost unvarying uniformity, the attitude in which they were surprised by the call of grace. St Paul has ever something of the horseman, speeding on to Damascus; St John is ever resting on the bosom of Jesus.

We naturally enquire how St John was employed while other Apostles were traversing sea and land.

The sacred legacy bequeathed to him from the Cross—the Virgin-Mother given to the virgin-soul—must have demanded his reverential care. To some it has appeared difficult to reconcile the supposition of his residence with her at Jerusalem with St Paul's distinct assertion that, upon his visit to that city, after his return to Damascus from Arabia, he saw none of the Apostles, except Peter and James the Lord's brother². But, as St John was certainly at Jerusalem during the second visit of St Paul³, his previous absence may have been temporary⁴. It has been conjectured that he returned to Galilee until after the destruction of Jerusalem. In that case St John would have left the Holy Land about A.D. 67.

The undying tradition of the Church that St John lived on far in the first century of the Christian Era, probably to its very close, possibly some two years later (A.D. 102)—after all the other Apostles had entered into their rest—is certainly quite in accordance with the tone of some words of Jesus preserved in St John's Gospel.

¹ Once in the list of the Apostles, Acts i. 13, three times in conjunction with St Peter, Acts iii. 4, iv. 13, viii. 14. Once, again, he is referred to by St Paul, in the same breath with James and Cephas, as universally admitted to be among the chief pillars of the Church, Gal. ii. 9. This is the first and last occasion where St John is recorded to have come into personal relation with St Paul.

² Gal. i. 19.

³ Gal. ii. 9.

⁴ There is, however, no trace of St John's presence at Jerusalem on the occasion of St Paul's last voyage, A.D. 60. (Acts xxi. 17 sqq.)

The incident of the miraculous draught of fishes after the Resurrection¹ has not merely a symbolical but a prophetical significance. St John did not, like St Peter, cast himself into the sea, whose waters are peoples and tongues. His life-work might rather be described by saying that he 'abode'² in the bark of the Church. The action of St Peter (John xxi. 7) might find its interpretation in an energetic mission to the islands of the sea; the words about John addressed by Jesus to Peter (John xxi. 22) might be more suitable to the quiet life of one who bore the name of John in later days—the English priest and poet, John Keble, "abiding" in the parish where his body rests. The first incident may indicate the young impulse of elastic life with which St Peter threw the Gospel net at Pentecost, or flung himself forward into the sea of humanity as a missionary of the Cross. One single word in the question of Jesus (v. 22) compresses a whole biography of blessed uneventful years; and well denotes the work of the old man, "abiding" in the Church, even to the close of the first century, and helping to draw the net, filled with fishes, safely to the shore³.

2. Until recent times, it would scarcely have occurred to any ordinary writer to do much more than indicate some of the many ancient writers⁴ who connect the later years of St John's prolonged life with the city of Ephesus. It was unhesitatingly believed that the Apostle found his way to Asia Minor, and died there at a very advanced age. Indeed, a very singular legend was associated with his grave at Ephesus⁵. The most destructive critics—even those who disbelieved in the authenticity of the Gospel, of the Epistles, of the Apocalypse—acquiesced in the universal tradition which gave to Ephesus the honour of a lengthened residence of St John¹. Keim appears to have first raised any serious question upon the subject². His view is based upon the conjecture that John ‘the Elder’ is confounded with St John the Apostle, and that in what is related by ancient writers the first is confused with the second. The same hypothesis has been still more recently supported by Scholten³. The answer to this exaggerated scepticism—which even M. Renan considers an instance of “the excessive spirit of negation which has come into the Protestant liberal school in the last 25 years”—seems to rest upon three evidences of undeniable solidity.

⁵ The story which represents St John as actually alive in his Ephesian tomb, and the earth as heaving with his slumber, is related (as "in quibusdam Scripturis, quamvis Apocryphis") by St Augustine. 'Tractat. 124 in Evang. Joann.' The whole subject is discussed with great learning and completeness by the late Dr Mill. 'Five Sermons on the Nature of Christianity.' Note B. pp. 147—149.

(a) The first of these is contained in the earlier chapters of the book of the Revelation.

These chapters—whatever view be taken of the authenticity and genuineness of the Apocalypse, and to whatever author it is assigned—form an argument of overwhelming weight for the Apostle’s connection, not only with Asia Minor, but with its Metropolis. If Scholten’s hypothesis be correct, the Christians of Ephesus and of the other Churches addressed in the Apocalyptic Epistles must have perfectly well known that St John had never been in Asia Minor. But it would have been palpably absurd to suppose that these Churches would have attached the slightest importance to the counsels or warnings of a writer who addressing them authoritatively spoke of John as an exile at Patmos¹, while yet he must have been aware that they, beyond any other Christians in the world, were certain that the Apostle had never sojourned in those regions at all. If the writer of the Revelation were not St John, it must at least have been some one who had absolute assurance of St John’s connection with Asia Minor and of his exile to Patmos. But Patmos leads us irresistibly to Ephesus. That little island was scarcely visited except by voyagers on the way from Ephesus to Rome, and from Rome to Ephesus. It was one resting-place for the night, on the system of short sails between the two cities. The tone of the whole of the three opening chapters of the Apocalypse is that of a metropolitan of the Asian Church; and Patmos may almost be said to face Ephesus and points towards it².

¹ So certain, indeed, did this seem to Neander, that he applies it to solve the mystery (for him) of the upgrowth of episcopacy. Neander writes from his point of view—“the constitution of the Church of Asia Minor in the time of Polycarp is different from the time of Paul. We are forced to suppose a powerful influence at work.” Hence the modern fashion of attributing diocesan episcopacy exclusively to St John, and styling it with some German scholars “the Johannic system.” Yet we find episcopacy not only in the Churches of Asia Minor in the Apocalypse—in the days of Polycarp. St James the Less presides over the Church at Jerusalem. St Paul, “called to diffuse himself over the whole world,” will have Titus remain at Crete, Timothy at Ephesus (1 Tim. i. 3; Titus i. 5). It is not of course intended to deny the important part which St John played in the organization of the Church. “Habemus et Joannis alumnas Ecclesiarum...ordo Episcoporum, ad originem recensens, et Joannem stabit auctorem.” Tertullian, ‘adv. Marc.’ iv. 5.

(b) The second evidence is that of Irenæus. It is unnecessary to quote at length one of the best-known pieces of early Christian literature—the fragment of the Epistle of Irenæus to Florinus, preserved by Eusebius in his Ecclesiastical History. Irenæus in mentioning the sojourn of St John in Asia Minor appeals to no dim tradition. He has a clear recollection of Polycarp whom he remembered in his youth—“where he sat to talk, his way, his mode of life, his appearance...how he used to tell of his intimacy with John, and with the others who had seen the Lord¹." The ingenious attempt of Scholten to invalidate the authority of the letter by making it out to be apocryphal is unavailing, as Irenæus uses almost the same language in another of his writings².

² “The only way of getting to Patmos has remained the same since the days of St John. One must engage at Mycone, the most easterly of the Cyclades, or at Scala Nova, the port of Ephesus, a little vessel, decked well or ill, and manned by four or five sailors. We embarked boldly with the chances of a passage under sail, which might last twelve hours at least, perhaps indefinitely longer. We set out from Mycone at midnight; we were at Patmos the next day just before sunset.” This extract is from a delightfully vivid paper which has come into the writer’s possession. (‘Une visite à Patmos,’ par M. de Julleville. ‘Revue des cours littéraires.’ Mars 2, 1867.)

(c) The third witness is that of Polycrates.

We still possess a fragment of a synodical epistle written by Polycrates, Bishop of Ephesus, to Victor and the Roman Church about the close of the second century. Polycrates wrote with the other Bishops of Asia in favour of the celebration of Easter at the same time with the Jews *decimaquarta luna*³. Polycrates speaks of the mighty ashes which sleep in Asia⁴ to awaken at the advent of the Lord, when He shall come with glory from the heavens, and raise up all His saints. He mentions specially Philip (of the number of the twelve), who sleeps in Hierapolis; and his two daughters who grew old in their virginity; and another daughter of his, having served the Church in the Holy Spirit, who taketh her rest in Ephesus—"yea, and John, moreover, who reclined upon the breast of the Lord, who was a High Priest, bearing the plate of pure gold¹, and martyr, and teacher. He 'sleepeth in Ephesus.'" It is unnecessary to enter upon the controversy which has been waged as to the literal or metaphorical interpretation of St John's wearing "the plate of gold²." Polycrates at all events states that the Apostle had the threefold glory of being high priest, martyr, and doctor, and that he sleeps in Ephesus³.

It is conceived that evidence such as this—local and unequivocal as it is—renders the connection of St John with Asia Minor and Ephesus one of the best attested facts of early Christian antiquity⁴.

3. Some description of the great city thus associated with the ministry of St John, is not only demanded by a craving of the modern spirit, but adds vividness to our appreciation of St John's writings.

The importance of Ephesus is abundantly attested. For Pliny it is "the light of Asia." By Seneca it is compared

² The same expression is used also in reference to James, brother of the Lord, first Bishop of Jerusalem (Epiphan. 'in Hæres.' LXXVIII.); and to St Mark the Evangelist—(of the last for a different reason, because supposed to be of the lineage of Aaron, Col. iv. 10; cf. Acts iv. 36. 'Passio S. Marc.' quoted by Valesius, apud Routh, ut supra.) Dr Routh adopts the metaphorical interpretation. Cotta's monograph on the subject is said to be exhaustive. ('De Lamine Pontif. App. Joann. Jacob. et Marci,' Tubing. 1754.)

⁴ Considerable use has been made in this section of Renan, 'L'Antechrist,' pp. 559—562.

² Ἐπειτα Ἰωάννης καὶ αὐτὸς ἐξέδωκε τὸ εὐαγγέλιον, ἐν Ἐφέσῳ τῆς Ἀσίας διατρίβων. 'Adv. Hær.' Lib. III. ch. i. In Lib. III. ch. iii., he is said to have lived at Ephesus till Trajan's time. [Lat. Vers.] Scholten's objection is mainly based upon the extraordinary longevity which this narrative would imply in three persons successively—in St John, in Polycarp, in Irenæus. But St John need not have died until A.D. 96—98 (the last seems to be the date assigned by S. Jerome, 'Cat.' IX.), possibly three or four years later, and Irenæus wrote A.D. 180. The author of this Introduction can testify that within the last few years, in or near the city where he is now writing, several individuals were alive who distinctly remembered a remarkable personage—a Bishop—who died in 1802. One of these persons—in this respect something like Polycarp—was able to point out a walk which the Bishop in question had paced up and down, and remembered all that the Bishop had said to him upon one occasion. The writer is also well acquainted with a distinguished physician, still alive (1881), and not in very advanced years, who at an early period of his career was for a short time much thrown with Mr Alexander Knox. But Mr Knox was a personal disciple of John Wesley, and John Wesley died in 1791.

to Alexandria. On a coin of Vespasian it is spoken of as "the chief city of Asia." "Ephesus," writes Lampe, "as the metropolis of Asia was a noble emporium, well adapted for commerce; on the coast of Asia, in the heart of the Mediterranean—central to Asia, Africa, Europe—whence the passage was easy to Syria and Egypt, and so to Greece and Italy¹."

The temple of Diana was the central wonder of Ephesus. After rising on seven different occasions from its ruins it was finally destroyed by the Goths (A.D. 248). As it stood in the days of St John, it "had been reared by the arts of Greece and the wealth of Asia." It was supported by 127 marble columns of the Ionic order, each sixty feet high, each the gift of a nation or of a monarch. The splendid altar was adorned with the sculptures of Praxiteles, the subjects being chosen with especial reference to the popular legend of the place—the birth of Latona's children; the concealment of Phœbus after the slaughter of the Cyclops; the clemency of Dionysus to the Amazons. The Ephesians gloried in their poetical mythology. The spirit of savage fanaticism which raised the cry 'great is Diana of the Ephesians,' and which made 'the city of the Ephesians the temple-keeper of the great Artemis, and of the image which fell down from Zeus²,' is exactly what might be expected from the almost contemporary records of classical antiquity. To Tiberius the Ephesians asserted with hard literalism and dogmatic bigotry that "it was a vulgar delusion to suppose that Artemis and Phœbus were born at Delos. Theirs was the Cenchrean river, theirs the Ortygian grove, where Latona, leaning upon an olive-tree which was still standing, had given birth to those heavenly twins in the grove which was consecrated by their express command. There had Phœbus escaped the wrath of Zeus for killing the Cyclops; there Father Liber had spared the Amazons³." These subjects appear again and again upon the coins of Ephesus, which are stamped with the images and symbols of Artemis and Phœbus, of the river Cenchrea, of the Amazons, of the four temples⁴. The great temple was 220 years in building. It was erected upon the marshes, as being somewhat less liable to entire destruction by the earthquakes so common in that fatal soil. That the foundations might not be too fluid for solidity of superstructure, a sort of frame was formed of coal tramped in and of tight-rammed wool sacks⁵. Ctesiphon is named as the architect by Strabo and Pliny. Beside the miracles of Christian architecture, indeed, the Ephesian temple would have been almost dwarfed into insignificance. Its length was 425 feet, while St Paul's is 500 and St Peter's 620 feet, and the arms of the Christian cross require an amplitude and expansion far beyond that of the oblong pagan shrine. The epistylon excited the astonishment of beholders. How was that enormous mass lifted to such a stupendous elevation? It was effected by an ingenious device. Sacks filled with sand were heaped up until they rose higher than the columns. Then the lower sacks were gradually emptied, that the work might settle down in its bed. The erection of the structure was difficult. The architect's resources and ingenuity were taxed to the utmost. At last he seemed to be baffled, and contemplated suicide. Wearied and worn out he fell asleep; and lo! in the night the present goddess appeared to him in a vision, and bid her servant live and not die, for she herself had taken order that the stones should settle into their places. And it was so when day dawned; for the whole mass was brought into place by its own weight⁶.

As the modern reader peruses the narratives of travellers, his fancy catches at some illustrations of the writings of St John. One recent writer tells us how he visited the marshy and verdant plain covered with the remains of Ephesus. The nature of the vegetation, the ³ Tacit. 'Annal.' III. 61. "Ortygia, a little above the sea, a glorious grove with trees of every kind, especially cypress. The river Cenchrea flows through it, where Latona washed. They shew the shrine in which the swaddling clothes are kept, and the olive-tree by which they said the goddess first rested, when her flocks which grazed in the deep grass, the grandeur of the ruins, the extent, the solitude, the broken arches of the long aqueduct, recalled irresistibly the sombre majesty of the Roman Campagna. While examining the semi-circle of the theatre, the traveller was struck by the aspect of the sky, and its strange effect upon the landscape. Towards the mountain the sky was grey and rainy; overhead copper-coloured clouds passed over clouds of spectral whiteness. At intervals pale gleams illuminated the immense ruins, the severe outline of the hills, the desert plain. Then all was shadowy—until looking seaward the sky was of brilliant azure, and the Ionian light began to grow pure and full¹. Was the Apostle thinking of some effect like this when he wrote—“because the darkness (or shadow) is drifting by, and the Very light now enlighteneth”²? “In the sides of Mount Preon,” says the writer lately quoted, “gape two tenantless grottoes. As we go down into their depths; as our eyes are lifted up to the black and yellow rocks only half-lighted by a mysterious gleam; as we ascend to the day again by a scarped path in the cliff, through masses which seem to have been piled there by some suddenly interrupted convulsion, we are tempted to think that the eagle of the Revelation may have sometimes lingered in the hollow rock, and have had in these truly Apocalyptic caverns a foretaste of the terrible visions of Patmos³.” All this may be fanciful. What seems to be as certain as almost any historical fact of the kind is that amidst these very scenes the Apostle St John found Christians to teach, and the very forms of error which he was divinely trained to encounter and overthrow. There were numerous churches in that quarter, founded by St Paul during his third missionary journey, A.D. 55—58. From the well-known passage in Pliny we learn that Christians abounded in the province of Bithynia. There, in Ephesus, St John remained for many years, the inheritor, the completer, the organiser of the work whose foundation had been so deeply laid by St Paul¹. “At the foot of the shrine of Diana of the Ephesians”—writes an eloquent historian of the Church—“under a sky blazing with light: in an atmosphere loaded with brilliant vapours; to minds enamoured of mystic initiations, and for the purpose of refuting heresies which naturally sprung from a soil so teeming, he developes, in a language full of grandeur, the sublime simplicity of Christian Metaphysics².”

One local allusion at least can scarcely be fanciful. Let any student of the First Epistle of St John read its six closing words³ in the light of Acts xix. 34, 35, and of the passages cited above from Strabo and Tacitus, and he will better see their force. The Epistle closes with a shudder—“the idols.”

II.

I. Commentators are, perhaps, responsible for having excited prejudice against the Epistle now before us by exaggerating the extent of its polemical element. When the student sees the formidable list of heresies to which St John refers, or is supposed to refer, he may be tempted to exclaim—“This is an obsolete chapter in the history of human error. These theological scare-crows are nothing to us now. The refutation of errors, which to us in the 19th century have the air of coming from some treatise on lunacy, has little meaning in our day⁴.” Now we do not deny the polemical purpose of parts of this Epistle, as will be seen. But St John does not confine himself to the eccentric and fortuitous forms of temporary error. He deals with its essential and permanent substance. Had the Apostle been hunting down local heretics in every verse, Gospel and Epistle alike would have become obsolete with their overthrow. But the Antichrists of whom he tells us that “they are come, have come into being⁵,” were the exponents, in that age, of errors which will appear, again and again, in other shapes, until the last dark and dreadful spirit shall arrive, whose advent is spoken of by the same solemn word as the Saviour's own¹. While we hold with Mosheim that Hammond has exceeded all bounds in his passion for "detecting Gnostics where there are none" in almost every verse of this Epistle, it is also certain that it contains an important polemical element. In it St John furnished the Church with infallible guidance against forms of error, which might have proved fatal to her very existence.

2. It is perfectly certain that the prophetic words addressed by St Paul to the elders of the Church of Ephesus², many years before the issue of St John's Epistles, had received ample fulfilment. Peculiar germs of speculative error were in the teeming air of Asia Minor, which were destined to find an appropriate nidus in the Church herself. A few years later (A.D. 65—66) St Paul deems it necessary to warn Timothy, as Bishop of Ephesus, against the 'polemics' or 'antitheses' of 'the gnosis that is falsely so called'. Elsewhere, in the same Epistle, he speaks of 'myths and genealogies'—not Jewish 'stemmata,' but systems of divine potencies, which the gnostics and gnosticising Rabbis loved to call æons, drawn out in what seemed lines of unending complication and tenuity³. The 'genealogies' are assuredly those of the æons, the successive emanations of existences from the bosom of the Infinite. The deceptive wisdom is that of the gnosis. St Paul signalized this error; St John confuted it.

3. This was, probably, one of the gravest dangers which Christianity has had to undergo. Gnosticism was not a partial, it was, so to speak, a Catholic heresy. Its object was to take the Christian creed; to transform, and apparently spiritualize it; to elevate the faith into a philosophy—a knowledge—and then to substitute this knowledge for the faith, concealing the deception by retaining the terminology of the Gospel. Gnosticism was eclectic. On the side of Greece and Hellenic Egypt, Platonism, Stoicism, and Pythagoreanism—on the side of Persia and India, Parseeism and a pantheistic cosmogony supplied it with materials.

The two most important features of this singular system were its dualistic and doketic aspects. Dualism asserted that the good and the evil of creation proceeded from two principles, one good, the other evil,—the one light, the other darkness¹. But spirit was the good influence, co-extensive with light. Matter was the power of evil, whose home is the realm of darkness. A mind thoroughly imbued with these ideas could only look at the dogma of the Incarnation from one point of view. The Christian Church taught that the "Word was made Flesh." But how could the Word of Light be hypostatically united to a true material body, plunged in the darkened world of matter? Christ, indeed, had been seen on the earth. But the human flesh which was seen was only apparent. Redemption was a spectral drama played out by unsubstantial shadows. A shadow was nailed in appearance to an apparent cross². Philosophical dualism was by a

² It is impossible to mistake the exuberant fulness of language, so unusual with St John, in 1 John i. 1, 2, 3, the emphatic I. X. ἐν σαρκὶ ἐληλυθότα, 1 John iv. 2, ἐρχόμενον ἐν σαρκί, 2 John 7, the reference to the blood and water from the real Body, 1 John v. 6. A little later, the same region was still haunted by these shadowy dreamers. Ignatius writes with impassioned energy to the Trallians of Christ who "was truly born, ate and drank; truly suffered: truly was crucified and died: truly rose"—then playing upon their name, λέγουσιν τὸ δοκεῖν πεπονθέναι αὐτὸν αὐτοὶ ὄντες τὸ δοκεῖν ('Epist. ad Trall.' ix. x). In the Epistle to the Church of Smyrna we find this form of error stigmatised as not confessing that "Jesus bore real human flesh" (μὴ ὁμολογῶν αὐτὸν σαρκοφόρον). This heresy upon the Incarnation became, as it was logically bound to be, anti-sacramental. Doketic Christians ceased to observe the Eucharist ('Epist. ad Smyrn.' v—vii). This necessary logical conclusion of Doketism lends additional force to the view of 1 John v. 8, advocated in the notes upon that place, and so clearly put in the paraphrase of a great Calvinistic commentator. "St John means not only that water and that blood which flowed once for all from the side of Christ, and once for all gave their witness to logical necessity theological doketism, anti-dogmatic and anti-sacramental.

The errors with which St John was immediately concerned may be looked upon as heresy of the intellect, heresy of the senses, heresy of the imagination¹.

(a) The heresy with which St John had to deal in its intellectual forms is specially connected with the name of Cerinthus. For Carpocrates, probably, lived somewhat later than Cerinthus, and approached the problems of the day from a different and bitterly anti-Judaistic point of view. What is known of Cerinthus may be best told in the clear language of Dean Mansel.

"The other form of heresy, subsequently known as the Ebionite², appears towards the close of the first century in the person of Cerinthus, a man of Jewish descent³ and educated at Alexandria, the headquarters of that philosophy from which his corruption of Christianity would most naturally emanate. The date of his notoriety as a teacher may be inferred with tolerable certainty from the well-known anecdote recorded by Irenæus on the authority of Polycarp, that St John, Him upon earth—but the water of Baptism, and the Supper of the Lord (which are Sacraments of the blood shed upon the cross), which will be witnesses to Him even to the end of the world." (Piscat. 'Anal. Log. VII. Epp. Cathol.' p. 368. Docketism lingered on to a late date. The Homilies of Chrysostom upon St John were preached about dawn twice a week to earnest Christians. Chrysostom would have been very unlikely to select any heresy for refutation which was not popular and prevalent, a question of the day. But in one place he shews his hearers how to deal with those heretics who said that "all about the Incarnation was putative—a phantasy, a personation, an idea" (ὅτι φαντασία τις ἦν καὶ ὑπόκρισις καὶ ὑπόβρυα τὰ τῆς οἰκονομίας ἀπαντα. S. Chrysost. 'In Joan. Homil.' XI. 2, Tom. VIII. 79, edit. Migne).

² It is not absolutely certain whether any such person as Ebion ever existed. The Ebionites prided themselves upon the derivation of the name of their sect from the Hebrew word for poor (עֲבִיּוֹן). Burton, 'Bampton Lectures,' Works, Vol. III. 182—183.

³ His Jewish descent may be inferred from the character of his teachings; cf. Burton, 'B. L.' p. 477. His study in Egypt is asserted by Hippolytus, VII. 33, and by Theodoret, 'Hær. Fab.' II. 3. Cf. Burton, 'B. L.' p. 175; Milman, 'Hist. of Christianity' II. p. 55. Merinthus, who is sometimes supposed to be a contemporary of Cerinthus (Epiphan. 'Hær.' XXVIII. 8), was probably only a nickname of Cerinthus, from μήρυκος, a cord.

having entered into a bath at Ephesus, and finding Cerinthus within, hastened out of it with the words, 'Let us fly, lest the bath should fall while Cerinthus, the enemy of the truth, is in it'. Other, but less trustworthy, authorities assign to him a yet earlier date. According to Epiphanius, he was one of those Judaizing disciples who censured St Peter after the conversion of Cornelius for having eaten with men uncircumcised, and also one of the multitude who raised a tumult against St Paul on the charge of having brought Greeks into the temple, and one of the false brethren whom St Paul mentions in the Epistle to the Galatians⁴. But the narrative of Epiphanius is very confused, and all these supposed early allusions to Cerinthus are at variance with the statement of Irenæus, who speaks of the Cerinthian heresy as much later than that of the Nicolaitanes⁵.

"The principal features of the teaching of Cerinthus are given in the following brief summary by Irenæus, who is followed almost word for word by Hippolytus. 'A certain Cerinthus in Asia taught that the world was not made by the Supreme God, but by a certain power altogether separate and at a distance from that Sovereign Power which is over the universe, and one which is ignorant of the God who is over all things. He represented Jesus as not having been born of a virgin (for this seemed to him to be impossible), but as having been the son of Joseph and Mary, born after the manner of other men, though distinguished above all others by justice and prudence and wisdom. He taught moreover, that after the baptism of Jesus the Christ descended upon Him in the form of a dove from that Sovereign Power which is over all things, and that He then announced the unknown Father and wrought miracles; but that towards the end (of His ministry) the Christ departed again from Jesus, and Jesus suffered and rose from the dead, while the Christ remained impassible as a spiritual being'.⁶"

² Epiphan. 'Hær.' XXVIII. 2—4. Epiphanius seems to have confounded St Paul's visit to Jerusalem in company with Titus, Gal. ii. 2, Acts xv. 2, with the later one in company with Trophimus, Acts xxi. 29.

The system of Cerinthus at least bore its testimony to the central miraculous fact of Christianity, though it is difficult to see how the resurrection of Jesus could be brought into real coherence with its first principles. But while his Christology was free from the apparently almost insane aberration of later Gnosticism, it is evidently Gnostic¹.

(b) The errors with which St John had to deal as moral heresy—heresy of the senses—appear to have attained formidable proportions. Our Lord, in His letter to the Church of the Ephesians, recognizes the existence of the Nicolaitanes, and commends that Church for its hatred of their deeds². He also speaks of certain in the Church of Pergamos as holding the doctrine of the Nicolaitanes, "which thing I hate³." It is unnecessary to enter here upon the perplexing controversy as to the leader from whom the party took its name—to examine whether the word is formed from the name of "Nicolas, a proselyte of Antioch," one of the seven deacons¹ become an heresiarch², or is to be understood as the Greek translation of Balaam. Nicolaism was plainly a fleshly heresy, antinomian upon principle³—a sensuality half veiled by Gnostic symbols. It is evident what an advantage such a system must have derived from the very sky and soil of Asia Minor. There were Æons, it was said, who actually wished to be served by deeds of unspeakable pollution. But in the walks of the glorious Ortygian grove, by the delightful banks of the Cenchrea or Cayster—near the islands which were haunted by Aphrodite, under the shadow of the Temple of Artemis, beneath that burning and voluptuous sky, the way was smooth for heresy which travelled with the human heart. There were many Christians lapsed into this heresy of the senses, of whom it might be said that "Of sight or sound

Whatever in that clime he found
Did to his mind impart
A kindred impulse, seem'd allied
To his own powers, and justified
The workings of his heart.
Nor less to feed voluptuous thought
The beauteous forms of Nature wrought, Fair trees and gorgeous flowers.
The breezes their own languor lent;
The stars had feelings which they sent Into those favour'd bowers⁴."

The First Epistle of St John sums up and represents the great strain of holy teaching in the Church of Ephesus, which won for it that precious word from the lips of the living Christ, tempering all the righteous severity of the message which was addressed to it—"but this thou hast, that thou hatest the deeds of the Nicolaitanes, which I also hate⁵."

A survey of the sketch given above of the system of Cerinthus by Dean Mansel will shew how that system would naturally lead, if not to Nicolaitan abandonment, at least to a fatally lowered line of Christian action⁶—and that precisely in

['The Gnostic Heresies,' Mansel.—Lecture VIII. pp. 111—113.]

¹ It may be well to supplement the remarks in the text by some sentences from Bishop Pearson's useful summary of the heresies of Asia Minor. "Two principal heresies upon the nature of Christ then prevailed, each diametrically opposed to the other as well as to the Catholic faith. One was the heresy of the Doketæ, which destroyed the verity of the Human Nature in Christ; the other was the heresy of the Ebionites, who denied the Divine Nature and the eternal Generation, and inclined to press the observation of the ceremonial law. Ancient writers acknowledge these as heresies of the first century; all allow that they were powerful in the age of Ignatius. Hence Theodoret (Proem.) divided the books of these heretics into two categories. In the first he included those who put forward the idea of a second Creator, and asserted that the Lord had appeared illusively. In the second he placed those who maintained that the Lord was merely a man. Of the first, Jerome observed ('Adv. Luciferian.' xxiii.) 'that while the Apostles yet remained upon the earth, while the blood of Christ was almost smoking upon the sod of Judæa, some asserted that the body of the Lord was a phantom.' Of the second the same writer remarked that 'St John, at the invitation of the Bishops of Asia Minor, wrote his Gospel against Cerinthus and other heretics—and especially against the dogma of the Ebionites, then rising into existence, who asserted that Christ did not exist before Mary.' Epiphanius notes that these heresies were mainly of Asia Minor (φνημι δὲ ἐν τῇ Ἀσίᾳ). 'Hæres.' LVI." (Pearson, 'Vindic. Ignat.' II. c. 1, p. 351.)

⁶ It is this, rather than absolute profligacy, which Ignatius seems to attribute to the appa-

the way indicated in the First Epistle of St John. The Christology of Cerinthus is Gnostic to its very root. The purpose of Christ's coming into the world is not the procuring of that redemption "which consists in the remission of sins¹," but the illumination of the intellect by a lofty philosophy. He is not, indeed, a Redeemer, a *propitiation*² for the whole world, but the teacher of the enlightened and initiated few³; and a teacher not of righteousness, not of keeping God's plain undeniable commandments, but of speculative *knowledge*⁴. Cerinthus separated Jesus from Christ. He would not admit any real suffering of the higher being who was impassible, or of the lower who was indeed a phantom. Sin and atonement—the nature of the first, the necessity of the second—find no place in his philosophy⁵. St John therefore defines sin; asserts Christ to be a propitiation; and shews the reality of His Death and of the sacraments, which are the abiding witnesses of its existence as a fact and its continuance as a power⁶.

(c) But heresy in Ephesus also clothed itself in the form of oriental Magic.

Ephesus had become a centre for magical practices, for incantations and evocations, for all which in our days might be called spiritualism. In the Acts of the Apostles "exorcists" and "practisers of curious arts" are connected with Ephesus⁷. Magicians came constantly from Asia and Persia with new enchantments, and with supplies of the strange herb omomi, which was supposed to produce a sacred delirium. Alexandria poured forth a crowd of Egyptian diviners. Chaldeans arrived for the purpose of selling their rently Doketic Cerinthian "heterodox" of the Church of Smyrna. "Concerning charity they care not—not for the widow—not for the orphan—not for the afflicted—not for bond or free—not for hungry or thirsty." ('Epist. ad Smyrn.' vi.)

⁴ See the evident references to such a gnosis in 1 John ii. 3, 4, and to false teachers of the kind, iii. 7. St John, indeed, does not mention Cerinthus or the Nicolaitanes. Throughout the epistle he affirms, he never discusses. It is an oracle, not an argument.

calculations. Cabalistic papers, called "Ephesian letters," were in repute throughout the Roman Empire, for the purposes of healing and divination. They were written upon the statue of Artemis, and carved and engraved upon gems in rings. Apollonius of Tyana, the Cagliostro of antiquity, was received with tumultuous welcome at Ephesus. "No artisan," writes Philostratus, "no man of such mean condition who did not quit his work to gaze upon Apollonius. Some marvelled at his knowledge, some at the majesty of his face; some at his austere way of living, others at his singular garb, most at these altogether." Remembering that the great diviners of antiquity—Calchas, Tiresias, Epimenides—had devoted a human victim, Apollonius hounded on the people to murder a poor old beggar, who lived by alms collected in the streets and upon the steps of the temple¹.

What is certain is that over all the gaiety and profligacy of Ephesus there hung an impression of some mysterious awe, of some strange communication with the powers of another world. In his Epistle to the Ephesians St Paul not only refers to the Temple of Artemis², his recognition of the mysteriousness of human life, of its perpetual conflict with evil intelligences—of the "prince of the power of the air, the spirit now in-working in the children of disobedience"³—is nowhere so awful or so ample. In his Gospel St John records no instance of our Lord's miraculous dispossessions of demoniacs, though he recognizes the idea of moral and spiritual possession⁴. The omission may have been partly determined by the false conception of the holy Redeemer as a spiritualist or mighty magician which might have arisen in Ephesus. But St Paul seems to recognize the atmosphere of Ephesus as one in which the Spirit of God⁵ and the spirits of evil¹ worked with a quickened energy. St John's tone is the exact counterpart of this. He does not, indeed, speak of supernatural gifts as continuing in the Churches of Asia Minor; but he does recognize with energy twice over their having chrism from Christ, unction from the Holy One², even as St Paul had twice referred to the "sealing" of the Ephesians—while his warning about the spirits contemplates an awful revelation of the world of evil intelligences around us identical with that which is conveyed in the language of the Epistle to the Ephesians about the powers of darkness³.

¹ It would seem to be quite possible that the visit of Apollonius to Ephesus may have been during St John's residence there. If so, it would give a vivid meaning to 1 John ii. 9—11, iii. 10—15. Contrast with Apollonius Peter and John with the lame beggar at the "Beautiful gate," Acts iii. 1—8.

Thus we recognize a distinct and important polemical element in St John's Epistle⁴. It is not, indeed, a personal element, for no one is named. In this the writer is only consistent with himself. A great Italian poet represents himself as rapt away into Paradise. He looks for the glorified spirit of St John, but can find no form or feature that answers to the Evangelist. And in gazing at the spot to which his eye was turned, he likens himself to one who, in an eclipse, looks at the sun, sees nothing with perfect distinctness, and is dazzled by the effulgence. Certainly St John's Epistle answers to this memorable passage—without address at the beginning; without benediction at the close; without mention of one human name among his contemporaries—all that is merely personal apparently lost in the glory of the Eternal Word, of the Divine Love¹.

4. But the very passages which the conviction of the Church has always associated with the local and temporary controversies of Ephesus and of the first century have within them the "semina æternitatis." Every Christian who is at once a thoughtful student of the Epistle, and a thoughtful observer of the times, must have felt that if these utterances were at first elicited by the spiritual needs of the Christians of Asia Minor, they have an unexhausted meaning for us also. Instances will readily occur.

Men are attempting to make a shadowy ideological Christ—a spiritualized Christ who is not True Man, a human Christ who is not True God. St John tells us how to deal with such figments. "Concerning the Word, Who is the Life, that which we have seen and heard declare we unto you. This is the True God and Eternal Life²."

A Philosophy, confident in its own strength, and arrogating to itself the title of spiritual, would give to a handful of haughty and self-sufficient thinkers, a God without a Christ, or it would offer to us the wretched and impossible compromise of retaining the ethical beauty of Jesus without bowing before the mystery of His Incarnation. Did the old man of Ephesus really see through the storm and mists of ages? Did he know the law by which Deism (so called) is perpetually sinking, first to pantheism, then to atheism? At least he wrote—"Whosoever denieth the Son, the same hath not the Father³."

There are those who would gird in the love of Christ within the narrow rim of a human system, and limit the extent of the redeeming Passion. St John declares that "He is propitiation for our ² 1 John ii. 20—27.

³ 1 John iv. 1, 2, 3. Cf. Ephes. vi. 12.

⁴ It is important to notice that the polemical elements in the Epistle and Gospel exist in precisely the tone and proportions which would naturally follow from the connection of interpénétration. The historian cannot enter upon the discussion of controverted principles without snapping the thread of his narrative, and more or less breaking the firm objective outline which is peculiar to the history as distinct from the treatise. At the same time he may select and arrange his materials so as to form an implicit polemic of great power. "The Word was made Flesh" (John i. 14), contains in germ the refutation of all errors, Cerinthian and Doketic (1 John iv. 2, 3). Without accepting questionable statements of the prolonged existence of a sect, which called itself by the name of John the Baptist and made him the Messiah, the Gospel evidently refers to some exaggerated feeling about the Baptist's office and ministry (John i. 6, 7, 8, 15, 20, 30, iii. 27—30, v. 33). This implicit polemic of the Gospel may well be one of the references of οὐκ ἐν τῷ ἰδεῖν μόνον, 1 John v. 6. See Godet's answer to Meyer, who denies all polemical intention in the Gospel, 'Comment sur l'Evang. de S. Jean,' II. 715. Meyer's view has been used by M. Astié and others as a proof that the Gospel was written at a period when the heresies referred to in the Epistle had ceased to exist, and therefore, many years later.

sins, and not for ours only, but for those of the whole world¹."

There are those who imagine in one quarter that an assumed favour of God does away with the eternal distinction of actions, and makes sin not perilous to believers; those in another who go perilously near to thinking that a man may be "a very good Catholic and a very bad Christian." The Church needs the sharp clear tone which tells us with its simple power that "whosoever committeth sin is of the devil. All unrighteousness is sin²."

There are times when the consciousness that sin is growing subdued within weakens the felt need of Redemption. Here is one who warns us that "the blood of Jesus keeps cleansing us from sin³."

There are times with individual souls, when the brooding consciousness of some particular transgression covers them with a horror of great darkness; or when the heart sinks down in utter prostration, as we look up at the unascended height of moral perfection. But it is written here, "if any man may have sinned, we have an Advocate with the Father⁴."

III.

1. The connection of the Epistle with the Gospel of St John is a subject of the first order of importance. In our discussion we shall endeavour to keep in view two ends—the establishment of resemblances in style and language of such a nature as could only be supposed to proceed from a single mind; and the precise relation which the writer intended the Epistle to bear to the Gospel.

We venture to sum up the phenomena presented by the Epistle when read side by side with the Gospel under three heads—interpenetration, suggestion, circumscription.

(a) By interpenetration it is not meant to lay exclusive stress upon such master-words as appear upon the very surface of the two documents (λόγος, φῶς, σκοτία, ζωή, ἀληθινός, κόσμος, μένειν, γινώσκειν, κ.τ.λ.); nor, again, upon passages which contain actually the same expressions (about nineteen in number)¹. It is intended to indicate such identical expressions as proceed from an identical mould of thought and language. Identical words or phrases in themselves might come from two writers trained in the same school, or from a forger making up a cento for the purpose of deception. Identical moulds of language are something more, and indicate identity of mind and hand much more powerfully.

The following instances are offered rather as specimens than as an exhaustive list:—

(1) The particle δέ occurs in St John's Gospel less frequently than in any other part of the New Testament, except the Epistles of St John, and the Apocalypse.

(2) The name of Jesus is more frequently anarthrous in St John's Gospel than in the others². In Tischendorf's text of that Gospel it appears 233 times, 83 times without the article. In the Epistles it is always anarthrous.

(3) iva referring to a pronoun and used as its complement. Compare

vi. 29.	" iv. 21.
vi. 40.	" v. 3.
xvii. 3.	2 John v. 6; 3 John v. 4.

(4) A peculiar use of the word λείω as equivalent to "evacuating of authority, depriving of force and efficacy, destroying," is found in St John's Gospel alone (ii. 19, v. 18, vii. 23, x. 35). This use is found in the Epistle (1 John iii. 8).

(5) The Gospel and Epistle occasionally employ ποιέω in the unusual sense of "declaring a thing or person to be so and so by word or deed." Compare

² ὁ τὶ—well explained by “tout ce que,” M. Godet, in loc.

³ Note the interesting Sinaitic reading of John xii. 32: “I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all (πάντα) unto Me.” “Non autem dicit omnes sed omnia.” Augustin.

(3) Accessional parallelism is a form of parallelism, in which the second member is always in advance of the first, and the third is occasionally in advance of the second. Of such a parallelism we may say with the critic just quoted—“the heart has never said all; it has always something more to say.” It is not all the truth to say of the eagle of God—“itque reditque per orbem.” (Corn. a Lap. on 1 John iv. 16.) He circles, indeed, round his favourite thoughts; but there is progress, and not mere spiral revolution.

Let us see, in its best-marked instances, this oppositio cum accessione—this rhetorical habit of making the second, or following, member of an antithesis overpass and add emphasis to that which precedes it. It will explain many “expressions which may seem strange to those who have not observed the reason of them.”

1 John ii. 4, 5. [To “keep His word” as one unbroken whole, goes far beyond “keeping His commandments” as isolated precepts.]

Ibid. vv. 4, 5, 6. [“Know Him”—“are in Him”—“abideth in Him”—form the successive points of a grand climax.]

Ibid. vv. 9, 10. [“Abideth in the light” is a step beyond “is in the light.”]

Ibid. v. 11. [A long, dark progress is denoted, “is in darkness”—“walketh in darkness”—“knoweth not whither”—and “darkness hath blinded.”]

Ibid. vv. 13, 14. [v. 14 completes and amplifies the idea of victory in v. 13. In v. 13 we have victory briefly,—“Ye have overcome the wicked one”—in v. 14 the source of that victory—“ye are strong, and the Word of God abideth in you.”]

Ibid. v. 27. [This principle of advance in thought, conveyed by subtle variations of expression, tends to confirm the reading adopted by Tisch. and Reiche in the latter part of the verse. The authority of MSS. is almost equally balanced between “The same anointing,” (τὸ αὐτὸ χρίσμα) and “His anointing” (τὸ αὐτοῦ χρίσμα). But the latter is confirmed by the marked advance of the thought conveyed by it. “The Anointing of Him” shews the relation of Christ and the Spirit more dogmatically and essentially than the expression at the beginning of the verse—"The anointing which ye have received from Him¹."

Ibid. vv. 27, 28. ["Abide in Him"—an advance upon "Ye shall abide in Him." Compare in the inverse order the first and last clauses of v. 24.]

See also i. 6, 7...7, 8, iv. 7, 8, v. 18, 19, and compare in the Gospel, e.g. iii. 17, 18, iv. 20, 21, vii. 37, 38, &c.

The interpenetration, then, of the Epistle by the Gospel is not merely a community of words and expressions. It is something much deeper. It is the proved existence of an identical mould of thought lying behind the words and expressions, and is often the strongest presumption in favour of the supposition that the two productions issue from one individual mind.

(b) The second term which we employ to express the relation of the First Epistle to the Gospel of St John is suggestion. This suggestion is twofold—of the Gospel as a whole, and of its separate portions.

The Epistle suggests the Gospel as a whole.

St John points in it to a certain type and historical representation of Jesus, which he assumes to be before the eyes of those to whom he writes. That type, however, is not within the compass of the Epistle itself, but lies somewhere outside it. The Epistle contains dogma and precept, and it contains nothing more. But it also implies that this historical representation had been published—so far at least as in some way to be perfectly known to them—and that it had been published by St John himself. And he states that the object of this representation is to bring out the things which he himself and others had seen and heard². There is, moreover, a quiet undoubting reference, with perfect assurance of being understood, to a certain picture, mould, or type of the life and character of Jesus, existent and recognized—to a picture beside them, which they might gaze upon and consult.

¹ This (if there were no other reason) would cause us to reject the once famous conjecture of Michaëlis that χρῖσμα slipped into the text by an iotacism for χρησµα, oracle. He uses it as an illustration of his doctrine that the true reading might never have been written in any manuscript, not even in that which came from the sacred author's hand or dictation.

² 1 John i. 3.

It is not, indeed, satisfactory to refer, with one critic¹, the threefold γράφω to the Epistle, the threefold ἔγραψα to the Gospel (1 John ii. 12, 13, 14). It is still less satisfactory, with another critic², to apply all six to the Gospel. But we have no necessity for pressing questionable arguments into the service of the theory before us.

When the Apostle urges upon his children the moral duty of walking continuously, even as He made His one great life-walk, he points them to a definite representation of that Life³.

Worthy of note is the way in which the present (ἐστὶ)—is—is applied to the moral characteristics of Jesus with what may be called an idealizing or presentiating shade of thought ("even as He is pure," 1 John iii. 2; "in Him is no sin," ibid. v. 5; "even as He is righteous," ibid. v. 7). Christ, as He is in the fourth Gospel, is ever present to the eye of the Church; and, in his Epistle, the Apostle points to the picture which he himself had drawn, and which abides engraven upon the plate of the Gospel.

The ideal of holiness is realized in the life of Jesus, and its realization necessarily implies a history and a historian. It, therefore, becomes in the highest degree probable, that the writer of the Epistle points to a Gospel written by himself—and the argument of interpenetration heightens the presumption.

But the phenomenon of suggestion as we lay the Epistle side by side with the Gospel carries us a great deal further. The Epistle is perpetually suggesting questions to the careful reader which he can answer from one book, and one book only, from one Gospel and one Gospel only. Each great leading word or idea in the Epistle is a latent reference, an asterisk pointing to the Gospel. Let us set down instances of this enough to leave no doubt upon the subject.

(c) Finally we have used the word circumscription to express another phenomenon of the relation of St John's Epistle to his Gospel. While writing his Epistle, he purposely circumscribes his pen and thoughts within the circle of the Gospel. Few words indeed are found at all in the letter¹ which are not either in the history or in the discourses, and of these few none which are of capital importance in the vocabulary of Christians, with the solitary exception of *ἰλασμός*². This explains to us the reason of the otherwise singular fact that the four great words—gospel, church, grace, repentance—are not found in St John's First Epistle. It did not suit the purpose of the Spirit that any of these words should be in the discourses of Jesus recorded in the fourth Gospel³.

¹ E.g. ἀλαζονεία (1 John ii. 16), βλος (1 John ii. 16, iii. 17), εἰδωλον (1 John v. 21). Ἀντίχριστος (1 John ii. 18, 22, iv. 3) does not occur in the Gospel. But St John in his Epistle merely names him of whom Jesus had said with such emphasis ἐάν τις εἴπῃ ἐν τῷ ὀνόματι τοῦ υἱοῦ τοῦ ἀνθρώπου (John v. 43). Observe the almost technical term ἐλθῇ. See on Antichrist cometh, note 1 John ii. 18). The substantive πίστις does not occur in the Gospel; it is found once in the Epistle (1 Joh. v. 4), but the verb (πιστεύειν) is in every page of the Gospel.

² 1 John ii. 2, iv. 10.

³ χαρις is found in the proemium of the Gospel three times, i. 14, 16, 17. It occurs in 2 John 3. See note.

St John scarcely takes a step outside the circle of the Gospel; he will hardly write down a word about the spiritual life, however precious in itself, which is not somewhere within its boundaries.

2. But while the First Epistle of St John is thus connected with the Gospel, interlaced through and through at every point—while the connection is not only superficial, but one of interpenetration, suggestion, and circumscription—there is no ground for supposing that the Epistle is a bit of theological marqueterie, cunningly fabricated by piecing together fragments of the Gospel. Such a mode of fabrication must have aimed at a purpose quite inconsistent with the reticence and veiled personality of the Epistle from beginning to end. For it omits precisely everything which such a forgery would be sure to have contained. It does not give us, like one of St Paul's Epistles, either the name of the Apostle, or the names of those to whom it is addressed. It has no salutation at the commencement or at the close. It does not expressly state a single circumstance of the writer, or designate by name any of the heretics whom it is written to refute.

The so-called Epistle to the Laodiceans enables us to estimate with exactitude the inevitable characteristics of such a cento. The lost Greek original of that document may be read in the substantially identical Greek translations of the Latin rendering, given by Elias Hutter¹ and quite recently by Bishop Lightfoot². The most efficacious argument against the authenticity of the Epistle is, as Erasmus said, simply to read it. The words, indeed, are Pauline; for thirty-six verses, chiefly from Philipians, are quoted more or less in a piece which is itself divided into twenty verses. But this fortuitous concourse of Pauline atoms, brought into juxtaposition in space, is destitute of life and purpose. The image of St Paul conjured up for a moment has no heart beating within it. The voice is as the voice of an automaton³. But the Epistle of St John has its own life and characteristics, notwithstanding its intimacy of connection with the Gospel. It develops freely the central dogma and the central moral principle of the Gospel—the Word made Flesh for the love of man; men loving one another as Christ has loved them. The writer does not fear to be independent when necessary; to concentrate the whole work of Christ into a word of his own¹; to designate the great human enemy of Christ and his Church by a name absolutely original²; to change the historical order of the blood and water upon the Cross into the mystical order of the water and blood in the sacraments³. Nay, above all, he does not shrink from giving to Jesus the highest and loftiest of all His titles, which yet our Lord does not ascribe to Himself in any of His recorded words⁴. The great dogmatic words of Christ with which he arms himself do not hang unnaturally about the Apostle in the battle of the faith. They are wings to lift him above the earth, not a burden to cumber him as he moves⁵.

3. This seems to be the proper place for adverting to one often-repeated objection to the historical truth of the discourses of Jesus recorded in the Gospel, which has been derived from the Epistle. The teaching of St John in the Epistles, it is said, is not only the same in substance but in style, in turn of language down to the minutest particular, with the teaching of Jesus in the Gospel. It is evident, therefore, that the writer of the Epistle invented those discourses and placed them in the lips of Jesus¹. Considering the undeniable likeness between the language of our Lord in the Gospel and that of St John in his Epistle, are we forced to recognize "the monotonous tone" of St John's own style—its "obscure gnosis and contorted metaphor"—in the discourses, which can, therefore, lay no claim to historical accuracy? The following considerations enable us to answer this question in the negative.

(a) The opening words of the first Epistle shew us that St John would have found an insuperable moral objection to placing discourses in the mouth of Jesus. "That which was from the beginning—which we have heard."² This at once recalls to us the words of Jesus, more especially His discourses in St John's Gospel. The very place of this clause in the sentence, where hearing stands out above sight and handling, shews us the reverence with which he regarded the words of 'the Word'. It indicates that he would have shrunk from the profanity of turning his Gospel into a fiction or a drama, and inventing language for the Incarnate Wisdom of God.

(b) But, if the similarity between the style of the discourses and that of the Epistle is exaggerated by many, it is, at least, after all deductions, very remarkable. And, if we reject with indignation on behalf of the lie-hating³ Apostle, the supposition that he would invent language, and place it in the lips of his Master, can we find a satisfactory solution of the difficulty? Assuredly we can. Christ, in the days of His flesh, expressed His divine knowledge in words. In His teaching there were two elements, referred to by Himself in the antithesis—"if I have told you of earthly things... if I tell you of heavenly things."⁴ The contrast between "earthly and heavenly" is not equivalent to that between "easy and difficult." But "heavenly" comprises dogmatic objective truths, connected with the nature of God, and the counsels of His grace. "Earthly," again, assuredly does not mean earth-born; for the original word is quite different¹. To that Soul whose home was in the bosom of God, things which seem to us the most heavenly, are on earth after all². They are of heaven indeed—from heaven—even now "in margine cæli," on the line which seems to blend with the heaven beyond. But they have for their subject-matter the teaching of truth, not as it is in itself, but as it meets with a creature like man, as it is capable of being morally tested and experienced by us. Others, then, recorded those words, which rather belonged to the circle of things on earth, or which made a greater impression at the time of their delivery. The Sermon on the Mount, spoken upon a height in Galilee to a great assemblage, sank into a thousand hearts, and found its way into the earliest memoirs. The conversation with Nicodemus by night, the dialogue with the Samaritan woman, the discourse in the Temple, the High Priest's prayer, would not lie so near the surface of Christian recollection.

Of these two elements, then, in the teaching of Christ, there was one with which the mind of St John had a constitutional affinity³. He appropriated "the things in heaven."⁴ They sank into his soul. They were taken up into the substance of his intellectual and spiritual being. Those who have been much with the great masters of thought and language, though only through the medium of their books, shew by their words and ideas the high company which they have been keeping. Tenny-

³ "If we are surprised at these different ways of comprehending Christ on the part of His immediate disciples, we must not forget the considerable influence of moral affinity in all forms of religious knowledge." (Pressensé, 'Hist. des prem. siècles,' II. 385.) "There are different forms of the Word under which He manifests Himself in proportion to the degree of the individual understanding, and the progress of the soul in holiness. If He revealed Himself upon the holy mount in a form far more sublime than that which was seen by the disciples who remained below, the reason was that they had not yet their sight sufficiently strong to contemplate the glory and the divinity of the Word in His Transfiguration." son, Browning, Arnold, Carlyle impose the very faults of their diction upon a generation of poetasters and sciolists. In truth, every founder of a school leaves a peculiar impress upon the style of his disciples. The generation in which we are living abounds in examples. A thoughtful theologian wrote not very many years since:—"I trace so distinctly to Bishop Butler the origin of the soundest and clearest views that I possess upon the human mind, that I could not write upon this, or any kindred subject, without a consciousness that I was directly or indirectly borrowing largely from him¹." Common studies, and schools, and tutors, impress subtle similarities of literary form and colour. Modern Oxfordmen, for instance, are liable to sudden conversions, and are drifted to havens upon the most distant shores of thought. But there is the old trick of voice. "Coelum non animus mutant." A curious family likeness may be traced where we should have least expected to find it. But much more is this the case, where the charm of personal influence is added. "I may be allowed," says an eloquent writer, "to take this opportunity of claiming, once for all, for the pupils of Arnold, the privilege and pleasure of using his words, and adopting his thoughts, without the necessity of specifying, in every instance, the source from which they have been derived²." Those who, now many years ago, on Sunday afternoons, used to listen with spell-bound interest to the calm, sweet voice of the remarkable man who was then Vicar of St Mary's—who told his hearers of "his misery's signs,

And how the dying spark of hope was fed,
And how the heart was soothed, and how the head,
And all his hourly varied anodynes—" will sometimes find a phrase, a word, a sentence coming to their lips, or hear them in the sermons and recognize them in the writings of others, which they can trace to a teacher, from whom they are now separated by the whole breadth of the spiritual world.

These analogies, drawn from our own days, and from men now or lately living, may enable us to feel more vividly how probable it is that the style of St John in his Epistle should be like that of the discourses in the Gospel. It is always to be remembered that the disciple was John, and the Master Jesus. Those favourite words—"light and darkness, life and death, love and hate, truth and witness, world, abiding"—were not terms which he had taught himself to apply to the designation of his own ideas. He had heard them in the long golden hush of the summer evenings by the shore of the lake of Galilee; in the sorrow of the guest-chamber; between the brook of Kedron and the garden of the Agony; during the days when the Risen Lord spoke to them "of the things pertaining to the kingdom of God." He had not only enshrined them in his memory. He had made them so livingly as if his own, had appropriated them so profoundly, that he could use them with unerring precision and definiteness. Expressions which occur in the Gospel¹ historically and occasionally were taken into the Apostle's soul. Rounded and smoothed like stones by the continual friction of the water, they appear in the Epistle, in a sententious, aphoristic form. "The Jesus of the three Synoptics," it has been said, "is a hundred miles away from the metaphysical being described by the Philonian Gospel alone²." "Is it John, the son of Zebedee," it has further been asked, "who could write these lessons of abstract metaphysics, to which neither the Synoptics nor the Talmud present any analogy?" Certainly, for he had heard them from Christ. In one instance, at least, he shews that he knew words previously recorded in the Synoptics¹. Sometimes we can see that the thought latent in an expression in the Synoptics is present to him². "He spake of the Temple of His Body"—"He dwelt among us³," is but the commentary upon the word in St Matthew—"there is something here greater than the Temple⁴." We conclude that John did not endow Christ with language, but learned it from Him⁵.

IV.

We may now examine the more positive and essential characteristics of the style of St John's Epistle from a literary point of view.

Some critics accuse these simple, yet profound pages, of a lamentable want of eloquence⁶. Spirits, which have been quickened into earnestness, may be reminded by such complainers of one, who, when apparently dying, angrily pushed away from him an ordinary crucifix, and called for another which was superbly carved, exclaiming that "he should otherwise die in despair, abhorring, as he did, all ill-made works of art." Others, who can read between the lines, will remember that these solecisms⁷—if ² Sentences are not wanting in the Synoptics which have quite the tone and structure of the words of Christ in St John; e.g. Matt. xi. 25, 27; Mark viii. 35; Luke x. 21, 22.

³ ἐσκήνωσεν, John i. 14, ii. 21.

⁵ The writer has ventured to make free use of some pages in a volume of Sermons preached by him before the University of Oxford in 1870—71. 'The Leading Ideas of the Gospels,' pp. 133—141 (Macmillan). The probable influence of the philosophical and religious language of Ephesian speculation upon St John's style is also to be taken into account. (For a similar influence exercised upon the style of St Paul, see Introd. to Colossians, Vol. ix. 649.) St John, very early in his apostolic career, was brought into contact with Gnosticism. (Acts vii. 9, 10, 14, 25.)

such there be—are among those "vulgarisms of the fishermen, which have overthrown the syllogisms of Athens."

The want of variety and of connection is another ground of objection.

1. The want of variety.

(a) To St Paul the Providence of God appears to have committed the task of defence and discussion. St John does not discuss, so much as *affirm*¹. This feature in his writings has been shewn by Coleridge to arise at once from the oriental genius, and from the nature of the doctrines which he was inspired to enunciate. "St John's logic," said that great thinker, "is oriental, and consists chiefly in position and parallel, while St Paul displays all the intricacies of Greek system²." And elsewhere he has observed—"the imperative and oracular form of Scripture is the form of reason itself in all things purely rational and moral."

(b) To many these isolated and apparently disconnected propositions, with their almost lapidary brevity and incision, sound like mere moral and theological axioms. And thus they fall under the contempt which, since Locke's celebrated argument, has, more or less, attached itself to axioms, on the ground that they are frivolous, because they are identical propositions. But it was irre-

Nam ἰδιώται proprie dicuntur homines de plebe, indocti, et solo sermone utentes quo vulgus utitur, quemque pueri à nutricibus suis imbibe-runt." (Salmas. 'De Hellenistic.' 260.)

"Some of the greatest books in the world, as, for instance, Bacon's 'Novum Organum,' and, in the highest sphere, St John's Epistles, are not so much chains of reasoning as a succession of observations on facts, the connexion of which is supplied, not by the mind which observes them, but by the facts themselves. To understand such writings we must be at the point of view from which the observations were first made, or, in Dr Campbell's favourite language, we must be 'in the light' of the truths observed." sistibly proved against Locke that propositions which he derided as frivolous because "identical," deserved no such treatment. Thus, to take one of his own examples—"gold is fusible"—Cousin has observed that "the first who said—gold is fusible—far from being guilty of tautology, expressed the result of a discovery, and a discovery not without difficulty and importance." We may well apply this principle to such axioms as "God is Light," "God is Love¹."

(c) Yet there are, after all, elements of quiet beauty and power in St John's Epistle which will "requite studious regard with opportune delight," and redeem it from the charge of "mere cycloidal composition, and monotonous movement of thought."

A kind of occasional picturesqueness is not utterly wanting in this Epistle. We should expect this from one so entirely taught by Him whose language shews that He answered the thoughts in the mute heart of nature²—from one whose record of the words of Jesus includes those which speak of the "leaping water"³ and of the "whiteness"⁴ of the Eastern harvest—whose picture of Judas "going out" expresses more than was, perhaps, ever expressed in words so few⁵.

The force of accessional parallelism has already been discussed.

Let us observe another secret of this unearthly rhetoric—preparatory allusion.

St John frequently indicates with delicate touch some subject, transcendently sacred, or peculiarly dear to him. He passes by it tenderly and reverentially for a while; then, after a pause, takes it up again and exhausts it more fully.

So the birth from God first indicated ii. 29, is resumed and expanded, iii. 9, v. 4.

So the hallowed boldness of God's children in saying out all to Him (παρρησία), first mentioned in iii. 21, is taken up again and unfolded in v. 14.

But the most important and beautiful illustration remains. It would almost appear as if St John did not venture to introduce the Holy Spirit abruptly. So he writes allusively—"ye have an unction from the Holy One," chrism from the Christ¹. Then, after an interval, the same chord is struck with a bolder hand—"we know that He abideth in us, by the Spirit which He hath given us²." And, finally, the notes are reiterated with added clearness, again and yet again—"we know that we dwell in Him, and He in us, because He hath given us of His Spirit."—"it is the Spirit that beareth witness."—"they who continue witnessing are three, the Spirit and the water and the blood³."

2. The kind of connection which may be traced in St John's Epistle is deserving of special notice.

At first sight, indeed, St John's Epistle is but a collection of isolated divine γνῶμαι, carved out in brief, oracular, sentences as if on stone. Yet a connection there is, though the commentator may easily overlook, and easily exaggerate it. The peculiar eloquence which it possesses is spiritual rather than logical, real rather than *verbal*⁴. It has been asserted by Coleridge that the connection between the different parts of a great lyrical ode is stronger and more real than that which subsists between the various portions of many treatises which profess to be written with perfect logical sequence. The same may be said of St John's Epistle. The reader must keep his mind intent, not only upon the words themselves, but upon that which precedes and follows, and the association which links one with the other. To take one instance of a principle illustrated in almost every section: "If we walk in the light...the blood of Jesus keeps cleansing us from all sin. If we say that we have no sin, we deceive ourselves." What is the link

If the style is the man, the style of St John is the express image of the unhesitating assurance of his belief. He writes with confidence like one who feels that his feet are on a rock. His language has the ring of the earnestness which speaks because it has believed, and the power which springs from unhesitating conviction. It has none of the hesitations—of the half apologies—of conjecture or of doubt. It asserts, because its writer is sure. It is dogmatic, because he is divinely sure. His belief is transparent. "With bared head he tells the bare truth²." He is the most sublime of writers. What Chrysostom has so grandly said of the first verse of his Gospel is almost equally true of the first verse of his Epistle. "See, therefore, how forthwith from the prelude having lent wings to the soul of his hearers, he has elevated their thought also. For having caused it to take its stand before all created things, he conducts it up above cherubim and seraphim, and over angels, and wins it to wing its way above every created thing. What then? After having exalted us to such a height, is he able to stay us there? Not so. But even as one taketh a man standing on the sea-beach, and gazing on towns, shores, ports—and hath brought him far out into mid-ocean; as such an one hath removed the voyager indeed from the former objects which he surveyed, yet hath he not stayed his eye from seeing, but led it on to a spectacle which is immense;—even so John, leading us above creation, and sending forth our thoughts to the ages beyond it, lifts the eye to illimitable heights, not causing it however to find any end—for end is none. For when the reason has ascended to the beginning, it asks—what beginning? Then finding that was ever outstripping its thought, it knows not where to stay its cogitation, but gazing intently and evermore unable to stop, it falleth wearied again to things below¹."

With all its reticence and apparent impersonality, who can doubt, after all, that there is in this Epistle a picture of Christian perfection? It is a reproduction of the image of St John's soul. It does not tell us what he did; it does tell us what he was. In it he has left us an idea of the Christian life, believing, loving, beautiful, victorious, peaceful, perfected. Above all the degenerations of history, above all the bitter disappointments of experience, it hangs undimmed. And it stimulates souls within the Church to a summit of unattained perfection. St John, in this Epistle, thus performs a third work, not inferior in importance either to the organization of the Church, or to its controversial defence against error. The mere controversialist often draws so many lines and bastions round Jerusalem that the temple is hidden from view. This Epistle was, above all, intended to unfold the inner life, to help forward a growth in practical holiness². No spiritual ¹ Chrysostom points out a beautiful association of this kind, a subtle connection in St John's Gospel, i. 14 with vv. 12, 13. "Having stated that they who received Him have become and are the sons of God, he lays down the cause and the foundation of this unspeakable honour. It is that the Word has become Flesh. For He who is God's very Son became Son of Man that He might make the sons of men children of God" ('in Joann. Homil.' XI. 1). So John iii. 14, 15 gives the cause of the new birth spoken of supra vv. 3, 5. (Ibid. 'Homil.' XXVII.) For another remarkable instance of this real connection, latent in the substance of the thought, see note on 1 John v. 3, 4.

² Ignatius, without speaking in so many words of St John's Epistle as he does of St Paul's to the Ephesians ('Epist. ad Ephes.' XII.), draws a picture of the Christian life which is conceived in the very spirit of St John, and represents the quiet, real, undemonstrative character which it was intended to form. "It is better to keep silent and yet to be, than to talk and not to be. Good is it to teach, if he that sayeth doeth. (ὁ λέγων, 1 John ii. 4, 6, 9.) For one Teacher there is who spake, and it came to pass (Gospel, passim). And what things He did in silence are book can ever be greater than its author. And so this Epistle is the very reflection of the inner life of the ἐπιστήθιος. A great statesman (Prince Bismarck) has said of ambassadors that "they are vessels, which are only valuable so far as they are filled with the spirit and will of those who sent them, and should, like crystal, at once show, by their tinge and colour, what liquid is in them." And so St John constantly repeats and reproduces the very words of Jesus, and applies them to mould and develop the spiritual life of the Church¹.

V.

1. We pause here, and attempt to draw to a point the converging lines of evidence upon (a) the authorship of the Epistle, and (b) the time and place to which it belongs.

(a) We believe that the three phenomena presented by the Epistle when read side by side with the Gospel—interpenetration, suggestion, circumscription, amount to a practical demonstration of a common author. Whoever wrote the Epistle wrote the Gospel also. This connection has been differently expressed by modern critics.

The view that the Gospel is an historical commentary on the Epistle has found little favour. The very shorter and more succinct shape which the sentences assume in the Epistle, as if written by one who had fully expressed his thought elsewhere and was now disposed to contract it, makes a careful reader in-worthy of His Father. He who hath got to himself the word of Jesus (1 John ii. 5) is also able to hear His very silence that he may be perfect, that he may act through his speech, and be known by his silence. Nothing is hid from the Lord, but even our secrets are near to Him. Let us, therefore, do all things, as in His presence who is dwelling in us, that we may be His temple, and He may be in us our God (1 Joh. ii. 14, iv. 4; cf. ἡ ἀγάπη μεθ' ἡμῶν, iv. 17; ἡ ἀγάπη τοῦ Θεοῦ ἐν ἡμῖν, iv. 9), which He both is and will appear before our face" (1 John iii. 2). This is deeply interesting as coming from one who must have been at Ephesus with St John, and who wrote not very many years after the Apostle's death.

instinctively feel that the process must be reversed. By very many it has been looked upon as an encyclical letter accompanying the Gospel.

Whether we are to look upon it precisely as this, as a postscript, or as a preface to the Gospel, may be rather a question of words. Bishop Lightfoot, however, shews with unrivalled clearness the reasons for considering it practically a *postscript*¹.

It should be remembered that the Gospel was dictated. Hence the sudden transitions; the passages at the close where the narrator looks towards or round a group of gathered witnesses². Immediately after the history itself, comes its postscript, in the form of this Epistle. The use of the plural links the close of the Gospel with the beginning of the Epistle. Thus, the first lines of the Epistle are in harmony with, and directly refer to, the first lines of the Gospel.

But this view, derived from a thorough and impartial comparison of the Epistle and Gospel by themselves is remarkably confirmed in the very ancient fragment on the Canon of the New Testament known as the Canon Muratorianus. The writer says, "Fourthly, the Gospel of John from among the disciples. His fellow disciples and Bishops exhorting him, he said: 'Fast with me from today for three days ; and let us tell one another what shall have been revealed to each.' The same night it was revealed to Andrew from among the Apostles, that by consent of all John should narrate all things in their stead. And therefore though each Gospel has a different starting-point, there is no variation for the faith of believers, since by one overruling Spirit all things are told in all the Gospels concerning the Nativity, the Passion, the Resurrection, the conversation of the Lord with His disciples, and concerning His twofold Advent—the first, as He is despised in His humiliation ; the second, as He is conspicuous in royal glory which is future. What wonder is it, then, if John so constantly brings forward each of these things in his Epistles too, saying for himself also—'what we have seen with our eyes and heard with our ears, and our hands have handled, these things we have written unto you'? For thus he professes himself not only a beholder but a hearer also—nay, and further a writer of all the marvellous things of the Lord in order¹." It will be best to let Bishop Lightfoot draw his own inference in his own words.

¹ Is not every preface really a postscript in everything but position in a volume?

² ὁ ἑωρακὼς μεμαρτύρηκεν... ἵνα καὶ ὑμεῖς πιστεύσητε (John xix. 35). Ταῦτα δὲ γέγραπται, ἵνα πιστεύσητε... καὶ ἵνα πιστεύοντες ζωὴν ἔχητε (xx. 31). Οὗτός ἐστιν ὁ μαθητὴς ὁ μαρτυρῶν... καὶ οἶδαμεν κ. τ. λ. (xxi. 24). St John lays down his pen, or ceases to dictate. The Bishops or disciples who have heard or read, St Andrew probably (revelatum est Andrea ex Apostolis. 'Canon Murator.'), and the rest, write these few words, this single formulated text of attestation. Then in v. 25 the amanuensis (or possibly the Apostle) returns to the singular—'I suppose.' An interesting illustration of this kind of testimony to a narrative may be found, in a somewhat similar form, in the singular book which for centuries was amongst the most popular in Europe. Marco Polo speaks throughout in the first person—I. But in the last sentence the secretary to whom he dictated gives his attestation to the truth of the whole narrative. Mr Murray—the translator and editor—remarks, "We may observe a curious change in the last sentence, from the first to the third person. This arises from Rustician's first writing as an amanuensis, then in his own person." ('Travels of Marco Polo,' Edinburgh Cabinet Library, p. 361.)

"I shall have something to say presently about the coincidences with Papias in this passage. For the moment I wish to call attention to the account which the writer gives of the origin of St John's Gospel. There may be some legendary matter mixed up with this account ; the interposition of Andrew and the dream of John may or may not have been historical facts ; but its general tenor agrees remarkably with the results yielded by an examination of the Gospel itself. Yet it must be regarded as altogether independent. To suppose otherwise would be to ascribe to the writer in the second century an amount of critical insight and investigation which would do no dishonour to the nineteenth. But there is also another point of importance to my immediate subject. The writer detaches the First Epistle of St John from the Second and Third, and connects it with the Gospel. Either he himself, or some earlier autho- *rity whom he copied, would appear to have used a manuscript in which it occupied this position*¹."

Thus internal and external evidence alike point to the thorough and immediate connection of the Epistle with the Gospel, and to the common authorship of the two documents.

(b) The connection of the Epistle and Gospel with Ephesus and Asia Minor, and with the close of the first century, has been attested by satisfactory arguments, which it is well to recapitulate. St John's relation to Ephesus is necessarily implied in the three opening chapters of the Apocalypse, whatever view is taken of the origin and character of that wonderful book. If it be St John's, the question is decided. If it be spurious, the forger knew that St John's prolonged residence in Asia Minor was an accredited and accepted fact in the Church. From St John to Irenæus, through Polycarp, Christian tradition goes on without a break. It is composed of two rings only, closely welded together, and of adamant strength. Polycrates, Bishop of Ephesus, writing probably not much more than eighty years after the death of St John, speaks of his burial at Ephesus. Nor is this all. Special forms of error, foreseen by St Paul, floating in the very air of *Ephesus*², known, as certainly as anything of the kind can be known, to have acquired an enormous development in Asia Minor towards the close of the first century—the heresies of Cerinthus and others, doketic and dualistic ; the Nicolaitan heresy ; certain mystic forms of oriental magic—are, beyond all rational doubt, referred to in the First Epistle of St John. But the reference to local heresies in local shapes attests St John's local interest in Asia Minor. Further still, such few indications as appear clearly to the attentive eye coincide perfectly with an Ephesian atmosphere. The mystic awe, the quickening of spiritual life, the strangely opening glimpses into the spirit world, the communion with supernatural powers, which Scripture and history alike connect with Ephesus, are perceptible in the Epistle¹. The glittering and magnificent worship of Ephesus—the fierce dogmatic and intolerant idolatry of the cultus of the image of Artemis², made of boxwood or vine, which was said to have fallen from heaven, to have lasted through seven restorations of the temple, and to be eternal—give force to the closing words of the First Epistle. Yet again. Those personal circumstances, which escape from the most reticent document—those traits of feeling and character which we divine as we hang in the silence of prolonged study upon the words we revere—perfectly fit into the traditions of the Church about St John's history, while they are too latent to have suggested them.

And here we enlarge the circle of witness so as to include the Second and Third Epistles. Every critic of note has felt that all three Epistles are the works of an old man³—above all those who accuse them of “senile iteration.” The characteristics of old age are especially marked in the second and third Epistles. The frequent repetitions of the first Epistle, their pervasion by the same ideas and language, make us feel that we are listening to a very old man. The fires of youth and manhood have long passed, and burned away all in the soul that is not made of asbestos—all that cannot be reduced to the few ideas which have been the directors of the life. St John was, possibly, an exile in Patmos, and despatched the first of these two short letters from thence. While no ancient writer, as we have seen, ever placed the Gospel and First Epistle outside the circle of Ephesus and an intimate relation with it, opinion was divided as to the spot from which they issued. Ephesus was, indeed, generally accepted (as to the Gospel⁴), but Patmos was mentioned by others⁵. In the valuable synoptical epitome of the Old and New Testament (wrongly attributed to Athanasius) a statement is made which appears intended to reconcile the two accounts. “The Gospel according to John was dictated by him, St John the Apostle and the beloved, when he was an exile in the Isle of Patmos—and was published at Ephesus by the same through the agency of Gaius the beloved friend and hospitable receiver of the Apostles, concerning whom Paul also wrote to the Romans—“Gaius, mine host, and of the whole Church, saluteth you⁶.” The character of the first Epistle would be consistent enough with this. It might well have been written, as the second Epistle must have been written, during some period of separation from the Churches over which the Apostle immediately presided. One expression in the third Epistle might certainly seem to give considerable support to the account of the author of the ‘Synopsis.’ The phrase—“and ye know that our record is true”—points evidently to the attesting appeal towards the close of the Gospel with which (if Gaius published it) he was so intimately connected⁴. The inveterate tradition of the Church was that St John was exiled in the later years of the reign of Domitian (A.D. 95—96)¹. The short reign of Nerva promised better days for the Church. The tidings of this would make it natural for St John to express to Kyria the hope of a speedy meeting².

² Note the complacent and unquestioning bigotry of the secretary of the city-council of Ephesus—“seeing that these things cannot be spoken against” (Acts xix. 36). The τὸ διωκτὸν (sc. ἄγαλμα, v. 35) cannot, perhaps, with absolute certainty be identified with the image of Artemis, described by Pliny (‘Nat. Hist.’ xvi. lxxxix.). Pliny says that the artificer of the image was named by some. (The various names given in different edd. seem to be mere guesses.) This, of course, would exclude, if locally believed, the idea of the image having “fallen from heaven.” But Pliny possibly hints at the legend of a much greater antiquity. At all events Pliny's anecdote well illustrates the idolatry of Ephesus. (See the interesting discussion and notes, Pliny, ‘Nat. Hist.’ Vol. v. pp. 2604—2607, edit. G. Brotier. Cum Not. Var. 1826.)

⁵ The curious manuscript in the convent at Patmos, containing a narrative of the journeys of St John in the island (Ἀλ περιόδοι τοῦ θεολόγου), and attributed to Prochorus, one of his disciples, has one section of some beauty and interest, which tells how the Apostle before leaving for Ephesus was miraculously led to dictate his Gospel. The extract is fully given in ‘Description de l'île de Patmos,’ par V. Guérin, pp. 27—31.

2. In this part of our task it only remains to shew the importance for the defence of St John's Gospel of grasping firmly the connection of the Epistle with it.

The Gospel of St John will be recognized by all competent judges as the centre of the Christian position; and indissolubly connected with it is the First Epistle of St John.

The latest accepted theory of unbelieving criticism at the present date is as follows:—

About A.D. 125 the Church first heard of a mysterious book, heralded by announcements well calculated to excite the curiosity of Christians. A forgery of unusual ability was launched as a precursor, the document known to us as the First Epistle of St John. This mysterious book was nothing less than a new Gospel, deeper and more spiritual than any of its predecessors, which was bold enough even to rectify the previous Evangelists in some not unimportant particulars, and which professed to be written by the beloved disciple of Jesus. This record affected a wider authority and a more spiritual texture than the humbler narratives, more on a level with ordinary humanity, which had up to this time converted, soothed, edified, contented, the souls of Christians.

It can scarcely be denied that the new book came from Asia Minor—from Ephesus—one of the pullulating hotbeds of the dogmatic vegetation of Christianity. The party-spirit, which is inseparable from earnest conviction in religion, had long divided Christians under the banners of various Apostles. A group of Churches, gathered in by the ardent missionary labours of St Paul, clung to the glory which they felt to be their right from their association with the great Apostle of the Gentiles. Other communities turned to St Peter in the West, to St James in Syria. There were not a few who were fiercely jealous of the movement of thought and feeling, not without some foundation in the synoptical Evangelists, which tended to make St Peter the Prince of the Apostles. The existing Gospels, as it seemed to them, afforded no counterpoise to the pretensions of this widely-diffused Petrine party. A pious fraud was therefore contemplated, of a character which would not shock the susceptibilities of the day. Thus from the obscurity which gathers round the Church at the close of the Apostolic age there issued a Gospel which was destined to obtain a pre-eminent place in the sacred Canon of the New Testament, and an Epistle which has influenced Christian thought and practice as the profoundest and gentlest delineation of Christian character sketched upon the lines of the great model in the Gospel. It is denied, peremptorily, that these two books were written either by St John himself, or by disciples informed and prompted by him during the closing years of his prolonged life. It is conjectured as probable, however, that they came from some disciple of the great master about twenty-five or thirty years after his death. For three or four decades there had been a peculiar tradition of the life of Christ floating through the Asiatic Churches, a Gospel according to the use of Ephesus. Two individuals had a very large part in this work: one, a homonym of the Apostle St John, the Presbyter John; the other, Aristion, who knew by heart many as yet unwritten discourses of Jesus. These two men were consulted by Papias as oracles upon the origin of Christianity and the life of its Founder.

The fourth Gospel, then, represents the traditions of this "Ephesian school."

² 1 John v. 12. See Wallon, 'De la Croyance due à l'Évangile,' pp. 211—213. Demetrius is (1 John v. 12) another link connecting these Epistles with Ephesus. It was certainly an Ephesian name, Acts xix. 24, 38. A famous architect of the name was honourably connected with the completion of the temple at Ephesus. By Vitruvius he is said to have been "servus Dianæ." He lived B.C. 340. See 'Dictionary of Greek and Roman Biography,' s. v.

It boldly fixed and stereotyped in writing in a concrete shape, in a form which the world has never forgotten, the memories of the Presbyter John and of Aristion, which, no doubt, did go back to the Apostle St John. It was to prepare for this "pious fraud," and to accustom the ears of Asiatic Christendom to an entirely new cast of theological language, that a Catholic Epistle, attributed to St John, was spread about as a preparatory essay. The dexterous author very possibly imitated what he had heard or remembered of the tone and style of the Apostle's preaching and conversation. The writer, whoever he may be, has a feverish desire to obtain credence by repeated asseverations; an excited style, as if he expected angry contradiction or contemptuous incredulity. The name of St John, it will be remarked, is never unequivocally adopted, as if the writer did not wish to burn all his boats and to commit himself irrevocably.

The object of the new Gospel is twofold: to prove the mission of Jesus as Saviour to unbelievers; and still more, to endow Christendom with a new and higher conception of His Person. Thus we have in the Gospel fraudulently named from St John a life of Jesus, different from, nay contradictory to, that which is given by the three synoptical Evangelists¹.

It will be seen that in this important controversy it is felt to be absolutely necessary to get rid of the Epistle as an authentic document, and discredit it in every particular. For this purpose it is considered convenient to suggest that the First Epistle may have been an essay, thrown off in advance to prepare the Christian public for a new Gospel and for an audacious development of Christian dogma. How long this process would have required, within what compass of time this taste would have been created, we are not told. But a careful and constant comparison between the Epistle and Gospel shews that the Gospel must have been the avant-courier of the Epistle, not the Epistle of the Gospel. We see in every form and in every direction some indication of the subjective, assuming, pointing to, commenting upon the objective. It is so in dogma, in polemics, in general application. The opening verses of the Epistle are the opening verses of the proœmium of the Gospel in a subjective form. The polemical topics just indicated by a certain emphatic arrangement of subjects and choice of words in the Gospel are more broadly dealt with in the Epistle. The Gospel closes the proœmium with the "Word made Flesh"—and then, starting from the humanity, ascends step after step to the full Godhead. It asserts and makes permanent the cries of confession wrung from the hearts of men. It writes down the wonderful music, elicited by a hand that runs up the scales from its first notes expressive of recognition of human sanctity—"Thou art the King of Israel"—to the grandest and richest harmony which ascends to Jesus as God—"my Lord and my God¹." Thus the Gospel proper starts from the Humanity, and ascends to the historical confession of the Divinity. The Epistle, on the contrary, with the objective historical order before it in the Gospel, starts from the true and proper *Divinity*², and descends to the dogmatic declaration of the true and proper Manhood³. It is impossible, from the nature of the case, to have any more complete proof that the Epistle could not have been launched as a separate venture, apart from the Gospel and preparatory to it.

VI.

The external testimony is considerable. All three Epistles are recognized in the 'Canon Muratorianus⁴.' Eusebius says of Papias—"he used passages as Origen complained of the abuse made of the text, 1 John v. 19. "Certain heretics," he says, "suppose that by world here John means to speak of things on earth and human affairs. From a mistaken notion that world, according to their reading of it, means the whole system consisting of heaven and earth and the things therein, they utter bold and impious things concerning God." He seems to say that they do so "from having no word to form an exact equivalent for κόσμος, and fall into impious thoughts concerning the demi-urgus." The First Epistle must have been well known at that time.

³ In the interesting 'Practical Exposition' dictated by Neander, when almost blind, the whole Epistle is divided into the following sections from a somewhat different point of view:

1. St John witness of Jesus, and announcer of the Gospel, i. 1—4.
2. The Nature of God—resulting consequences for us, i. 5—10.
3. The sinner's welcome, ii. 1, 2.
4. The knowledge of God, ii. 3—6.
5. The old and new commandments, ii. 7—11.
6. The unity and diversity of Gospel witness, ii. 12—14.
7. The love of the world, ii. 15—17.
8. The Antichrist, ii. 18—23.
9. The inner treasure, ii. 24—28.
10. The child of God:
 - (a) His privileges, ii. 29—iii. 2.
 - (b) His vocation, iii. 3—10.
11. Brotherly love, the summary of the Christian life, iii. 11—18.
12. The Christian's confidence before God, iii. 19—22.

Great practical objects of the declaration of St John in the Gospel and Epistle—

- (a) fellowship with "us." (v. 3.)
 (And that, too, a fellowship with the Father and with His Son.) (Ibid.)
 (b) joy fulfilled. (v. 4.)

II.

I. 5—II. 2.

The Great ANNOUNCEMENT—God is Light. (v. 5.)

Practical character of the result of false profession. (v. 6.)

Result of walking in the light—

- (a) true mental communion,
 (b) constant purification by the blood of Jesus. (v. 7.)

Two warnings (vv. 8—10) with a promise enclosed. (v. 9.)

The whole object of this teaching—"that ye sin not." (ii. 1.)

Yet it includes a "comfortable word." (Ibid.)

A propitiation for us and the whole world. (v. 2.)

III.

(A) II. 3—6.

The test of knowledge of Christ. (v. 3.)

The test of vital communion with Him:

1. Observing His commandments severally. (v. 4.)

2. Observing His word as "one entire and perfect chrysolite." (v. 5.)

The Christian's objective standard—the one great life-walk traced in the Gospel of St John. (v. 6.)

(B) II. 7—II.

The commandment in a sense new, in a sense old— (v. 7.)

true and attested in the Christ of the Gospel and in their own experience. (v. 8.)

The darkness is passing away, and the Very light enlighteneth. (Ibid.)

"In light," "in darkness," contrasted. (vv. 9, 10, 11.)

13. The Commandment of God, iii. 22—24.

14. The spirit of truth and error, iv. 1—6.

15. God is Love, iv. 7—18.

16. The love of God the basis of brotherly love, iv. 19—v. 1.

17. The victory over the world, v. 2—5.

18. The triple witness given to Jesus Christ, v. 6—10.

19. Christ the Life of the faithful, v. 11—13.

20. The efficacy of prayer, v. 14, 15.

21. The sin unto death, v. 16, 17.

22. Union with Christ, the source of sanctity, v. 18—21.

(C) vv. 12—17.

Why he is writing and has written. (vv. 12, 13, 14.)

Warning against the love of the world. (vv. 15, 16, 17.)

IV.

II. 18—28.

The last hour—Antichrist. (vv. 18, 19.)

Their chrism from the Christ. (v. 20.)

The Antichrist, and the chrism which teaches and is permanent. (vv. 20—28.)

a very practical and purifying truth. (v. 3.)

Sin subjective is ever sin objective. (v. 4.)

The removal of sin the purpose of His manifestation. (v. 5.)

Test of being God's or Satan's. (vv. 6—10.)

VI.

III. 11—24.

The message of love announced to be fulfilled. (vv. 11, 12.)

Illustrated by its opposite—parenthetical and pathetic words. (v. 13.)

Translation from death to life attested by the existence of the love as an effect. (v. 14.)

The opposite of that blessed translation. (vv. 14, 15.)

Our love only measurable by the self-sacrifice of Christ. (v. 16.)

A fortiori is sacrifice of "this world's good" demanded. (v. 17.)

The test of solid spiritual comfort. (vv. 18, 19.)

Of true self-condemnation and self-acquittal. (vv. 20, 21.)

Relation between keeping His commandments (v. 22) and His great all-inclusive commandment (v. 23), and answer to our prayers. (vv. 22, 23.)

Knowledge of the fulfilment of Christ's promise in the Gospel (xiv. 23, xvii. 23) communicated by the Spirit (according to xiv. 20). (v. 24.)

VII.

IV. 1—6.

The spirits are to be tested. (v. 1.)

Test of Antichrist. (vv. 2, 3.)

Assurance of victory. (vv. 4, 5, 6.)

VIII.

IV. 7—V. 2.

Love—

- (a) in its ideal essence (vv. 7, 8).
 - (b) in its Divine manifestation (vv. 9, 10).
 - (c) as our duty (v. 11).
 - (d) in God and His people (vv. 12—16).
 - (e) perfected (v. 17).
 - (f) love and fear (v. 18).
 - (g) of God and man inseparable (vv. 19, 20, 21).
- He that loves the Father loves the Father's children. (v. 1, 2.)

IX.

V. 3—21.

The conquest which has conquered the world. (vv. 3, 4, 5.)

Results of the Incarnation. (v. 6.)

The idea of fivefold witness in the Gospel—

Witness of Spirit,

Witness of water,

Witness of blood,

a threefold witness— (vv. 6, 7, 8.)

Add the witness of men (v. 9), the witness of God (v. 9).

This fivefold witness crowned and perfected by the inner witness (v. 10).

Summary of its purport. (v. 11.)

Warning. (v. 12.)

Object of his writing. (v. 13.)

Prayer; boundless confidence in it (vv. 14, 15), except in the case of sin unto death. (vv. 16, 17.)

Three primary points of Christian knowledge, which are also general principles of the Epistle. (vv. 18, 19, 20.)

Guard yourselves from the idols. (v. 21.)

Such, then, the Epistle stands before us. It may originally have been communicated to the cycle of Johannic churches. But it was not intended to be restricted to their use. It is not merely the charge of a Bishop or Metropolitan, choked and cumbered with local and transitory details. It is the voice of an Apostle—calm, indeed, and simple, yet ringing on through the ages, and speaking to successive generations in a language that is for all time. It represents the permanent as opposed to the transient principles and feelings of the Church; because it represents more closely than even the writings of St Paul the very words and thoughts of Jesus. The Epistle is second in importance, we may almost say, only to the Gospel with which it is so inseparably connected. It is that Gospel's best exposition and invaluable defender. It is an arsenal in which weapons will be found against forms of error which are ever arising. It is also the loveliest image of a human existence, which we may well conceive to have been as truly conformed to the one perfect life as any which has ever been passed upon the earth. It has been said that the nearer the style is to the thought, and the thought to God, the better it will be. This highest merit St John's style possesses. Viewed in its external circumstances and earthly moulding it was influenced by two elements. For the language of the Galileans was Syro-Chaldaic. Greek was, however, much spoken in Galilee of the Gentiles. Not the exquisite Greek of Athens, or even of Alexandria, but "common," with a touch of barbarian and foreign forms, yet not quite without Hebraic force and Hellenic splendour¹. Every fibre of language is a fibre of mind; every fibre of Greek of the finest and subtlest of minds. Some ancient Christian writers did not doubt that contact with the school of Ephesus and the Ionian reflection of Hellenic culture added something of grace to St John's style². This may be an exaggeration³, yet in truth there is in it something of both his countries—much of Galilee, a little perhaps of Ephesus. To Galilee and its influences belong the ineradicable Hebraic tinge, the alternate beat of the wings, the double, triple or quadruple advancing wave of parallelism⁴. To Greece may perhaps be attributed its elevation, its distinction,

³ Herder, however, is not afraid to say of the fourth Gospel, "an angel's hand has written it."

its incision¹. We have all too little among modern scholars of that enthusiastic delight in Scripture which existed in their predecessors. If Sir Philip Sidney could say, "I never heard the old song of Percy and Douglas that I found not my heart more moved than with a trumpet;" the great Archbishop of Constantinople exclaims over one of St Paul's Epistles, "I rejoice with joy exceeding in my delight at the sound of that trumpet of the Spirit." Such thrilling elevation is scarcely the effect to be expected from the letter of the Apostle of love². But here, if anywhere,

² Yet of the beginning of St John's Gospel, Chrysostom also says—ὁ τῆς βροντῆς υἱὸς Ἰωάννης, ὁ ἀπὸ τῆς σάλπιγγος ἡχῶν τῆς πνευματικῆς τῷ, Ἦν.

we may find the utterance of the Wisdom that is "suaviter fortis, et fortiter suavis¹." One who has spent years in the study of these chapters, and with unwilling haste piles together in a few broken months the materials which he has long amassed, can humbly sympathize with the great Augustine, at least in one thing—the love with which he lingered over the Epistle of love, his unwillingness to have done with it—"quanto libentius de charitate loquor, tanto minus volo finiri Epistolam istam²."

THE FIRST EPISTLE GENERAL OF JOHN.

CHAPTER I.

1 He describeth the person of Christ, in whom we have eternal life, by a communion with God: 5 to which we must adjoin holiness of life, to testify the truth of that our commu- nion and profession of faith, as also to assure us of the forgiveness of our sins by Christ's death.

THAT which was from the beginning, which we have heard,

CHAP. I. 1—4. "That which was continually from the beginning, before the world was, from all eternity; that which we have heard, which we have seen with our eyes, and the impression of which is still present with us; that which during the time of Christ's walk upon earth we contemplated, and which our hands once handled—I speak concerning the Word whose Divine attribute is Life, Who is the Life—and that Life was once manifested upon earth; and we have seen, and consequently are witnesses, and announce to you from Him who sent us that Life, that eternal Life whose peculiar attribute it is to have been with the Father and manifested to us)—that which we have seen and heard declare we from Him who sent us unto you, to the end that you too may have fellowship with us. And then that fellowship of ours is with the Father and His Son, Jesus Christ. And we are writing unto you these things that His words in the Gospel may be fulfilled, and that our joy may continue full." The peculiarity of St John's mode of expression here is well observed and accounted for by Neander. "It may seem surprising that, instead of clearly designating the Divine Person, who was from the beginning and was manifested to him in visible form, St John uses indeterminate expressions, such as—'that which was'—and—'that which we have heard,' &c. But this language is connected with the deepest part of the Apostle's method and doctrine. In fact, Christ is with Him the beginning and end of all Christian preaching. In his thoughts and in his life there is no other subject. The indeterminate expressions which he employs correspond, not to abstract ideas, but to this Living Person, the centre of his teaching and of his life. Hence it is that he uses indifferently to designate Him either personal pronouns ('He Who') or impersonal pronouns ('that which'). 'That which' St John announces is the coming in the flesh of 'Him who' was from the beginning. St John does not at once complete his thought. He interrupts himself to explain the subject which as yet he has only indicated in vague terms, but which fills his whole soul. It is the Word of Life." (Neander, 'Comment. on First Epist. of St John.')

1. That which] The neuter which for the masc. He who. St John frequently uses the neuter to express a collective whole. See in St John's Gospel i. 11, iv. 22, vi. 37, xvii. 2. "The neuter is naturally used, when the most comprehensive term is wanted." (Cf. Gal. iii. 22; 1 Cor. i. 27; Eph. i. 10; Col. i. 20.) Bp Lightfoot, 'Galatians,' p. 148.

was] The word shews that, before His manifestation, He existed with the Father.

from the beginning] It is not, perhaps, as decisively true here as in the Gospel (i. 1) that "no one who takes words in their natural sense can suppose that the beginning means the commencement of the Ministry of Christ." ('Essays and Reviews,' p. 355.) But the balance of argument certainly inclines to the higher interpretation of the words. So far, indeed, as the language alone is concerned, from the beginning may mean one of two things: either (1) from eternity, or, at least, from the beginning of the world (Matt. xix. 4, 8; John viii. 44; 2 Thess. ii. 13, 14; 1 John ii. 13, 14, iii. 8; cf. also in LXX., Micah v. 2; Prov. viii. 23; Eccles. xxiv. 14); or (2) it may mean, from the beginning of the Ministry of Christ, the initium rei Christianæ (cf. John xv. 27; 1 John ii. 7, 24, iii. 11; 2 John vv. 5, 6). In favour of the first interpretation are the following:

(a) The analogy of the proœmium of the Gospel. "The Gospel and the Epistle of John," says Dionysius of Alexandria, "are in harmony and begin similarly. The former says, In the beginning was the Word; the latter, That which was from the beginning. These are the first notes of the strain." According to this interpretation, "all is perfectly balanced and self-consistent, and nothing wanders from the theme, in these preludes which he plays." (Ap. Euseb. 'Hist. Eccles.' vii. 25.) This view becomes certain, if, as we contend, this which we have seen with our eyes, which we have looked upon, and our hands have handled, of the Word of life;

Epistle accompanied the Gospel and pointed to it throughout. It is an undeniable instance of the connection of suggestion. (See Introd. to this Epistle.)

(b) The elevated tone of the whole context. We have here a passage strangely unlike St John's general mould of composition. Least of all does the Apostle's structure of words generally resemble the description quaintly given of Hooker, that his style was "long and pithy, driving on a whole flock of several clauses before he comes to the close of a sentence." We have here a passage "prefaced and brought in with more magnificent ceremony than any one passage of Scripture" (Hammond). The very length of the sentence, so unusual with St John, testifies to the emotion with which it was written. The sublimity of the passage as a whole gives a proportional elevation to each single clause, and makes the highest sense also the most natural.

(c) The context seems to be almost inconsistent with the second interpretation. How could the Apostles be said, not only to have heard, but to have seen and handled the commencement of the Gospel message? (Bp Bull, 'Judic. Eccles. Cathol.' p. 43.)

We therefore conclude in favour of understanding the beginning here as in St John's Gospel, i. 1.

"It is to a fact, not to a principle, or a sentiment, that we are here directed as containing the ideal essence of the Gospel." (Dr Mill.) "Whilst the three other Evangelists begin the Life of Jesus from dates which belong to earth and time, St John, in the very first words of his Gospel, transports himself beyond the commencement of the earthly life of the Son of God; he elevates himself to the contemplation of the Divine type of which the visible life is but the earthly impress. He follows precisely the same process in his Epistle. St John could not proceed otherwise; he could not relate the Life of Christ without first ascending to His pre-existence; for the fulness of the Divine Nature which had gloriously appeared in Jesus was indissolubly linked in his mind with the human manifestation of that Nature. The Apostle ever sees in Christ the revelation of Him Who is elevated above time, Who had no beginning of days, Who was before creation, and Who dwells from eternity to eternity in sanctuaries impenetrable to mortal gaze. To shew that it is He Who has assumed a human form in the Person of Jesus of Nazareth whose history he is about to relate, he must commence his Gospel by establishing the connection between the prehistoric Christ, such as He was in the bosom of the Father, and the historical Christ, such as contemporaries had seen, known, heard Him. He begins his Epistle also by no abstractions, but by the assertion of the greatest fact in the history of humanity, 'That which was from the beginning,' &c." (Neander.)

which we have heard, which we have seen with our eyes, which we gazed upon, and our hands handled] In such a passage as this reverence will be slow to find mere pleonasms. Those only are "competent judges," we may safely say (with Bp. Butler of his own style), who are also "competent judges how far the same things, and not other things, could have been said in different words." The so-called pleonasms of Scripture generally render important services. They add colour and impressiveness to the style, and give it dignity or liveliness, even when they do not directly strengthen its logical skeleton. With the skilful rhetorician an epithet is often an abridged argument (Archbp. Whately, 'Rhet.' p. 213; Arist. 'Rhet.' III. 3). Much more do phrases in Scripture accused of being pleonastic often condense an argument, or embody an important reference (e.g. "Mine eyes have seen Thy salvation," Luke ii. 30, shews the exact fulfilment of v. 26), or add to ethical effect. ("The pleonasm of entire sentences is a thing not to be thought of." See the instructive pages, Winer, Pt. III. § LXV. 633, 634.) We may extend to St John Prof. Jowett's words, originally written of St Paul, that "tautology with him is often emphatic." For each of the phrases here has its own proper significance. Strange errors were abroad. Taking its starting-point from the necessary evil of matter, Doketism denied the Flesh of Christ. But, as the first words of the verse assured Christians that their Lord was no common-place Christ, so its close maintained by an emphatic appeal to human ears, eyes, hands, that he was no shadowy Christ. Such a "Christological image of mist" would have called into existence an evanescent Church. Ours is not a Christ such as we read of in Gnostic fragments, which strangely blend Oriental mysticism with Greek philosophy. The Christ here set forth by St John is not one who left no footprints upon the earth; who did not really eat and drink; who had a spectre nailed to the cross in His stead; whose body yielded to the touch; who melted away, like mist, in the pageant of an illusive ascension. He is One Who came, in the likeness of sinful flesh, in the reality of human flesh. It is also remarkable how these "pleonasms" serve to establish the subject of the verse. If we had only the verb heard, Socinus might be right in inter-

2 (For the life was manifested, witness, and shew unto you that and we have seen it, and bear eternal life, which was with the preting the passage of doctrine; if we had only the verb seen, de Wette might be right in interpreting it of "the power of a new life." But neither a mere doctrine, nor a mere influence—nothing, indeed, but a real living person, could have been heard, seen, contemplated, handled. Which our hands have handled may possibly have an anti-Doketic tinge in a very special way.

which we have heard] This reminds us of the words of Jesus, with more especial reference to the discourses recorded in the fourth Gospel. Its place in the sentence—above sight and handling—shews the reverence with which St John regarded the words of Christ. It makes us feel how the Apostle would have shrunk from inventing language for Him, and putting it into His mouth.

which we have seen with our eyes] "It is not enough to say, we have seen. He adds, with our eyes. We believed with our own, not other men's eyes. So in Latin, bisce oculis vidi" (Grotius). Cf. for the emphatic use of "seeing with the eyes," Luke ii. 30. The tense here signifies "we have looked and see"—The impression of the sight still remains.

which we gazed upon] Between seen and gazed upon (ἐθεασάμεθα) a distinction is to be noticed: either (1) as between the external sight of miracles, and the more spiritual and internal beholding the moral glory of the only-Begotten (Baur, Ebrard); or (2) with much greater truth, as between the sight which has simply knowledge for its result and object, and that fuller and more entranced gaze which rejoices in the object contemplated (cf. St John's Gospel, vi. 36—40, where the beholdeth of v. 40 is an intentional advance upon the have seen of v. 36). He contemplates who is sufficiently struck to stop and gaze. The word used here by St John is the same as that applied by the angel to those who gazed upon the Ascension (Acts i. 11). This shade of meaning θεασαί (John vi. 40) seems to have in common with θεᾶσθαι. In Ps. xxvii. 4 it is the word in the LXX. which renders חַוּחַ,—"clinging, eager, enchanted gaze." (De-itzsch.) "To contemplate with pleasure; delight in the sight of something." (Gesen. 'Lex.' s. v. Cf. the use of suspicit in 'Æneid' l. 442, VI. 667, and "Vis animum mirer suspiciamque tuum," Martial, II. 36.)

The Transfiguration is not mentioned in St John's Gospel. May it not be specially pointed at here, and in St John i. 14? It is also referred to by another of the three who witnessed it, in a tone which implies that it was a well-known part of Christian teaching. (1 Pet. i. 16—18.)

our hands handled] The expression would naturally refer to some great single occasion, perhaps to His bidding (Luke xxiv. 39), and to the finger and hand of Thomas in St John's Gospel (xx. 27). See the striking quotation from Bullinger in Ebrard, p. 47.

concerning] used, as it frequently is at the beginning of a sentence, to lead to the point to be discussed.

the Word (who is also) the Life] This certainly does not mean the word, written or preached, whose subject is the spiritual and eternal life; but the Personal Word, the Logos, whose attribute it is that He is the Life; who is at once both the Word and the Life (cf. Ephes. iv. 18). For the double gen. and the interpret. of it, cf. St John's Gospel, ii. 21 ("the Temple which is His Body"), xi. 13 ("that taking of rest which is sleep").

On the Logos see Introd. to Gospel and Notes, John i. 1. (One of Gibbon's bitterest sneers is conveyed in three adroitly italicized words upon the margin. "The Logos taught in the school of Alexandria before Christ 100—revealed to the Apostle St John, A.D. 97." ('Decline and Fall,' chap. XXI.) Those who believe with St Augustine that all truth, wherever found, belongs to Christ by right, will not be perplexed by the taunt.) Chrysostom would seem to refer to this place when he says: "If then the Word is the Life; and He who is at once the Word and the Life (ὁ δὲ λόγος οὗτος καὶ ἡ ζωὴ) became flesh; then the Life became flesh." ('In Joann. Evangel.' v.) "Possibly some one might understand the Word of Life as some speech or teaching about Christ, not the very Body of Christ, which was handled. See what follows:—'And that Life was manifested.'"—St Aug. 'In Epist. Joann.' Prolog. Tract. 1.

"The Word of Life"—does this only mean the preaching of eternal life? "The words which follow clearly refer, not to the preaching of life, but to the manifestation of the Life, which has taken place in the bosom of humanity." (Neander.)

2. A comparison of this verse with the Gospel, i. 14, is very suggestive. The Apostle in the Gospel naturally writes from an objective and historical point of view. He begins with the historical fact ("The Word was made Flesh"), and passes on to a statement of the personal impression made upon himself and others ("and we beheld with entranced gaze His glory"). But in the Epistle, which is subjectively related to the Gospel, the process is exactly reversed. St John begins with the personal impression made upon himself and others; pauses to affirm the historical reality of the object, which has produced this impression;

Father, and was manifested unto us;)

3 That which we have seen and heard declare we unto you, that ye also may have fellowship with us: and truly our fellowship is with the Father, and with his Son Jesus Christ.

and then returns to the subjective impression. (See Godet, 'Sur l'Évangile de S. Jean,' 1. 197.) It is one of those deep coincidences between the Epistle and Gospel, which witness not only to a common authorship, but also to an interpenetration of one document by the other.

was manifested] The aorist denoting that it was once for all historically manifested in the Incarnation and life of Jesus. Cf. for thought and expression 1 Tim. iii. 16.

and declare] The verb is the same with that which is so rendered at the commencement of v. 3. The word indicates properly the bearing of a message from another. The translation in the A. V. is an instance of "various renderings of the same words, by which artificial distinctions are introduced in the translation, which have no place in the original." (Bp Lightfoot, 'On Revision,' &c., p. 33.) Note that this word includes St John's Gospel with the present Epistle as part of the declaration or message which he bears to the Church from God.

the life, the eternal (life)] the adj. with art. placed after noun gives the strongest emphasis of which language is capable. Eternal, here an attribute of Christ, is also an attribute of God, in Rom. xvi. 26 (so in LXX.; Isai. xxvi. 4, xl. 28). Note that just this attribute of God and Christ is applied to future reward and punishment. 2 Thess. i. 9. (See Add. Note at end of the Ep. to Thess.) "As the Epistle opens, so it closes with the mention of eternal life," v. 20 (Bengel).

which] The Greek (ἣτις) is inadequately rendered by the simple relative. "It expresses an attribute belonging to the nature of the object, its real and peculiar, not like ὅς, its accidental property." (Jelf, 'Gr. Gr.' 11. 425.) It amplifies, assigns the class to which an object essentially belongs, and has a causative tinge (cf. Matt. xxv. 1; Luke viii. 3, ix. 30, x. 42; John viii. 53; Acts xxiii. 21; Rom. iii. 2; 2 Thess. i. 3, &c.).

as being that which was with the Father] (See note at close of the Chapter.)

3. that ye also] "That you, no less than we, may derive fruit from it" (Grotius).

may have] "may proceed in having, and being confirmed in. He signifies increasing and continuous, not inchoate, action; for he addresses those who had already entered the communion of the Church." (à Lap.)

fellowship with] "Fellowship denotes commerce and society in the same faith, religion, and Church, where all partake of the same sacraments" (ibid.). The prep. (with) is used especially of intellectual, moral, and spiritual relation.

with us] One blessed result of the reception of the Incarnate God is fellowship, communion with the Church, as the Apostolic Church. It is to be noticed, however, that the word Church is never used by St John, either in his Gospel, or in the First and Second Epistle (in 3 John vv. 6, 9, 10. See Note on 3 John v. 6). The pronoun we is, in one sense, its equivalent. It is not so much the "plural of majesty;" or "the plural or modesty, when we share our honour with others" (Grot.); as the plural of communion—the spirit which leads men to speak kindly and lovingly of those who are intimately associated with them as "we"—the expression of the Apostle's intense conviction of his fellowship with all Christ's people, and theirs with him. As we have in this verse the we of a common Apostolic Church (defined by the prep.), so not unfrequently in St John we find the we of a common Apostolic witness, or of collective attestation of the Gospel: supra v. 1; Gospel, i. 14, xxi. 24.

and truly our fellowship is] "and truly the fellowship which I have called ours (with us) is something more than that. It is with the Father," &c. When καὶ...δὲ occur, as in this place, within a short space, they are intended to explain and amplify. The second part of the sentence is linked to the first by these particles, which thus indicate a co-ordination in the ideas but with a certain progress. (Godet, 'Sur l'É. de S. Jean,' 11. 124; cf. John vi. 51, xv. 27. "καὶ...δὲ, in one and the same clause, as often in the best authors, signifies et vero — atque etiam." Winer, 'Gramm. of N. T.,' Part III. Sect. liii. p. 464.)

with the Father, and with His Son] "He unfolds the grandeur and nobility of the society of the Church; it is a fellowship with the Father, and with His Son; cf. 1 Cor. i. 9" (à Lap.). "The fellowship of which St John speaks is not only that peace and concord, by which men are knit to their fellow-men, but that by which there is a vital, indissoluble union of men with God in soul and spirit by faith." (Zwingle, quoted by Ebrard in loc.) The idea of the double fellowship is profoundly given in John xv. 1 sqq.

Jesus Christ] Our Lord is called Jesus, i. 7, iv. 3, 15, v. 1, 5; Jesus Christ i. 3, iii. 23, iv. 2, v. 20. When there is a reference, direct or indirect, to heretics who denied the Incarnation, the name Jesus is specially used as ap-

4 And these things write we unto you, that your joy may be full.

5 This then is the message which we have heard of him, and declare propriate to the Human Nature. Jesus Christ implies peculiarly a recognition of His Messianic character (v. 6).

4. And these things write we unto you] Does the Apostle refer to the verses which precede, or (as Dusterd) not merely to vv. 1—3, but to the whole Epistle? (See Additional Note at close of the Chapter.)

On the whole, there is a presumption that, in v. 4, St John would have us understand by these things, not the entire Epistle or the subsequent portion of it, but either (1) solely the contents of vv. 1, 2, 3, or (2) with much greater probability the Gospel also.

your joy] Two important MSS. read "our joy." The internal evidence, however, seems to be in favour of the A. V. (1) It is infinitely more natural in a letter to wish joy—for practically what is said here is tantamount to a wish—to others than to ourselves. (2) 1 John v. 12 is not decisive, for (a) the reading is uncertain, (b) the anticipated pleasure of meeting "face to face" imparts a different colour to the word our, and makes it vivid and appropriate. (3) The phrase "that your joy may be fulfilled" (John xvi. 24) is in favour of the Text. Rec. (see Reiche, 'Comment. Crit.' in loc.).

your joy may be fulfilled] For the expression cf. Gospel, iii. 29, xv. 11, xvi. 24, xvii. 13. "The whole Epistle is a devotional and moral application of the main ideas, which are evolved historically in the sayings and doings of Christ recorded in the Gospel." (Bishop Lightfoot.)

fulfilled (perf. part.)] raised to the highest point. "It is but the beginning of joy when we begin to believe. When faith daily increases, joy increases in proportion" (Luther).

Note the coincidence in thought between 1 John i. 3, 4 and St John's Gospel, ch. xvii.

A. V., as it is in the original, with the language of the Epistle," thus bringing out "another of the many coincidences, tending to establish an identity of authorship in the Gospel and Epistle, and thus to make valid for the former all the evidences which may be adduced for the latter." Bishop Lightfoot, 'On Revision of N. T.' pp. 55, 56.]

SECTION II.

i. 5—ii. 2. "And the message which we have heard from Him, and of which we are consequently the authoritative announcers to you, is as follows:—'God is Light, and there is in Him no speck of darkness whatever.' If we say (I know not whether it be so—it may be) that we have moral and spiritual communion with Him, while yet we practically move in the sphere of darkness, we lie, and are no doers of the truth. But if we walk in the Light, as He is in the Light, we have communion with Him, with His Church, with all its faithful people, and they with us, and the blood of Jesus His Son continually purifies us from all sin. I say this, mention this purification continually effected, because if we say—as some of us perhaps do—that we have no sin as our own, no reality of guilt clinging to us and abiding, we deceive ourselves, and the truth, theoretical and practical, is not in us. If we confess our sins, He is faithful to His promises, and full of righteousness in order to remit our sins and cleanse us from all unrighteousness. If we say that we have not sinned and are not sinners, we are making Him a liar, and the substance of His teaching is not in us. My children! these things I am writing to you, in order that ye may not sin. Yet if any one may have committed some sin (it may be!) we—you and I—have an Advocate with the Father, a righteous One, Jesus Christ. And He is a Propitiation for our sins, nay, not for ours only, but for those of the whole world."

5. This then is the message] κ stands alone in reading here, "This, then, is the love of the message." But several MSS. read promise (ἐπαγγελία) instead of message (ἀγγελία). But the context evidently requires, not any Gospel promise, but a message as the object of "we announce." In the words that follow there is no promise, but there is an annunciation. The first of these words in the N. T. does not ever seem to signify message, but always promise, except in Acts xxii. 21, where it means command. (Bretsch. s. v.)

which we have heard from Him] In classical Greek the gen. without the prepos. would have been sufficient. (Winer.)

unto you, that God is light, and in him is no darkness at all.

6 If we say that we have fellowship with him, and walk in HIM] Christ is HE of whom St John's heart is so full that it seems as if all must understand of whom he speaks. It is like David, who begins a psalm, "I will praise Thee," without naming Him Whom he addresses. (Psalm cxxxviii. 1.) This trait seems to be beautifully illustrated by the delineation of Mary Magdalene in the Gospel, xx. 15. "Mary did not express by name Him Whom she sought, but only said 'Him' three times. (John xx. 15.) How Him? she does not disclose the name, because she instinctively supposes that the thought which is never for a moment absent from her own heart must be clear to all." (S. Bernard, 'Serm. in Cant.' vii.) "Believers easily supply the name, for their souls are full to overflowing with the memory of their Lord" (Bengel).

and announce] (ἀναγγέλλομεν). This is not the same compound of ἀγγέλλω which in v. 3 is translated declare. The prep. in composition has the sense of increase and strengthening as well as repetition. It is always used of solemn teaching with a certain character of authority about it: of the Messiah (John iv. 25), of the Holy Spirit (xvi. 13, 14, 15, three times over, like a refrain), of some one who has a message that must be announced, especially Apostles (John v. 15; Acts xiv. 27, xv. 4, xx. 20; Rom. xv. 21, of priests and Levites; 1 Pet. i. 12). In LXX. it is almost a sacerdotal word (cf. Deut. xxiv. 8; Isai. lii. 15). Bourdaloue instructively contrasts the more subjective and appealing tone of St Paul (2 Cor. xii. 11 sqq.) with the majestic tone which St John knew how to assume in his adnuntiamus.

Note the Apostle's intense conviction that the Message which he has to deliver is received from the lips of Christ; that it is not the conclusion of an argument, or the expression of the consciousness of the congregation, but a revelation; and that its delivery implies a commission. We announce implies grandeur and importance in the Message—earnestness and commission in the messenger.

that God is light] "It is difficult to open up sufficiently any of the highest and most transcendent subjects without using symbols," says Plato ('Polit.' 396). What is conveyed by the symbol of light? "Since light," says Grimm, "is the subtlest, the purest, the most glorious of things, God is called light, i.e. a Nature free from alien intermixture, most pure, and most holy." (Grimm, 'Clav. N. T.' s. v., where the writer refers to Wisdom vii. 26, and Grimm's note.) Light, in the text, is not merely intelligence (Calv.), nor sanctity and purity exclusively (Luthardt), though the context makes the last idea prominent. "This profound term designates perfect moral goodness, combined with blissful consciousness of His own sanctity, in the sphere of the highest life, where the luminous clearness of the Divine Wisdom also rules as opposed to the world (αἰών)." (Godet, 'Comm. sur l'Év. de St Luc,' II. 199.) Cf. for the conjunction of light with life, Gospel i. 4, also Phil. ii. 15. The root of this is in Ps. xxxvi. 9.

and darkness in Him there is none] "No darkness, i.e. of sin or ignorance, of error or of death." ('Schol. Matt.' quoted by Lücke.) "All and every kind of darkness is excluded from the nature of God" (Ebrard). There is no speck in that perfect orb. Hengstenb. asserts that while light in St John's Gospel is nearly equivalent to salvation, in the Epistle it almost stands for moral goodness, while darkness is moral evil. The immoderate passion for discovering polemical allusions in every syllable of the Epistle, and (like Hammond) "seeing Gnostics where there are none," has led to an unreasonable reaction. Internal and external evidence alike attest the existence of a polemical purpose in the Epistle, subordinate to other and higher ends. There is a reference in the passage to Gnosticism, and the systems of Oriental dualism, with their eternal and necessary spheres of light and darkness. The verse seems to bear remarkably on Spinozism and Hegelianism, which teach that evil is only relative to the individual being—"good in making." St Augustine well traces the connection:—"John has said above v. 3—But if God is light, and darkness in Him is none, and we should have fellowship with Him; then the darkness is to be chased away by us that it may be light within us—for darkness cannot have fellowship with light. Therefore see what follows (v. 6), and compare 'what fellowship hath light with darkness?' (2 Cor. vi. 14). You say that you have fellowship with God, and walk in darkness. But 'God is light, and darkness in Him is none.' How then is fellowship between light and darkness? A man may say, 'What shall I do? How shall I, a sinner, be light?' A certain despairing sadness arises. There is no safety, but in the fellowship of God (v. 5). But sins are darkness. What then is to be done? Fellowship with God is to be held fast. Other hope of eternal life there is none." (St Aug., 'In Epist. Joann. ad Part. Tract.' I. 5. Opp. Tom. III. Pt. 2, 1981, edit. Migne.)

6. If we say] εἰ (if) with conj. expresses mere supposition, not conviction. It may happen. The writer feels no certainty that it will, yet has some expectation that his supposition may be realised (Kühner, 'Gr. Gr.' Jelf's ed. 467, 470). It will be seen from darkness, we lie, and do not the truth:

7 But if we walk in the light, as he is in the light, we have fellowship one with another, and the blood of Jesus Christ his Son cleanseth us from all sin.

this what subtle gentleness lies in the form of St John's expression.

and yet (καὶ). This use is specially, but not exclusively, Johannic. (See note on 1 John ii. 1.)

walk] make our continuous life-walk.

we lie] The grand Message, received from Christ, and announced in the Gospel, makes it evident that if any possibly claim communion with Him, and yet persistently have their life-walk in the sphere of moral darkness, their whole life becomes a lie in speculation and action.

and are not doing the truth] The realm of truth, in St John's conception, is not limited to speech, written or articulate. It extends to the thoughts, and indeed to the whole life. Right action is truth made objectively visible. See Additional Note, 3 John 3.

7. he] Christ. See note on v. 5. For "walking in light" cf. Ps. lxxxix. 15.

as he is in the light] The as here is, of course, of similitude not equality. Cf. Matt. v. 43, vi. 12; 1 John iii. 3.

fellowship one with another] Some of the ancient Greek writers explain this as "the mutual intercommunion of ourselves and of Him who is the Light" (Theophyl., Œcumen.). Much better Bengel—"It does not seem that the expression can be fitly used of God and man."

and the blood of Jesus His Son] This reading is to be preferred. The word Christ is omitted by NBC. Reiche argues for its retention. "St John in this Epistle never certainly (for iv. 15 is doubtful) calls the Saviour simply Jesus, with one exception, which has a singular significance, viz. in iv. 3. In that passage he opposes heresies which denied the Incarnation, and thus had a special reason for employing the name which peculiarly denoted the Human Nature. But St John generally and constantly joins 'Jesus Christ' (i. 3, iii. 23, iv. 2, v. 20). There is no reason why he should have omitted it here. But officious copyists might be influenced by dogmatic causes, because to them it might have seemed that the blood was suitable only to the Human Nature" ('Comment. Crit.' III. 312). This subtle critic, however, appears to write with less than his usual accuracy. Jesus alone occurs not only in iv. 3, but in ii. 22, iv. 15 (probably), v. 1—5.

"The blood of Jesus," sc. poured forth. The whole sacrifice, nay the whole obedience of Jesus, consisting in His perfect holiness, and consummated by His voluntary self-sacrifice. (Gomar, Neander, Bengel) Something more is meant than "natural faith in the moral purpose of the death of Jesus" (Paulus), or even than "faith in Christ's obedience unto death, or in His Passion." (Episcop., Grot.) For in this expression, endeared to every Christian heart, we have the central thought of the Gospel, under the most vivid and affecting of images. Scripture speaks the language of life and living emotion. It does not always define. It takes a striking characteristic, and puts it before the heart and eye as a summary representative of the whole. In ordinary language, an abridged description, when the part selected is vivid, picturesque, pregnant, gives force and colour to "the poetry of common speech." Thus we say, so many "souls" for persons, "sail" for ships, "hands" for effective individuals. Such a word in Christian theology is the Blood. It is dogma with pathos. But it is not only picturesque and pathetic. It implies, as no other word could do, (a) the reality of the Human Body of Jesus, (b) the reality of His sufferings, (c) the reality of His sacrifice. It is remembered in heaven as the source of redemption. Apoc. v. 9, vii. 14, xii. 11.—It points also to the fulfilment of all that was symbolized by blood in the earlier dispensation. (Hebrews ix. 11, 23.)

Thus "the blood of Jesus" is Johannic as well as Pauline. "Those who are truly of the family of God cannot and will not ignore the language of their Father's house." (Melancthon.)

is ever purifying] (Bp Wordsworth), keeps on purifying. The contrast between our natural fear of the rigidity of the moral government of the universe, with our consciousness that "its rules are such as not to admit of pardon by the sole efficacy of repentance," and "the particular manner in which Christ interfered in the redemption of the world, His office as Mediator" (Bp Butler, 'Analogy,' Part II. Chap. v.), may be drawn out by reading the verse before us with a memorable passage in modern poetry. The usurper Canute, who has had a share in his father's death, expiring after a virtuous and glorious reign, walks towards the light of heaven. But first he cuts with his sword a shroud of snow from the top of Mount Savo. As he advances towards heaven a cloud forms, and drop by drop his shroud is soaked with a rain of blood. So it is for ever.

"C'est pourquoi ce roi sombre est resté dans la nuit,

Et, sans pouvoir rentrer dans sa blancheur première,

Sentant, à chaque pas qu'il fait vers la lumière,

Une goutte de sang sur sa tête pleuvoir

Rôde éternellement sous l'énorme ciel noir."

(V. Hugo, 'La Lég. des Siècles,' 'Le Parricide,' I. 77—83.)

8 If we say that we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us.

9 If we confess our sins, he is faithful and just to forgive us our sins, and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness.

10 If we say that we have not sinned, we make him a liar, and his word is not in us.

Read beside this "The blood of Jesus is ever purifying." The blood of Jesus has not only a momentary efficacy. Its virtue extends to the whole Christian life continuously. The purification thus effected, and expressed by the word "is purifying," is twofold. It implies (1) justification, by which we are brought back into communion with God; (2) sanctification, by which the power of sin is gradually abolished. The red rose of pardon and the white rose of purity (if we may venture to use such language as mystics have loved) grow upon one stem and spring from one root. The remarkable reading in Apoc. xxii. 14 adopted by Tischend. (μακάριοι οἱ πλύνοντες τὰς στολὰς αὐτῶν) would singularly illustrate the notion of continuous purification in this verse. He who wrote this verse in the Epistle before us would naturally write Apoc. vii. 14 and xxii. 14 in the more imaginative elevation of poetry or prophecy.

8. Here we have one of those subtle lines of connection; those "roots at the bottom of the stream, hidden from casual observers" (Alford) so common in St John. "What! those who, according to v. 7, make their abiding life-walk in the light; who habitually 'form the glorious procession of the sons of light' (W. Archer Butler)—must it be said of them that they have a perpetual guilt, which needs the perpetual cleansing of a perpetual pity?" The answer to this implied objection is contained in this v. 8 ("yes! for) if we say," &c.

that we have not sin] There is often an emphatic force in the verb have in the New Testament for good and for bad. It signifies an abiding reality of guilt or grace which we have and hold ("This verb speaks of the state in which we habitually are; of the condition, external and internal, in which we abide; when a substant. in the accus. follows, the notion conveyed is that of keeping permanently in the condition. Cf. specially Matt. xvii. 20, where 'having faith' is not simply believing, but being constantly full of faith—so Bretsch. 'Lex. Man.' s.v. See in St John's Gospel, viii. 12, ix. 41, xv. 22—24, xix. 11; 1 John v. 10 (cf. Heb. xii. 28. This pregnant use of have is also characteristic of the Apoc. See vi. 9, xii. 17, xix. 10).

If we say that we have no sin, we deceive ourselves] "It is to be noted who speaks here—a faithful Apostle of Christ, and a veteran moreover." (Bengel.)

we deceive ourselves] or mislead ourselves.

(Used by LXX. in Exod. xiv. 3 as translation of "they are entangled in the land.") Not only like "men whose life has gone astray" (Spenser, 'Faerie Queene,' Book I. Cant. iv. 36), but like men who lead their own lives astray.

the truth is not in us] It may be round us, near us, acknowledged, contended for, but it has not penetrated the soul. It remains an external rule perhaps, but a dead letter. It is not in us.

8, 9, 10. Have we not the abiding reality of sin? If we say so we are but misleading ourselves, self-deceived and self-involved in our pride, and the truth is not in us. Have we only sin in the abstract, not definite, personal, actual sins to confess? Nay, we have such, though still with a blessed hope of pardon. Are we not sinful in our present condition, as the result of past sin? (note the perf. v. 10). Nay, if we say so, we are worse than liars. We make Him a liar. The whole substance of His word is absent from our inner being. Our life is a practical negation of that doctrine which is absolute truth; for "the imagination of our own sinlessness is an inward lie." (W. Archer Butler.)

9. If we confess our sins] The petition in the Lord's Prayer supposes the Christian perpetually penetrated with the sense of sin. It is implied in it that he prays daily for forgiveness. (Luke xi. 3.)

It has been urged by some that the prayer was given by our Lord to disciples who had not yet risen above the position of Judaism. But this verse beyond all question applies to Christian believers.

he is faithful and righteous] These two attributes are conjoined in Psalm cxliii. 1. Faithful, as abiding by His Promise. Just or righteous—there is some temptation here to conjecture that the word is used of goodness generally, with an under-meaning of gentleness and benignity (cf. Matt. i. 19—and the character of the true Christian gentleman in Ps. cxii. 9). But the slight allusive touch in the word unrighteousness at the close of the verse (which is lost by the just of the A. V. at the beginning of it) seems to fix the more usual meaning.

that He may forgive us our sins] i.e. in order to, or with a view to, "forgiving us." (See Winer, 'Gr. Gr.' p. 483.) The word can scarcely, however, be limited to bare forgiveness. Among its various senses, indeed, running as they do in Lexicons round the compounds of missio (emissio, dimissio, omissio, permissio) we must include remissio. This is specially applied to debt (Deut. xv. 1, 2; LXX.) and to sin, looked upon as a debt incurred (Matt. vi. 12, xviii. 27). But in the Old Testament it is used by LXX. as the translation of verbs signifying expiation (Isai. xxii. 14), ablation (Ps. xxv. 18), pardon and indulgence (Num. xiv. 19). "We cannot argue from the word alone that God in forgiving sin doth only and barely release the debt." (Bp Pearson on Creed, Art. x.)

our sins...all unrighteousness] There are in Exodus xxxiv. 7 three words for sin under different aspects, "iniquity, transgression, sin" (A. V.)—sin as vanity, nothingness; sin as separation from God; sin as mistake and error—ἀνομία, ἀδικία, ἀμαρτία (LXX.). If we may be guided by the Hebrew words of which they appear as the translation, we should say that sin is transgression as a terrible mistake, unrighteousness as a separation from God. See also the important note on Ps. li. 3.

10. we make him] A peculiar Johannic phrase, "to declare one to be such by word and deed" (1 John v. 10; cf. Gospel, v. 18, viii. 53, x. 33, xix. 7—12).

his word is not in us] "The Divine word is regarded as a thing which may pass over into subjectivity" (Düsterd), cf. "Ye have not His word abiding in you," Gospel v. 38. The expression is parallel with, and an advance upon, "the truth is not in us," supra v. 8.

As this Epistle alone in the N.T. is addressed to a generation which had grown up in the midst of Christian tradition, and surrounded by Christian influences, it would quite naturally (as it does here) give prominence to the Christians' perpetual need of pardon. In dwelling upon pardon once obtained, and sanctification once begun, Christians sometimes forget that pardon is to be always sought, purification to be always going on. We are perpetually to pass through new pardons and new purifications, coming from new surrenders of self to Christ. This passage (esp. v. 9) certainly does not speak of "one pardon of all sins, past, present, and future," but of continuing sinfulness and ever-renewed pardon. The appointment of the general confession and absolution in the Prayer-Book for every day in the year is perhaps the best practical commentary upon the spirit of these verses. Cf. also St Paul's exhortation, "be ye reconciled to God," with his magnificent recognition of a great change which had taken place once for all, and remained in its consequences. 2 Cor. v. 20; cf. v. 17.

ADDITIONAL NOTES ON CHAP. I. 2, 4, 5.

2. "By the prep. πρός in this place is meant the utmost possible proximity without confusion, and likeness without sameness" (Coleridge, 'Table Talk,' p. 13), "with signifies both propinquity and difference" (Grotius). The prep. of motion with the verb of repose involves eternity of relation with activity and life (Coleridge, ibid.), cf. Gospel, i. 1, with Luther's pregnant Commentary. "The with sounds as if the Word were different from God; therefore he takes it up again, and closes the ring—"and the Word was God." (Cf. Proverbs viii. 30—where, however, לִפְנֵי is translated by a different prep. in LXX.)

4. An exhaustive consideration of the passages in St John in which οὗτος occurs leads to the following conclusions.

(a) That οὗτος with ἴνα, ἐὰν, ὅτι always points to that which follows (Gospel, iii. 19, v. 18, vi. 29, xv. 12, xvii. 3; 1 John ii. 3, iii. 11, 13, v. 3).

(b) That οὗτος alone generally refers to that which precedes. Thus in 1 John v. 13, 14, the ταῦτα, these things, in v. 13 must refer to that which goes before—the αὐτῇ...ὅτι in v. 14 to that which is just coming (see Gospel, ii. 22, xiv. 25, xv. 11, 21, xvi. 1, 3, 4, 25, 33, xvii. 1, xx. 31, xxi. 24).

Still there remain several exceptions to conclusion (b): in Gospel, i. 19, v. 3; in First Epistle, ii. 25, 26, v. 25, "this is the promise," i.e. that which follows; v. 26, "these things have I written unto you," i.e. that which goes before. [It has been suggested that the solution is to be found in the use of the singular and the plural—the singular always referring to that which precedes. (Lücke.) But this is very precarious.]

5. We are not merely to look upon this use of αὐτός as a Christian equivalent of the way in which the Pythagoreans used to speak of their master. (Compare for this—"And him—O wondrous him! O miracle of men!" 'Henry IV.' Act II. Scene 3.) There is a higher consciousness pervading the use of it by St John and St Paul. Among the Hebrews הוּא (hū), He, He Himself, like bu among the Persians, αὐτός, ἐκεῖνος among the Greeks (Simon. 'Onom.' 549), denotes God in the religious usus loquendi, and therefore אֱלֹהֵינוּ (Ābhīyāhū, aūrōtheos) with אֱלֹהֵינוּ (Ābhīyāh, Ābhīyēl). [Fuerst, 'Heb. and Chaldee Lexicon,' p. 10. Cf. Mark xii. 32, where the true reading is—"for there is One" (God being incorrectly supplied in T. R.), "and there is none other but HE." "The practice of denoting God by the pronoun of the third person was common among the Hebrews. The name Elihu ('He is my God') is one example." (Renan, 'Job,' p. 153.) God and Christ run so completely into one subject that the subtlest criticism often seeks in vain to sever them (1 John ii. 5, 12, 25, 28, 29, iii. 1, 2; 2 John v. 6. See Tholuck 'On Hebrews,' Vol. II. 63). For this solemn and reverential use of αὐτός, see besides the passages just cited, Luke i. 17, v. 16, 17, ix. 51; the αὐτός, twelve times repeated of Christ in Col. i. 16—20; finally the probably true reading of Hebr. x. 12 (αὐτὸς δέ, "but HE"). Contrast, as significant of subtle differences of character, St Paul's effusion and expansiveness in again and again reiterating our Lord's names (e.g. 1 Cor. i. 4—9; 2 Cor. iv. 10, 11, 14) with St John's general love of tender periphrases. (Very striking is the passage ending with the words referring to Christ—τοῦ Θεοῦ...ἐπαγγελλομένου, ὃς ἐστὶν αὐτός. S. Ignat. 'Epist. ad Trall.' xi.)

God is Light] In all languages at all stages of culture, light has been used as the most appropriate representation of God's holiness, bliss, and goodness. Light has been, not unsuccessfully, appealed to as the first real educator of the religious instinct of the idiot. (Mentioned in a Report of the Earlswood Asylum a few years ago.) To the Arabs it is so potently suggestive, that by one well versed in their modes of thought, they have been supposed to lose the object of their worship in His own glorious emblem, and thus to practise in a peculiar form the idolatry which their creed abhors. (Palgrave's 'Travels.') Of the effect of light upon a scientific man of the highest eminence the following interesting record has been preserved. "The predominance of light as a figure and a symbol in Clifford's writings will be remarked: he associates it with the right and all things good so constantly and naturally that it is one of the marks of his style. He had physically a great love of light, and chose to write when he could in a clear and spacious room, with the windows quite free from curtains." (W. Kingdon Clifford, by Frederick Pollock, 'Fortnightly Review,' May 1, 1879, pp. 686, 676.) The same passion for light may be traced constantly in St Augustine. (See especially 'Confess.' x. 34.) Poetry connects light instinctively with our highest ideas. Cowley apostrophizes it, "Swiftess and Power by birth are thine!" The exquisite beauty of Dante's allusions to light is admirably drawn out in Dean Church's Essay.

But "there is no poetry" (says Herder) "which on the subject of light can be compared with Hebrew. The very word (אור, or) has a lofty sound, and is the special symbol of joy." ('Geist v. Heb. Poes.' p. 55.)

CHAPTER II.

1 He comforteth them against the sins of infirmity. 3 Rightly to know God is to keep his commandments, 9 to love our brethren, 15 and not to love the world. 18 We must beware of seducers: 20 from whose deceits the godly are safe, preserved by perseverance in faith, and holiness of life.

MY little children, these things I write I unto you, that ye sin not. And if any man sin, we have an CHAP. II. 1, 2. The object of this teaching is holiness. "My children, these things I am writing to you, in order that ye may not continue sinning. Yet, if any one may have committed some act of sin (it may be!) you and I have an Advocate."

1. My children!] There are two different words in this Epistle alike rendered "little children" in A. V., τεκνία and παιδιά, the first in ii. 12, 28, iii. 18, iv. 4; the second in ii. 13, 18. Both seem to have been caught from the lips of Him who speaks in the Gospel (the first, xiii. 33; cf. Mark x. 24; the second, xxi. 5). There seems to be some distinction between the two; St Paul's use of τεκνία (in Gal. iv. 19 alone in his Epp.—possibly, however, τέκνα) appears to shew that it signifies the spiritual relation of children in the faith to a spiritual father. It will be seen (inf. v. 12) that the first of these two words is used generally of all sons in the faith, and includes adults; while the second designates properly the age or characteristics of childhood (Luke i. 80, ii. 40; 1 Cor. xiv. 20), as a class, with special reference to the earliest period of human life (inf. vv. 12, 13). Thus the first is a more definite and technical term, and has a specific reference to spiritual fatherhood, and may be translated my sons or my children; while the second is the gentle and benevolent address of "age in admonishing youth, of authority in charging subordinates, of wisdom in instructing ignorance and inexperience." (Reiche 'Comment. Crit.') It will be best to translate this last by the more endearing word, Little children!

That ye may not sin. And yet if any may have sinned. [ἀμαρτην, past isolated single action, not present continuous or future action.] And yet. This rhetorical use of καί—the καί of paradox—in connecting two propositions, of which the last seems contradictory to the first, is noted by Stallbaum ('Plat. Apol.' 29 b). It is rather frequent in N. T. (Matt. vi. 26; 2 Thess. iii. 15; Apoc. iii. 1 are good instances). Two remarks may be made: (1) On the Gospel mode of making men virtuous. Not by an appeal to interest or happiness, or even to the eternal fitness of things and to the will of God. These answers to the question "why should we be virtuous?" are all true in some measure, some very nobly true. But practically they meet with little success. But the appeal "Be virtuous, because i. 7—9 is true" has succeeded, and will succeed as nothing advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous :

2 And he is the propitiation for our sins : and not for ours only, but else can. (2) To the general end and principle "that ye may not sin," there is here an apparent exception, "if any man may have sinned," &c. One illustrative passage may be cited. "Although the design of the Gospel be that we should erect a throne for Christ to reign in our spirits, and this doctrine be therefore preached 'that we sin not;' yet, if one be overtaken in a fault, despair not. Christ is our Advocate, and He is the Propitiation; He did propitiate the Father by His death, and the benefit of that we receive at our first access to Him. But then He is our Advocate too, and prays perpetually for our perseverance or restitution respectively." (Bp Taylor 'Of Repentance.') It is peculiarly necessary here to preserve the exquisitely adjusted balance in the divine original of invigorating effort for the Christian's strength and comfortable promise for the Christian's weakness. No encouragement is given to those who continue in present, or to those who meditate future sin.

we have] The Apostle tenderly and humbly includes himself among them who have and need an Advocate.

we have an advocate] παράκλητον ἔχομεν. On the pregnant sense of have see note supra on i. 8.

Paraclete, "one who is called in by his good word or countenance to aid him whose cause is to be examined, or whose petition is to be considered." The word occurs five times in the New Testament; four times (in St John's Gospel) of the Holy Ghost; once (in this verse) of Christ. It will be best here simply to refer to the exhaustive note on St John xiv. 16.

an advocate] "Christ is our Advocate: (1) interpretatively, by pleading before the Father His merits or blood; (2) formally and properly by pleading for us—not by prostration as a suppliant, but by expressing His desire for the salvation of His people, in such wise as may beseem Him" (Est.). "Christ pleads the cause of His Church with the Father; the Holy Spirit with men" (Grotius).

with the Father] Christians have never adopted the formula "Christe! ora pro nobis." For His intercession is not verbal and temporary. It is interpretative and continuous. He prays with His Father—not at particular seasons, like the Jewish High Priests—but perpetually by His very Being and Presence. (Voss. 'Harmon. Evang.' p. 423.)

Two remarks remain to be made: (1) The intense conviction of Christ's living Personality in St John's heart. He is for St John not merely a memory, but the living Advocate. He continues the same work which the Apostle saw Him begin upon earth, only elevated above the condition of time and space. The "way" for us through the veil is a "living way" (Heb. x. 20). Earth's great men live on in their work, or in the principles which they have embodied and represented. The work of Luther or Napoleon is linked to their history; the work of Jesus is linked to His Person. (2) Some modern critics have asserted a dogmatic difference between this passage and St John's Gospel (xiv. 16), which speaks of another Comforter. This is so far from being the case that this very passage in the Epistle is, so to speak, one of the asterisks which point its readers back to the Gospel; one of the suggestions implying a question which only the Gospel can answer. When Jesus speaks of "another Comforter," He implicitly gives this very title to Himself.

Jesus Christ who is righteous] "Our version, Jesus Christ the righteous, is rather beyond the original. As it is, St John has said only, 'Jesus Christ, a righteous Person'" (Bp Middleton). Note, however, that this apparently casual epithet fits into one great leading idea of the Epistle, because it points gently to the picture in the Gospel. Jesus Christ is not only a sage teaching a system of beautiful ideas to a school. He is not only the Word who is the Life. He is Righteous (observe the position of the word closing the verse). What stress is practically laid upon this may be seen further on, where the Christian's life is declared to be an imitation of His righteousness, 1 John iii. 7—10.

2. And he is] The present of "to be" is used by St John especially, with a presentiating shade of thought and meaning when He speaks of our Lord. It is thus used of His life on earth (1 John iii. 3, 5, 7), of His life in heaven (iii. 2, iv. 17). So here of His propitiation. It is not merely an isolated act of history. It is abiding and present. Cf. the old Collect for 15th Sunday after Trinity, "Keep Thy Church by Thy perpetual propitiation" (propitiatione perpetua).

propitiation. "Ps. cxxx. 4; LXX. ἱλασμός, only there and in Dan. ix. 9; Neh. ix. 17 (The verb in 2 Chro. vi. 21, 25, 27, 30, 39); Vulg. propitiation, 1 John ii. 2" (see Kay, 'The Psalms,' p. 418). ἱλασμός, ἱλαστής, after Hebrew usage, are from ἱλάσκειν, "to cause sins to cease." Thus "He is a propitiation, either (1) by means of the effect produced by His obedience, as Rom. iii. 25 (ἱλαστήριον), i.e. one who renders God propitious (Gom., Vorst.), or (2) as an expiatory Victim, offered upon the Cross, by which God was rendered propitious (August., Piscat., Est.). The advocacy of Christ is here based upon His offering; and we have also for the sins of the whole world.

3 And hereby we do know that we know him, if we keep his commandments.

three characteristics of it: (a) It is present and abiding ("He is"); (b) it is propitiatory; (c) it is universal.

The doctrine of the Atonement is not dependent for its life upon any one phrase or figure—therefore, not upon this of propitiation. Yet it is useless to attempt to evade its force. "Was it," it has been asked, "that God needed to be propitiated? Such a thought refutes itself by the indignation which it awakens. From the Epistle to the Hebrews it has passed into modern theology. We can live and die in the language of St Paul and St John." (Prof. Jowett.) Yet English-speaking Christians, at least, have not learnt to apply the idea of propitiation to Christ's work from the Epistle to the Hebrews. (In the original, indeed, of Heb. ii. 17, it does occur, but in our A. V. neither there nor elsewhere in that Epistle.) To them it comes exclusively from Rom. iii. 15, and from St John's Epistle, who does not shrink from repeating the word, infra iv. 10. So completely at one in this matter are St Paul, St John, and the writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews.

for our sins] The technical sacrificial prepos. used with verbs signifying expiate, offering for.

for those of the whole world] whole (ὅλον) signifies fulness of quantity; all (πᾶν) completeness of number.

world] In St John "the world" denotes either (1) creation, the universe (xvi. 24), or (2) "the sphere of mingled good and evil, receiving many Satanic influences, and also capable of certain germs of good," or (3) men universally (iii. 16, vi. 51), as in this place, or (4) that element in the material and human world, in the sphere of mingled good and evil, which is external to God, His Spirit, and His Church. [The signif. of the word is well traced by Dean Vaughan, 'St Paul's Epistle to the Romans,' p. 15.] The sense of the love of God sometimes falls upon narrow hearts. There is a self-righteousness from the sense of special favour, no less than from that of special merit. None ever drew the line between the Church and the world more distinctly than St John (see infra, v. 19). Yet now that "the barriers of a nation had been broken down, the boundless perspective of the Christian horizon broadens on his view." (De Broglie, 'Hist. de l'Empire et l'Église,' I. 99.) This universal statement does not really contradict, but rather explains, our Lord's statement in St John's Gospel (x. 15), even if we decide that "for the sheep" there includes believers alone. In the Divine idea and purpose Christ laid down His life for all. In historical reality and fact it will profit those only who receive it. "He knows that it will only take effect for the last, and therefore He says, 'I lay down My life in favour, on behalf of the sheep'" (Godet, 'S. Jean,' II. 291). The connection, i. 8—ii. 2, is admirably traced by St Augustine: "i. 8—If you confess yourself a sinner, the truth is in you; for that truth is light. Your life is not yet a perfect splendour, for sins are in it; but you have begun to be enlightened, because you confess your sins. For see what follows (i. 9): not only past sins, but those which we happen to contract from the present life; for men in this life cannot but have sins, though they be not of the graver kind. And lest he should seem to give impunity to sins in i. 9, and men should say 'Let us sin securely, for Christ cleanses us'... note what follows (ii. 2): 'Yes; but sin perhaps creeps in from human life. What then? Shall we despair? Nay, listen (v. 1, ad fin.): He then is the Advocate. Take heed not to sin. If sin shall have crept in from human frailty, at once see and condemn it. And when you have condemned it, come without fear to the Judge. There you have the Advocate. Fear not to lose the cause. If a man in a worldly cause commits himself to an eloquent pleader, and is safe, shall you trust yourself to the Advocate and perish? No! 'We have an Advocate.' Mark St John's humility. He says not 'ye have'; nor 'ye have me'; nor even 'ye have Christ.' But he puts forward Christ, not himself; and he says 'we have,' not 'ye have,' placing himself in the rank of sinners." ('In Epist. Joann.' Tract. I.)

SECTION III. (a). ii. 3—6.

3—6. "And we know that we have made ourselves acquainted with, and at present continue to know Him by this simple fact, if we carefully and thoughtfully keep Christ's commandments. Some man perhaps vaunts, 'I have made myself acquainted with, and continue to know Christ.' Suppose that such an one keep not Christ's commandments. Christ's word which is the truth dwells not in his inner being. But if a man not only keeps the commandments one by one, but observes that word as a whole, truly such a man not only knows God, but his love to God reaches towards the standard of ideal perfection. By this we test our communion with Him. He that vaunts a vital abiding with Christ, ought himself to walk continuously, to make his walk of life such as Christ made His one great Life-walk here upon earth." (Gospel, viii. 29, vi. 57, "As He hath sent Me, so I live for Him—to manifest His Life and Majesty.")

3. hereby] In this that follows, namely, if... See note on i. 4.

4 He that saith, I know him, and keepeth not his commandments, is a liar, and the truth is not in him.

5 But whoso keepeth his word, in him verily is the love of God perfected: hereby know we that we are in him.

6 He that saith he abideth in him

we do know that we have the knowledge of Him (Alford)]. A gentle parody of the ambitious gnosis of the Gnostics (Hengst.). It is denied by some critics (Lücke) that to know signifies the experimental knowledge of love. But the Hebrew word, of which it is the transl., is lit. to perceive or understand, hence in a secondary sense to have intimate acquaintance, and corresponding love. (On $\gamma\omega\sigma\kappa\epsilon\iota\upsilon$, LXX. see Fuerst, 'Heb. and Chald. Lexicon,' p. 543.) Hence in LXX. the word is used to denote man's loving knowledge of God (Ps. ix. 10; 1 S. ii. 12; Job xviii. 21; Hosea viii. 2) as well as God's loving knowledge of man. In the text the word is not merely the "knowledge of Him as Advocate, as Propitiation" (Hammond), but loving knowledge. "Knowledge is placed in these Epistles twenty-seven times as the fundamental ethical and spiritual principle, faith only seven times" (Rev. C. A. Row).

If we observe His commandments.] The verb ($\tau\eta\rho\omega\mu\epsilon\nu$) signifies to keep the eye fixed upon an object; hence to keep the eye of the soul fixed upon the commandments, in our desire to perform them thoughtfully and conscientiously. (Cf. "deditæque eò mentes cum oculis erant." T. Liv. 'Hist.' I. 9, quoted by Bretsch. 'L. M.' s. v.)

his] of Him, sc. Christ. See note on i. 5. This practical teaching is unlike mere mysticism, in which there is generally a tendency, more or less, to a sort of pantheistic absorption of morality in the spiritual element. In all parts of the Christian Church, perhaps, immorality has from time to time co-existed with some degree of capacity for emotional religionism or of zeal for assumed orthodoxy. The Apostle meets this plainly and decidedly. Here is the test by which to distinguish morbid religionism, or ostentatious orthodoxy, from true religion.

4. He that saith, I have knowledge of Him] "A prosopopœia of one vaunting his knowledge of Christ."

observeth not His commandments] The negative here has an emotional and subjective tinge, quite in accordance with St John's character. He does not assert it as a fact that there is such a person actually; but given the existence of such—"he is a liar," &c. "Some Gnostics, who professed to be perfect, said that they were no more polluted by sins than gold by mire, or sunbeam by the dunghill." (Hammond.)

the truth is not in him] The Cod. Sinait. strikingly adds, "the truth of God."

5. In vv. 5, 6 we have an instance of one of St John's most beautiful peculiarities. We find frequently a parallelism in his writings; but not the mere monotonous parallelism, the cycloidal composition, the eternal tautology, with which that favourite mould of Hebrew thought has so often been charged. (See a beautiful defence in Herder, 'Geist von Hebr. Poes.' Part I. 1.) Thus here—"to observe His commandments" (v. 4) is much; "to observe His word" (v. 5) as one great whole is more, i.e. not merely keeping the commandments in act, but the word of Christ, one and indivisible. Again, the "love" in this verse is, in expression, an advance upon the "knowledge" in the last. Well and briefly Grotius—"He who not only observes the commandments but the word not only knows God but perfectly loves Him. Love presupposes knowledge." For marked examples of this "accessional parallelism" in which each successive member of an antithesis is made to go beyond that which precedes, and the last ripple of thought always breaks highest up on the beach, cf. i. 6, 7, ii. 4, 5, 6—9, 10, 11, 13, 14—20, 27, 28, v. 18, 19. (See Introd. to the Epistle.)

verily in this man his love of God is perfected] "The love of God," i.e. his love toward God. This is the general sense of the phrase in St John (see Gospel, v. 42; cf. xv. 10; 1 John ii. 15, iii. 17, v. 3). When God's love towards man is spoken of, either the context is different (1 John iv. 9), or some periphrastic expression is thrown in which determines the meaning (cf. "the love that God hath," 1 John iv. 16). The verse has been explained away (mainly for the dogmatic purpose of opposing perfectionism) in two ways; either (1) by maintaining that "the love of God" here is God's love to us; or (2) by joining the adv. "truly" immediately with the verb "perfected"—"In such a man love is truly perfected, in deed and truth, not in mere name." The question must be decided by St John's use of the word "to perfect." See Gospel, iv. 34, v. 36, xvii. 4, 23, xix. 28; 1 John iv. 12, 17, 18. In speaking of "perfection" the Apostle here, as often elsewhere, expresses an ideal standard. In proportion as we advance towards this ideal of a perfected, finished love towards God, "we know that we are in Him."

in him] in—study this little word which is so great. The force of in ($\epsilon\nu$), applied to separate, yet intimately connected personal existences, is strikingly illustrated by St Luke, xi. 19, "if I in ($\epsilon\nu$) Beelzebub." "It has an ought himself also so to walk, even as he walked.

7 Brethren, I write no new commandment unto you, but an old commandment which ye had from the beginning. The old commandment is the word which ye have heard from the beginning.

8 Again, a new commandment I write unto you, which thing is true energetic sense. It signifies not only by authority of Beelzebub, but by Beelzebub dwelling personally in Him," by a mutual inter-existence, so to speak, of one with the other. (Godet, 'Comm. sur l'Év. de S. Luc,' II. 74.)

6. be that saith] as in v. 4, a notion of vaunting implied—"giving out." Cf. Luke xxiii. 2 ad fin.; Acts v. 36, viii. 9.

be abideth in him] One of those truly Johannic words, which he had caught from the lips of Christ. It signifies not only "abiding patiently," or "moral perseverance," (Lücke), but vitally and mystically. It is the compression of John xv. 1—5 into a single word, and implies spiritual immanence, interpenetration of life and spirit. "No words (it has been truly said) expressive of the soul's union with God, can be pantheistic, unless they imply that the soul ceases to be, and becomes essentially one with God."

ought] is bound, lit. "is in debt" (ὀφείλει), is morally bound.

is bound, even as He walked, so also himself to be walking.

even as be] The pronoun here (ἐκεῖνος) is constantly used by St John in an exclusive sense, with a sort of tacit antithesis. "He, and He alone." It will be seen what meaning this gives to many passages in the Gospels (i. 18, 33, ii. 21—He who had the true secret; xiv. 26, i.e. He shall teach you, in antithesis to Me who leave you; ix. 9, i.e. others said so-and-so, but he who knew best said, "I am he." Here it signifies—"as He walked, and He alone." The pronoun is reverential and reserved. Observe in v. 6, the contrast of tense in speaking of Christ's walk, and the Christian's—"is morally bound, as He made His one great life-walk, so also himself to walk continuously." The walk denotes the action of life, external and internal, wherever we are or turn on the path by which we must go. The word was used by our Lord metaphorically (John viii. 12, xii. 35), and from thence passed into the vocabulary of Christians (Acts xxi. 21; Eph. ii. 10; Col. iii. 7; Rom. vi. 4). May not St John with his subtle delicacy—in keeping with his constant practice throughout the Epistle—refer to the very word which he had used (with touching allusion to the homelessness of Jesus) historically in the Gospel—(1) of the Lord's life in Galilee ("Jesus walked in Galilee," vi. 7) and in Judæa (xi. 54), and (2) of His disciples' communion with Him

(vi. 65)? (Bretschn. well says of the word "to walk"—"After the Hebraistic usage it denotes, habitually being or dwelling in a particular place or way of life. St John vii. 1, xi. 54, in which passages there is also a reference to the fact that Jesus taught as He went itinerating—ambulando docebat." (See 'Lex. M. N. T.' s. v.) The walk of Christ is the Christian's highest and only standard, and St John refers to that description of it, which he had traced for them. The verse is another finger-post, pointing to St John's Gospel—another suggestion of a question which that Gospel only can answer.—"Even as He walked." How did He walk? The answer is written at large in the Gospel. The Christian life, as conceived by St John, is at once a continued humiliation (1 John i. 9), and a continued aspiration (ii. 4). It utters itself in a long miserere (i. 8—10)—for "true repentance must run through the state of holy living" (Bp Taylor)—and in a long excelsior (ii. 6). The first is embodied in the daily General Confession, the second in the order of the Christian seasons.

SECTION III. (b). vv. 7—11.

7. Beloved] Cf. iii. 21, iv. 1, 7, 11. "Brethren" only occurs in this Epistle in iii. 13.

I am writing no fresh commandment] There are two words alike translated new in the A. V. (καινός, the word in this verse, and νέος). Of these, the first (novus, nouveau) expresses that which is new in relation to quality, set over against and occupying the place of the outworn or effete (Heb. viii. 8—13); the second (recens, neuf) expresses that which is new in relation to time. The first denotes novelty, intellectual, ethical, spiritual, and may sometimes be rendered fresh; the second, novelty temporal and chronological. (See note Col. iii. 10.) St John is speaking of no single commandment, but of the one entire Gospel commandment. The commandment was in a sense old to those who had it so long; in a sense fresh and new, because it superseded and took the place of an older one.

8. which thing is true in him and in you] These difficult words are variously understood. (1) Some refer the relative "which" to the idea contained in the word new. "I am writing a new commandment unto you, which thing (i. e. new) it truly is" (ἀληθές used adverbially), or "which quality of newness it truly possesses in Christ and in you." But in him and in you: because the darkness is past, and the true light now shineth.

9 He that saith he is in the light, and hateth his brother, is in darkness even until now.

10 He that loveth his brother abideth in the light, and there is none occasion of stumbling in him.

† Gr. scandal.

11 But he that hateth his brother is in darkness, and walketh in darkness, and knoweth not whither he this is harsh, and opposed to St John's use of words. (2) Harsher still is another view, "Again, I am writing to you as (sub. ὡς) a new commandment, this thing (ταῦτο) which is true," κ.τ.λ. (Knapp). (3) Rather vv. 7, 8 may be thus explained naturally—"Beloved (in bidding you walk as Christ walked, v. 6), I am writing to you not a fresh commandment, but an old commandment which ye have always had and held fast from the beginning of the Gospel. The commandment, that old commandment, is no isolated one, but the entire word which ye heard once for all. Again, a fresh commandment I am writing unto you, which taken as a whole in its universality (ὅ) is true, and of which you have attestation, partly in the example of Christ in the Gospel, partly in your own experience."

because] Some explain the connection—"which thing is true, is realized in this, that the darkness," &c.

is passing by] (Alford); "is drifting by" (παράγεται). Two uncials (N A), possibly by a slip of the scribe, read "shadow" (σῆα). "The shadow passeth." (Hammond.)

the light, the very light] Not the true as opposed to the false, but as opposed to the imperfect—not veracity but realization—not harmony between word and thought, but embodiment of essential idea. The "very light," then, is that which corresponds absolutely with the highest idea of light—which is all that light can be. It should be especially noted in St John that when a natural and a spiritual object are designated by one word, the last is always called very, while the material is considered but as the shadow and image. (i. 9, vi. 32, xv. 1.)

enlighteneth, or is enlightening] St John does not use the middle, as generally in classical Greek, but the active—not shining so as to be recognized, but enlightening so as to dispel darkness; as in the Collect, "Lighten our darkness." Note the present, in act yet in continual progress. Cf. Gospel, i. 5.

9. in the darkness] as his proper element, in exile from the light of God. His state is the contradiction of that mentioned in St John's Gospel, iii. 21. When we consider the impression made upon the Apostle by the life of our Lord, and the tone in which he speaks of Judas staggering out into the darkness of night ("and it was night," xiii. 30), it would seem as if then he fully realized the symbolical significance of darkness.

hitherto] (ἔως ἄρτι) used by St John only here, and Gospel, v. 17.

10. there is none occasion of stumbling in him] Lit. scandal in him there is not. Scandal (from a word meaning to halt) is used by LXX. for the wood in a trap (Ps. cxl. 5; cf. Rom. xiv. 13; Rev. ii. 14); then a stumbling-block upon which one strikes his foot (Rom. ix. 33; 1 Peter ii. 7, 8); thence, sin which entices our fellow-men to destruction. (Bretsch. See Additional Note at the end of the Chapter.) The root of St John's idea is in the Psalmist's words:

"Great peace have they who love thy law,
And no stumbling have they."

(Ps. cxix. 165.)

(1) They walk firmly and safely in the clear path of duty. (2) They are not scandalized, driven into scepticism, by the iniquity of the world or the defects of men professedly religious. Their soul is rooted and grounded in love, and while they desire to reform all faults, yet hoping all things, enduring all things, they retain peace, inward and outward. (Estius.) The God of peace is with them, and does not allow their strength to stumble beneath the burden. (Neh. iv. 10.) (3) They are free from the "stumbling of heart" (1 S. xxv. 31), the paralyzing weakness which follows on the consciousness of having wronged, or of bearing ill-will to a brother." (Kay, 'The Psalms,' pp. 399, 400.) Neander well grasps the force of the passage. "Whilst walking in the dark, we are in danger of stumbling at every step. When the road is lighted, we walk with confidence. So with the spiritual walk. Without light, we are always exposed to the danger of stumbling. But the guiding light of the Christian walk is Love. Love communicates an exquisite tact which knows how to profit by every circumstance of life, and to distinguish the right from wrong in every action and event. Love then gives security and withdraws us from the empire of passion and hatred, which darkens the judgment."

11. Note the solemn and picturesque eloquence of the accessional parallelism in this verse. The inner condition of him who hates his brother—"is in darkness" ("the night has crept into his heart." See quotation from Tennyson just below)—the outward life—"walketh in darkness." (Cf. ἐν σκότει διαπορεύονται, Ps. lxxxii. 5, ὁ ἄφρων ἐν σκότει πορεύεται, Eccles. ii. 14, with ἐν σκοτίᾳ περι- goeth, because that darkness hath blinded his eyes.

12 I write unto you, little children, because your sins are forgiven you for his name's sake.

13 I write unto you, fathers, be-παρεῖ in this verse.) He has lost his point of orientation—he knoweth not whither he goeth, to what unsurmised guilt and punishment. Something follows, worse than darkness above—the darkness has not only blinded him, but blinded his very eyes once for all. He has lost the very faculty of sight! (Could the Apostle have thought of creatures who, in dark caverns, not only lose the faculty of sight, but have the visive organs atrophied?) A great living poet has presented the same image, applying it however not to sin but to sorrow:

“But the night has crept into my heart, and begun to darken my eyes.”

Tennyson, ‘Ballads and other Poems. Rizpah.’

See remarks upon the occasional picturesqueness of St John's style in the Introduction. For his feeling of the symbolism of night and darkness, cf. Gospel xiii. 30. The fall of Judas lies in the background of the terrible picture. See note, supra, v. 9. Cf. also Matt. vi. 23.

SECTION III. (c). vv. 12—17.

“All that I write to you is intelligible to you and will be realized only under certain conditions which are fulfilled in your case. I write this epistle to you, dear children in the faith, because your sins having been blotted out are forgiven for His Name's sake. I write it to you, fathers—because ye have known Him, the Eternal Word, who was from the beginning. I write it to you, youths—because ye have won a triumph and are victorious over the evil one. As with the whole epistle, so with what is written. I have written it to you, little children! because ye have known the Father; to you, fathers—because ye have known Him who was known to you from the beginning; to you, youths—because ye are strong, and the word of God abideth in you as the source of strength, and ye are victors over the evil one. Now here is my solemn warning: ‘Love not the world.’ If any man love the world, &c. For all that is in the world—I speak not physically, but morally—I mean, the lust whose seat is in the lower nature, the lust which is fed through the eyes, and the vaunting arrogance of life—has not its origin from the Father, but from the world. And the world is shifting and passing away, and the lust which it excited; but the doer of the will of God abideth for ever.”

12—14. These verses will be made clearer by two remarks: (1) According to the reading commended by the majority of best MSS.

and by the symmetry of the periods we have six clauses, divided by the different tenses of γράφω—I am writing (γράφω), I have written (ἔγραψα). Thus:

- i. I am writing unto you.
 - (A) Children (τεκνία).
 1. Fathers.
 2. Young men.
- ii. I have written unto you.
 - (B) Little children (παιδιά).
 1. Fathers.
 2. Young men.

The thrice-repeated “I am writing” refers to the whole Epistle; the thrice-repeated “I have written” points to the portion of it which was already written.

(2) The temptation of dividing the spiritual life into three ages, corresponding to childhood, youth, old age, has led many preachers and expositors into inaccuracy. (After St Augustine. “Children, fathers, youth are here. In children, we regard their birth—in fathers, their age—in young men, their strength.”) The first clause of each series is marked by a general address, which includes the old and the young—“children” (v. 12), “little children” (v. 13). In each case, those who are universally called “children” in the first set of clauses, “little children” in the second, are divided into two classes, “Fathers” and “Young men.” The verses might gain in impressiveness and clearness of representation by standing thus:

12. I am writing unto you, children! because your sins are forgiven for His name's sake. (13) I am writing unto you, fathers, because ye have known him that is from the beginning. I am writing unto you, young men, because ye have overcome the wicked one.

I have written unto you, little children! because ye have known the Father. (14) I have written unto you, fathers, because ye have known Him that is from the beginning. I have written unto you, young men, because ye are strong, and the Word of God abideth in you, and ye have overcome the wicked one.

It certainly seems, at first sight, somewhat difficult to understand this importunate proximity of affection. But the unusual form gives an emphasis of its own. All that he was about to write, or had written, would be practically meaningless unless they had received forgiveness and grace, and the faculty to embrace and understand it. All his spiritual children on entering into covenant with God had had their sins forgiven, and been brought into “a state of salvation,” a permanent condition of acceptance. The elder, as life cause ye have known him that is from the beginning. I write unto you, young men, because ye have overcome the wicked one. I write unto you, little children, because ye have known the Father.

14 I have written unto you, fathers, because ye have known him that is from the beginning. I have written unto you, young men, because ye are strong, and the word of God abideth in you, and ye have overcome the wicked one.

15 Love not the world, neither went on, learned to know no theological novelty—no new ideological Christ—no temporary juxtaposition of an Æon with a man of exceptional holiness—but the Everlasting which was from the beginning. The young, confirmed in the faith, had within them a fountain of perennial youth and energy through the personal Word abiding in them. Here is another suggestion of a question only to be answered by the Gospel—"The Word of God abideth in you." How so? St John xiv. 23.

12. are forgiven] The verb is in the perfect (Winer, p. 294), expressing a permanent state as the result of a past condition. In reference to the Christian life, and its general history, St Paul habitually uses the aorist, St John the perfect. (In one magnificent passage, St Paul combines his habitual baptismal aorist of the one great change with the Johannic perfect of the intended abiding result. "The old things passed away, all things have become and consequently are new." 2 Cor. v. 17.) St Paul employs the aorist in its strictest aoristic sense of the great spiritual change as summed up in one act—"potentially to all men in our Lord's Passion and Resurrection; actually to each individual man when he accepts Christ, is baptized into Christ" (Bishop Lightfoot, 'Revision,' pp. 84, 85). St John by the perf. binds the present with the past, and speaks of the abiding result of the past in the present.

for His name's sake] His—see on i. 5. On "the name" see on 3 John 7. "Note that confidence in remission of sins is a help, not an impediment, to piety and the fear of God." (Calv.)

13. have knowledge of Him that is from the Beginning] The "have knowledge" is not an allusion to a personal knowledge of Christ on earth among the aged believers. "He that is from the beginning" is not here the Ancient of days, the eternal Father. (This interpretation arose from a sentimental concinnity between the "fathers" and the Fatherhood of God.) It must mean, therefore, one of two things: either, (1) "ye have knowledge of the old Christ, whom ye have known from the beginning of your Christian experience" (the somewhat superficial interpretation of Macknight and others); or (2) most probably—"the eternal Pre-existent Christ, who was from the beginning"

—"Christ, new in His Flesh, ancient in His Divinity—Begotten by the Eternal Father, from eternity, in eternity. Exod. iii. 14; Psal. lx. 3; St John i. 5." (St August. 'In Epist. Joann.' Tract. II. Cap. ii. 5. Opp. Tom. III. Pro. 1992.) Cf. 1 John i. 1, and note on "from the beginning." "Ye have known the Person who was from the beginning, who has existed from eternity. The text is another of those which affirm the eternal pre-existence of Christ, and harmonizes exactly with the language of St John in the exordium of his Gospel." (Bp Middleton, 'Greek Article,' p. 440.)

14. Note again the addition, the accessional parallelism in—"ye are strong, and the Word of God abideth in you" (v. 14)—compared with the simple "have overcome the wicked one" (v. 13). For the Word of God here being the living Personal Lord, cf. infra iv. 4; John xiv. 18, 23, xv. 5. Consider the advance upon Ps. cxix. 9. The thought of the indwelling of Christ in the heart is also the ground of the exhortation in 1 Pet. iii. 14. Some modern writers represent the Holy Trinity as simply three manifestations of God—the Father God in nature, the Son God in history, the Holy Ghost God in conscience. But Scripture does not represent the Father exclusively as God in nature. (Ps. civ. 3; Col. i. 16.) Nor again (as we see in this verse), the heart or conscience as the sole and exclusive domain of the Holy Spirit.

15, 16, 17. A warning against the love of the world. (For the world, see above on v. 2. The world here is used in the second of the senses there indicated.) "That sinfulness which is dominant in the whole race of man; that collective common life of sin, depending on spiritual contagion and example, which then ruled supreme in the earthly order, and corrupted it to the heart's core—that Jesus summed up under the name of the world." (Döllinger, 'First Age of the Church,' I. 28.) St John in his strongest prohibitions never runs into fanatical excess. "All that is in the world" without the appositional qualification ("the lust of the flesh") might justify the extremest spirit of monasticism. It is not of material things, but of worldly lusts that St John affirms that they are not from the Father. There is deep truth in Augustine's remark—"By the world is signified not only the fabric which God hath made of heaven and earth and the things that are in the world. If any man love the world, the love of the Father is not in him.

16 For all that is in the world, the lust of the flesh, and the lust of the eyes, and the pride of life, is not of the Father, but is of the world.

sea; but the dwellers in the world are called the world, as both the walls and their inhabitants are called the house. Sometimes we praise the house, and censure its inhabitants. All lovers of the world, because they inhabit the world by their love of it, are called the world."

There are two reasons given by St John for this admonition.

i. "If any love the world, the love towards the Father (see on v. 5, supra) is not in him."

This is the application of the law of human nature that two master-passions cannot co-exist in one man (cf. Chalmers' Sermon, with the profound and suggestive title 'On the expulsive power of a new affection'). "Shut out the evil love of the world, that thou mayest be filled with the love of God. Thou art a vessel, but so far thou art filled—Pour out that which thou hast, that thou mayest receive that which thou hast not." (St. August. ut supra, 1994.)

ii. The fleeting character of the world, its irremediable transitoriness. The world is passing away, drifting by in ceaseless change (v. 17).

No Christian teacher has more deeply understood these words than St Augustine. "Let us not love those things which are in the world." St John adds this to "Love not the world," lest any should reason in this way: "Heaven, earth, ocean, moon and stars, the ornaments of the sky, are in the world. God made them, why should I not love that which God hath made?" Well, God forbids not that thou shouldest love them, but that thou shouldest love them so as to find thy bliss in them. It is as if a spouse should give his betrothed a fair and precious ring. And if she should love the gift more than the giver, would not her heart be convicted of unfaithfulness, even though that which she loved were her lover's gift? If she said—"his fair gifts are enough for me, I care not to see his face"—where were her love? The spouse bestows the gift to this end, that he may be loved in it." ('In Epist. Joann.' Tom. III. P.2. 1995.)

16. the lust of the flesh, and the lust of the eyes, and the pride of life] Not merely voluptuousness, covetousness, ambition, as in old systems of moral theology. We cannot always fit the language of St John more especially into the pigeon-holes of modern terminology. We lose more in truth and depth than we gain in deceptive clearness, by translating language which is spiritual and mystical into the apparently more precise and definite language of modern moral philosophy.

the lust of the flesh] The act of desiring, and that which is desired, run up into one. (For lust of flesh, cf. Gal. v. 16—24; Ephes. ii. 3; 2 Pet. ii. 18.) It is a general term for all the propensities which objects presented to our senses have a tendency to awaken. In St Paul, St John, and St Peter, it generally signifies the animality of man, as the natural "fountain," or "hearth," or "seat," of appetites in the bad sense—(fomes)—human nature so far as it is animal and instinctive, unrenewed by the gift of the indwelling Spirit, unregulated by the Divine law, and lusting against that law. To this is constantly opposed the nature of man, transformed and instrengthened by the Holy Spirit, and thus elevated into the wider sphere of true reason (Rom. vi. 19, vii. 18, 25, viii. 1, 3, 5, 6, 7, 13; Gal. v. 8, 16, 17; Ephes. ii. 3; Col. ii. 18; 2 Pet. ii. 18). See dissertation in Introd. to Romans.

flesh] Note the careful distinction between flesh and body in Scriptural language. See notes on Rom. vii. and viii. and on Col. ii. 18.

of the eyes] desire so far as it is conveyed by the movement of the eyes. The sins of envy and voluptuousness are connected with the eye in the New Testament (Mark vii. 22; 2 Pet. ii. 14). It may well be that St John was thinking, in part at least, of the sanguinary and voluptuous fascination of the circus and theatre, of which the history of the Church contains a striking example in Alypius (St August. 'Confess.').

arrogancy of living] The word here translated life is not that which almost universally in Scripture denotes higher life, but a different word (βίος), which means the organic life; the period of time during which we preserve it; and that which belongs to its prolongation of pleasurable enjoyment. (See infra. iii. 17.) Sometimes all this is summed up in riches. Pride (ἀλαζονεία, lit. the character of an ἀλαζών)—a word which in classical Greek has almost a notion of gasconade and imposture (Arist. 'Ethic. Nic.' IV. 7, 11); twice used in New Testament (James iv. 16, and here). The phrase is variously translated and understood. ("Secular ambition," St Aug.; "arrogant and self-assuming pomp," Beng.; "swelling pride and phantasy of life," Chrysost.; "desire of boastful display in the conduct of life," Ebrard; "vanity, love of display, deliberate self-seeking," Neand.) It has been remarked that "the pride of life" is, as it were, projected outward, and set in a material framework in the gorgeous description of the "merchandise" of Babylon in Apoc. xviii. 11—14—On these three anti-spiritual principles. "The lust of the flesh has the lust of the eyes as a subtle form of itself, and attains its culmination in the pride of life" (Düsterd). "St John indicates three special forms, under which the worldly spirit which he attacks is revealed: (1) carnal desires, (2) desires awakened in the soul by the objects of sight, (3) vanity, love of éclat, deliberate self-seeking. Thus, satisfaction of sensual desires, love of pleasures, and pride, are the three principal forms of the worldly spirit, here signalized by St John" (Neander). Of all that has been written on this verse, three passages may be selected for reference: one, among the most vivid and interesting of ancient theology, almost a treatise on the whole subject, and specially on the lust of the eyes, in St August. ('Confess.' x. 35); another, valuable for its application to our Lord's threefold Temptation, in Dr Mill 'On the Temptation,' pp. 60—85, 86; the third, Bossuet, 'Traité de la Concupiscence.—Expos. de 1 Joann. ii. 15, 17.'

is not from the Father, but from the world it is. [See Additional Note.]

17. And the world is passing by, and the lust of it. For passing by, see on v. 8 supra. The thought of the passing by of the world's shifting scene lay very deep in the heart of primitive Christianity (cf. 1 Cor. vii. 31). All higher spirits, indeed, recur to this in their truest moments.
Even Goethe, that "pagan in Christendom," cried, "Die Gestalt dieser Welt vergeht; und ich möchte mich nun mit dem beschäftigen, was bleibende Verhältnisse sind." "The fashion of the world passeth away; and I would fain occupy myself only with the abiding" ('A French Critic on Goethe.'
'Quarterly Review,' Jan. 1878, p. 163).
"The current of things temporal sweeps along; but like a tree over that stream has arisen our Lord Jesus Christ. He willed to plant Himself, as it were, over the river. Are you whirled along by the current? Lay hold upon the wood. Does the love of the world roll you along in its course? Lay hold upon Christ. For you He became temporal, that you might become eternal; for He was so made temporal as to remain eternal." (St August. ut supra.)

but he that doeth the will of God abideth for ever] There is slight authority for the very striking addition in some Fathers of the Latin Church, "even as God also abideth for ever."
The world passeth away, and the pleasure which has the world for its object is as evanescent as that object. But "he who continues doing the will of God" is "not accessible to earthly vicissitudes; for him death does not exist.

He is partaker of a life of unchanging happiness, which will only attain its complete development when earth, with its life and riches, shall have passed away" (Neander).
"Join thy heart to the eternity of God, and thou shalt be eternal with Him" (St Aug.).

SECTION IV. ii. 18—28.

"Dear children! I have spoken of the world's unabiding character. Well, its last fixed period now is, and as ye have heard of Antichrist's solemn predestinated entrance upon the stage of history, so, as it is, many Antichrists have come into existence, and are now. From whence we practically know that it is the last period. They went out from us, but they were not of us. Had they been of us, which they were not, they would certainly have remained continuously with us. They went out that they might shew once for all that they are not all of us.
Ye on the other hand have nothing from Anti-christ; ye really have and hold a chrism from Christ the Holy One of God, and consequently know all that ye need know on this. Why then, it may be said, do you write?
I have not written to you because ye have not learned and do not know the truth, but because ye know it, and that no lie is of the Truth.
Who is the liar, unless we conceive it to be he who denies that Jesus is the Christ? The Antichrist is this, the denier of the Father and the Son. And remember every denier of the Son hath not the Father, while he who confesses the Son hath the Father also. Ye then—that which ye once heard from the beginning, let it abide in you—if that which ye heard, and nothing else, abide in you, ye too shall abide in the Son and in the Father.
And to encourage you to remain—this is the promise which He promised, eternal life.
These things that precede I have written to you, concerning those who would deceive you. And ye—the chrism which ye have once received abides in you, and ye have no lack to need that any such as I should be teaching you, but as His chrism is your teacher and is true, and is not a lie, and as it once taught you, so shall ye abide in it. And now, dear ones, abide in Him, that when He be manifested we may have boldness, and not be ashamed before Him when He comes."

18. Little children, it is the last hour (ᾠρα) Period (χρόνος, time in reference to dura- tion, or chronological succession; καίρος, time in many antichrists; whereby we know that it is the last time.

19 They went out from us, but they were not of us; for if they had been of us, they would no doubt have continued with us: but they went out, that they might be made manifest that they were not all of us.

reference to events, or historical adaptation; ώρα, time (generally brief) in reference to fixed date, chronologically assigned limit of human or Divine purpose). It will be observed here, again, that we have "a root below the stream." The connection lies in the substance of the thought. St John has been speaking of the drifting by of the world. Hence he proceeds to speak of "the last hour." "That last hour is long; yet it is the last." The "root below the stream" is keenly seen by St Augustine: "Some might probably say—how is it the last time, the last hour? Certainly Antichrist must first come, and then the day of Judgment. John saw their thoughts: lest they should become secure, and suppose that it was not the last hour, because Antichrist was to come, he adds, v. 18—Could that hour have many Antichrists, if it were not the last?" (St August. ut supra, 1998.)

heard] A lesson taught by Christ Himself (Matt. xxiv. 24; John v. 43, "another" who "shall come in his own name") and by His Apostles (Acts xx. 29, 30; 2 Thess. ii. 3 (see note there); 2 Cor. xi. 4; 1 Tim. iv. 1).

antichrist] This word is absolutely peculiar to St John. The general use of ἀντί (contra) and the meaning of the similarly formed word ἀντίθεος (St Just. M. 'Quæst. et Resp.' q. 103, p. 463) lead to the conclusion that the term means "adversary of Messiah." The Jews derived their conception from Daniel vii. 25, viii. 25, xi. 36; Ezek. xxxviii.—ix. The name was probably formed by St John. It was believed by the Jews that Antichrist would appear immediately before the advent of Christ. (See references in Grimm and Bretschn. s. v.) Cf. inf. v. 22, iv. 3; 2 John 7. Our Lord mentioned "pseudo-Christ" as a sign (Matt. xxiv. 24). St Paul gave a solemn warning to the very Churches which St John now specially addressed (Acts xx. 29). St John saw these principles and the men who embodied them in full action, and it was an indication for him of "the last period." So far Christians had only learnt in general to expect the personal appearance of one great enemy of Christ, the Antichrist (ye have heard that Antichrist cometh). In his Epistle St John gives solemn warning that those heretics who denied the God-Man were not merely precursors of Antichrist, but impersonations of the Antichristian principle—each of them in a true sense an Antichrist. The term is used by no other sacred writer, by St John himself only five times (1 John ii. 18, twice; ii. 22, iv. 3; 2

John 7), and that specifically to characterize heresy denying the Incarnation, Person, and dignity of Christ as God-Man. Antichrist is "the liar;" his spirit and teaching is a lie pure and simple. The one Antichrist, whose coming was stamped into the living tradition of the early Church, and of whom believers had necessarily "heard," is clearly distinguished from many who were already in existence, and were closely connected with him in spirit (1 John ii. 18, 22, 26, iv. 3, 6; 2 John v. 7). Probably St John expected the chief Antichrist, the "theological antagonist of Christ," before the Personal Advent. In 2 Thess. ii. we find the same idea of a singular individual of pre-eminent wickedness, while St Paul does not call the "Man of Sin" Antichrist. [See note on 2 Thess. ii. 3.] In the Apoc. we have a delineation of an Antichristian power (xiii.—xvii.); in St Paul and in St John's Epp. of the "eximious Antichristian person." (H. More, 'Theol. Works,' 552.)

cometh] There is solemnity and elevation in the word. It denotes a solemn predestined entrance of any great messenger of God, or representative of an idea, upon the stage of history. It is the almost technical term for Christ's appearing (Gospel, iv. 25, xii. 27. Cf. Matt. x. 34, 35, xi. 3; Luke vii. 20, xvii. 20, of the Kingdom of God). Hence, it is applied to the Man of Sin or Antichrist, and well brings out the parody of Christ. Cf. John v. 43, x. 8; 2 Cor. xi. 4; 2 Thess. ii. 3. See more especially notes on the elaborate parody of Christ by the Man of Sin.

[1 John iv. 3.] Cf. for the thought, and that with special reference to Ephesus and the other Churches of Asia Minor, Acts xx. 29, 30 (Matt. xxiv. 24). Note that St John speaks of Antichrists newly risen up; for the importance of this as bearing upon the polemical object of the Epistle, see Introd. on the polemical aspects of St John's first Epistle.

19. They went out from us] Cf. "certain which went out from us," Acts xv. 24.

But they were not of us, for if they had been of us, they would have continued with us. On ἐξ, denoting emphatically origin from the very centre and essence of anything, see note on 1 Thess. ii. 6. The no doubt of the A. V. is better omitted. The meaning is, "had they been unction or chrism] (χρίσμα), allusively to Christ and Antichrist. "Ye are not of Antichrist! ye have chrism from the Christ, the Holy Spirit proceeding from the Holy One." "This spiritual unction is the Holy Spirit Himself" (St August.). "The Holy Spirit is called and is unction and seal" (St Athan. 'Epist. III. ad Serap.' 'Opp. Dogmat. Select.' Edd Thilo, 768). For "the oil of holy ointment" (χρίσμα ἁγίου) see Exod. xxx. 25 LXX.; cf. Ps. cxxxiii. 2 sqq. Oil denotes the Holy Spirit in Scripture. Remark the prohibition of oil and frankincense with sin-offering (Levit. v. 11)—the frankincense as symbolising acceptable prayer (Levit. vi. 13; John ix. 31), oil as denoting the Spirit of joy and freedom (Ps. li. 12)—to indicate that sin and the Holy Ghost are mutually exclusive. (See Hengst. on 'Sacrifices,' p. 385.) We are Christians as anointed by the Holy Spirit (1 Cor. i. 21; cf. 1 Chro. xvi. 22). It should be noticed that while St John does not here mention the Holy Ghost directly, he begins the subject in a form peculiarly his own. For it is common with him, before introducing some great topics, to prepare the way by allusive hints, delicately playing round a subject which is to be more fully handled presently. E.g. "the birth from God," introduced 1 John i. 29, is expanded iii. 9; "confidence" introduced iii. 21 is expanded v. 14. The symbolical unction in this place is a prelude to the fuller music of the Veni, Creator Spiritus, infra ii. 24, iv. 13, v. 6. "Antichrist shall not lay his disarming hand upon you. You have and hold chrism from Christ, the gift of the Holy Ghost." [Hence chrism was used at a very early period in connection with baptism and confirmation. Bingham, 'Antiquities,' I. 462, 514, 565.]

ye know all things] Reference of suggestion to John xiv. 26. It must be remembered that science and revelation are two different spheres. The Apostle's assertion points to the Saviour's promise, and, like it, is limited to the last. For St John, in his inspired writings, there is nothing in the way of "work, device, knowledge, or wisdom" outside the margin of God's kingdom.

21. The connection here is supplied by an objection, which occurs to St John's mind as likely to be felt by those to whom he wrote. "If we thus realize our Lord's promise, recorded in the Gospel, and know all things, why do you write? Not because you have not learned, or do not know the truth, but just because you know it!"

that every lie is not of the Truth. It has been suggested that the ὅτι, thrice repeated in this short verse, is that of quotation. (The quotational ὅτι (ὅτι recitativum) is frequent in St Mark. See iii. 21, xvi. 11.) "I have not written this—'ye know not the truth'—but this—'ye know it'—and this finally—'every lie is not from the truth.'" It may be noted that St John's sternly severe view of truth makes it certain that he would have shrunk with horror from the manufacture of discourses dramatically put in the mouth of our Lord, or from any false or highly-coloured representation of His work. Cf. Apoc. xxii. 15.

of the Truth. Cf. iii. 19 with Gospel, xviii. 37.

The Antichrist is this, he that denieth the Father and the Son.

the liar. "Something more is meant than 'a liar.' The context leaves no doubt that 'the liar' is the same with the Antichrist following" (Bp Middleton, p. 440).

that Jesus is the Christ] "Jesus has one signification, Christ another: though Jesus Christ our Saviour is one, Jesus is His proper name. As Moses, Elias, Abraham, is called each by his own name, so our Lord Jesus has that as His own proper name; but Christ is the name of His offices." (St August. ut supra, 2002.)

23. The words bracketed in A. V. should be retained here for two reasons. (1) The 24 Let that therefore abide in you, which ye have heard from the beginning. If that which ye have heard from the beginning shall remain in you, ye also shall continue in the Son, and in the Father.

25 And this is the promise that he hath promised us, even eternal life.

26 These things have I written unto you concerning them that seduce you.

27 But the anointing which ye have received of him abideth in you, and ye need not that any man teach you: but as the same anointing teacheth you of all things, and is truth, and is no lie, and even as it hath taught you, ye shall abide in ^{10r}him.

preponderance of witnesses, uncials and other MSS. (A, B, C, N, Cod. Amiat.). (2) The accordance with St John's style, who delights in repeating his weightiest thoughts in one peculiar form, i.e. first positively, then negatively (i. 5, 8, ii. 4, iii. 6, iv. 2, 3, 6, 7, 8, v. 12).

he that confesseth the Son, &c.] Modern Rationalism and the so-called 'spiritual philosophy' of Deism are proofs not less truly than Judaism of the truth of this oracle. These systems, expounded with touching eloquence and consummate ability, desire to give up the historical Christ, and to cling to the idea of the Father. In common with Judaism, they reject the worship of Christ, professedly out of reverence for the Father. But, by a necessary process of thought, the rationalist and spiritual Schools are constantly being absorbed in atheism or pantheism. God, opposed to Christ, is not the Father, the living God; He becomes a metaphysical abstraction, alternately expanded into the monstrous God who is all, or diluted into the shadowy God who is nothing. When Voltaire, rapt into momentary enthusiasm by a sunset upon the Alps, exclaimed "God the Father! I adore Thee," and then, as if ashamed, added a disclaimer of worship of the Son, he furnished, however unwillingly, one other exemplification to this text. It is the expression of true Christian Theism against Judaism, Deism, and Mahomedanism. Cf. especially the thought in 1 Pet. i. 21.

24. That which ye heard from the beginning let it abide in you; if that which ye heard from the beginning abide in you, ye also shall abide in the Son and in the Father.

In the A. V. we have three different words (abide, remain, continue) for the same Greek word. On "abide" see note supra, v. 6. abide in the Son. The truly Johannic idea—in the Son (xiv. 19, 20, xv. 4, 7; 1 John ii. 5, 6, 24, 28, iii. 24, v. 20), is also truly Pauline. See on the mystical meaning of ἐν, note on 1 Thess. i. 1, and Rom. viii. 1 (III. 146 and 707). Cf. also 1 Pet. v. 14.

25. And (to encourage) this is the promise that He promised us, even the eternal life.

the eternal life. For the accus. here as "an apposition comprehended in a relative clause," see Winer, p. 552.

26. These things] i.e. those which go before. See note on i. 4.

them that seduce you] are for misleading you. Cf. i. 8.

27. And ye—the unction which ye received from Him abideth in you, and ye have no need that any man be teaching you; but as His unction is teaching you concerning all things, and is true, and is not a lie, and as it taught you, so shall ye abide in Him.

His unction or chrism, i.e. the Holy Spirit (Athanas.). For the strength and joy of this cf. Ps. xcii. 10. "The same anointing" (A. V.) (τὸ αὐτὸ χρίσμα) (A, B, approved by Bengel, Lücke, Huther, Lachmann, Bp Wordsworth). So quoted by St Athanas. ('Epist. 1. ad Serap.' 23). His unction (τὸ αὐτοῦ χρίσμα) (C, N, Cod. Amiat. (unctio ejus), approved by Tisch. and Reiche. The latter critic gives the following reasons in its favour.

i. The word His is of importance in the argument. It brings out the efficacy of the unction as Divine.

ii. The marked advance of thought in St John's usual manner. The expression shews the relation of the Holy Spirit to Christ as His Spirit more essentially and dogmatically than "ye have an unction from the Holy One" (v. 20), or "the anointing which ye have received of Him" in the earlier part of the present verse. The copyists might not have thought "His unction" a very intelligible or even reverent expression.

as it hath taught] taught once for all.

ye shall abide] The imp. abide ye has very considerable support (A, B, C, N, Cod. Amiat., manete in Eo—approved by Düst., Huth., Lach., Bengel, Lücke, Tisch.). Reiche prefers the fut., (1) from v. 25, where the language is not of command but of hope and blessed we may have confidence, and not be ashamed before him at his coming.

augury; (2) there is a subtle beauty in the change from v. 27 to v. 28—"ye shall abide in Him" (v. 27)—"well, then, children! do abide in Him" (v. 28). So, in the inverse order in v. 24, "let that which ye have heard abide in you...ye also shall abide" &c.

as His unction is teaching you concerning all things...and as it taught you. "As the Spirit excites the whole spiritual life, so He exercises an influence upon the power of spiritual knowledge" (Olsh.). These words have an important controversial and practical bearing. (1) Development through a continuous revelation by an infallible organization, or by an individual human being, is, to say the least, ignored. The language is such as surely could not have been used by any one who held that view even implicitly. (2) We may cite two passages from two spiritual teachers in different ages. (a) "The sound of our words strikes on the ear; the Teacher is within. I, for my part, have spoken to all of you:—but they to whom the unction within speaketh not—whom the Spirit within teacheth not, go away untaught. There are certain appointed outward offices and administrations for our behoof. The Teacher in the heart hath His chair in Heaven" (St Aug.). (b) "Persons deprived of all human aid often advance the work of sanctification more by continually renouncing themselves in order to follow the impulse of the Holy Ghost than by all the precepts and methods of masters of the spiritual life. The Holy Spirit, who dwells in a justified soul, is a great director, when we are willing to listen and know how to hear Him. His anointing teacheth you of all things" (Lombes, 'Paix Int.').

28. little children] children. See note, supra, ii. 1.

confidence...ashamed] Opposed, as in Phil. ii. 20. (See Prov. xiii. 5, LXX.) Παρρησία is literally "liberty of speech to speak out all we think." It was the almost technical word used by Athenians of their privilege as citizens. Eurip. 'Hipp.' 442; Plat. 'Rep.' 557. "Right of free speech is the badge, the privilege, of the servant of Christ. See especially 2 Cor. iii. 12." Bishop Lightfoot, 'Philippians,' p. 89.] "Confidence in the original denotes the entire freedom with which we unburden, in presence of an intimate friend, all which can weigh upon our heart" (Neander).

not be ashamed at his coming] In (ἐν) with a subst. after defines a term of time. Here, when He shall have come—"when the last trump shall sound" (1 Cor. xv. 52)—"in them is filled up the wrath of God," i.e. when they (the plagues) shall have finished (Rev. xv. 1).

coming] The technical term for the coming of Christ, 2 Thess. ii. 8 (and of the Man of Sin as His unholy caricature and counterpart). This verse and the following are of very high dogmatic importance, because they prove the unity of Apostolic teaching upon eschatology, and shew that the notion of a visible, exterior, historical advent is not "foreign from and unknown to St John," or inconsistent with his idealizing mould of thought. (See Meyer on St John's Gospel, xxi. 22, 23.)

not be ashamed before him] (ἀσχυθῶμεν δὲ αὐτοῦ.) A Hebraism. The verb "to be ashamed" (שׁוּב, to grow pale, to change colour for shame) is translated by LXX. as in the text (Jer. ii. 36, xlviii. 13).

SECTION V. ii. 29—iii. 9.

"If ye know (theoretically or scientifically) that He is righteous, ye know (practically) that every one who doeth righteousness has been born of Him, and continues to be His child. We may well dwell upon this Sonship as regards the present and the future.

"As regards the present. Behold! of what marvellous love the Father is a giver to us, that we should be, and be owned to be, the children of God. For the very reason that we are such, the world has no real knowledge of us, because it has not taken knowledge of Him.

"As regards the future. As it is, we are children of God, and what we shall be is not yet manifested once for all. We know that when that (i.e. 'what we shall be') may have been manifested we shall be like Him, for we shall see Him as He is. And this is a very practical truth. Every one who holds and cleaves to this hope reposed in God is perpetually purifying himself even as He, Christ, is pure.

"This is no unnecessary teaching. There is no charm by which subjective sin ceases to be sin objective, by which the intrinsic character of actions is transformed in virtue of those who perform them. Every doer of sin is a doer of transgression. There may be a formal difference, there is an essential identity between them. Ye know that He has been once manifested for the very purpose of removing the guilt and power of sin, and speck or stain of sin in Him there is not. Every one vitally abiding in Him is therefore no habitual sinner. Every such habitual sinner has no true historical knowledge and insight into His character, much less has he inner knowledge and love of Him.

"Dear sons, there are deceivers abroad.

"Let no man deceive you. He that doeth righteousness is righteous even as He is righteous. The sin-doer is of the devil, for 29 If ye know that he is right-

 1 Or, know ye. cous, 'ye know that every one that doeth righteousness is born of him.

the devil from the beginning of the world keeps on sinning; he does the devil's works. And how can he be on Christ's side, who does the very works which He has become incarnate for the purpose of destroying? No, he who having been born of God continues such, is no doer and worker of sin; because God's holy seed (i.e. His children) continues in abiding vital union with Him (v. 6), and it cannot continue in sin, because having been born of God it continues in that blessed condition."

29. If ye know that he is righteous, ye are aware that every one doing righteousness is born from him.

If ye know] theoretically.

doing righteousness. The part. pres. denotes the course, or tendency, in which a man continuously and determinately perseveres. Of the two verbs translated do in A. V. that which is here used (ποιῶν) is most appropriate to doing good, i.e. effective realization, abiding product.

righteousness] Righteous, righteousness, with St John denotes moral rectitude in some aspect of it. He calls Christ "righteous" with special significance in this Epistle (1 John ii. 1, iii. 7). "In St John's Gospel our Lord attributes righteousness to Himself (xvi. 10). The Holy Ghost will convince the world, not here of a righteousness to be found in Christ, but of a purer and more perfect type of moral righteousness than it had known or conceived, and that in one done to death by it, but taken up from its sight to God's Right Hand." (See Olshausen, 'Gospels,' IV. 92.) With St John the word is essentially ethical, with St Paul essentially doctrinal. Yet, even in St Paul, when it stands alone, it is ethical, not dogmatic. Note the strikingly Jobannic phrase in Rev. xxii. 11.

is born of him] is born from him, is born (perfect, a present state as the result of a past action. See below on iii. 9). From him (ἐξ αὐτοῦ). [This addition (preserved with slight variation, infra iii. 9, iv. 7, v. 1, 4, 18) might be cited with some force in favour of translating the word rendered again in St John's Gospel (iii. 3) as from above. (ἀνωθεν. cf. also iii. 31, xix. 11. Ibid. v. 23, it is local. "from the top.") For (1) in the Gospel this word never denotes again. (2) The new birth is only directly mentioned in this form outside St John's Gospel in the present Epistle. It is one of the loops which specially fasten the two books to the same cover. Consequently the birth from God in the Epistle, so emphatically repeated, would seem to be the exponent of ἀνωθεν. (See, however, the note on St John iii. 3.) It may be noted that here, as so often, the Hebraic idea of the new birth of God, in connection with the registration and entrance of the citizens of the New City, is found in its first sense in the Psalter. (Ps. lxxxvii. 4, 5, 6.)] See Additional Note. Justus justum gignit. (Beng.)

ADDITIONAL NOTES on CHAP. II. 10, 16, 18, 19, 29.

10. Two words in Hebrew are rendered by σκάνδαλον; (1) לִשְׁכַּל from root לִשַׁל to totter in the ankles, i.e. that against which any one stumbles, a stumbling-block—hence (a) cause of falling, (b) incitement to fall, (c) offence or scruple of conscience (1 S. xxv. 31, Gesen. 1. v.), (2) שְׂרִיד from שָׂרַף, a hook or snare.

In LXX. οὐκ ἔστιν αὐτοῖς σκάνδαλον (Ps. cxix. 165), here καὶ σκάνδαλον ἐν αὐτῷ οὐκ ἔστιν (1 St John ii. 10).

16. ἐκ "figuratively signifies every source and cause, out of which something flows." Winer, 'Gramm. of G. T. D.,' Pt. III., Sect. xlvii., p. 385.—"εἶναι, γενέσθαι ἐκ, oriundum esse ex; hinc, de quavis aliâ origine. εἶναι ἐκ τινος, ab aliquo proficisci auctore" (Grimm, 'Clav. N. T.,' p. 129).

18. On "the last period" the following extracts will be of interest, as representing the opinions of two great scriptural students, and of the very different schools to which they belong. "1 John ii. 18, Grotius and Mede understand these Antichrists of the pseudo-Christ (ψευδόχριστοι, Matt. xxiv. 24) that our Saviour foretells of, which should start up before "the last time" of the Jewish Commonwealth, the destruction of Jerusalem, which was the ἐσχάτη ὥρα of Judaism. But ἐσχ. ὥ. signifies καὶρὸς ἐσχάτος (for ἦν is indifferently rendered ὥρα or καὶρὸς), and the fourth kingdom in Daniel being the last. the time of that kingdom may be also intimated by it. Whence that in St John (1 John ii. 18) may signify this, viz. that the last time in Daniel's kalendar of his four kingdoms, i.e. the last kingdom, was then a running on, which is the Roman, during which kingdom the Little Horn, here called Antichrist, shall come upon the stage. This is ὁ Ἄντ., that famous Antichrist which ye have heard from Daniel, but this is a greater distance off. Wherefore (to speak what more nearly concerns you) "even now are there many Antichrists which not Daniel, but our Saviour foretold of, whereby again we know it is the last hour; but I mean not of Daniel's four kingdoms, but of the Jewish Commonwealth, as our Lord predicted." Or briefly, "It is the last hour, i.e. last kingdom of the four, viz. the Roman; and as you have heard that Antichrist will then come, so also now, in the last time of the Jewish polity are many Antichrists; whence we may assuredly gather it is the last hour thereof—these many Antichrists, according to prediction, attending this last hour, as that one famous Antichrist that." Henry More, 'Theological Works,' p. 521. Again—"And the sense of both 1 John ii. 18—iv. 2, 3, may be this, namely, that whereas those to whom St John wrote had received a rumour or fame of that eximious Antichrist that was to come into the world in the last time, occasioned (I doubt not) from Daniel's prophecies of the Little Horn and of that King of Pride that would exalt himself above all; the event of these prophecies being further off, though at last certainly to come, he fixes their minds upon such Antichrists as were nearer at hand; and who, though but the types and figures of that great Antichrist to come some ages after, were yet of more concernment to them to take notice of: but in the interim describes Antichrist so, that though it does more palpably point at these types of the future Antichrist, yet the description, more narrowly searched into, takes fast hold also on that great Antichrist himself; forasmuch as it is implied, that it is one who by way of imposture puts himself into the place of Jesus, who is the true Christ, that King, Priest, and Prophet appointed by God, to whom all must submit. Which not only Barchocab and such false Messiahs in the Jewish Commonwealth have done, but he that has so made himself the Head of the Church as to null the laws and doctrines of Christ is deprehended to do the like also." (Ibid. p. 522.)

"The Apostle shews Christians that they should not be inattentive to the signs of the times. In fact, events do not succeed without order or reason. They make part of a vast plan, directed by God, and in which each event has its place. Speaking of the epoch in which he lived, St John calls it 'the last time,' i.e. 'the Christian period.' It is so called because that period is the end and accomplishment of all previous periods; all which precedes it has only been the gradual preparation for it. The coming of Jesus Christ is the centre and corner-stone of the whole history of the kingdom of God. Starting from that moment, we assist at the development and application of this great fact; such is the substance of history since Christ. All which has followed forms one sole period, designated in its entirety—whatever its duration is to be—as 'the last time;' it extends to the final crisis of God's kingdom, which will commence with Christ's Personal coming." (Neander.)

18. γεγόναι, perfect middle of γίγνομαι, "come into being:" γέγονα and ἐγενόμην supply the perfect and aor. of εἰμί, I am; γέγονα frequently has a present sense, "I have been born, and therefore am in existence," πέφυκα, Donaldson, 'Gr. G.' pp. 266, 286 (cf. Matth., Jelf, 'Gr. Gr.' I. 236).

19. εἰ γὰρ ἐξ ἡμῶν ἦσαν, μεμενῆκεισαν ᾧ, εἰ with indicative of historical tenses, when the truth of the antecedent is denied—"had they been, what they were not." The consequent is then generally expressed by a corresponding tense of indicative with ᾧ, whereby the truth of the consequence also is denied. The pluperfect is used in such cases, to express the continued action of the consequent. See Jelf, Matth., 'Gr. G.' p. 474.

20. The most important objection to this view is that alleged by Tholuck. Nicodemus appears to understand ἄνωθεν as δεύτερον (St John iii. 4, "can he enter the second time, &c."). Tholuck also appeals to the regenerative idea in Titus iii. 5 (παλιγγενεσία), 1 Peter i. 3 (ἀναγεννήσας), ibid. 23 (ἀναγεγεννημένοι). See Lange, 'Life of Christ,' II. 31; cf. also Bp Wordsworth, 'New Testament,' II. 162, Bretschn., 'Lex. Man. N. T.' s.v. γεννάω, and the important Additional Note on St John's Gospel, p. 63.

sons of God] St John never uses the word υἱός of any human child of God (xii. 36 is the nearest approach to an exception). He employs a different word (τέκνον) here and v. 2, iii. 10, v. 2 ; cf. Gospel i. 12, xi. 52. St Paul uses the latter rarely (Rom. viii. 16, 17, 21, ix. 8 ; Philipp. ii. 15) the former more frequently (Rom. viii. 14, 19, ix. 26 ; 2 Cor. vi. 18 ; Gal. iii. 26, iv. 6, 7. So Heb. ii. 10, xii. 5, 6, 7, 8 ; cf. Ps. lxxiii. 15). The first, probably, rather contemplates the adoptive act, by which one who does not belong to the family is adopted and brought into the relation of a son ; the second the nature imparted to those who are born and produced by actual birth.

"The last words with which Arnold closed his last lecture on the N.T. were in commenting on 1 John iii. 2. 'Yes,' he added with marked fervency, 'the mere contemplation of Christ shall transform us into His likeness.'" (Stanley's 'Life of Dr Arnold,' II. 331, 332.)

"When some heathen converts to Christianity were translating a Catechism into their own language, they happened to come upon 1 John iii. 2 ; they stopped—"No! it is too much," they said, "let us write that we shall be permitted to kiss His feet." "The whole life of a good Christian is one act of holy desire for this." (St August. ut supra, 2008.)

3. every man that hath] Holds and cleaves to. this hope in Him] Him should be so printed as to shew that God is the object on whom this hope reposes (ἔχων τὴν ἐλπίδα ταύτην ἐπ' αὐτῷ). Cf. ἐπὶ σοὶ, Κύριε, ἠλπισα, Ps. xxx. 1 (LXX.), and the subtly varied form of expressing hope's mode of resting upon God or Christ (1 Cor. xv. 19 ; 1 Tim. v. 5 ; 1 Peter iii. 5). The hope of poetry is hopefulness. "Hope delighted smiled, and waved her golden hair." (Collins' Ode on the Passions.) The hope of the New Testament is patient, comfortable expectation of the promises of God, built upon the sure foundation of God's word. But hope, like our strongest affections (anger, fear, love), is personal in its highest form ; and so God Himself is the highest object of hope. "Hope in Him, or rather on Him (1 John iii. 3). And this is a special act of Christian hope to be thus unfastened from ourselves and fastened upon God." See the wise remarks of Hammond, 'Practical Catechism,' Lib. I., Sect. iii. and the note in this volume on 1 Pet. i. 3.

purifieth] is continually purifying himself. "The very hope of it now, if it be fastened on God, hath the power of making us pure" (Hammond). See South's Sermon on this text, and Paley's on Purity of heart and affection (Sermon XLII.). Augustine well notes—"See how he does not do away with free-will ; for he says, 'purifies himself—Who purifies us but God?' Yet God does not purify you when you are unwilling. Therefore, in joining your will to God, you purify yourself."

even as he] Here no longer αὐτός, but ἐκεῖνος (see on the antithetic use of this pronoun above on ii. 6), "as Christ, and Christ alone," &c.

is] Presentiating tinge of thought. The sinlessness of Jesus is still considered as present to faith.

4. Every one that is doing sin is also doing lawlessness, for sin is lawlessness. Every sin-doer also doeth lawlessness. (See Additional Note.) St Paul's idea is the same in 2 Thess. ii. 3—8. The "Man of sin" is also "the lawless one." St John's object is to state that there is no personal favour which charms away the intrinsic sinfulness of sins, and gives a dispensation to privileged individuals, by which sin subjective (ἀμαρτία) ceases to be sin objective (ἀνομία), by which the intrinsic character of actions is changed out of consideration for those who perform them. Every doer of sin is a doer of lawlessness, every sin-maker a law-breaker. "It is one of those exactly convertible or reciprocal propositions which are very rare" (Rose on Bp Middleton, 'Doctrine of Greek Article,' p. 55 note). The connection has been thus traced. "If we would not lose that hope, we shall aim at a universal and pervasive holiness. We shall refrain not only from palpable violation of the law, but from all sin, for it is false to suppose that the former can ever be separated from the latter. There may be a formal difference, there is an essential identity between them" (Storr and Michael, 'Einleitung,' 1520).

5 And ye know that he was manifested to take away our sins; and in him is no sin.

6 Whosoever abideth in him sinneth not: whosoever sinneth hath not seen him, neither known him.

7 Little children, let no man deceive you: he that doeth righteousness is righteous, even as he is righteous.

8 He that committeth sin is of the devil; for the devil sinneth from the beginning. For this purpose the Son of God was manifested, that he might destroy the works of the devil.

5. to take away our sins] Our is omitted by some MSS. and editors (Lachm., Tischend.). It is not in A, B, apparuit ut peccata tolleret (Cod. Amiat.). It is, however, retained by C, K, and others. Internal arguments tend to turn the balance in its favour. (1) Throughout the Epistle it is we who are spoken of as forgiven (i. 7, 10, ii. 1, iv. 10). (2) In v. 4 supra, sin has been spoken of generally. Here it is made special by including the Apostle and his readers. (See Reiche, 'Comment. Crit.' in loc.)

to take away] that He should take away by one act. Dogmatic disputes have arisen as to the exact meaning of the verb rendered "take away." In John i. 29 (cf. Isai. liii. 4, 6, 11) the context would certainly seem to lay more stress on the Lamb of God bearing sin by way of expiation, than lifting it from the sinner by way of sanctification. But "the act designated by αἵνειν being that which consists in lifting a burden, in order that it may not crush him upon whom it weighs, it is employed as the emblem of deliverance from sin in general, which includes both expiation and sanctification" (Godet, 'Sur l'Év. de S. Jean,' i. 292). The context here would seem to require us to think still more of lifting away the power than the guilt of sin.

And sin in Him is not.

6. whosoever sinneth hath not seen him, neither knoweth him] No habitual sinner (the present part. denoting continuance in) has attained a true historical knowledge of, and insight into, His character, much less has he gained inner knowledge and love of Him. To see in the New Testament often denotes clear religious knowledge (John i. 18, vi. 46; Heb. ii. 8). See the interesting note of Apollinaris on our Lord's words—"I speak that which I have seen with my Father: and ye do that which ye have seen with your father," John viii. 38—in Cramer, 'Catena,' II. 280. "In saying that He had seen, and with His Father, He indicated not seeing with the eyes, but the knowledge and insight which was in accordance with His nature; since in asserting that they also had seen with their father, He by no means signifies that they had been ocular spectators, but that by the wickedness which dwelt in their souls, they were familiar with the counsels and character of the evil one."

7. This verse is addressed by anticipation, not only to Gnostics, but to all in the Christian Church who "fashion out such a God as will, in Christ at least, in those that be once His own, by one knows not what fond affection appropriated to Himself, connive at their very sins, so that they shall not make the least breach between Himself and them." (Cudworth, 'Sermon before the House of Commons.') is righteous, even as he is righteous] "Even as does not always or necessarily imply parity or equality. For instance, what a difference there is between the face of a man, and its reflection in the mirror! And yet we say even as there are ears or eyes in the one case, so in the other....He purifies us even as He is pure; but He is pure eternally, we pure by faith—we are righteous and He is righteous; but He immortally and for ever, we by believing in Him whom we see not." (St Augustine, ut supra, 2010.)

8. the devil] (ὁ διάβολος). See for this word note on John vi. 70. The interpretation of "accuser," "calumniator," appears to be fixed, both by the derivation and by Apoc. xii. 10; cf. 9. [The curious Hebraized word הַיָּדֵן, the transliteration of κατήγωρ, is used by the Rabbis. Buxtorf, 'Lex. Rabbin. Talm.' 2009*. Schoettgen, 'Hor. Hebr.' 1121 sqq.]

the devil sinneth from the beginning] Cf. John viii. 44. Genesis is recognized as worthy of credit. For arguments against the Manichean notion of an eternal personal principle of evil, see St Aug. 'De Civ. D.' xi. 13.

that he might destroy the works of the devil] destroy (λύση), to weaken, deprive of power, abolish in principle; a word in this sense peculiar to St John (unless Matt. v. 19 be an exception). See Gospel, ii. 19, v. 18 ("was destroying the Sabbath"), vii. 23.

the works of the devil] Among the miracles recorded in the Gospels, a whole class, those of dispossession, peculiar to the synoptical evangelists, and especially to St Mark, are nowhere recorded by St John. But the evangelistic silence is no objection (John xx. 30, 31). We certainly read in him of no particular victories over Satan in the recovery of demoniacs. But it should be observed that they are here included and referred to. It is false to say that possession was quite alien to St John's life or even knowledge. Moral 9 Whosoever is born of God doth not commit sin; for his seed remaineth in him: and he cannot sin, because he is born of God.

10 In this the children of God are manifest, and the children of the devil: whosoever doeth not righteousness is not of God, neither he that loveth not his brother.

and spiritual possession is very strongly indicated by him (vi. 70, viii. 44, xiii. 27). As to the knowledge of the writer of the Gospel of the idea of possession, see John viii. 48, x. 20.

9. Whosoever is born of God is not doing sin...because he is born of God] (γεννημένος...γενήσεται, pft.). The tense shews that St John is speaking not of those who have been once regenerate, but of those who retain and develop the new life and continue in it; who having been born from God remain in a condition correspondent to the supernatural life which they have received in the birth of water and of the spirit; who persevere in "an untirable and continue goodness." (Shakespeare, 'Timon of Athens.') Is this consistent (cf. also infra v. 1-4) with our Lord's words to Nicodemus (John iii. 3-5, 6, 7)? Perfectly. The natural difference between the Epistle and Gospel is that the Epistle gives the subjective version, so to speak, of the objective elements presented in the Gospel—a fact which accounts for apparently slight but most significant variations of expression. (Cf. i. 1 with 1 John i. 1, 2; xix. 34 with 1 John v. 6.) Our Lord, speaking to Nicodemus, contemplates the germ and first principle of the new life, which he had yet to receive. St John, writing to those who had long entered the kingdom, contemplates not the germ but the fruit, not the tendency but the realization, not the impulse towards and capacity of renovation, but the renovation itself. To Nicodemus our Lord declares how a man must enter into the kingdom, and be provided with spiritual faculties fitting him for it. St John in his Epistle speaks of the ideal new life issuing from the new birth. The fourth Gospel refers principally to the new birth, to the shower of grace; the Epistle of St John refers principally to the new life—to the growing of the grass long after the rain has fallen. (See Bp Browne 'on the XXXIX. Articles,' p. 636.)

for His seed continues in Him. The His...Him refer to God, not to "whosoever is born of God." "Seed" (σπέρμα) is used as in Isai. liii. 10, lxvi. 22, for the holy stock of God's children. His holy seed continues in abiding vital union with Him. (The LXX. translate זרע by σπέρμα in these passages in the sense of posterity, stock, race.) This is the essential cause that "whosoever is born of God doth not commit sin." [The view which understands the "seed" of the Holy Spirit as the germ and principle of a new life, intended to spring up into holiness, has gained much acceptance (Bishop Taylor, 'Life of our Blessed Lord. Of Baptism.' Lect. ix. 23), but is not so consonant with the general usage of the word in Scripture.]

and he cannot sin] The pronoun understood may be a resumption of the first part of the verse, he; or (somewhat less probably) a further development of the spiritual strength of the seed of God, it. And he is not able to continue in sin (οὐ δύναται ἀμαρτάνειν). He is not able. The word is one of those which it is quite incorrect to treat as pleonastic or nearly so, and which should be fully rendered. (See Winer, Part III. § lxxv. 635, 637.) Note the vitally important distinction between the present here, and the aor. of the same verb, supra ii. 1. ["The infinit. aorist is generally used...either of a thing occurring only once, which does not admit, or at least does not require, the notion of continuance and perpetuity, or of something which is brief and as it were only momentary in duration." (Stallbaum, 'Plat. Euthyd.' p. 140.) "The inf. pres. is generally employed to express an action now in course of performance, or continued in itself or its results, or frequently repeated." Winer, Pt. III. § xlv. 348. An excellent illustration will be found in Matt. xiv. 22.] "As when we say, 'an honest man cannot do this or that,' our meaning is not to assign any natural impossibility, that he is not able, but that he cannot think fit [or bring himself] to do it, the principle of honesty within him [as here the principle of the new life] will resist it; or, if he do not, he is no longer to be called an honest man" (Hammond). "A man, if you speak naturally, can masticate gums, and he can sip up, by little draughts, mixture of aloes or of the deadly night-shade; but he cannot do this naturally and willingly, cheerfully and with delight. Every sin is against a good man's nature." (Bishop Taylor, Sermon 1, "Of the Spirit of Grace," 'Works,' I. 763.)

SECTION VI. iii. 10-24.

10. One of the fruits of the Gospel, pointed to in the Epistle, is love of man. The Gospel, as exhibited by St John, is not only the spiritual law which directs souls, and the moral law which regulates consciences; it is also the social law, which should govern the earth, and the love of man for man is inseparably linked with his love for God (Baunard, 'L'Apôtre S. Jean,' p. 342).

! Or, command-ment.

11 For this is the ¹message that ye heard from the beginning, that we should love one another.

12 Not as Cain, who was of that wicked one, and slew his brother. And wherefore slew he him? Because his own works were evil, and his brother's righteous.

13 Marvel not, my brethren, if the world hate you.

14 We know that we have passed from death unto life, because we love the brethren. He that loveth not his brother abideth in death.

15 Whosoever hateth his brother is a murderer: and ye know that no murderer hath eternal life abiding in him.

16 Hereby perceive we the love of God, because he laid down his life for us: and we ought to lay down our lives for the brethren.

17 But whoso hath this world's

11. this is the message] message in New Testament signifies things announced that they may be done. "He loves to call it the message rather than the law" (Beng.). Here, as in i. 5, & others read a word, which is always promise, exc. Acts xviii. 21. But promise would be almost unmeaning here. Here again the Epistle points to, and is supported by, the Gospel of St John. Our Lord's urgent "command" to His disciples (John xv. 12, 17), the emphasis which in the High Priestly Prayer is laid upon the unity of believers (xvii. 21, 22, 23), receive their most instructive practical development, and their most beautiful historical development, in the Epistles of St John.

12. Not as Cain was of the evil one! The comparison is not expressed with full technical precision; yet the reader can conceive the meaning vividly:—This is the message... that we should love one another (v. 11). Not as Cain was of the wicked one, sc. shall it be with us. Abel is mentioned by our Lord as the proto-martyr, and viewed in contrast with Cain, as the representative of the whole generation of saints over against the whole seed of the evil one. Note a second recognition of the Book of Genesis within a few lines (cf. supra, v. 8). See Additional Note.

13. Marvel not...if] "el is used after verbs of emotion, when the objective οτι, that, might have been expected" (Winer, p. 564). Cf. Mark xv. 44.

brethren] brothers! Here alone are Christians thus addressed in the Epistle. That address is suitable to the context.

14. that we have passed over] Cf. John v. 24. "That passage contains no reference to a future event, but to something that has really commenced. Cf. 1 John iii. 14; Lücke, Comment." (Winer, pt. III. § XL. p. 289.) The condition of man without the Son of God is a condition in which he is in wrath (Gospel, iii. 36). The correlative of the condition, severed from the life of God and pervaded by an ever-deepening misery, is death. (Gospel, v. 25.) The love of the brethren is not the cause but the effect of this blessed translation.

16. Hereby know we] have studied and consequently know.

the love] that love which is above all love (Luth., Beng.). (Cf. Philemon, v. 9, note.) We have come to know what that love is.

we ought] are morally bound.

to lay down our lives for the brethren]

Note the exact echo in these words and in those in the last clause, of the Good Shepherd's declaration, John x. 15. "The measure of love is to have no measure. The model of love is the love of Jesus giving His life for the life of the world." (Baunard, 'L'Apôtre S. Jean,' p. 344.) In the touching tradition of the young robber, won back by St John, the Apostle is represented as saying, "If needs be, I would willingly die for thee, as He died for us." (Euseb. 'H. E.' III. 42.) for the brethren] on their behalf (ὕπέρ). This moral obligation extends as far as the propitiation, which is the great proof of the love. It is, no doubt, true that brother here, and in vv. 10, 13, 14, 15, denotes every fellow-man and fellow-sinner; that the limit of the word is not the fellow-regenerate, but the fellow-redeemed. Still it is well to weigh Augustine's explanation of St John's silence upon love of our enemies in this Epistle. "It is necessary that love like fire should first seize upon that which is near, then extend itself to that which is more remote. Extend your love to those who are nearest; yet you can scarcely call that extension, where the objects are so close. Extend it to those unknown to you, who have done you no evil. Pass over them also; arrive at the point of loving your enemies." (St August. ut supra, 2438.) The complete Christian teaching is given by St Peter. Philosophers have said, "Honour all men;" sectarians and schools have said, "Love the brotherhood." Christianity alone has said "Honour all men—love the brotherhood." (1 Peter ii. 17.)

17. An argument from the greater to the less. The sacrifice of a portion of worldly good, and seeth his brother have need, and shutteth up his bowels of compassion from him, how dwelleth the love of God in him?

18 My little children, let us not love in word, neither in tongue; but in deed and in truth.

19 And hereby we know that we are of the truth, and shall ^{† Gr. persuaded.} assure our hearts before him.

20 For if our heart condemn us, God is greater than our heart, and knoweth all things.

21 Beloved, if our heart condemn goods is small compared with the sacrifice of life itself, which is our bounden duty.

batb this world's good] the living of the world. Life (βίος, here), not the higher life (ζωή), but the organic life, and so that sustenance which belongs to its prolongation or enjoyment. The word is well translated "living" in A. V. Mark xii. 44; Luke xxi. 4. See supra on ii. 16. ("βίος (1) period of life, (2) hence means by which it is sustained, means of life." Archbp Trench.)

gazeth on] The word implies looking on quietly, gazing at it as a sight (θεωρῆν).

how abideth love towards God in him? On "the love of God" as love towards God, see supra, ii. 5.

18, 19. children, let us not love... nor with the tongue, but in truth... in this] i.e. that which just precedes, supra, i. 4. This will remind most readers of the beautiful story told by St Jerome. "When St John was lingering at Ephesus, even to extreme old age, and was with difficulty carried to church by the disciples, and could not sustain his voice for many words, he used to say nothing at each service but Little children! love one another. At length the disciples and brethren somewhat wearied, said, 'Master, why are you always saying this?' He answered in a sentence worthy of John, 'Because it is the precept of the Lord, and sufficient, if it only be done.'" St Hieron. 'Comment. in Epist. ad Galat.' Lib. III. Cap. V. (Tom. VII. 529).

that we are of (from) the truth] Our Lord's phrase before Pilate, John xviii. 37, "every one that is from the truth."

shall assure] or persuade, still, pacify, placare (Düsterd). (The fut. of expectation; that which issues so directly from the nature of the case that we must anticipate it.—before him. Not in the distance of the Great Judgment. (Cf. ἐπεισε Δαυὶδ τοὺς ἄνδρας, κ.τ.λ., 1 S. xxiv. 8, LXX.) The word is used Matt. xxviii. 14.

our hearts] St Paul and St Peter alone in Scripture use conscience (συνείδησις). (See Additional Note.) It is never used by St John. "Convicted by conscience" (viii. 9) is of doubtful authorship. (It is the honour of Grecian thought to have first found a special word to designate conscience.) Hebrew uses the same term which designates heart. "Hebrew has no term which peculiarly and exclusively signifies that which we understand by conscience; and two words, heart or spirit, are used instead. Prov. iv. 23, xviii. 14; Eccles. vii. 22; 1 John iii. 21" (Bp Sander-son, 'De Oblig. Consc. Prælect.' 1. 3; Riggenbach, 'Lieb. Jes.' p. 121). See Additional Note.

him] God. See note, supra, i. 5, and cf. v. 21 ("if our heart condemn us not, we have confidence toward God").

20. For if our heart condemn us, God is greater than our heart, and knoweth all things] Many interpretations have been proposed of these difficult words; but they may be considered as falling under two general divisions, as they are supposed to aim at quieting or awakening conscience: (i.) Those who think that St John's object is to soothe the conscience, naturally reject all in the interpretation which would create a feeling of alarm. It is, they think, a gracious pardoning omniscience which we are to keep in view. "And hereby we shall persuade our hearts before Him, in whatever matter our conscience may accuse us (ὅτι ἐὰν, cf. ὁ ἐὰν ποιῇτε, Coloss. iii. 23... ὁ ἐὰν αἰτῶμεν, infra, v. 22, quand même), because God is greater than our heart, and knoweth all things," i.e. The Christian, who is conscious of true love in word and deed, though vexed by a morbid and scrupulous, or even a restless and lacerated conscience, may yet lull it, and persuade it to be calm, by the sweet spell of one consolatory thought. He who is Love is greater than our fallible conscience with its tormenting misgivings. His tender omniscience knows us through and through better than we know ourselves, and in that knowledge we may rest. (See Additional Note.) The whole sentiment, then, would be in accordance with St Peter's words in John xxi. 15, 16, 17 ("Thou knowest all things. Thou knowest that I love Thee"), and a fulfilment of the promise of forgiveness in Matt. vi. 14. (ii.) St John's object, however, is to appeal to, and awaken conscience; and his words fall into this view with a natural and unforced emphasis which goes far to prove the truth of the interpretation. "By true love in word and deed (v. 18) we know that we are children born from the Truth, and attain to the blessedness of silencing the accusing echoes of the voice of conscience (v. 19). It is so—for if we cannot honestly and as in God's sight "persuade" our conscience; if we are forced to admit us not, then have we confidence toward God.

22 And whatsoever we ask, we receive of him, because we keep his commandments, and do those things that are pleasing in his sight.

23 And this is his commandment, That we should believe on the name of his Son Jesus Christ, and love one another, as he gave us commandment.

24 And he that keepeth his commandments dwelleth in him, and he in him. And hereby we know that he abideth in us, by the Spirit which he hath given us.

to ourselves that there is a disaccordance between our profession and our conscience; if, in spite of all opiates administered, and illusions attempted, conscience still wakes, and pierces through the plausibilities, and cries "guilty;" how can we succeed in deceiving God, who is omniscient, and therefore greater than conscience itself (v. 21)? Nothing can escape that piercing eye; the accusation of our heart is the avant-courier of the judgment of God. "Thus," adds Neander, "the means of knowing ourselves thoroughly is to recollect ourselves, and hear in silence the voice of the incorruptible judge whom each of us carries in the depth of himself. If, in the examination, our conscience bears us witness that we sincerely desire to put our practice in unison with our profession, then we are in peace. 'Beloved, if our heart condemn us not, then have we confidence toward God' (v. 21). Our works do not justify us; but they are witnesses that we are really in communion with Him who justifies; they seal our Christian life with the signet of sincerity. Thus they become for us a subject of confidence."

22. The same boundlessness of promise as in the Gospel (xv. 7), and the same condition. "A prayer thus formed is the child of heaven, and its return to its home is natural. It is God's promise transformed into supplication" (Godet). "Love itself prayeth. Against this, He who gave it knoweth not how to close His ears." (St August. in loc.) because] for—not the reason why, not the meritorious cause of our being heard.

keep] observe. See note supra, ii. 3.

commandments.....things that are (well) pleasing in his sight] Two aspects of God's law. Assuredly not that the things well-pleasing are over and above the commandments, and so counsels of perfection.

23. The "commandments" of v. 22 summed up in one (cf. ii. 3—5, where "word" in v. 5 is an advance upon "commandments" in v. 3). The two that follow (that "we should believe and love") are not two but one. Faith and piety, dogma and duty, run into one. believe on the name] Cf. v. 13 (where the constr. is different); here it is believe the Name.

24. Said to have been Spinoza's favourite verse.

This is the first direct mention of the Holy Spirit in St John's Epistle, cf. ii. 20, note. The direct mention is purposely deferred, just as St Paul does in Rom. v. 5 compared with viii. 1 sqq. The whole structure of St John's Epistle is thus Trinitarian (see W. Archer Butler's Sermons, pp. 92—94). He has mentioned the Father and the Son (i. 3), now the Spirit. So in the Gospel, we find the section of the Spirit, chapters xiv. to xvii.

And hereby we know that he abideth in us, from the Spirit which he gave us] from—ἐκ, when it has a partitive signification, indicates the abundance out of which something is given. (See in Matt. xii. 34; John viii. 44.) The same word is unfortunately translated (A. V.) dwelleth at the beginning of this verse and abideth at the close.

ADDITIONAL NOTES on CHAP. III. 8, 9, 12, 19, 20.

8. ὁ ποιεῖν τὴν ἀμαρτίαν. "This term, as it stands in direct antithesis to ὁ γέγεν. ἐκ τ. Θεοῦ, is correlative to it in meaning—a state or condition, not a simple act. The word ποιεῖν, according to the Hebraic usage, in the present participle, denotes not act only, but habit, or rather more than habit. 'Αμαρτίαν ποιεῖν—Lat. operarius iniquitatis, one that maketh a trade of sin, or professeth iniquity, whose service is altogether incompatible with the profession or life of a Christian." Jackson, 'Works,' III. 363. "τοὺς ποιοῦντας τὴν ἀνομίαν (Matt. xiii. 41), omnes qui iniquitatem exercent, et, ut ita dicam, iniquitatis artem factitant; magis enim habitus quam actus Hebraicâ phrasi significatur." Maldon, in loc.

9. This verse and its parallel in this Epistle were prominently appealed to by Jovinian. "Jovinian asserted that John made no distinction but one, viz. between those who are born of God, and those who are not. He did not reflect that, although Divine life as a common property of all who believe is one and the same, yet different stages are found in its development and degree; that along with the Divine life the sinful tendency lingers on, which may more or less overcome, or be overcome by, that life; that in this way it is right to speak of more and less, of distinctions and degrees, in sin or holiness. Hence, too, he represents sanctification as simply possession of what has once been received, not progressive development of it" (Neander, 'Church History,' II. 368). St John, here as so often, gives us the ideal standard of Christianity as it stands for ever high above all superficial views of its character, which look only at partial, particular, imperfect realizations of it, and sever it from its eternal and unattainable ideal. But Jovinian failed from a contrary error. He did not distinguish between the ideal standard, and human realizations of it, with their infinite degrees (see Lücke on the text).

12. It has sometimes been supposed that this may have been suggested to St John by the conduct and teaching of Apollonius of Tyana at Ephesus. From the strange book of Philostratus it is difficult to draw precise chronological data, but the visit may possibly have been A.D. 96, towards the close of St John's life. Philostratus tells a story of a poor old mendicant, whom, after the example of Calchas, Tiresias, and Epimenides, Apollonius advised the people to kill. This story is narrated by Philostratus with picturesqueness and pathos ('Vita Apollon.' Act. II. Sc. II. 5, 58, 59). It would certainly form a vivid commentary on 1 John iii. 12. (See Baunard, 'L'Apôtre S. Jean,' pp. 286, 287.)

19. This omission has important reasons.—(1) To avoid apparent entanglement with mere Moral Philosophy. (2) For the same reason for which Bishop Butler so often varies his language, and uses one equivalent after another for conscience; a process which he says will seem "strange to those who have not observed the reason of it"—viz. to state general truth, apart from special theories about it, such as are involved in the fixed use of words of the kind. "St John designates the human soul, the spiritual being, by the name of heart, without troubling himself as to psychological distinctions drawn between the different faculties of the soul" (Neander).

The use of \aleph in Hebrew seems to be this: (1) the central point of blood, and vessel of corporeal life; then (2) the life itself; then (3) the seat of senses, emotions, affections; and (4) the mode of thinking and acting, the seat of will and purpose—in fact the centre of corporeal, of sensuous, of emotional, of moral and voluntary life; where the moral character becomes manifest in virtue or vice. Gesen. i.v. and Fuerst, 'Lex.' pp. 723, 724.

20. This interpretation is defended grammatically by Hoogeveen ('Doct. Part. Græc.' p. 589), morally by Nösselt ('Interp. Gramm.' 1 John iii. 19, 22) and by Huther, see quotations in Lücke in loc. Several modern scholars who take the soothing view of the subject-matter of this verse explain it thus: "We shall convince our hearts as in His presence that [if our heart condemn us] that God is greater than our hearts." The Greek is understood thus:—πείσομεν τὰς καρδίας...ὅτι [ἐὰν καταγινώσκη ἡμῶν ἡ καρδία] ὅτι μεῖζων, κ.τ.λ.—the second ὅτι being simply a resumption of the first by repeating it. Cf. the resumption of οὗτος by οὗτος after a parenthetic clause in James i. 25.

CHAPTER IV.

1 He warneth them not to believe all teachers, who boast of the Spirit, but to try them by the rules of the catholick faith: 7 and by many reasons exhorteth to brotherly love.

SECTION VII. iv. 1—6.

CHAP. IV. 1. believe not every spirit] believe not any spirit, i.e. do not give credence to it, the assent of faith, merely upon its own word.

spirit] In the utterance of any powerful teacher St John would have seen, not the individual, but (1) the general spirit at work, and (2) behind and beyond that the influence of a superhuman intelligence, good or evil.

but test. So St Paul, "despise not prophecies, but bring all to the test" (1 Thess. v. 21). Cf. among the distribution of gifts of the Spirit, those of criticism and discernment, 1 Cor. xii. 10. The spirit of St John and St Paul, however deeply reverential and child-like, is not one of credulous fanaticism, or BELOVED, believe not every spirit, but try the spirits whether they are of God: because many false prophets are gone out into the world.

abject unreasoning submission to authority. Cf. 1 Cor. xii. 10, xiv. 29; 1 Tim. iv. 1. See note on 1 Thess. v. 21. It must have been a crisis-time in the spiritual world, cf. Apoc. ix. 1—3. We must remember that at Ephesus, and in Asia Minor generally, St John found not only a heresy of the intellect in Cerinthus and the Gnostics, and a heresy of the senses in the Nicolaitanes, but also a heresy of magic and mysticism. The streets of Ephesus were full of theoleptics and convulsionaries; magical practices and invocations were pursued by the educated with a passionate interest to which modern spiritualism presents but a feeble parallel (see the "exorcists," "curious arts," and "books" spoken of in Acts xix. 19). St Paul triumphed for a season (ibid. vv. 17, 20). But Persian Magi,

2 Hereby know ye the Spirit of God: Every spirit that confesseth that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh is of God:

3 And every spirit that confesseth not that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh is not of God: and this is that spirit of antichrist, whereof ye have heard that it should come; and even now already is it in the world.

4 Ye are of God, little children, and have overcome them: because greater is he that is in you, than he that is in the world.

5 They are of the world: therefore speak they of the world, and the world heareth them.

with their enchantments and philtres, Egyptian hierophants, Chaldean astrologers, came to Ephesus year after year. Cabalistic letters, called Ephesian letters, were in reputation for their power of healing or divination. (Clem. Alex. 'Stromat.' i. pp. 386 sqq.) Apollonius of Tyana found an enthusiastic reception in Ephesus (Baunard, 'L'Apôtre S. Jean,' pp. 277—288). It may be added that St John's Epp. contain no hint of the Apostles exercising gifts of healing. Even in the Acts, immediately after Pentecost, while Peter and John walk together, the influence of the former in this department completely overshadows that of the latter. Peter performs the miracle. John assists in silence by faith and prayer. (Acts iii. to iv. 22.)

many false prophets are gone out into the world] It was a critical time in the spiritual world; cf. 2 John, v. 7. For the words "gone out," see supra, ii. 19. The idea is given in a poetry of awful symbols, Apoc. ix. 1, 2.

2. Hereby know ye] It may be indic. or imp. that confesseth that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh] Jesus Christ come in the flesh. (Note the perf. partic. ἐληλυθότα, the permanent state or condition consequent upon His having come; and cf. the pres. (ἐρχόμενον ἐν σαρκί) 2 John v. 7. In this passage the Incarnation is looked upon as a past fact with permanent consequences in the present—in 2 John 7, as a present and continuous principle.)

3. And every spirit that confesseth not that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh] Tischend. and others read, "every spirit that confesseth not Jesus," omitting the following words, "Christ...come in the flesh" (Reiche, however, argues for their retention). A celebrated controversy rose upon this text. See Additional Note.

this is that whole power and principle of the Antichrist] (τὸ τοῦ Ἀντιχρίστου). Prob. not spirit understood (as in A. V.), but a generalizing use of the neuter for essence and character, denoting a collective whole. ("When we wish to express as genewhereof ye have heard that it is coming] not only in this Epistle, but as an integral part of Catholic tradition in which they lived and breathed. Cf. 2 Thess. ii. 5.

he that is in you] sc. the Personal Word. Cf. "the Word of God abideth in you," supra ii. 14. Ignatius, after St John's death, writes to the Church of Ephesus in a strain derived from this passage, as if sure of being understood by them. "Let us do all things, as if He were dwelling permanently in us, that we may be His temples, and that He may be in us our God, which He both is and will appear before our face." (Ignat. 'Epist. ad Ephes.' xv.) "Every one who hears—the words 'ye have overcome'—lifts his head, and would be praised. Nay, exalt not yourself. See who has overcome in you. Greater is He that is in you, than he that is in the world." (St August. in Epist. Joann. Tract. vii. 2, Epp. iii. p. 2, 2050.)

5. "They are from the world. Therefore from the world is the very form verbally of that which they speak" (λαλοῦσιν). On the implied difference between λαλῶ, λαλιά, and λέγω, λόγος, cf. John viii. 43, "Why do ye not comprehend the form and mode of speech so peculiarly Mine own (τὴν λαλίαν τὴν ἐμήν)? because ye are morally incapable of hearing with true reception the substance of the message which is emphatically Mine (τὸν λόγον τὸν ἐμόν)."

6. "The testimony which St John bears in this verse is broad enough to include all who have truly received Christ by faith: it is narrow enough to exclude all who make any other than Christ the service of their life" (Düsterd).

7 Beloved, let us love one another: for love is of God; and every one that loveth is born of God, and knoweth God.

8 He that loveth not knoweth not God; for God is love.

9 In this was manifested the love of God toward us, because that God sent his only begotten Son into the world, that we might live through him.

10 Herein is love, not that we loved God, but that he loved us, and sent his Son to be the propitiation for our sins.

11 Beloved, if God so loved us, we ought also to love one another.

the Spirit of The Truth] Who is He? Gospel xiv. 17, xv. 26, xvi. 13. The article should be preserved in translating all these passages. See Additional Note on 3 John 3.

SECTION VIII. iv. 7—v. 2.

7. love...every one that loveth] Love (ἡ ἀγάπη), the "charity" of St Paul. (For this word, see notes, Vol. III. pp. 338 and 376.) On the distinction between ἀγάπη and φιλία, the peculiarly Christian use of ἀγάπη, and the absence of ἔργον, the student should read five beautiful pages in Archbp Trench's 'Synonyms of the New Testament,' pp. 39—43. "It should never be forgotten that ἀγάπη is a word born within the bosom of revealed religion; it occurs in the LXX., but there is no example of its use in any heathen writer whatever" (p. 42). "A wicked man may have Baptism. He may have prophecy. He may receive the sacrament of the Body and Blood of Christ (1 Cor. xi. 29). All these things a wicked man may have. But no wicked man can have charity." (St August. ut supra, 2031.)

8. God is love] Cf. v. 16. There is something in this much beyond the mere Socinian view that "God is benevolent;" or even the Calvinistic view that God has given in Redemption most touching evidence of His love to man, though these are included. It has been observed that "Reformed expositors have a tendency to see in these words not a Nature of love but proofs of love" (Düsterd); while the theologians of the Primitive Church and Lutheran and Roman Catholic expositors rather find in them that God is Love inwardly, so to speak, as well as outwardly—by essence as well as manifestation. "God is Love" points not only to our Creation and Redemption, but to an inner essential Love in the everlasting Trinity. And this Love becomes the solution of the mystery of existence—the answer to the question, "Why did God create?" There was no outward necessity; no compulsion but that of love, for love is in its nature diffusive and creative. "Brevis laus, et magna laus; brevis in sermone, magna in intellectu." (St August. ut supra, 2045.) (See Additional Note.)

9. In this was manifested the love of God in us] Toward us is not an adequate translation of ἐν ἡμῖν. It is more than the simple dat.: it means not only "bestowed upon us," or "acting toward us," but in us. Cf. Acts iv. 12 (δεδωμένον ἐν ἀνθρώποις), so also "the grace of God given in the Churches of Macedonia" (2 Cor. viii. 1). "The gift or grace was not only bestowed upon, but operated in, the Churches. It was a grace working in them by love" (Bp Wordsworth, 'N. T.' II. 167). Cf. Bp Bull, 'Works,' vi. 99, 100; Olshausen, 'Commentary,' III. 396.

that God hath sent] Perfect (ἀπέσταλκεν). This perfect, implying the present, permanent, continuing effect of the mission of the Son of God, should be carefully compared with the aorist of the same verb in the next verse (ἀπέστειλε), which signifies the propitiation effected by that mission considered as one great act. For a fine illustration of the distinction between the aor. and perfect, and of the force of the tense here, see "He anointed Me...and hath sent Me," the former (ἔχρισέ με) viewed as what took place once, the latter (ἀπέσταλκέ με) as still present in its effects. (St Luke iv. 18.) Winer, Part III. § xi. p. 287. Note the bearing of the verse upon the doctrine of the Atonement. (1) We did not first become objects of God's love in consequence of the Atonement. Rather, the sending of the Son was an evidence of a love which already existed. (2) God's love was not evoked by ours, but preceded it, even when we were aliens in heart.

His Son, His only-begotten. The title which St John chooses here for our Lord is selected with deep thoughtfulness to indicate and enhance the extent and preciousness of the Father's gift. This title of Christ occurs only here and in St John's Gospel, i. 14, 18, iii. 16, 18. The word does not signify, as some of old thought, brought into existence by the One God, but the Only Begotten One (ὁ μόνος γεννηθείς). St Basil, Lib. II. 'adv. Eunom.'

10. sent His Son a propitiation] Cf. supra, ii. 2.

11. if God so loved us] If expresses no doubt; it is conditional only in form, and in sense is almost equivalent to since. Cf. Gospel, vii. 4; Rom. xi. 21.

so loved us] Cf. Gospel, iii. 16. The so is not merely immeasurable love—so much—but refers to the manner of His love, as described in v. 10—not to the quantity, so to speak, but to the quality of the love.

12 No man hath seen God at any time. If we love one another, God dwelleth in us, and his love is perfected in us.

13 Hereby know we that we dwell in him, and he in us, because he hath given us of his Spirit.

14 And we have seen and do testify that the Father sent the Son to be the Saviour of the world.

15 Whosoever shall confess that Jesus is the Son of God, God dwelleth in him, and he in God.

16 And we have known and be-

12. God] Both here and St John i. 18, the Divine Name stands without the article. This confirms the inference that he is speaking not of the Father in particular, but of the Godhead (see the important note on John i. 18), which is the doctrine of the greatest teachers of the Church. "When the Arians said that the Father only was invisible, Athanasius asserted from Scripture and reason the equal invisibility of the Trinity, proving that God is not seen save by the assumption of manhood—but that as regards the proper nature of Deity, God is invisible—i.e. Father, Son, and Holy Ghost—save as far as He can be known mentally and spiritually." See this and other testimonies to the same effect. (St August. 'Epist.' CXLVIII. Tom. II. 626, Edit. Migne.)

God no one hath ever yet beholden. True! He is invisible. But, if we love one another, He comes very close to us. Yes! He abideth in us. The connection is so explained by à Lap., Huther, Düsterd. We must observe carefully the distinction between the simple sight spoken of in the Gospel i. 18, and the intent contemplation of the verb here used (ρεθεαται). The question how this statement is to be reconciled with St Matt. v. 8, 1 John iii. 2—and with the sight of God attributed in the Old Testament to Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Job, Moses, Micaiah, Isaiah (Gen. xviii. 1, xxvi. 2, xxxii. 30; Job xxxviii. 1; Exod. xxxiii. 11; 1 K. xxii. 19; Isaiah vi. 1)—is discussed at length by St Augustine in an Epistle which won the enthusiastic admiration of Bishop Pearson—"that golden Epistle." 'De Invisib. Dei,' Lect. XII. 'Minor Theol. Works' I. 118—127). St Augustine points out that the sight spoken of is not that of exterior objects or of mental phenomena. God's words to Moses—"thou canst not see My face: for there shall no man see Me, and live" (Exod. xxxiii. 20)—lead to the solution of the difficulty. No living man in this life can see Him and live. The right view of 1 John iii. 2 refers to a sight of God very different from that which was enjoyed by Moses and others upon earth. They saw Him when He willed, with that sort of sight which He willed, not in the inner glory of that Nature in which He remained hidden, even when in a sense He was seen. "We shall see Him as He is" (1 John iii. 2) exactly answers to the sight which was withheld from Moses (Exod. xxxiii. 20, 22, 23). "This you can understand so far as you are united to God, and prepare yourself within as the incorporeal place of His dwelling to hear the silence of His speech, and to see His invisible form. 'The pure in heart shall see God.' Not that He shall appear to them as a body from any interval of place—but that He shall have come to them and made His abode with them. For they shall be filled with all the fulness of God, not that they shall become fully God, but that they shall be perfectly full of God."..... "Great theologians have well said that the Invisible God is seen invisibly, i.e. by that nature which is also invisible in us—by a pure heart." S. August. 'Epist.' CXLVII., CXLVIII. Opp. Tom. II. 596—630. St John vi. 45, 46, should be carefully studied. Learning from the Father as a consequence of continuing to bear His teaching is markedly distinguished from seeing Him. The first belongs to all who come to Jesus: the second is the exclusive attribute of the Son.

God abideth in us.

his love is perfected in us] Not sharply either "His love to us" or "our love to Him;" but—"the relation of love between us and God (on God's part already perfected) is perfected in us, if we love one another." "Have you begun to love? God has begun to dwell in you. Love Him who has begun to dwell in you, that by dwelling in you more perfectly He may make you perfect." (St August. in Epist. Johann. Tract. VIII. 12.)

13. Supra, iii. 24. "Whence know we then that He hath given us from His Spirit? Ask your own heart. If it is full of love, you have the Spirit. Whence know we that you may thus know that the Spirit dwelleth in you? Ask St Paul (Rom. v. 5)." (St August. ut supra, 2043.)

14. "We have seen with adoring wonder—and the impression of the sight abides with us (ρεθεάμεθα)—and are bearing witness (μαρτυροῦμεν)—that the Father hath sent (perf.) the Son as the Saviour of the world." One of the numerous loops that bind the Epistle to the Gospel. It is the phrase of the Samaritans, who have been convinced, not only by the woman's witness, but by their own hearing, in St John's Gospel, iv. 42. The language here is certainly such as would be inappropriate in any but an eyewitness.

16. "We know and have believed and continue to believe in" (πιστεύκαμεν) (cf. Gospel, xx. 29), i.e. we have not only "made lieved the love that God hath to us. God is love; and he that dwelleth in love dwelleth in God, and God in him.

17 Herein is ^{† Gr. love} our love made perfect, that we may have boldness in the day of judgment: because as he is, so are we in this world.

an act of faith" at some past time, but continue now in possession of that faith as the result. That in which we believe is the love that God hath in us—not only to us but in us, by virtue of the Incarnation. It is impossible to understand the Epistle here without a reference to the Gospel. "We have known the love which God hath in us." Why so? Because Jesus promised—"ye shall know that I am...in you"—"I will make it known to them that the love with which Thou lovedst Me may be in them, and I in them" (xvii. 26). It is yet another instance of the connection of suggestion between the Epistle and Gospel. (πιστεύειν τι, to be persuaded of anything, to believe it with an underlying notion of constancy in the persuasion—πιστεύκαμεν τὴν ἀγάπην, we are fully persuaded of the love of God. See Bretsch. 'Lex. Man. N. T.' s. v.) The passage may also be explained by looking upon "we believe" as parenthetical. "We have known [and we still permanently believe it] the love," &c. It has been profoundly remarked by Bossuet upon this verse, that it goes to the very root of the heresies upon the Incarnation which St John had in view. Such heresies generally have refused to receive neither the power, nor the wisdom of God, but, strange to say, His goodness. The mystery under which the pride of the sophist sank was, at its root, the mystery of the love of God. "In all mysteries let us give as the best reason, God so loved the world. That is the doctrine of the Master, and the beloved disciple well understood it. In his time the heresiarch Cerinthus would not believe that God could make Himself man, and the victim for sinners. What is the answer of the Theologian of the New Testament to the heresiarch? What symbol, what new confession of faith, does he oppose to the nascent heresy? Hear and wonder—we have believed the love that God hath in us! There is the whole faith of Christians; there is the cause and abridgment of the whole Creed." ('Oraison Funèbre d'Anne de Gonzague.')

A philosopher of the day has said "that theologians fail by attaching themselves to the Christian symbol instead of to the moral sentiment which carries immeasurable Christianities in its bosom." (R. W. Emerson.) St John says that the two are one in Christ—that the symbol is a sentiment. The Creed which we believe is "the Love which God hath in us."

17. Herein hath the love been perfected (and is consequently perfect) with us] (ἡ ἀγάπη μεθ' ἡμῶν), love with us ("between us, mutual love," Bretsch.), love generally to God and man, is fulfilled and perfected in this, viz. that we may have boldness in the day of Judgment—because as He who is the Love, is (abiding in deathless love in the unfading picture in the Gospel which you may contemplate, in the Heaven above where you may lift up your eyes and see Him by faith, in your hearts where He abides), so are we in this poor fallen world. It is difficult not to feel that there is some subtle reference to the idea of God with us (Matt. i. 23), and to our peace with God, with man, and with ourselves, through the Incarnation. (See Bp Wordsworth.) As He is—is presentiating (see supra, ii. 2, iii. 2; John v. 2)—so are we too. Cf. even as He is pure (iii. 3); also as He is righteous (iii. 7). The we are answering to the He is brings out more subtly the idealising and unattainable character of the standard. See on ἐκεῖνος ("He, and none else"), ii. 6.

in the day of judgment] in the day of The Judgment.

the day] The Hebrews distinguished two "ages," that before Messiah, and that after Him. (See Additional Note at the end of 2 Thessalonians.) The "last day" is the last of the "age," in which Christ shall come again. "The day of the Judgment" is the day appointed for the Judgment. According to St John's use of language κρίσις is (a) the separation and critical discrimination which goes on necessarily and spontaneously by the very fact of our Lord's appearance and witness between men as they receive or reject Him, with special reference to its condemnatory aspect (John iii. 19—27, the sentence of condemnation upon this world, ibid. xii. 31; cf. xvi. 8—11); (b) the last Judgment, with a special inclusion of the condemnation of those rejected in "the resurrection of judgment," i.e. sequacem habens condemnationem (John v. 29); (c) a usage including both these senses—"My judgment, the judgment which is peculiarly Mine" (John v. 30), "all judgment" (ibid. v. 22), i.e. totum judicandi negotium—the whole long series of judgments culminating in the Great Judgment, the long process of discrimination with its last and awful sequel. St John's eschatology is at one with that of St Peter and St Paul, and looks on the day of Judgment—the "Last Judgment," as it used, with true instinct, always to be called—with a vivid realization, as if it were all but present (cf. Rom. ii. 15, 16). (See on the subject, Grimm, 'Clav. N. T.' p. 191 and p. 247.) It is well to note the Johannic phrase (ἡ ὥρα τῆς κρίσεως αὐτοῦ) Αποκ. xiv. 7.

18 There is no fear in love; but perfect love casteth out fear: because fear hath torment. He that feareth is not made perfect in love.

19 We love him, because he first loved us.

20 If a man say, I love God, and hateth his brother, he is a liar: for he that loveth not his brother whom he hath seen, how can he love God whom he hath not seen?

21 And this commandment have we from him, That he who loveth God love his brother also.

18. A great Christian thinker reminds us here that there are two kinds of fear, one servile, the other holy—the fear of him who quails before punishment, and the tender fear of him who loves righteousness. “If there were at first no fear, there would be no entrance for love. As in sewing, we see the thread passed through by the needle. The needle is first pushed in, but the thread cannot be introduced until the needle is brought out. So fear first occupies the mind, but does not remain permanently, because it entered for the purpose of introducing love” (August. ‘Tract. in Evang. Joann.’).

fear brings punishment with it] Not “fear is punished,” nor “leaves a consciousness of punishment,” but there is punishment in fear. (ὁ φόβος κόλασιν ἔχει. The verb ἔχει sometimes means that which something brings with it in its train or company. So here and James i. 4, “let patience bring with it.” Bretschn. s.v.) “For him who abides in love, there is no subject of fear.” Among other such subjects, the fear of being judged by God tends to disappear; not that the Christian passes superficially over that most solemn truth, or entertains a shallow and deceptive security. But the guilty agitation which lays hold of the wilful sinner so long as he sees in God nothing but a severe and awful Judge—the trouble which is spread over the soul by a conviction of the “wrath of God”—gives place to quiet confidence in all who cherish those loving relations with God established by Jesus Christ, of which St John has just spoken. The foundation of such confidence is not laid in the personal merit or sanctity or emotions of the Christian; that would be a precarious and tottering foundation. The sole support upon which any sinner can rely is the love of God revealed in Christ, by which he is united with his Saviour. There are two opposite points of view in the spiritual life; one considers God as a Father, to whom we remain united by love, and whom Jesus Christ has revealed to us—the other as a Judge, who acts upon us by the dread of punishment. This is the Apostle’s point. It may well be that, even in a soul which has arrived at the liberty of love, there are reactions of the spirit of bondage, returns to the yoke of fear broken by the Gospel. But St John speaks in the verse of an ideal spiritual condition, in which love reigns with undivided sway, so as entirely to have banished fear. (So Neander.) St Augustine beautifully illustrates the two kinds of fear—one here mentioned by St John as inconsistent with love—the other inseparable from love. “Suppose two wives. The one who is faithless fears her husband’s coming—such are they who fear the coming of the day of Judgment. The other, who loves her husband, desires his coming. Both fear. Ask one ‘Do you fear your husband?’ She will answer ‘I fear.’ Ask the other; she too will say, ‘I fear.’ The words are the same; the feeling is different. Ask them why they fear? One says, ‘I fear that my husband will come;’ the other, ‘I fear that he will go away.’ One says, ‘I fear to be condemned by him;’ the other, ‘I then fear to be deprived of him.’ Transfer this to the Christian life—and you have the fear which is inconsistent with love, and the pure sweet fear which lasts on.” (‘In Epist. Joann. Tract.’ ix. 5.)

He that feareth] He that continues fearing, the principle of whose spiritual life is fear (ὁ φοβούμενος).

19. We love (omit him), because he first] First (πρῶτος in the sense of πρότερος), cf. John i. 15, 18. “Our soul is defiled by sin; by loving God it is made beautiful. What a love is that which makes him who loves beautiful! How shall we grow beautiful? By loving Him who is beautiful.” (St Aug. ut supra, 2051.) Was St John thinking of his own gracious and unmerited call? (Gospel i. 38, 39.)

20. he that loveth not his brother] The neg. here gives a subjective tinge to the cast of the expression—“any one of whom we conceive as belonging to such a class.”

hath seen...hath not seen] The perfect “sometimes equivalent to ‘I (have looked and) see.’” John ix. 37; 1 John iv. 20.” (Winer, ‘Gr. of N. T. D.’ Part III. § xi. p. 290.)

how can he love God] “While men are continually bidden ἀγαπᾶν τ. θεόν (Matt. xxii. 37; Luke x. 27; 1 Cor. viii. 13) and good men declared to do so (Rom. viii. 28; 1 Pet. i. 8; 1 John iv. 21), the φιλεῖν τ. θεόν is commanded to them never.” (Archbp Trench, ‘Synon. of N. T.’ p. 40, where see the explanation of this.) Cf. also Hammond, ‘Practical Catechism,’ Lib. i. Sect. 3, p. 56.

21. he who loveth God] He that continues loving, the principle of whose spiritual life is love. The present partic. with the definite article has almost the force of a substantive. See v. 18 supra. In the example and teaching of St John's Gospel, we have not only the moral law which is to rule the conscience, but the social law which is to govern society. So the love of man is taken up into, and becomes inseparable from, the love of God. St John not only exalts our duty towards our brethren; he makes it divine. "It is hard to love men as men. Humanity in the mass is so vulgar; or so perverse. We must have despaired of social and human love altogether, if upon the human object proposed to our love God had not cast an elevating grandeur, and the beauty of a superhuman transfiguration. It is a point specially explained by the disciple of Jesus in his First Epistle. 'If a man say, I love God, and hateth his brother, he is a liar' (1 John iv. 20). The law which we have received from Him is a law of love, 'that he who loveth God, love his brother also' (ibid. v. 21). Such is the moral law which is also the law of holiness, of progress, of the future. It is going on for nearly two thousand years since the Epistle of St John presented us with its formula. Humanity and the world have as yet only drawn from it its first consequences. These essays, poor and incomplete as they are, have made civilized humanity what it is. Ask then of this love all that it can give. Do not mutilate it, by changing its very nature. Do not separate the love of God from the love of man. Do not preach a sterile human fraternity by overlooking the Divine paternity, which is the trunk of the tree of life. Do not isolate at your own pleasure the law of religion from the law of society." (Baunard, pp. 342—345.)

ADDITIONAL NOTES ON CHAP. IV. 3, 9 AND 16.

3. Socrates asserted that "Nestorius was ignorant that in the old copies of the Catholic Epistle of John it was written, 'every spirit that dissolveth Jesus is not from God' (πᾶν πνεῦμα ὃ λύει τὸν Ἰησοῦν ἀπὸ τοῦ Θεοῦ οὐκ ἐστὶ). But this thought those who wished to separate the Divinity from the economy of the Manhood erased from the old MSS. Wherefore the old interpreters indicated this very fact when they related that some dealt deceitfully with the text of St John's Epistle, wishing to dissolve (or sever) Him who is Man from Him who is God." ('Hist. Eccles.' VII. 32.) It would seem as if Socrates himself were the only Greek evidence who remains. For (1) no Greek MSS., nor any version, or author, except Latin¹, support this; (2) several, even of the Latins, cite the passage as it stands in the Greek texts (see Tert., St Augustine, Fulgent., in Reiche, 'Comment. Crit.' III. 321). The reading is apparently of Latin origin, either from the old Latin version or some author of repute, probably Tertullian. The aim is clearly "polemical, against heretics, who distinguished between the Man Jesus and the Divine Æon, Christ—or the Divine and Human Nature—and who as thus isolating the true Humanity, might be said to separate the Man Jesus from Christ as God, and as it were to "dissolve" Him. This became inserted in the text. In the great Latin Epistle of Leo the Great ('ad Flavianum,' x. cap. 5²), which was declared orthodox by the Council of Chalcedon (A.D. 451), translated into Greek, and elevated almost to the rank of a symbol, this passage is quoted more than once as solvit Jesum" (see Reiche in loc. and on 1 Tim. iii. 16).

9, 16. For ἀγάπη, see 1 Cor. xiii. and the Additional Note, Vol. III. 376. The present writer arrived independently at the same general conclusion, viz. that ἀγάπη alone is best rendered charity, with "defining context" love. His reasons are these. (1) No reverent student of the N. T. can doubt that the exclusion of ἔρως from its pages is not accidental. The sole Greek word for love, untainted by degrading associations and unconfined by special limitations, sprang up not indeed within the circle of Christianity literally speaking, but "within the sphere of revealed religion." (Archbp Trench.) (Ἀγάπη is derived from ἀγαπάω, which is connected with ἀγαμαι, wondering and reverential admiration. The word is not found outside the circle of sacred thought, and is unknown to classical Greek as a substantive—for the reading in Plut. 'Symp. Quæst.' VII. 6, 3, seems to be erroneous. It appears as the translation of נחמץ in the LXX., possibly from phonetic resemblance.) (See e.g. Eccles. ix. 1; Cant. viii. 6.) (2) The exclusion of ἔρως from the N. T. imposes upon the translator a corresponding carefulness. The old Latin version bears witness to this. (Augustine certainly refuses to recognize a distinction in the Latin Scriptures between amor or dilectio as bad, and caritas as good; 'De Civ. D.' xxv. 7; but the argument is incomplete as regards caritas at least.) Dilectio is too cold, amor too dubiously ethical for ἀγάπη, in spite of the "Deus amor est" of Bengel. Now the word caritas as compared with amor is predominately ethical. The distinction is excellently drawn by Quintilian. "Amor πάθος. caritas ἡθός." ('Instit. Orat.' Lib. VI. Cap. II. 21, Tom. II. 495, edit. Spalding.) The great rhetorician leaves no doubt as to his meaning. The word ἡθός denotes that which is less intense, more soothing, and is at once commended by its irresistible goodness. Caritas is love prescinded from selfishness and passion. The word seemed providentially designed for the sacred ἀγάπη. Thus charity passed into English. It is to be hoped that it will never be ultimately allowed to disappear from the English N. T. or from the Collect and Epistle for Quinquagesima Sunday. For (3) some moral and spiritual loss may ensue. It is often objected that charity is narrowed and vulgarized into the hard metallic form of alms—mere money or money's worth. But against this, or anything of the kind, there is a perpetual stream of protest from quarters which are not theological. (Thus in his address to the Medical Congress, August 3, 1881, Sir James Paget said:—"And to this we shall attain if we will remind ourselves that, as in every pursuit of knowledge there is the charm of novelty, and in every attainment of truth utility, so in every use of it there may be charity. I do not mean only the charity which is in hospitals or in the service of the poor, great as is the privilege of our calling in that we may be its chief ministers, but that wider charity which is practised in a constant sympathy and gentleness, in patience and self-devotion. And it is surely fair to hold that, as in every search for knowledge we may strengthen our intellectual power, so in every practical employment of it we may, if we will, improve our moral nature; we may obey the whole law of Christian love.") After a careful search, the present writer is unable to find in Shakespeare one single instance where the word "charity" is used in any other sense, than that of pure, noble, disinterested gentleness ('M. of Venice,' IV. 1; '2nd Part of Henry VI.' III. 1; 'Richard III.' I. 3; 'Henry VIII.' I. 2). Nay, in one passage, love itself is distinguished from charity as a part from the whole, or a fruit from the principle whence it springs. King Edward says,

² 'Epist.' xxviii. (al. xxiv.). See the Ep. with Notes in Prof. Bright's 'Sermons of S. Leo' 146—153.

"Brother, we have done deeds of charity, Made peace of enmity, fair love of hate."

Granting, however, the force of the objection, the people may be constantly reminded to correct and enlarge their conception of charity by 1 Cor. xiii. 3. But no amount of teaching, it is to be feared, can absolutely purify "love" for some, or spiritually elevate it for others of our race and language. Poetry, romance, history, common conversation, associations almost as wide and strong as human life, have fixed love in the region of passion. The writer has examined more than 300 passages in Shakespeare in which the word is found. It is only used in fifteen or twenty for the affection of brother, sister, parent, or for general benignity (then mostly qualified by an epithet, e.g. "kind," "fair," "comely," "unfeigned"), in all other cases it signifies the passion which has been glorified by chivalry, the theme of poets and novelists. For all these reasons, the present writer deeply regrets the disappearance of "charity" from the Revised Version of the N. T. (The rendering "of love" in 1 Peter v. 14 seems to him to be specially unadvisable.) When new ideas are projected into the realm of thought, new words necessarily come into existence. It has been remarked that the French Revolution at once added largely to the French dictionary. When God created a new thing upon the earth, and bestowed a new gift upon regenerate human hearts, His Word gave it a new name. Ordinary speech, even Greek speech, could not render the idea; φιλία, φιλανθρωπία, στοργή, ἔρως, were inadequate or worse. The very fact of 'charity' being a word out of the ordinary sphere gives it an advantage as a rendering of ἀγάπη.

[The derivation of the word seems to throw little light upon the question. However, by the kindness of a friend, deeply versed in comparative philology—the Dean of Clonfert—the writer is enabled to add the following interesting note. "There can be no doubt that Eng. love, Ang.-S. lufu, Goth. lubo, "are all the same root as Sans. lubb—cupere, "desiderare. The essential element of its "meaning is the tension of desire; but not "necessarily of concupiscence. On the con- "trary, in Goth. the same root is applied in "the substantive lubains to express hope; and "there is a kindred root laub which expresses "estimation, approval. Galaubs kas (vessel) "is Ulfilas's translation of εἰς τιμὴν σκεῦος in "Rom. ix. 21, and ga-laub-jan is Goth. for "glauben to believe, and us-laub-jan for er- "lauben to permit. No doubt also libet, lubet, "libido are kindred words, and λίπτομαι, λι- "παρής, λίψ expressing the tension of eager- "ness. Of the same family, but more remote, "is Goth. liban, Eng. live, expressing the "inner force of life. It is hard to find any "root which can be identified with amo, but "I think it appears from its uses and from "amicus and amoenus that it expresses not the "tension of desire but the relaxation of enjoy- "ment. That this is also the Grundbedeutung "of ἀγάπη is evident from the passages quoted "in Liddell and Scott under ἀγαπάω; but it "is as difficult to identify this with any other "root as it is for amo. Carus is precisely "dear and caritas dearness. There is little or "no desire in it, still less relaxation of enjoy- "ment, but rather the tension of prized pos- "session which becomes want in the absence "of possession. There is no other root to "which carus can be affiliated though the "Greek χρ is akin to its latter meaning, and in "it the tension or bond may be ethical, χρεία, "χρῆ. Sanskr. vr—desiderare, petere, optare, "eligere, is the same root as that of ἔρως."]]

CHAPTER V.

1 He that loveth God loveth his children, and keepeth his commandments: 3 which to the faithful are light, and not grievous. 9 Jesus is the Son of God, able to save us, 14 and to hear our prayers, which we make for ourselves, and for others.

WHOSOEVER believeth that Jesus is the Christ is born of God: and every one that loveth him that begat loveth him also that is begotten of him.

2 By this we know that we love the children of God, when we love God, and keep his commandments.

3 For this is the love of God, that we keep his commandments: and his commandments are not grievous.

CHAP. V. 1. him that begat] The aorist. him that is begotten] The perfect participle.

2. By this we know that we love the children of God, when we love God] St John's meaning is finely analysed by Augustine: "How is this? A little before he spoke of the Son of God, not of the sons of God. Christ alone was proposed to our contemplation, and it was said (v. 1)—then follows v. 2—therefore, he who loves the sons of God loves the Son of God; and he who loves the Son of God loves the sons of God; nor can any man love the Father unless he love the Son; and he who loves the Son loves the sons. What sons of God? The members of the Son of God. And by love he too becomes a member, and by love is knit and compacted into the body of Christ; and thus there will be one Christ loving Himself. (1 Cor. xii. 26, 27.) A little above St John said of brotherly love (1 John iv. 20), But if you love your brother, can you love him and not love Christ? How can this be, since you love the members of Christ? When then you love the members of Christ, you love Christ; when you love Christ, you love the Son of God. Love cannot be separated. Choose any one of these objects of love; the rest necessarily follow. You say, 'I love God the Father alone.' False! If you love Him, you love the Son also. But, you say, I love the Father and the Son; but this alone. False! For if you love the Head, you love the members; and if you love not the members you love not the Head. Let no man excuse himself from one love by another. That love is so compacted into one that it makes all the loves which hang from it one, and fuses them as a fire. Unless the flame of love be kindled, the fusion of many loves into one cannot be. When we love God, we know that we love the children of God." (St August. ut supra.)

SECTION IX. vv. 3 sqq.

3. In reading A. V., alter the punctuation so as to connect v. 4 directly with the close of v. 3. His commandments are not grievous, because all that is born of God overcometh the world. ("Turn to the two commandments Matt. xxii. 37, 39. The whole of this Epistle is full of these two commandments." St Aug.) In hearing that "we are to observe His commandments," one thought may well occur—"The commandments spoken of are those observed by Jesus, whose picture we see developed in the Sermon on the Mount. There we have a law of sanctity beside which all human morality is pale. The task is difficult, impossible." Nay, St John says the contrary. "They are not heavy." Such a declaration could only come from his own life and experience! (Cf. for the beginning of the verse the words of Raphael:

"Him whom to love is to obey, and keep His great command."

'Paradise Lost,' VIII. 634.)

Here is one proof that His commandments are not grievous—a proof co-extensive with the world-wide spiritual combat of God's children. "They are not grievous; for whatsoever is born of God overcometh the world."

4. whatsoever is born of God] The neuter substituted for the masculine is an advance upon it. It designates a mark of the new nature abstracted from incidental peculiarities—a characteristic of the entire body as an integral whole. From a different point of view the masculine (John vi. 40) is an advance upon the neuter (ibid. v. 39). In the first, our Lord promises Resurrection to those who are given to Him in the mass, and as a whole. In the second, he obviates the idea of a sort of pantheistic absorption, and individualizes the promise (cf. in vi. 37, the neuter immediately exchanged for the masculine).

sense—the faith, i.e. the Christian religion objectively as received by faith subjectively. This sense of the word is found in Acts vi. 7, xiv. 27; Rom. i. 5. Observe that the faith is spoken of, not merely as the means of victory, but as a victory in itself. There is something very noble in this deep, silent, unexcited triumph—our faith is a victory! [So Wordsworth addresses Duty—"Thou who art victory!" 'Ode to Duty.']

6. This is he that came by water and blood, even Jesus Christ; not with the water only, but with the water and with the blood] Let us (i) attempt to bring out the exact force of the words here, and (ii) pass on to grasp their meaning.

(i) The force of the words is—"This is He who came, conditioned (so to speak) by—with the intervention of (διά)—water and blood, not accompanied only by (ἐν) the water, but by the water and the blood." (See Additional Note at the end of the chapter.) (ii) A full examination of the meaning which is to be constructed out of these elements, and which must include the following verses, will occupy some space for its due development. The Epistle and Gospel (as we have so often seen) must be constantly read together. There is a perpetual reference in the former to the latter. "The most perplexing incident in the Gospel" (xix. 34) is followed up in "the most perplexing passage in the Epistle" (Bishop Lightfoot) (1 John v. 6). Now vv. 6, 7, 8, 9, 10 are pervaded by, and are unintelligible without, the consideration that St John's Gospel aims at being a Gospel of manifold witness to Jesus. (a) A witness of men to Christ, with the attesting cries wrung from their hearts. (i. 7—49, iii. 2, iv. 39, vi. 69, vii. 46, xii. 17, xx. 28.) The Gospel is a tissue woven out of many lines of human evidence. In v. 9, infra, "if we receive the witness of men," &c. the Apostle refers to his Gospel as that of human witness. (b) It is also the Gospel of Divine witness in various forms: (1) Scripture (v. 39—46), (2) His own (viii. 17, 18), (3) His Father's (viii. 18, xii. 28), (4) Miracles (v. 36). In all these ways it is a Gospel of witness, human and Divine. The very word studs almost every page, and occurs in the Gospel nearly as often as in the whole of the rest of the New Testament. Now, it has scarcely been sufficiently noticed by interpreters of 1 John v. 6—12 that these verses advert to this great characteristic of the Gospel. This is indicated by the otherwise unaccountable prolixity of iteration of the word ten times in five short verses. The Epistle points out (vv. 7, 8) that there is in the Gospel another series of witnesses, not obtrusively visible, not outwardly audible, yet whose shadow falls upon every page, whose voice may be heard by the attentive ear. Mysterious fact! they are three. And thus it is: St John records in his Gospel that "one of the soldiers with a spear pierced his side, and forthwith came thereout blood and water" (xix. 34). (This blood and water is the order of fact and history.) To this St John adverts (1 John v. 6) when he tells us "this is He who came...not accompanied only by the water but by the blood." (The water and blood is the ideal, mystical, sacramental, subjective order; the blood and water is the historical and objective order. The first, therefore, is appropriately adopted in the Epistle; the second in the Gospel.) To us, no doubt, this may seem strange. Yet let us pause and consider St John's point of view. If any one fact remains historically sure it is that Cerinthianism prevailed in Asia Minor, and that St John wrote in part to meet its advances. Now Cerinthus separated Christ, the Divine Æon, from Jesus, the good but mortal and finite man. The two, he said, met at the waters of Jordan, upon the day of the Baptism, when Christ united Himself to Jesus for a few years, to leave the man for ever. Before the Passion the Divine ideal Christ withdrew, the man Jesus suffered, while the impassible, immortal Christ was far away in Heaven. This St John utterly denies in v. 6. There is no such fortuitous juxtaposition of two beings. There is one Lord Jesus Christ—declared to be one, not only by His Baptism, the witness of water, but by His Passion, the witness of blood, not only in Jordan but on Calvary. Look at the pierced side, and we have a visible type and summary of this, not only the water but the blood! But, lying behind this, in deep and tender distance, there is assuredly something more than an allusion to a temporary controversy—something eternal as the Gospel. The historical order, as we have seen, is in the Gospel (xix. 34), the ideal and sacramental in the Epistle (v. 6). The water, the blood, the Spirit are three great factors in the Gospel: it is full of them. (The water, John iii. 5, cf. i. 26—33, ii. 9, iii. 23, iv. 13, v. 4, ix. 7. The blood, vi. 53, 54, 56, xix. 34. The Spirit, vii. 39, xiv. xv. xvi. xx. 22.) Now the water centres, so to speak, in Baptism (iii. 5), and the blood is symbolized, exhibited, applied, in Holy Communion (vi.); and the Spirit, by His Divine power, is perpetually making them effectual.

7 For there are three that bear record in heaven, the Father, the Word, and the Holy Ghost: and these three are one.

8 And there are three that bear witness in earth, the spirit, and the water, and the blood: and these three agree in one.

9 If we receive the witness of men, the witness of God is greater: for this is the witness of God which he hath testified of his Son.

Thus the water and the blood in the Gospel and in the Church, in the Book and in the Sacraments, are abiding witnesses of the Incarnate Lord. For, if all else were swept away, these would be His witnesses. Why all these millions, generation after generation, baptized with water? Why that cup, blessed in so many churches in all lands with the words "This is my Blood"? Round this the whole external order of the Ministry is drawn. And before these stands a third Witness, who is Divine. Not only Sacraments—all the marvels of Christianity; the onward progress of its powers; the new creation perpetually called from the dust of human life; its peaceful and glorious victories come from one source. It is the Spirit who calls forth in long succession preachers, missionaries, martyrs, reformers, healers, saints. The outward and inward in the Church are harmonious. Her master has given her an outward administration and an inward power. The water and the blood warn the Church not to spiritualize the material. The Spirit saves the Church from materializing the spiritual. See Additional Note at the end of the chapter.

[This interpretation would not exclude a reference to expiation and sanctification—to the sacrifice and cleansing, the altar and the laver (Exod. xxx. 18, 21, xl. 6), so wonderfully significant of the benefits of Christ's death. It is not inconsistent with the symbolical hint of the Divine and Human Natures of Jesus seen by so many ancient writers in the incident (John xix. 34), and constantly remembered, as they supposed, in the primitive usage of mixing water with wine in Holy Communion. It would include the quickening by the Spirit and the cleansing from sin—the ideas of the outpoured Spirit and of the sacrificed human life "which underlie the two sacraments" and St John's use of the terms "blood" and "water." See on St John xix. 34.

And the Spirit is that which is witnessing that the Spirit is the Truth] The self-attestation of the Spirit crowning and perfecting the outward and historical. On the Spirit as The Truth see Additional Note 3 John 3.

7. For three are they who are witnessing. Thus we have a Trinity of testimony, "the three genuine witnesses" (Bishop Lightfoot on 'Rev. of N. T.' p. 24). "This trine array of witnesses on earth is clearly supported, and has behind and above it the Trinity which is heavenly, archetypal, fundamental, immortal" (Bengel). See Additional Note at the end of the chapter.

The numerical principle in human witness, and the notion of God as witness, were impressed upon St John from the lips of Christ (Gospel viii. 17, 18; cf. 3 John 12). While he writes here vv. 7, 8, his eye is fixed upon Three personal witnesses. Observe the masculine partic., v. 7 (τρεῖς εἰσιν οἱ μαρτυροῦντες), and then, though he mentions three subjects markedly in the neuter, with the thrice-repeated neuter article (v. 8)—and though his style generally has a tendency to prefer the neuter—as if the unexpressed Personal witnesses who occupied his thought overshadowed the page, overpowered his language, and could not be put aside—the repeated masculine after the three neuters (οἱ τρεῖς). The 'Schol. apud Matth.,' quoted by Tischend., observes—"he speaks of these three in the masculine, because these are symbols of the Trinity." It may be that after the express mention of the Spirit first (in consequence of the last words of the previous clause), the Father who regenerates is symbolized by the water (Titus iii. 5; 1 Peter i. 3; James i. 17, 18), and the Son who redeems by the blood.

and these three agree in one] (οἱ τρεῖς εἰς τὸ ἓν εἰσιν) co-operate to one end,—“to the subject of the leading clause, that Jesus is Christ” (Düsterd); perhaps “to overcoming the world” (v. 5). Bishop Wordsworth translates—"these three" (masc.) "are (joined) into the one (the one Substance, neuter)," and compares St John x. 30 and xvii. 11, 22, in which the unity of the Persons is described by the neuter. There is high ancient authority for this interpretation. But a theological difficulty is suggested by Dr Burton, 'Bampton Lectures,' Note 85, p. 526.

9. If we receive the witness of men] The form of the expression implies that we do assuredly receive human witness. We receive it naturally as men, not merely supernaturally as Christians—necessarily and as matter of course. This is at once an appeal to the principle of rational, historical common-sense, and to the Gospel which that principle underlies (see note, v. 6, and Additional Note at end of the chapter).

10, 11. Read these verses with the central clause in parenthesis, thus: He that believeth on the Son of God hath the witness in him (or in Him). (He that believeth not God hath made

10 He that believeth on the Son of God hath the witness in himself: he that believeth not God hath made him a liar; because he believeth not the record that God gave of his Son.

11 And this is the record, that God hath given to us eternal life, and this life is in his Son.

12 He that hath the Son hath life; and he that hath not the Son of God hath not life.

13 These things have I written unto you that believe on the name him a liar; because he hath not believed the witness that God hath witnessed of his Son.) And this is the witness, that God gave to us eternal life, and this life is in his Son.

10. the witness in him, i.e. in himself] [Not probably Him, with reference to the Son of God as "the living theology of Christians," the sphere in which the witness exists.] From u. 6, we have had a summary of the Gospel as a Gospel of witness; the witness of the Spirit, of the water, of the blood, of men, of God. Precisely the subjective addition is now made which is natural. [The reading ἐν ἑαυτῷ found in N and received by Lachm. is probably not correct. But αὐτός sometimes has a reflexive force. The Vulg. translates in semetipso.] All the objective witness is crowned and perfected when it passes inwardly into the soul, into the heart and life—when the believer on the Son of God hath the witness in himself. The evidential importance of the inner witness is well stated by Baxter. "I am now much more apprehensive than heretofore of the necessity of well grounding men in their religion, and especially of the witness of the indwelling Spirit; for I more sensibly perceive that the Spirit is the great witness of Christ and Christianity to the world. And though the folly of fanatics tempted me long to overlook the strength of this testimony of the Spirit, while they placed it in a certain internal affection or enthusiastic inspiration, yet now I see that the Holy Ghost in another manner is the witness of Christ and his agent in the world. The Spirit in the Prophets was his first witness; and the Spirit by miracles was the second; and the Spirit by renovation and sanctification, illumination and consolation, assimilating the soul to Christ and heaven, is the continued witness to all true believers. And therefore ungodly persons have a great disadvantage in their resisting temptations to unbelief." (Richard Baxter, History of his own Life and Times in Wordsworth's 'Ecclesiastical Biography,' Vol. v. p. 568.) him] This is not logically a proof to others; but it is the proof of proofs to ourselves. (See Rom. viii. 16.) "The first question asked of Laud was, what was the comfortableness saying which a dying man could have in his mouth; to which he meekly made answer, cupio dissolvi et esse cum Christo. Being asked again what was the fittest speech a man could use to express his confidence and assurance, he answered with the same spirit of meekness, that such assurance was to be found within, and that no words were able to express it rightly." 'Life of Laud,' by P. Heylin. Part II. Lib. v. 55. Thus once more the Epistle appears as the subjective completion of the whole Gospel of St John.

he that believeth not God] One uncial only (A) here reads, that believeth not the Son. This reading is not only weak in external support. For St John is not speaking of faith in the Son—but of God's witness to His Son; to which witness of God Himself he who gives not credence is guilty of impiety, because in disbelieving it he makes God a liar. (Reiche, 'Comment. Crit.')

he that believeth not God hath made him a liar; because he is not a believer in the witness that God gave] There is a double refinement of distinction in these words, which it is difficult to indicate in translation. (1) "He that believeth not God...because he believeth not" (ὁ μὴ πιστεύων τῷ Θεῷ...ὅτι οὐ πιστεύκειν). In the last words the objective negative makes it pass from supposition to fact. The supposed case of the unbeliever has passed into reality, and St John represents to himself an actual unbeliever. (2) Further, the first "he that believeth not God," rather signifies—"not taking Him at His word," "not putting faith in His veracity"—the second, "believeth not the witness as Divine." ["πιστ. εἰς τινα, i.e. honor Deo soli adhibendus, ...sed πιστεύειν τινί, cum sit universalis, aliquando Deo, aliquando hominibus convenit" (Lampe). This gives great force to John v. 38. "If they did not believe Him, how much less could they believe in Him?" It is unbelief, not only denying His Divinity, but insulting His veracity. The translation of the same word in A.V. by witness and record (vv. 10, 11) is unfortunate.

12. He that hath the Son hath the life] He that hath not the Son hath not that life.

13. These things have I written unto you that ye may know that ye have eternal life—ye believers in the name of the Son of God!

There is great variety of reading here. But the readings may be divided into two classes, the contracted and uncontracted, with many slight shades of variation. The uncontracted of the Son of God; that ye may know that ye have eternal life, and that ye may believe on the name of the Son of God.

1 Or, concerning him.

14 And this is the confidence that we have in him, that, if we ask any thing according to his will, he heareth us:

15 And if we know that he hear us, whatsoever we ask, we know that we have the petitions that we desired of him.

may be represented by A.V.—the contracted by Tisch. (ταῦτα ἔγραψα ὑμῖν ἵνα εἰδῆτε ὅτι ζωὴν ἔχετε αἰώνιον, οἱ πιστεύοντες εἰς τὸ ὄνομα τοῦ υἱοῦ τοῦ θεοῦ).

This reading is found in A, B, K, Cod. Amiat. (so the very old Coptic version word for word), and is approved by Lachm., Lücke, Huther, and many others. But the longer reading is less likely to have been introduced into the text, and copyists might think that the passage admitted of easy and judicious abbreviation. According to the T. R. and the translation of it in the A. V., the design of the epistle was twofold: (1) That, though believers, they should know and be warned again that eternal salvation can only be by faith in Christ. (2) That they should persevere in the same faith—that believing they should continue to believe. But this is the very hinge on which the Epistle turns. The repetition of the same words—"believe on the name of the Son of God"—may not find favour in the schools of human rhetoric; but it is quite in the style of St John, who loves to engrave his weightiest sentiments upon the minds and hearts of his readers by a repetition of words, or even of phrases.

These things have I written] In letters, ἔγραψα is used for γράφω, as scripsi in Latin, in reference to the epistle which is being written. But we should be careful not to set down the former in all cases as an epistolary aor. Sometimes it points to a previous epistle (3 John v. 9). Sometimes it alludes to an epistle already concluded, or to a portion already finished of the letter in hand (1 John ii. 21—26, v. 13). Winer, 'Gramm. N. T. D.' Part III. § xl. p. 294. (Düsterd., Ebrard, Bengel, however, consider these words as a formal conclusion of the whole Epistle.) believe in, &c.] The construction here denotes to give honour to, to trust in, as Divine; for the more usual expression employed to signify belief in man as well as faith in God, see above, v. 10.

believe in the name] "Name denotes the sum of a personality. Wahl interprets the Name of Jesus as Jesus, with all the ideas and memories connected with His Name." (Tholuck, 'Gospel of St John,' p. 335.) The name in the absolute sense, in the eye of God, is that by which the true essence of the being named is characterized, and not only a connotative mark. This verse is very important, as unequivocally teaching that the main object of this Epistle is practical and spiritual, not polemical.

14. And the confidence that we have towards him consists in this, that] (Cf. Gospel, iii. 11, xvii. 3, &c.), i.e. "we have full confidence that...."

he heareth us] Not exactly equivalent to "fulfil our petitions" (that is first mentioned, v. 15), but as in St John's Gospel for ἐξακούει (ix. 31, xi. 41, 42).

15. if we know] A peculiar form, expressing a very strong confirmation (ἐάν with perfect indic., the only instance in the New Testament)—"If we know, as we certainly do."

we know that we have] In the pregnant Johannic sense. It is almost parallel to the way in which the word is applied to future rewards and punishments to indicate their certainty (Matt. v. 46; Mark iii. 29; John iii. 15; Hebrews x. 35; see Bretschn. s. v. ἔχω). Note in this passage two conditions of acceptable prayer—confidence, and harmony with God's will.

the desires that we have desired from Him] St John's language here is strikingly like 1 S. i. 17, LXX.

16, 17. Under the general head of prayer, a special case requires to be considered. This difficult passage may be treated most satisfactorily by a continuous paraphrase of vv. 12—21.

"All the things contained in this Epistle I have written for two great ends to you who believe on the name of the Son of God—that ye may know that ye have already eternal life, and that ye may continue to believe on that name.

"Continuing in this knowledge and belief we have confidence towards Him consisting in this—that if we ask aught according to His will He heareth us. And if we know—as we do—that He heareth us whatsoever we so ask, we know that we have the petition which we ask from Him.

"Here is a case to be considered however. If any man see his brother sinning sin we will suppose it to be not to death, he shall ask, and God shall give him life, i.e. in the case of those whom we suppose not to sin unto death. There is sin to death. I do not say that he shall inquire concerning that. All unrighteousness is sin, and there is sin which as a matter of fact is not unto death.

"But be comforted. We know that every one who having been born of God continues in that blessed state is not an habitual sinner; but the true everlasting Son of God keepeth

16 If any man see his brother sin a sin which is not unto death, he shall ask, and he shall give him life for them that sin not unto death. There is a sin unto death : I do not say that he shall pray for it.

17 All unrighteousness is sin : and there is a sin not unto death.

him, and that wicked one toucheth him not. Yea, we know that we are of God, and the world lieth wholly in the power of the wicked one. Not so with us. We know further that the Son of God is present, and hath given us an understanding to know the one True God. And in His Son Jesus Christ [this is the true God and eternal life] we are in the True God.

"Children! who are in the one true God and in the true God His Son, guard yourselves by one decisive act of self-defence from the idols."

16. There is sin unto death] As to this, four tests are positively discoverable in the text itself. (a) It does not seem to be any single sin, but sin of a particular kind (there is sin). (β) From the emphatic way in which brother is used, it could only occur among Christians, in the full communion of the Church. (γ) It would seem to be such sin as was, in some sense, perceptible and visible—"if any man see." (δ) According to the Johannic sense of the word, the death spoken of cannot be bodily death from the judgment of God; or the mere spiritual losses—however grave and real—of a deserved excommunication. It must mean moral and spiritual death (1 John iii. 14), deprivation of the life (supra, v. 12). It might seem as if its lineaments were traced in the previous part of the Epistle. By heresy, by unbelief, by obstinate wordliness, by want of love issuing in a Cainlike hatred, we may reverse the blessed transition "from death unto life" (1 John iii. 14), and pass from "life to death," i.e. to a state of spiritual (not yet necessarily eternal) death. The completion of this state is the passing out from the light of Christ and of His Church into darkness—possibly into apostasy and idolatry, or into atheism. This explanation seems to meet the whole context from v. 16 on. St John does not state whether such a sinner's case is absolutely hopeless, whether he is definitively incapable of conversion. But he will not desire Christians to intercede for those who, as far as in them lies, have voluntarily dipped the roots of their souls in poison, and sought to destroy their Christian life. The reference is here, as so often, to the Gospel of St John. Even among Christians there was the possibility of incurring the doom of which Jesus warned the unbelieving Jews—"Ye shall die in your sin...in your sins" (John viii. 21—24). See Additional Note at the end of the chapter.

He shall give to him (αὐτῷ) life, for them that sin not unto death (τοῖς ἀμαρτάνουσιν μὴ πρὸς θάνατον). These words may be explained in two ways. (1) Apposition does not necessarily extend to gender and number. A plural in appos. may refer to a collective singular (1 Cor. i. 2; cf. 1 K. xii 10, LXX.). "He shall give life to him, i.e. to those sinning, in a way which may be conceived of as not unto death." (2) "To him" may, more probably, refer to the person asking. "God shall give to him who asks in faithful prayer life for those (dativ. comm.) not sinning unto death."

There is sin unto death. I say not concerning that, that he shall inquire.

I say not. "I say not that he (i.e. the Christian brother) shall pray for it. Which may seem cautiously set. Not that he forbids, but only doth not bid, to pray for them, or did not promise good success to prayer offered for such an one." (Hammond.) Cf. the prohibition: "Pray not thou for this people, neither lift up cry nor prayer for them, neither make intercession to Me" (Jer. vii. 16). ("It is not for any one to heal this sin but Christ only.") "I do not command him to pray." (Augustine, in loc.; cf. however 'Retract.' 1. 19.) A Lap. paraphrases well: "I have said above 'that, if we ask anything according to His will He heareth us...that we know that we have the petitions that we desired of Him' (vv. 14, 15). Yet I except one case, that of 'sin unto death,' i.e. if a brother have, to thy knowledge, sinned not unto death, pray for him, and I am full sure that this will be heard. But, if it be sin unto death, I must not, I cannot, engage. Yet I do not absolutely forbid intercessory prayer. Pray if thou wilt, but be not sure that thou wilt be heard."

Observe "sin not unto death" (v. 16), and again (v. 17). "In the former clause μὴ is used as suitable to a subjective observation, dependent upon if he see. In the latter clause, οὐ occurs intentionally, since an objectively valid principle is expressed, a dogmatically real idea is established" (Winer).

Inquire] This word (ἐρωτήσῃ) stands with marked emphasis at the close of the sentence, and is distinguished from ask (αἰτῆσαι) at its beginning. See on John xvi. 23, and Archbp Trench, 'Syn. N. T.' xl.

18, 19. The Apostle marks by a threefold we know three great general principles of the Epistle.

(a) We are conscious that he who having been born of God continues in that blessed state, continues not in sin, kept as he is by the Son of God. (v. 18.)

(b) We are conscious of a new nature

18 We know that whosoever is born of God sinneth not; but he that is begotten of God keepeth himself, and that wicked one toucheth him not.

19 And we know that we are of God, and the whole world lieth in wickedness.

20 And we know that the Son of and of lofty privileges which come from God, as contrasted with the world's entire devotion to the evil one. (v. 19.)

(c) We are conscious of the presence of the Son of God, and of the faculty of knowing God given by Him. (v. 20.)

The Epistle is pervaded by three relations—(a) to holiness, (b) to the world, (c) to the Person of Christ. See for (a) i. 6, ii. 3, 13, 20, 27, iii. 3; for (b) ii. 8, 15 sqq., iii. 13; (c) ii. 20—22.

18. We know (οἶδαμεν)] A rare form elsewhere. The spirit of St John was one with that of his readers. Not only he, but the Church; not only an Apostle, but all Christendom. His own personal conviction enlarges, as it were, into that of the Church.

The idea in the latter part of this verse is exactly opposite to that which is derived from A. V. It is not that "he that is born of God keepeth himself;" but that "the Begotten of God (ὁ γεννηθεὶς ἐκ τοῦ Θεοῦ), i.e. Jesus, keepeth him." The perf. not the aor. (see beginning of this v.) is used by St John for the human child of God. See for the idea—"He that is of God" (ὁ ὢν παρὰ τοῦ Θεοῦ), John vi. 46, where a hasty reader thinks of the privilege of every true Christian, not of the sole dignity of the everlasting Son of the Father. The expression used by Chrysostom in commenting upon the latter passage throws light upon the verse before us—"what this essence is no one knoweth, save only He that was Begotten of Him" (ὁ γεννηθεὶς ἐξ αὐτοῦ). S. Joann. Chrysost. 'In Joann. Homil.' xv. (Tom. VIII. 99, edit. Migne.) We have here the statement of the Son of God (John xvii. 12) generalized as a principle of the Christian life. Besides this, in the Gospel the Father is prayed by Christ to "keep" Christians (xvii. 14, 15). Indeed, it may almost be said that neither in St John's writings, nor anywhere else in the New Testament, are Christians spoken of as absolutely and universally "keeping themselves." For 1 Tim. v. 22; James i. 27; Jude v. 21, refer to "keeping themselves" in some special department of Christian duty or life.

toucheth him not] (prob. an allusion to touch not Mine anointed, 1 Chro. xvi. 22, LXX.). The promise implied in this is fulfilled in him who having been born of God continues in that condition.

19. We know that we are from God, and the world lieth wholly.

Lieth wholly (ὁ κόσμος ὅλος ἐν τ. π. κεῖται). Wholly, with emphasis, like Milton's—

"where armies whole have sunk" (cf. "Thou wast wholly born," John ix. 34).

lieth wholly in the evil one. ("Mundus totus in Maligno" (not in malo) "positus est." Vulg.) The meaning here appears to be determined by the evil one of v. 18, and cannot therefore have any weight (additional to v. 18) in justifying the translation ("deliver us from the evil one," Matt. vi. 13). The image may be taken from a child on a parent's lap. Note the advance from toucheth in last verse to lieth wholly in this.

We know that we are from God. "In an age when the purifying influences of the Spirit had no operation beyond the walls of the Church—and when, moreover, within those limits the Gospel was exerting its fullest influence—Christians, conscious as they were of both hopes and virtues to which none but themselves could pretend, were liable to no embarrassment (whatever grief) in taking up the Apostle's profession, we know that we are of God. While the Church and the world are in any such relative position, each exhibits its proper internal quality in the most conspicuous manner. Purity belongs to one, shameless confusion to the other. The last living Apostle in the age of Trajan, he looked abroad upon the Roman world, and must, inspiration apart, boldly decide between the friends and foes of his Master" (L. Taylor, 'Saturday Evenings,' pp. 59, 60).

20. is here] (ἦκει) "to have come and be here" (Winer, p. 290). Cf. Ps. xl. 7, ἦκω (ἦκω, LXX.), the very motto and Ich dien of the Son of God in N. T. "Venio quasi symbolum Domini fuit." (Bengel on Hebrews x. 7. See passages in 'Bampton Lectures for 1876,' p. 245, note 1, 2nd edition.)

and hath given us an understanding] (διανοίαν) that we may know Him that is true. An understanding, a faculty, a new sense. "We have five senses by which the visible world comes before us. Faith is a new sense, a new eye, by which the invisible world comes before us" (Tholuck).

that we may know] Knowledge only in the deeper sense of the word. When it treats of the relations of two persons, it designates the "perfect intuition which each has of the moral being of the other" (Godet, 'Sur l'Év. de S. Jean,' II. 542).

him that is true] Or, the Very God (τ. ἀληθινὸν θεόν). Is this the true reading? It is supported by A among uncial MSS., and a God is come, and hath given us an understanding, that we may know him that is true, and we are in him that is true, even in his Son Jesus Christ.

This is the true God, and eternal life.

21 Little children, keep yourselves from idols. Amen.

preponderance of versions and Greek Fathers. (See especially Athan. 'Orat. III. c. Arian.' 19.) It might indeed have been inserted by copyists for perspicuity, but it would not so constantly have appeared in quotations unless justified by ancient MSS. (cf. also John xvii. 3; 1 Thess. i. 9).

And in His Son, Jesus Christ [this is the Very God and Eternal Life], we are in the Very (sc. God).

Waterland says, "Admitting this reading it confirms this view: 'We are in the true God, viz. the Father, by being in His Son, because that Son is the True God.' This is very expressive and significant, intimating that there is none so certain way of knowing the true God as by a teacher who is true God: nor any other way of being reconciled to God but by being united to one who is God;—that the Son of God alone can be able to unite us to the true God, and that because He Himself is true God: who by being Incarnate could join Divine and human natures, God and man, in one." (Cf. Irenæus: "No man can know God, unless God has taught him—that is to say, that without God, God cannot be known." Quoted by Waterland. Moyer, Lecture VI.)

"Allowing that a pronoun may sometimes refer to a remote antecedent, yet it is not so usual, nor so natural, neither should it be presumed without manifest necessity" (ibid.).

eternal life] Eternal life is a title of Jesus (supra, i. 2). "He began his Gospel with observing that the Father is God, and the Son God also; so he ended his Epistle teaching us to believe in the Father as True God, and in the Son as true God too."

the Very God] The Very, not the true. He who alone is really God, as distinguished from all idols. It seems most desirable to distinguish, when possible, in translation between ἀληθής and ἀληθινός. The latter, as applied to God, denotes the Being who alone is worthy to be so called, because He alone realizes the idea expressed by God. As opposed to idols, the one word Very implies all that is expressed in 1 Cor. viii. 4, 5, 6. This truly Johannic word is found thirteen times in the Gospel and First Epistle of St John, ten times in the Apocalypse—only in six other places of the New Testament. "The Son, according to John, is not simply God, but Very God." (St Athanas. 'Orat. IV. c. Arian.' 26, p. 648, edit. Thilo.)

21. Children! guard yourselves from the idols. Guard yourselves—the aor. (φυλά-

στε) as if by one decided act. Do so—and have done with it (see Bp Andrewes, 'Anglo-Cath. Lib.' I. p. 430; quoted by Donaldson, 'Greek Grammar,' 413). (Cf. the present imperative in "keep fleeing from idolatry." 1 Cor. x. 14.) The present imperative rather denotes "measured and dispassionate" moral precept; the imperat. aor. is emotional and stringent (Winer, 'Gr. N. T. Diction.' Part III. § xliii. 329, 330.) The word which we render guard occurs only in this place in St John's Epistles, and three times in his Gospel (xii. 25, 47, xvii. 12). It is distinguished from the other word rendered keep in the A.V. (τηρεῖν) as the outward guard of a gate or bulwark, from the inward principle of watchful observation. "Guard yourself by the bulwark of the Church—you have a strong city." (Ps. xxxi. 21; Isaiah xxvi. 1.) The idols (ἀπὸ τῶν εἰδωλῶν). These words must have had great emphasis in Ephesus; see Introd.

Two important inferences from this passage should not be overlooked. (1) The horror of idols, indicated by the eloquent shudder with which the Epistle closes, is a characteristic which its writer possesses in common with the author of the Revelation. (Apoc. ix. 20, xxi. 8, xxii. 15.) Cf. also for the idols, note on 1 Thess. i. 9. (2) To St John is often attributed an intentional and exaggerated development of the glory of our Lord. If it were so, he took part in a successful conspiracy to give the honour due to God to one whom in his heart he believed to be a created being. But the instinctive fear and loathing of idolatry, manifested by the emphatic close of the First Epistle, supplies a moral contradiction to this supposition. One curious fact may perhaps be noted as a possible effect of St John's teaching. It has been mentioned as singular that no example of a heathen temple, converted into a Christian church, has been found in Asia Minor, anywhere on or near the track of the earliest line of the progress of Christianity. ('Byzantine Architecture; illustrated by Examples of Edifices erected in the East during the Earliest Ages of Christianity, with Historical and Archaeological Descriptions.' By Charles Texier, Member of the Institute of France, and R. Popplewell Pullan, Esq., F.R.I.B.A.)—It may be added that both the exhortation here, and the abstinence from direct use of the Old Testament throughout the Epistle, distinctly shew that St John was primarily addressing Gentile Christians. (The references in iii. 8—12 are to very elementary facts of Bible history.)

ADDITIONAL NOTES on CHAP. V. 6, 7, 8, 9, 16.

I.

6. The view of this difficult passage given in the text is the result of anxious and prolonged consideration. The writer feels sure that he has arrived at his conclusion without prejudice at least, as he commenced his special study of the verse with a leaning to a different interpretation. There are some remarks which he is desirous to add. (a) It may be objected to the sacramental interpretation of the blood at least that the Holy Communion is in Scripture spoken of rather in connection with the sacred symbol of the Body than of the Blood of Christ. It should not be forgotten, however, that there are two passages in which the two sacraments are summarily referred to, in each of which the Holy Communion is described not by the bread but by the other element which stands for the Blood of Christ. (Matt. xx. 22, 23; 1 Cor. xii. 13. For the double sacramental reference of the second text, see Waterland's powerful argument, 'Works,' IV. 669 sqq. Cp. also the language of Ignatius, ἐν ποτήριον εἰς ἔνωσιν τοῦ αἵματος αὐτοῦ. 'Ad Philad.' IV.) (b) The view taken in the Commentary has been dear to many of the greatest divines of the Church of England. ["Behold the Fountain that is set open for sin and for uncleanness; a fountain not of water only, but of blood too! O Saviour, by that water we are washed, by that blood we are redeemed. Those two sacraments, which Thou didst institute alive, flow also from Thee dead; the water of baptism, which is the laver of regeneration; the blood of the New Testament shed for remission of sins; and these together with the Spirit that gives life to them both are the three witnesses on earth whose attestation cannot fail us." (Bishop Hall, 'Contemplations,' Book IV. Contemp. XXXII.) "I stand upon the number two, because they are put together (1 Cor. x. 3, xii. 13), or learn it from St John. Christ came not by water alone, but by water and blood. And there are three that bear witness; the Spirit that is the ministry of the Gospel; the water, that is baptism, and the blood, that is the Lord's Supper." (Bishop Taylor, 'Christian Consolation.' Of Sacraments. Chapter V. Works I. xlv. Bohn's edition.)

"That they will pierce my side I full well know, That as sin came so sacraments might flow."
George Herbert, 'The Sacrifice.'

The words of the prayer in our Baptismal Service, by referring the water from the pierced side to Baptism, would seem to imply the application to the other sacrament also: "Who for the forgiveness of our sins didst shed out of Thy most precious side both water and blood, and didst command Thy disciples that they should go and teach all nations, baptizing them...Sanctify this water to the mystical washing away of sin," &c. (This form is taken from ancient Liturgies. See Palmer, 'Orig. Liturg.' II. 187.) It may be added that St John's view of the sacramental life as twofold and twofold only exactly corresponds with St Paul's. 1 Cor. x. 1—4.

II.

Οὗτος ἐστὶν ὁ ἐλθὼν δι' ὕδατος καὶ αἵματος, 'I. X. With verbs such as εἶναι, γίνεσθαι, ἔρχεσθαι, and the like, διά expresses the state or condition in which the person is, comes, &c. (cf. Rom. ii. 27; 1 Cor. xvi. 3; 2 Cor. ii. 4; Ephes. vi. 18, &c.)—"This is He who came under the conditions, as it were, of water and blood." See instances from classical writers, the LXX. and Josephus in Bretschn. 'Lex. Man.' p. 93.

Οὐκ ἐν τῷ ὕδατι μόνον, ἀλλ' ἐν τῷ ὕδατι καὶ ἐν τῷ αἵματι. 'Εν with verbs of coming, going, &c., denotes accompanied by, "with them" (see Num. xx. 20, καὶ ἐξῆλθεν εἰς συνάντησιν αὐτῷ ἐν ὄχλῳ βαρεῖ, καὶ ἐν χειρὶ ἰσχυρῇ, LXX.), Luke xiv. 31; Rom. xv. 19; 1 Cor. iv. 21; 2 Thess. ii. 9; Heb. ix. 25. [Εν ad eam conjunctionem quæ est in comitatu, ubi convenit cum σύν vel μετά, quo sensu plerumque legitur cum verbis veniendi, eundi et similibus, ut propriè sit in medio aliquorum, i.e. cum iis in comitatu eorum, et maximè, quamquam non semper, dicatur de pluribus." Bretschn. 'Lex. Man.' p. 138. Thus Rom. xv. 29, ἐν πληρώματι εὐλ. ἐλεύσομαι, "I will so come, as to bring with me fulness of blessing." Heb. ix. 25, ὁ ἀρχιερεὺς εἰσέρχεται ἐν αἵματι, "the High Priest enters, accompanied by, bringing with him, blood." The whole manifestation of Jesus was, so to speak, under the condition of water and blood. He came bringing with Him, accompanied by, not the water only, but the water and the blood.

[The supposed polemical allusion to the disciples of the Baptist in the words "not by water only," would seem to have arisen from a failure in perceiving St John's motive in the prominence which he gives to the Baptist. The whole Gospel contains a series of witnesses, of whom the Baptist is the first and not the least important (i. 7, v. 36). Moreover, writing, as St John did, after the other Evangelists, partly to supply and fill up, he naturally added some particulars about the precursor (Tischend. 'Præf. Synop. Evang.' p. xxiv., and Eusebius, 'Hist. E.' there quoted). M. Renan finds this polemical allusion in the text, which he interweaves into his theory with his usual adroitness. "The school of the Baptist did not expire with its founder. Many years after the death of the two Masters, the Baptism of John was still administered. Later (about A.D. 80) the Bap- tist's sect was in opposition to Christianity, especially in Asia Minor. The Apostle appears to combat it indirectly (Gospel i. 26, 33, iv. 2; 1 John v. 6; cf. Acts xix. 1—4). One of the Sibylline poems seems to come from the school. As to the sects of Heme-robaptists, Baptists, Elchasaïtes who filled Syria, Palestine, and Babylon in the second century, and of whom fragments remain to our own day in the Mendaïtes, or so-called Christians of St John, it may not be sure that they have the same origin with the movement of John Baptist, or that they are of authentic descent from John. His own true and peculiar school, half fused into Christianity, fell into the position of a petty Christian heresy and passed into obscurity." ('Vie de Jésus,' pp. 203, 204.) Niemeyer, 'de Docetis,' discusses the question whether the "School of the Baptist" is referred to here and in the Gospel (i. 7, 8, 15—20, 23, 26—29, 34, iii. 27—36, v. 36, x. 4). He quotes some fragments brought to light by Norberg upon the disciples of John, or Sabians¹. In this sect some critics think they can detect a different school of Johannites from those who supposed John to be Messiah—a type of doctrine which indeed asserted that Messiahship belonged neither to our Lord nor to John, but (as in the Gnostic and Doketic speculations) to a heavenly nature only apparently endowed with a human body. But the gravest doubt rests upon the whole interpretation, and the question cannot be answered—when and how did those dogmas and terms, to which St John is supposed to refer polemically in his Gospel and in 1 John v. 6, pass over to the Sabians? On the whole, the existence of a "School of the Baptist," not only behind the full Pentecostal development of Christianity but in fierce dogmatic opposition to it, seems extremely uncertain. And the general object of St John's Gospel, together with the well-ascertained heretical tenets of the Cerinthians—not to mention the purpose of the writer of the Epistle to refer constantly to the Gospel—supply us with a sufficient key to the text.]

The following remarks from the pen of the Rev. Samuel Haughton, M.D. of the University of Dublin, add to the stores of information in the notes on St John's Gospel, and to Dr Stroud's often-quoted discussion on 'The Physical Cause of the Death of Christ.' They are inserted here by the kind permission of the great physiologist by whom they were written (see also 'Church Quarterly Review,' Jan. 1880):—

Ἦλθον οὖν οἱ στρατιῶται καὶ τοῦ μὲν πρώτου κατέαξαν τὰ σκέλη, καὶ τοῦ ἄλλου τοῦ σταυρωθέντος αὐτῷ· ἐπὶ δὲ τὸν Ἰησοῦν ἐλθόντες, ὡς εἶδον αὐτὸν ἤδη τεθνηκότα, οὐ κατέαξαν αὐτοῦ τὰ σκέλη· ἀλλ' εἰς τῶν στρατιωτῶν λόγχῃ αὐτοῦ τὴν πλευρὰν ἔνυξε, καὶ εὐθὺς ἐξῆλθεν αἷμα καὶ ὕδωρ· καὶ ὁ ἑωρακὼς μεμαρτύρηκε, καὶ ἀληθινὴ αὐτοῦ ἐστὶν ἡ μαρτυρία· κακεῖνος οἶδεν ὅτι ἀληθὴ λέγει, ἵνα καὶ ὑμεῖς πιστεύσητε.—John xix. 32—35.

Οὗτός ἐστιν ὁ ἐλθὼν δι' ὕδατος καὶ αἵματος, Ἰησοῦς ὁ χριστός, οὐκ ἐν τῷ ὕδατι μόνον, ἀλλ' ἐν τῷ ὕδατι καὶ ἐν τῷ αἵματι.—1 John v. 6.

"When the soldier pierced with his spear the side of Christ, He was already dead; and the flow of blood and water that followed was either a natural phenomenon explicable by natural causes or it was a miracle. That St John thought it, if not to be miraculous, at least to be unusual, appears plainly from the comment he makes upon it, and from the emphatic manner in which he solemnly declares his accuracy in narrating it.

"Repeated observations and experiments made upon men and animals have led me to the following results—

"When the left side is freely pierced after death by a large knife, comparable in size with a Roman spear, three distinct cases may be noted:

"1st. No flow of any kind follows the wound, except a slight trickling of blood.

"2nd. A copious flow of blood only follows the wound

"3rd. A flow of water only, succeeded by a few drops of blood, follows the wound.

"Of these three cases, the first is that which usually occurs; the second is found in cases of death by drowning and by strychnia, and may be demonstrated by destroying an animal with that poison, and it can be proved to be the natural case of a crucified person; and the third is found in cases of death from pleurisy, pericarditis, and rupture of the heart. With the foregoing cases most anatomists who have devoted their attention to this subject are familiar; but the two following cases, although readily explicable on physiological principles, are not recorded in the books (except by St John). Nor have I been fortunate enough to meet with them.

"4th. A copious flow of water, succeeded by a copious flow of blood, follows the wound.

"5th. A copious flow of blood, succeeded by a copious flow of water, follows the wound.

"Assuming for the present, what I shall shortly prove, that death by crucifixion causes a condition of blood in the lungs similar to that produced by drowning and strychnia, the fourth case would occur in a crucified person who had previously to crucifixion suffered from pleuritic effusion; and the fifth case would occur in a crucified person, who had died upon the cross from rupture of the heart. The history of the days preceding our Lord's crucifixion effectually excludes the supposition of pleurisy, which is also out of the question if blood first and water afterwards followed the wound. There remains, therefore, no supposition possible to explain the recorded phenomenon except the combination of the crucifixion and rupture of the heart.

"That rupture of the heart was the cause of the death of Christ is ably maintained by Dr William Stroud¹; and that rupture of the heart actually occurred I firmly believe; but at the same time I do not think that mere rupture of the heart without crucifixion can account for the flow of blood as well as water. The order of the phenomenon was the following: the spear of the soldier pierced in succession the pleura, the lung, and the pericardium. From the pleural cavity nothing flowed; from the lung was poured out the dark fluid blood, characteristic of crucifixion; and from the sac of the pericardium followed the copious flow of water (serum), separated after death from the blood that had filled this cavity and caused instantaneous death, when the sufferer closed His long agony, and having said 'It is finished' bent His head and gave up the ghost, because His heart was broke. It remains now to investigate the causes of death in ordinary crucifixion, and to shew that it can explain the copious flow of blood that followed the wound inflicted after the death by the spear of the soldier.

"In crucifixion, as commonly practised by the Romans, the sufferer was nailed by the feet to the upright beam, and his hands were fastened by nails or cords to the cross-beam; while a projecting bar, passing between the legs, afforded a partial support to the weight of the body. In this constrained position the operation of breathing, as far as it is performed by means of the intercostal muscles, was seriously interfered with, because the ribs were fixed by the strain caused by the suspension of the body from the arms by the intervention of the great pectoral and serrate muscles connecting the upper limbs with the trunk; and the unfortunate sufferer was thus mechanically reduced to the condition of one whose intercostal muscles have been tetanized by the action of strychnia or lock-jaw, or other cause capable of producing this result. In consequence of the above-mentioned interference with the free action of the intercostal muscles, the breathing was conducted altogether by means of the diaphragm; a condition so painful after a short time, that the sufferer involuntarily raised his body by bearing upon the nails that secured his feet, or by swinging himself from the points of suspension of his hands, notwithstanding the agony thus occasioned, which was easily endured in comparison of the greater agony produced by his diaphragmatic breathing. It thus frequently happened that a strong man of resolute will, by raising himself by the hands, or lifting himself on his feet, remained alive upon the cross for three or four days, during which his blood, in consequence of imperfect oxidation, became more and more venous and fluid, and was lodged in a larger proportion than was natural in the substance of his lungs, so that if pierced after death, these organs would have given forth a copious flow of fluid black blood, like that observed to flow from the lungs of an animal killed by strychnia, or suffocated in water after much struggling. When it was not convenient for the soldiers to remain for three or four days on the watch beside the cross to prevent the interference of their friends, or when, as in the case of Jewish criminals (Deut. xxi. 22, 23), it was necessary to terminate their sufferings before sunset, death was hastened by breaking the bones of the legs and arms, near the ankles and wrists, by means of an iron mallet. The effect of the fracture of the legs and arms was to prevent the sufferer from relieving the agony of diaphragmatic breathing by restoring the action of the intercostal muscles, and he thus perished miserably in a few hours of horrible suffering, instead of prolonging his life for some days by the painful process of relieving the intercostal muscles by lifting himself by the muscles of the arms and legs. In either case death was ultimately produced by deficient oxidation of the blood, and a post-mortem wound of the lung would be followed by a copious flow of dark and fluid blood. In the case of the Divine Redeemer, this flow of blood caused by crucifixion was followed by the flow of water due to the rupture of the substance of the heart, and the effusion some time before death of a large quantity of blood into the cavity of the pericardium."

The importance of this is obvious. It shews that the narrative in St John xix. could never have been invented; that the facts recorded must have been seen by an eye-witness; and that the eye-witness was so astonished that he apparently thought the phenomenon miraculous.

7, 8. This passage stands as above in A.V. Elz. has in addition to the Greek words, ὅτι τοῖς ἐλὼν οἱ μαρτυροῦντες, the following:—ἐν

¹ 'A Physical Treatise on the Cause of the Death of Christ.' 8vo. London. Hamilton and Adams. 1847.

I am permitted by the widow and son of an eminent physician who recently died from rupture of the heart to mention the following particulars, which may be regarded as typical in such cases:—

1. The pericardium contained a pint and a half of fluid.

2. This fluid consisted of half a pint of soft clot, tolerably well separated, and one pint of clearish serum.

3. The examination was made fifty hours after death.

τῷ οὐρανῷ ὁ Πατήρ, ὁ Λόγος, καὶ τὸ Ἅγιον Πνεῦμα· καὶ οὗτοι οἱ τρεῖς ἐν εἰσι. καὶ τρεῖς εἰσι οἱ μαρτυροῦντες ἐν τῇ γῇ. It is not within the scope of the present undertaking to enter minutely into a question which is so purely one of critical scholarship. It may suffice to say that the additional words (1) break the continuity of the context, (2) are unsupported, (a) by any uncials, (b) by any cursives, except three of comparatively recent date, (c) by any good MSS. of ancient versions, (d) by any Greek Fathers of the first four centuries, (e) by any older Lectionaries. Those who still seriously defend the additional words are obliged to content themselves, either with attempting to shew the relevancy of the interpolation to the context, or with trying to decide the issue upon writings of Latin Fathers of the African Church. There can be no doubt that the sagacity of Cardinal Wiseman, and the learning of M. Lehir, have added to the evidence of a disposition on the part of the teachers of the African Church from Tertullian to Fulgentius, if not to quote the words in the fuller form, at least to make the addition in full or in part an almost inseparable gloss. Fulgentius not only cites the words, but asserts that they were quoted by St Cyprian ('Respons. ad Arian.' ad fin., 'De Trinit. ad Felicem'). In the confession of faith of 400 Bishops at the Conference of Carthage, convoked by Huneric (A.D. 484), the passage occurs in part at least. St Victor of Vita transcribes the confession. In it occurs the sentence: "Et ut adhuc luce clarius unius divinitatis esse cum Patre et Filio Spiritum Sanctum doceamus, Joannis evangelistæ testimonio comprobatur. Ait namque—'tres sunt qui testimonium perhibent in cælo, Pater, Verbum, et Spiritus Sanctus; et hi tres unum sunt.'" ('Hist. Persec. Vandal.' Lib. III.) It is, therefore, scarcely accurate to assert that Vigilius Tapsensis is "the first of the Latin Fathers who quoted the spurious words." (Tischendorf, 'N. T. Græcæ,' Edit. 7, II. 226; Griesbach, 'Dissert.' at end of Tom. II. Crit. Edit. of N. T., 1806.) Ingenious attempts have also been made to find allusions in St Augustine. "Habeto duo vel tres testes, P. et F. et Sp. Sanctum." 'In Joan. Evang. Tract.' XXXVI. 10.—"Deus itaque summus et verus cum Verbo suo, et Sp. Sancto, quæ tria unum sunt." 'De Civ. D.' v. 11. St Cyprian writes in one passage—"de P. et F. et Sp. Sancto scriptum est 'et tres unum sunt'" ('De Unit. Eccl.'), and in another, "cum tres unum sint." ('Epist. ad Jubaien.') Tertullian also quotes the words "tres unum sunt" ('Adv. Iren.' c. XXV.), and in a way which might not unfairly be contended to indicate that he drew his citation from v. 7 (not v. 8), and that he used the words as words of Scripture. There can be no doubt that in the chain of African witnesses (Tertullian, Cyprian, Augustine, the Bishops at Carthage, Victor of Vita, and Fulgentius) there is something remarkable. But there is no passage from these African Latin Fathers which cannot be accounted for by the Trinitarian allusion which unquestionably underlies the authentic passage, or by the words tres unum sunt specially impressing themselves upon the Church of Africa¹. It is impossible to shew any reason for believing that the African Churches alone were in possession of the contested verse, or to account for a passage of such dogmatic importance having disappeared from the Greek MSS. and from the versions of every other branch of the Church. Why should Africa have enjoyed a more ancient Latin version of the N. T. than Rome itself, drawn directly from Greek MSS., older and more complete than any which we now possess? (The argument in favour of the interpolations is drawn out fully in 'Two letters on 1 Joh. v. 7, containing also an inquiry into the origin of the first Latin version of Scripture, commonly called the Itala.' By N. Wiseman, D.D. Rome, 1833. M. Lehir's treatise has not yet been published, but an abstract of its contents is given 'Introd. au N. T.' par H. de Valroger, II. 552—568. Bentley's golden words may well re-assure any who suppose that the candour of Christian criticism has weakened the proof of the great Christian dogma of the Trinity: "If the fourth century knew that text, let it come in, in God's name; but if that age did not know it, then Arianism in its height was beat down without the help of that verse; and let the fact prove as it will the doctrine is unshaken." ('Letter,' January 1, 1717.)

9. It will be seen how directly this meets the objection of perhaps the most learned and certainly the most eloquent of the opponents of St John's Gospel: "The School of St John in Asia Minor was characterized by a tendency, commoner in antiquity than now, but very articulately marked in all mystic ideologists, viz. indifference to historical reality. Without the slightest scruple that school

¹ Bentley appears to have supposed that "Cyprian's words were transcribed into the margin, or between the lines of v. 8, of a book of some one who had a great veneration for that Father, as a gloss, which is very common in MSS. Next, a copyist, finding the words so inserted, imagined that the former copyist had by mistake omitted them, and therefore put them in the Text. And thus the insertion might rest till a long time after, and then the sham Preface must be made, complaining of the unfaithful Translator for leaving it out!" See Bp Wordsworth's reasons for supposing that the remarks in Casley's 'Preface to Catalogue of Royal Library' represent Bentley's Prælection of May 1, 1717. 'N. T.' II. P. 2, p. 124.

applies the principle which was destined to become Hegelian, 'it ought to be, therefore it is.' See the fourth Gospel. It is evident to rigorous criticism that that Gospel systematically subordinates chronological order and the tendency of its narratives, to the dogma of the Incarnate Word." (M. Réville, 'Irenæus.') Surely this "mystic ideology," this "indifference to historical reality," is inconsistent with the profession in 1 John v. 9, of the essentially historical principle of belief upon evidence. The tradition of the Church credits St John with a grave and awful reverence for historical truth. It asserts that he degraded from the ministry a Presbyter of Asia Minor who confessed that he wrote the apocryphal acts of Paul and Thecla from excessive zeal for the honour of that Apostle. This very ancient tradition is an indication of that which was felt to be St John's view upon such matters. The guilt of the Asiatic Presbyter would have been light indeed compared with that of St John himself had he placed words in the mouth of the Saviour which He never spoke¹. [The dramatic truth of St John's narrative in his Gospel, the delineation of character, the consistency of language, in the various persons introduced, should be studied and dwelt upon as a proof of its historical veracity. A great master of fiction has said for himself—"I neither can, nor do pretend, to the observation of complete accuracy even in matters of outward costume, much less in the more important points of language and manners;" and he speaks of "the fair license due to the author of a fictitious composition" (Sir W. Scott, Preface to 'Ivanhoe'.) Now in point of "language and manners," St John has never been proved to fail. Either the delineator of the Samaritan woman, the blind man, Thomas, Martha and Mary, was a consummate artist, or a true chronicler. Certainly he was not the former; therefore, he was the latter.]

16. The general principle laid down in the note (supra) will enable us to deal with most of the interpretations which have been given of "sin unto death."

The different views may be briefly tabulated thus:

1. Obstinate unbelief.
2. Sins punished with mortal disease (according to the synagogue) or made capital by the civil power (Michaelis—Serenfeld. 'Syllog. Dissert. Theol.' p. 470).
3. Sin against the Holy Ghost (Matt. xii. 31) [but if so, it would be more explicitly described]. (Schol. Matth. Beza, Wolff. So many of the Fathers.)

4. Sin, obstinate and unrepented, "when a man sins without any feeling leading to repentance." ὅταν τις ἀμαρτίαν ἀναισθητὸς ἔχῃ πρὸς μετάνοιαν, Schol. Matthäi, 146—230. Œcumenius seems to adopt this, referring to Judas' example (Schol. Matth. Œcumenius).

5. After true knowledge of God, sinning against the brotherhood of the Church, and resisting the grace of reconciliation. (Augustine: "Peccatum fratris ad mortem puto esse, cum post agnitionem Dei per gratiam Domini nostri Jesu Christi quisquam oppugnat fraternitatem et adversus ipsam gratiam, quâ reconciliatus est Deo, invidentiæ facibus agebatur" (afterwards, "si in hac perversitate finierit hanc vitam"). "Peccatum autem non ad mortem est si quisquam non amorem a fratre alienaverit, sed officia fraternitatis debita per alienam infirmitatem animi non exhibuerit." 'Opp. Aug.' Tom. III. P. 2, 197 (quoted by Lücke). Aquinas, Suarez.)

6. Sin leading to death and hell.

7. Final impenitence.

8. Blasphemy (1 S. ii. 25), or apostasy to idolatry.

9. Sin from its enormity practically incorrigible, like that of Judas, Sodom, &c.

10. Views which may be called Ecclesiastical.

(a) The excommunicate—for whom no solemn public prayers were made, though private intercession was not forbidden ("A man for whom intercessory prayers of the Church might be hurtful"). Neander. Grotius: "Qui cum peccaverint moniti peccare pergunt, aut certè disciplinæ, quæ in ecclesiâ instituta est, se subicere nolunt," but compare 2 Tim. ii. 25, 26.

(b) The state of sin described Heb. x. 28, 29, and referred to by the Second Council of Nicæa, i.e. after Church censure ἀδιόρθωτον μένειν. So there were among the Jews three degrees of sin, of which Schammatha ("there is death") was third. Bp Wordsworth cites Schoettgen to this effect, who states that John's language (1 John v. 16) is "grounded in Hebrew thought, law, and language." (See especially Lücke, Commentary on this passage, who has supplied much of the material here employed.) This note may close with a brief extract from a great English divine.

"This passage led Jovinian to teach that a baptized man should never sin. Hence it was inferred that if a man falls away, he is lost beyond hope (St Hieron. 'adv. Jovinian.' Lib. II. Tom. IV. Part ii. p. 193). Some acts of sin are so incident to the condition of men that the man who hath committed them is still within the methods of pardon. But "unto death," i.e. some men proceed beyond the measures and economy of Gospel, and the usual methods and probabilities of repentance, by obstinacy, or despising offers of grace and means of pardon. For such a man John does not encourage us to pray: if he be such our prayers will do him no good. But because no man can tell the last minute or period of pardon, therefore Scripture left us under indefinite restraint and caution—discretory enough to represent the sad state of things in which the impenitent have immersed themselves, yet so indefinite and cautious that we may not be too forward in applying it to particulars, nor in prescribing measures to Divine Mercy, nor in passing final sentence upon our brother before we have heard our Judge Himself speak. Every act of sin takes away something from the contrary grace; but if the root abide in the ground, the plant is still alive, and may bring forth fruit again. But he only is dead who hath thrown off God for ever, or entirely, with his very heart." (Bishop Taylor on 'Repentance.') So St Ambrose, Eph. ii. 1, "Sinners sin unto death, i.e. habitual, refractory, pertinacious and incorrigible sinners, in whom there is scarcely any hope or sign of life."

II. JOHN.

Senior ergo, cui scilicet cycnea suppeteret quædam gratia senectutis.

(S. Ambros. 'In Psalm.' xxxvi. 25.)

INTRODUCTION.

I.

1. To whom is the Epistle addressed?—
To a Christian woman, Kyria.
2. Reasons for this conclusion.

II.

1. Who is "the Elder" spoken of?
(a) The style and contents point to St John, negatively and positively.
(b) Two conclusions adverse to St John's authorship both of the Epistles and of the Gospel drawn from the title of Elder.
A. The title of Presbyter could not have been assumed by an Apostle.
Answer.
B. Objection from Eusebius's interpreta-

I.

1. Among the first questions which naturally suggest themselves to readers of the Epistle are those connected with its opening words. To whom is the letter inscribed—to the Church in general, or to a particular Church personified? Or, if addressed to an individual, what is her name?

The writer of the present notice has slowly, and almost reluctantly, come to the conclusion that the Second Epistle of St John was sent to an individual Christian woman, Kyria¹. The reluct-

¹ The name seems to be Kyria—(1) Because, had the name been Electa the order of the words would, probably, have been different. (2) Because the position of the word Kyria (v. 5) best corresponds with the notion of its being a proper name. (3) Because the sister of her to whom the Epistle is inscribed is also spoken of at the close as "thine elect sister" (τὰ τέκνα τῆς ἀδελφῆς σου τῆς ἐκλεκτῆς, v. 13). (4) Because there is ample evidence that at the time to which the letter must be referred, Kyria was in use as a tion of the passage of Papias preserved in his History.

Interest and importance of the letter as addressed 1. to a Christian widow—

2. to an Ephesian widow.
3. The difficulty in accepting the fact that the Epistle is addressed to an individual woman arises to many minds from v. 10.

ance arises partly from the weight of authority against this interpretation. It is observed by Bp Wordsworth that "in an ancient painting at St Maria in Trastevere at Rome, Christ is represented as enthroned with the Church as the Queen on His right hand, and in it a book with the words inscribed—'Veni, Electa mea, et ponam te in thronum meum'." This is the representation in pictorial form of the interpretation of St Jerome², proper name, which can scarcely be said of Electa. (See references in Lücke, 'Comment. üb. die Brr. des Johann.' p. 35.) Kyria is in meaning equivalent to the Chaldaic ܡܪܝܬܐ (Mārtha, domina).

and of many others, ancient and modern, from whom one is unwilling to separate. The reasons for a respectful dissent from this interpretation are the following.

2. It seems easy to see why many writers thought themselves constrained to have recourse to allegory. (a) The person addressed by St John, if person it were, was lost in obscurity. This was sufficiently indicated by the fact that even the name was not absolutely certain. But the first verse interpreted of a woman, Kyria, and her children, would imply that they were known and loved far and wide through the Church, by "all who knew the truth". A personification of a church, or of the Church, as a woman with many sons, would remove the difficulty. (b) The objections which were raised against the Epistle to Philemon in some quarters will serve to shew how brevity and an everyday tone were apt to be considered inconsistent with inspiration. The oracle of God could hardly condescend to the affairs of common life, to the interests of a slave, to the feelings and spiritual welfare of a widow and her family. But exalt the widow into a mystic figure of the Church mourning for her Lord, and the objection would be removed.¹ (c) It certainly would appear singular to many that a note to a private friend should find its place among the Epistles known as Catholic. (d) The language of St Peter², whether interpreted of the Church in Rome³ or of the Church in the literal Babylon⁴, might seem to afford an almost exact parallel⁵.

¹ "St John's Second Epistle impresses us as being addressed to a community, for, if a private family were signified by 'the elect lady and her children,' the Apostle could not have said that not only he, but all they also that have known the truth, 'loved the children of the elect one'" (Döllinger, 'First Age of the Church,' I. 163).

⁶ Another objection from v. 10 will be considered below.

Of these objections, the first presses the words too closely, and does not make sufficient allowance for the electric current of sympathy between the Churches in St John's day. The second will make no impression upon modern Christian thought and feeling¹. The third has been answered by Lücke. "If by the term Catholic Epistles we are to understand apostolical letters, St Paul's (ὁ ἀπόστολος) only excepted, the above-mentioned difficulty is entirely removed. But even on the other hypothesis (that the ancients originally gave the name of Catholic to no epistles but such as were really encyclical) the difficulty is not serious. In some Churches, apparently, the Second and Third Epistles were not at first incorporated in the collection of Catholic Epistles. When these short letters were, sooner or later, received into that collection, one or other of two reasons may have been taken into account. Possibly these brief notes may have been considered as appendices or accompaniments to the First Epistle². Possibly no more suitable place in the canon could be found for their canonical preservation, than just beside the First Epistle; which arrangement, as they were so brief, did not in the least alter the original signification of the term Catholic Epistles³." In reference to the last argument for the mystical interpretation Bp Lightfoot adds—"The salutation" to the "elect lady" (v. 1) from her "elect sister" (v. 13) will then be a greeting sent to one Church from another; just as in 1 Peter the letter is addressed at the outset ἐκλεκτοῖς Πόντου κ.τ.λ. (i. 1) and contains at the close a salutation from ἡ ἐν Βαβυλῶνι συνεκλεκτή (v. 13)¹. This is the strongest point that can be raised for the hypothesis, and has unquestionable weight. But the mysterious tone of St Peter in the passage, and the symbolical colouring imparted by the word "Babylon," makes the passage in St Peter very different from the straightforward and literal tone of St John in his Second Epistle².

¹ The tone of this is rather expressed by Bengel's beautiful praise of the N. T. "Ad mulieres, liberos, servos, adolescentes dirigitur sermo atque ad omnes omnino." (On Heb. xiii. 34.) This inspired note to a widow is worthy of the disciple of Him who so tenderly considered the widow's circumstances. (Mark xii. 42; Luke xxi. 1.) Cf. note on the mention of Apphia in Philem. v. 2, Vol. III. 831.

² So Irenæus seems to have regarded 2 John ('Adv. Hæres.' III. 18). "Joannes Domini discipulus confirmat dicens [Joh. xx. 31]. ...Et in Epistola sua sic testificatus est [1 Joh. ii. 18-22]. ...Et discipulus ejus Joannes in prædicta epistola fugere eos [hæreticos] præcepit, 'multi seductores exierunt in hunc mundum, qui non confitentur Jesum Christum in carne venisse. Hic est seductor et Antichristus: videte eos, ne perdati quod operati estis' [2 Joh. 7, 8]. Et rursus in Epistola ait: 'multi pseudoprophete exierunt de sæculo...non est ex Deo,' sed ex Antichristo est [1 Joh. iv. 1-3]. ...Rursus in Epistola clamat [1 Joh. v. 1]." It will be observed that 2 Joh. 7, 8 is cited as from the first Epistle—perhaps from a mere slip—possibly, however, for the reason indicated by Lücke in the text.

³ Lücke, 'Comment.' p. 355.

II.

A question not only of greater interest, but of much deeper importance, arises as to the authorship of the Epistle, and is suggested by the first words which meet the eye of the reader—(ὁ πρεσβύτερος). Who is the "Elder"?

1. (a) The style and contents of this short note point irresistibly to the pen and heart of St John—and that negatively and positively. Some words usual with the other Apostolic writers, and in all

² Other arguments for the mystical interpretation are derived from the representation of the Church under the figure of a woman in the 'Pastor of Hermas,' and from the Scholium in Matthæi (ἐκλεκτῇ Κυρίᾳ λέγει τὴν ἐν τῇ τότε ἐκκλησίᾳ ὡς τῇ τοῦ Κυρίου διδασκαλίαν ἐκρεβῆ φυλάττουσαν) compared with the old title πρὸς Παρθένους. See Reithmayer, 'Introd. Canon. B. of N. T.' (Fr. Translat. of Valroger, II. 410).

the range of the earliest Christian literature, are not found in it. Language and ideas which lie outside the Johannic circle of the Gospel and First Epistle, lie outside the Second Epistle also. "Church" does not occur. The opening salutation (v. 3) is, in all probability—"grace, mercy, peace, from God the Father, and from Jesus Christ"¹—the full title, "Lord Jesus Christ," not being in the Gospel or First Epistle. The teaching about Antichrist is peculiar to St John and to the First Epistle, and was especially needed in the Churches of Asia Minor. The writer of this Epistle says with energy—"this is that Deceiver and that Antichrist." Much more convincing than the many similarities of style is the constant reference to the First Epistle. High above all the paths by which that Epistle led its readers were warnings against the three especial dangers of the time and place. (1) The danger of denying the true Christ; the peril of losing Christ, and God with Him—for he who has not Christ has not God. (2) The danger of failing in true love to the brethren. (3) The danger of not observing Christ's commandments. Every Christian wanted to have these three great cardinal warnings constantly at hand, engraven upon his heart. He wanted to be able to say to himself some short, sharp watchword against the three perils of the time. Precisely the same three dangers are presented to us in the Second Epistle upon a narrower canvas, and in a more concise form. The treatise is compressed into a leaflet. Hence the especial value of the Second Epistle. Easily copied and remembered, it was wafted from spot to spot, from city to city, from Church to Church. It was recognized as Catholic in both senses of the word—in its universal circulation, and in its claim to universal acceptance as having come from an Apostle's hand. To apply the language of the time, it was felt that the feather, small as it is, had dropped from the eagle's wing. Here are its three talismans—(1) Against the peril of losing Christ, and losing God with Him. "Many deceivers are gone out into the world, those who continue in not confessing Jesus Christ coming in Flesh. This is the Deceiver and the Antichrist. Every one leading forward and abiding not in the doctrine which is Christ's, hath not God. He that abideth in the doctrine, he hath both the Father and the Son" (2 John vv. 7, 9). (2) Against the peril of losing true love of the brethren. "Not as though I wrote a new commandment unto thee, but that which we had from the beginning, that we love one another" (v. 5). (3) Against the peril of ceasing to observe Christ's commandment. "And this is love, that we walk after His commandments. This is the commandment, that, as ye have heard from the beginning, ye should walk in it" (v. 6). The style and contents of the Second Epistle of St John, we may confidently conclude, lead us back to St John the Apostle as its author.

² ὁ πλάνος καὶ ὁ Ἀντίχριστος, 2 John v. 7. The term πλάνος, indeed, is not exclusively Johannic (cf. Matt. xxvii. 63; 2 Cor. vi. 8), nor the kindred verb and substantive, but the verb at least is a favourite with St John (John vii. 12, 47; 1 John i. 8, ii. 26, iii. 7, iv. 6 (πλάνη)). The verb is found in eight places of the Apocalypse.

(b) The title of πρεσβύτερος, assumed by the writer of these two short letters (2 John 1; 3 John 1), leads us, however, into a controversy of much importance in its bearing upon the authorship of the Gospel and the First Epistle, which have always been attributed to the beloved disciple. Two conclusions are confidently maintained by many modern critics. (A) It is allowed, indeed, that the Second and Third Epistles of John are from one hand, and that the hand of the writer of the fourth Gospel and of the First Epistle. But the New Testament, it is urged, gives us one clear indication of the author's position, which effectually excludes the supposition that he can have been an Apostle. For the writer of the Second and Third Epistles, who is undeniably the same with the author of the two other great Johannic works, twice calls himself ὁ πρεσβύτερος. But the title, in such a connection, can only designate the official presbyter, the minister of a particular Church, and cannot possibly have been assumed by an Apostle. (B) The scanty fragments of ecclesiastical history have preserved us one page written by Papias, which enables us to identify the writer of the Gospel and the three Epistles with the Presbyter John spoken of by that writer.

(A) It is to be observed, however, that one expression used by St Peter¹ presents a parallel to the language of St John (2 John v. 1; 3 John v. 1), even if we are compelled to understand by it the official term for the ordinary minister of a Church, which seems however to be unlikely in this case. If St John calls himself "the Presbyter," St Peter addresses the presbyters as "the fellow-Presbyter." This may confidently be maintained, in spite of the doubt which has been thrown upon the interpretation by the arguments of Grotius. If it is necessary then to suppose that the word Presbyter in this place is technical and official (which appears more than doubtful as we proceed to shew), it would not, therefore, follow that an Apostle could not apply it to himself.

(B) Whatever the word may mean, in the famous passage preserved by Eusebius² Papias apparently assigns the title to several other Apostles by inference. It would seem more than probable that by the Presbyter John he simply indicates the Apostle St John a second time³. And Papias mentions him with this attribute, not because the second John is a different person from the first, but because he wishes to indicate the two different ways in which he obtained the information which he so much preferred, "from the living and abiding voice" of man to the less vivid narrative of books¹. In the first place, he drew his information from those who had themselves followed the Elders—those Elders being Andrew, Peter, Philip, Thomas, James, John, Matthew, i.e. the Apostles. In the second place, Papias bethinks himself of the still nearer approach to the words and deeds of Jesus which he had enjoyed, and names two actual disciples of the Lord with whom he had himself conversed. First, he places Aristion, who was simply one of the actual disciples of Jesus; then he reserves for the last place, for the crown and climax of witnesses, one who was not merely a disciple of Jesus, but the Apostle (ὁ πρεσβύτερος) John².—"The Elder," then, at the beginning of our Epistle signifies the aged Apostle who had seen Jesus, the oldest of those who had walked with the Lord, the one existing representative of holier days and a more favoured generation. Christian art represents St John in the beauty of youth. In these two Epistles, written with a feeble hand which seems to shrink from the exertion of dipping the pen in ink³, we see the beauty of old age. Both representations are true. St John is ever young and ever old. Those only who in youth have something of the calm and purity of old age carry into their old age something of the fire and freshness of youth.

² εἰ δὲ που καὶ παρηκολουθηκώς τις τοῖς πρεσβυτέροις ἔλθοι, τοὺς τῶν πρεσβυτέρων ἀνέκρινον λόγους—τί Ἀνδρέας ἢ τί Πέτρος εἶπεν· ἢ τί Φίλιππος· ἢ τί Θωμᾶς, ἢ Ἰάκωβος· ἢ τί Ἰωάννης, ἢ Ματθαῖος, ἢ τις ἕτερος τῶν τοῦ Κυρίου μαθητῶν· ἃ τε Ἀριστίων καὶ ὁ πρεσβύτερος Ἰωάννης, αἱ τοῦ Κυρίου μαθηταὶ λέγουσιν. (Papias apud Euseb. 'Hist. Eccl.' Lib. III. cap. ult. See also Routh, 'Reliq. S.' Tom. 1. 8, and notes, pp. 21—25).

³ Every one who has looked into the controversy of course knows that Eusebius draws a different inference, that he lays stress upon the fact that Papias "counts John's name twice over" (ὅτις καταριθμοῦντι αὐτῷ τὸ Ἰωάννου ὄνομα). "Another John Papias mentions with those who are not of the number of the Apostles, placing Aristion before this John, and styling him presbyter. Thus by these things evidence is given to the truth of the story that two of the same name lived in Asia Minor, and that the two have tombs in Ephesus, and that each tomb is called to this day the tomb of John. To which statements it is well to attend. For it is probable that the second—if some will not have it that the first—beheld the Revelation which goes under the name of John." The questionable character of these inferences of Eusebius has been well shewn by Riggenbach, 'Lieb. Jesu' (French Transl. pp. 59, 60).

We conclude that the Second Epistle of St John comes from the Apostle, and is addressed to an individual.

III.

1. The conclusion that this truly Apostolical letter is addressed to an individual, a woman, a widowed mother, seems to give it a deeper interest. The great question about any religion is not whether it is capable of making converts in a single generation. Can it mould and influence those converts to the late evening of a prolonged life? Can it communicate its power undiminished to a second generation? Can it find its way into the life of the family? This Epistle answers the question at a later date than any other part of the New Testament, and thus supplies what we scarcely find elsewhere. The absence of all reference to Kyria's husband makes us conclude that she was a widow. It would appear that she had not had daughters, or at least did not possess them now¹; but she had sons, probably many, at all events three at least². Upon these sons the Gospel had laid the strong grasp of its purity. Their life had touched the centre of Truth, and from it described the perfect circle of Love. St John found them making their continuous life-walk³ in the sphere of a truth which was not only speculative; for they who had lost one earthly parent kept ever in the path indicated by a command coming from the Father⁴, and received by all His children. In its main particulars, the natural inferences from the Epistle would correspond with the historical tradition of the life of St John. Its whole tone, and the title of "the Ancient" or "Elder" (ὁ πρεσβύτερος) indicate the writer's old age. Equally would it seem apparent that the Apostle was absent from his usual place of abode. That absence might, possibly, have been one of the tours of visitation for the appointment of Bishops and regulation of Churches mentioned by an early writer¹. But men are not apt to write in such a strain, except to those who have been severed from them by barriers not easily crossed². The close of the note, after its solemn warnings, is irradiated by a gleam of joy at the prospect of a meeting, so full and bright that we may be tempted to find the rift in the clouds through which it falls in some circumstance which promised deliverance from the exile in Patmos—possibly the death of Domitian and the accession of Nerva.

2. If this general view be correct, the Second Epistle of St John suggests one striking and interesting contrast. Kyria was a Christian widow of Ephesus. But Ephesus was the most dissolute, as it was the most superstitious, of cities. "It was entirely plunged in insolent idleness," writes Philostratus. "It was filled with players upon instruments, the ministers of every abandoned pleasure. The streets were thronged with dissolute effeminate wretches. All night long one heard nothing but balls, revels, and wanton music³." And "the Ephesian widow" was almost a proverb for evil even in a corrupt age. One of the marvellous gifts of the Christian Church consisted in honouring, consoling, utilising widowhood. For the Gospel ministers to the broken-hearted, and soothes the lonely. It saves from despair; it opens the soul to an inseparable love; it gives a new purpose by calling upon the spirit which has been healed to pour out the consolation which itself has received upon all who are wounded in the battle of life by sin or sorrow. It is remarkable that St Paul should have drawn precisely for a Bishop of the Church of Ephesus that picture of the true Christian widow, with her awful severity to herself and her gentle sweetness to others, with her holy and consecrated gravity⁴. Almost contemporaneously with St John's Epistle to Kyria, the famous story of the "Ephesian Widow" was told by Petronius, with its cynical insult to all that is best in the heart of a woman—to the love for the husband of her youth, to the tender recollections of her wedded life, to the sanctity of the grave, to the majesty of death⁵. Indeed the First Epistle to Timothy itself suggests the same contrast in another shape. What a difference between the younger Ephesian widow, touched by grace superficially, at the circumference not in the centre of her soul, upon whom the breath of the truth had blown without its transforming power—and such as Kyria, loved by St John and all who knew the truth for the truth's sake, which abideth in us—yes, and shall be with us for ever⁶.

3. It may be well to refer finally to one passage, which is often felt to be a moral difficulty in the way of accepting the reference of this Epistle to a person. It probably, indeed, lies at the root of the eagerness to accept the mystical view on the part of some believing critics, who are themselves eminently free from mysticism. It is felt by such that the stern prohibition against receiving heretics who deny Christ into the house, or bidding them good-speed, is infinitely less difficult to defend as addressed to a Church than as addressed to an individual. But, it should be remembered that the heretic here contemplated came solemnly to the house⁷, summoning it as it were formally in the name of ¹ 1 Tim. v. 3—10. Cf. ἐν καταστάσει λεπτοπρεπεῖς, Titus ii. 3. On the quasi-ecclesiastical position of widows in the early Church, see Bingham, 'Antiq.' VII. 4—9.

² The story is repeated by Jeremy Taylor, with all the many-coloured light which can be thrown upon it by his fancy and reading—strangely out of place, one is tempted to say—in 'Rules and Exercises of Holy Dying,' Chapter v. sect. VIII. The Ephesian widow's marriage "took place in the grave of her husband, in the pomp of mourning, in her funeral garments." She advises the soldier, in an emergency which arose, "to take the body of her first husband, and place it upon the gallows in place of the body of the stolen thief." Taylor's reference is to Petronius, ['Satyric.'] XVII. 1.

³ Contrast St Paul's caustic touches (συναλῶσα...καταστρηδιάσουσι...τῇ πρώτῃ πίστει ἡθελήσαν) 1 Tim. v. 6, 11 with 2 John vv. 2, 3.

Antichrist, admittedly and as downright matter of fact bearing with him anti-christian doctrine¹. The highest welfare of some within the house might demand that they should not be exposed to the contaminating influence. Perhaps the best and wisest commentary upon the passage has been written by Bishop Taylor—"No spiritual communion is to be held with heretical persons, when it is certain they are such, when they are convinced by competent authority and sufficient argument. But the persons of the men are to be pitied, to be reproved, to be convinced, to be wrought upon by fair confidences and the offices of civility, and invited to the family of faith by the best arguments of charity, and the instances of a holy life (1 Pet. ii. 12). Indeed, if there be danger, i.e. if a weak understanding may not safely converse in civil society with a subtle heretic, in such cases they are to be avoided, not saluted (Titus iii. 10; 2 John v. 10); but as this is only when the danger is by reason of the unequal capacities of the persons, so it must only be when the article is certainly heresy, and the person certainly criminal—when interest is the ingredient in the persuasion, and a certain and necessary truth destroyed by the opinions²." The advice, certainly, is not inconsistent with the character of St John. To forget this is to err in the same direction as that style of art which accepts for the type of St John the languid grace of an effeminate tenderness. The thunder which sometimes suddenly rolled through the sky which hung over his youth³—the passionate zeal which desired to bring down fire from heaven, as Elias did⁴—did not quite pass away with the new creation in Christ Jesus, with the softening of an Elijah into an Elisha. At all events this verse, and various passages in the first Epistle, indicate the same type of character⁵. The Apostle, like the truth of which he is the messenger, has his sternness as well as his indulgence, his intolerance as well as his tolerance⁶. He has been wont for more than sixty years to confine his thoughts within the limits of The Doctrine. He is "well pleased with the easy conditions of dwelling at Jerusalem, and not passing over the pleasant bounds of the sweet banks of Kidron." To lead forward over these is for him the negation of true progress, the ceasing to have a hold upon the living God¹.

But, after all, an age like ours has a difficulty—moral or immoral—in any such injunction, however explained. It may be well if we are led to examine how much of our difficulty arises from genuine charity—how much from feeble convictions, from a superficial courtesy, from the canvassing for popularity, from the vanity which feels confidence against temptation, and the curiosity which desires to hear what can be said in the most piquant form, but is utterly careless as to what is true.

The external evidence for the Second Epistle of St John is, as might be anticipated, less than that which can be adduced for the First. Still it is considerable, both in the East and West. In the Alexandrian school it was generally recognized. Clement of Alexandria looks upon it as a note of the simplest tone, addressed to a lady of Babylon, by name Electa¹. Eusebius distinctly states that Clement in his 'Hypotyp.' gave concise summaries of all the books in the canon, not excluding those called "antilegomena—I mean the Epistle of Jude, and the remainder which are called catholic²." Dionysius of Alexandria, whose doubts about the authorship of the Apocalypse give evidence of his critical fastidiousness, recognizes the second and third Epistles as of St John³. Later on, the evidence is overwhelming. The excommunication of the Arian party is justified by a Bishop of Alexandria⁴ by an appeal to St John's language (2 John v. 10). The 'Synopsis of Scripture' attributed to Athanasius not only recognizes but analyses the second and third Epistles of St John¹. St Athanasius himself, in a writing especially intended for a safeguard against apocryphal pieces disguised under the same names², expressly enumerates three Epistles of John among the seven Catholic Epistles, as a possession of those who hold fast divine Scriptures unto salvation. In the West, Irenæus, the disciple of Polycarp, the representative of the best traditions of the "school of Ephesus," quotes the Second Epistle (v. 11) as written by "John, the disciple of the Lord³." The 'Canon Muratorianus,' after mentioning the first Epistle in close connection with the Gospel, adds towards the close an explicit recognition of two Epistles of John. In the seventh Council of Carthage (A.D. 256) under Cyprian, an African Bishop expressly cites a passage from the Second Epistle in justifying his vote against the validity of heretical baptism⁴.]

[The possible connection of this Epistle with Patmos justifies the insertion in this place of the best description of that island which the writer has seen, and which—so far as he knows—is contained only in some pages which cannot now be procured.

“Facing that side of Ionia, so celebrated of old by its riches—at the present day only by the ruins of so many great cities, Miletus, Priene, Ephesus—there rises a group of islets, rocks almost without a name, for the most part desert, scattered in the Ionian Sea between Cos and Samos. One only has become famous, and by a singular contrast in the midst of this classic country, it owes all the fame which it possesses to Christianity alone, to the memory of the Apocalypse, and to the presence of a monastery. That islet is Patmos.”

After an account of his voyage from Mycone, and arrival at the Monastery of St John in Patmos, the writer thus describes the scene.

“Day fell. The sun set in a cloudless sky. We availed ourselves of its last moments to go out upon the roof, and to take in the general aspect of the isle....With one glance we took in the isle in its littleness. It is but a point lost in the immense sea—indeed, singularly enough, the impression struck me more in the islet than in our little bark in the mid-sea. Four hills from 800 to 1000 feet high, at the extremities of Patmos, answer to that on which the convent stands. Formed of great black broken boulders, they are quite barren. The shore and the inner valleys, though without trees, shew some verdure—not that of pasturage, but of useless brush-wood which grows spontaneously. What more can we see? Little chapels upon all the heights, shepherds’ huts made of pine branches, covered sheds, miserable parks grazed by thin sheep, fifty barks at anchor in the silent port—that is all Patmos in its austere poverty. But let us lift our eyes above this arid soil and these melancholy rocks. What a splendour of light! There seem to be almost as many islets as waves sown in the illimitable sea. How beautiful they look at this happy distance which hides their sterility, while it lets us see their majestic forms! There is Amorgos, like the upturned keel of a huge ship. There is Paros all white as its own marbles upon the horizon. There is Nicaria, indented by a hundred bays. There is Samos, partly plain, partly highland. There, to the east, is Anatolia, and Asia Minor from Miletus to Iassos. A transparent vapour, which takes none of the clearness from the objects over which it floats, blends all their outlines, and happily melts together this sky, this sea, these isles. The sky is blue, the sea is blue, the isles are blue—the isles more vapourous, the sea deeper-coloured, the heaven clear, tender, almost ashen, to the horizon....There is a certain pleasure in feeling a vast sea between oneself and every public event, in knowing nothing of the outer world but the white sail of a vessel which gleams upon the horizon without ever casting anchor in front of the despised islet....We started one morning for the ruins of Iassos. Soon the mounds, the convent, the isle itself, was nothing but a dark point upon the horizon, which a last high wave suddenly removed into the region of memory.” (‘Une visite à Patmos,’ par M. P. de Julleville. ‘Revue des cours litteraires,’ 2 Mars, 1867, pp. 217—222.)]

THE SECOND EPISTLE OF JOHN.

1 He exhorteth a certain honourable matron, with her children, to persevere in Christian love and belief, 8 lest they lose the reward of their former profession: 10 and to have nothing to do with those seducers that bring not the true doctrine of Christ Jesus.

THE elder unto the elect lady and her children, whom I love in the truth; and not I only, but also all they that have known the truth;

2 For the truth's sake, which dwelleth in us, and shall be with us for ever.

3 Grace be with you, mercy, and peace, from God the Father, and from the Lord Jesus Christ, the Son of the Father, in truth and love.

1. Most probably (as has been proved above in the Introduction), in the important and often-quoted fragment of Papias elder signifies no official position, but is used to indicate one who belongs to the first generation of Christian believers. So here. The suppression of the name is quite in accordance with St John's usage in his Gospel.

to the excellent Kyria] See Additional Note.

her children] cf. v. 4. If Kyria in this passage be (as we suppose—see Introd.) an individual, the expression and I found of thy children (infra, v. 4) would shew that she had at least three living children. (Lücke.)

whom I love in truth] with true love.

2. For the truth's sake] "If, in any instance, the world's affections stray beyond its own circle, if it extends its regards to a real Christian, it is never on account of his being a Christian, never for the truth's sake which dwelleth in us." (Robert Hall.) This is a beautiful description of the cause of the love of each true Christian to all others—the conformity of faith through the whole Church. (Est.) "Truth" is used five times in this Epistle, six times in 3 John. The best way of loving in truth is to love for the Truth.

—yea and it shall be with us for ever] This is an instance of the oratic variata. The construction is altered intentionally, and brings out the thought much more forcibly than could have been done by a uniform structure. (Winer, Part III. § lxiii. 600.) It is half benediction, half prophecy, like the beginning of the next verse. "The Truth with us" is drawn from the same region of thought "as the Love with us." (See note on 1 John iv. 17, and cf. Matt. i. 23.)

3. There shall be with us grace, mercy, peace] A reference, possibly, to St Paul's Apostolic salutation in two Epistles only (1 Tim. i. 2; 2 Tim. i. 2). This rush of words is unlike St John's usual calm reserve. Can it be that some circumstance—possibly the martyrdom of Timothy—filled the heart of John and caused him to use in this place a form of salutation which would remind an Ephesian Christian of the Bishop of Ephesus, and of words which were likely to have been constantly on his lips? "Grace and peace" are also conjoined in the opening of the Apoc., i. 4. The word grace is very rare in St John's writings; only besides these passages in John i. 14, 16, 17; Apoc. xxii. 21. "Grace and peace" are substituted for the Hellenic and heathen χαίρειν (used by St James alone of the Apostles, i. 1). (See infra note on v. 11.)

and from Jesus Christ] The word Lord, which occurs nowhere in St John's Epistles, should be omitted here.

in truth and love] As, in very advanced life, he draws near the evening of his days, the two things which are dearest to St John's heart, and ever on his lips, are truth and love. It was said of one (Bonaventura) that "what he had read in the morning he seemed to have known from all eternity." In St John, on the contrary, we see a deep meditative character, slowly maturing and retaining to advanced age the master ideas of life received in youth from the teaching of Jesus. "O Truth! O Love!" cries the Church in the old prayer at the close of every week, "behold! the day, when after all the sorrows of the earth below, we are about to enter into the blessedness of your rest." (Baunard, 'L'Apôtre S. Jean,' p. 399.)

4 I rejoiced greatly that I found of thy children walking in truth, as we have received a commandment from the Father.

5 And now I beseech thee, lady, not as though I wrote a new commandment unto thee, but that which we had from the beginning, that we love one another.

6 And this is love, that we walk after his commandments. This is the commandment, That, as ye have heard from the beginning, ye should walk in it.

7 For many deceivers are entered into the world, who confess not that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh. This is a deceiver and an antichrist.

8 Look to yourselves, that we lose not those things which we have wrought, but that we receive a full reward.

4. have found of thy children] Some of the number of thy children. Some find in these words a sad and gentle hint that certain others of Kyria's children were not walking in the Truth.

have found] (εὕρηκα) The eureka of the saint is different from that of the philosopher. ("Rarum hodiè inventum, rarum gaudium!" Bengel.)

5, 6. Cf. 1 John ii. 7, v. 3. I beseech thee, Kyria! These verses carry with them irresistible evidence of coming from the heart and pen of St John. "This is the new commandment, that we love one another." But the love—the charity—what is it? Walking according to His commandments. But the commandment, which includes all commandments—what is it?—Why, the Love! The Love expanded issues in the commandments. The commandments, essentially enfolded in the commandment, contract again into the Love.

"As if the rose should shut and be a bud again."

6. That...ye should walk in it] i.e. in the Love more probably than in the commandment. This passage in which the Love (charity) is identified with the commandment suggests the best definition of ἀγάπη. It is the compression into one word of the whole saying of Jesus in Mark xii. 29—31, the idea of His first and second commandment embodied in Him and reproduced in us by the Spirit.

7. many deceivers...This] "many deceivers;" used collectively, and taken up by "this" in sing.

are gone out into the world (ἐξῆλθον εἰς τὸν κόσμον)] A, B, N (Cod. Amiat. exierunt) approved by Lachm., Tischend., Lücke, for these reasons. (a) The expression occurs in 1 John ii. 19, iv. 1, while there is no reason for supposing it carried in from these passages, as ἐλθόν is easier, and not without precedent in New Testament (Rom. v. 12); (b) the meaning "gone out" is more suitable here, for "come in" is said of things or persons upon their first use or introduction. But, in the case of these "seducers," they had been in the Church, and then left it. They did not enter into the world, but went out from their place in the Church into the world. (See Reiche, 'Comment. Crit.' III. 332.) The same word is used in Apoc. vi. 4, "There went out (sc. into the world) another horse."

who confess not] μὴ with a partic. indicates a supposed genus or class. The phrase is not equivalent to "many deceivers, viz. those who do not confess" (that would require the objective negative), but "many deceivers, those of the class who do not confess," quicumque non profitetur (Winer, 'Gr. of N. T. D.' p. 505).

Jesus Christ coming in the flesh] The Incarnation is here viewed as a present living principle. Cf. note on 1 Joh. iv. 2.

This is the deceiver and the antichrist "The proceedings against the πλάνος, the seducer (Mésith), who makes an attempt upon the purity of religion, are explained in the Talmud with details." (Renan, 'Vie de Jésus,' p. 393, 1st edit.) The word is technically and characteristically applied to our Lord by the chief priests and Pharisees (Matt. xxvii. 63, ὁ πλάνος, that deceiver). The name and idea are Johannic (John vii. 12, 47). The many deceivers are looked upon as concentrated and gathered into one.

8. Look to yourselves] The emphatic to yourselves implies St John's absence very strongly. (Cf. Phil. ii. 12.)

"That ye lose not those things that ye wrought (ἀ ἐργάσασθε, perf. pass. used actively, Winer, p. 274), but that ye receive reward in full," &c. We have here to choose between three verbs in first person plural, or the three same verbs in the second person plural. The second person plural is best supported by authority, and also by the context. The second person might be suggested to copyists by the words which they had just written, Look to yourselves, and is apparently very easy. But it is much more logical and cogent for the Apostle to charge those to whom he wrote by their own eternal interests, than by those of himself and other

9 Whosoever transgresseth, and abideth not in the doctrine of Christ, hath not God. He that abideth in the doctrine of Christ, he hath both the Father and the Son.

10 If there come any unto you, ministers. Surely, too, it would not be precisely true or scriptural to assert that the Apostles or Christian teachers suffered eternal loss by the failure of their converts. For the scriptural idea of wrought in its bearing on salvation cf. John iii. 21, vi. 27; for reward, 2 Chro. xv. 7; Matt. v. 12, vi. 1, x. 41, 42 (the οὐ μὴ ἀπολέσῃ τὸν μισθὸν αὐτοῦ of this verse, possibly alluded to here), Luke vi. 35; Rom. iv. 4; 1 Cor. iii. 14 (see especially Melanchthon on the 'August. Conf.' Opp. i. 33, 34). The true notion of reward fills up what would otherwise be a gap upon one side of Gospel truth. This verse may have been in the minds of those who changed the old Collect—"ut divini operis fructum propensius exequentes pietatis tuæ remedia majora percipiant"—into "that they plentifully bringing forth the fruit of good works may of Thee be plentifully rewarded" (Collect for the Twenty-fifth Sunday after Trinity). The reward in full (μισθὸν πληρὴν ἀπολάβητε) would seem the echo of Ruth ii. 12 (γένοιτο ὁ μισθός σου πλήρης. LXX.).

9. Every one leading forward and not abiding in the doctrine which is Christ's bath not God] (1) leading forward. (πράγμων is the true reading; so A, B, N. omnis qui præcedit, Cod. Amiat.) The word is perhaps more than simply going forward. In classical Greek it is used of an officer leading on his troops, pushing forward. It seems here to include two ideas—going beyond the line of truth in what seems to him an advance, with an allusion to the vaunted progress of advanced Gnostic thought—carrying others with him, leading them with bold and self-willed ambition, outside the barriers. There may possibly be a reference to a haughty imitation by the servants of Antichrist of the Great Shepherd, of whom the word is used by Himself and by others (Matt. xxvi. 32, xxviii. 7; Mark x. 32). (2) "The doctrine which is Christ's." Not, probably with genitive of the object "doctrine about Christ," nor again "doctrine which is Christian" or "with which Christ works," but "doctrine which has Christ for its Author, which He taught." (Cf. Matt. vii. 28, xxii. 33; Mark i. 22, xi. 18; Luke iv. 32; John xviii. 19. "The doctrine of Balaam" is that which Balaam taught. Apoc. ii. 14.) Here, once more, we have an instance of suggestion, an asterisk pointing to the Gospel. (Introd. to First Epistle, p. 284.) "The doctrine which is Christ's." What is that? and why so called? The answer is in St John's Gospel, vii. 16, 17. It is the doctrine which Jesus delivered, and called emphatically "my doctrine, the doctrine." "The doctrine which is Christ's" is the norm of all true thought and doctrine. Every development beyond that is a leap into the darkness. Every supposed progress, outside the limit, is rather a retrocession, a feeble restlessness which will not allow the soul to "abide," a ceasing to "hold God fast." Thought must be chastened as well as free. One step outside the circle of the Truth is ruin and sin and death. (See Additional Note.)

He that abideth in the doctrine] of Christ is not to be repeated here. (See Additional Note.)

10. This verse reminds us that the Gospel has its intolerance as well as tolerance. The well-known story of St John's flying from the bath where Cerinthus was, scarcely, perhaps, indicates a stronger abhorrence of such errors as would lead us away from the real, living, Incarnate Christ. The earlier indications of St John's character in the Gospels (Mark ix. 38; Luke ix. 53) are recalled to our memory. Some important distinctions between the Church and world then and now are certainly to be taken into account. (1) "The world lieth wholly in the wicked one," cried St John in his first Epistle. The words are, in a measure, true yet. But "the darkness," which in his day was "drifting by," is now, in Christendom, partially dissipated. (2) The only hope of the world lay in the Incarnation, and in the ideas which it brought, and the powers which it implanted in humanity. We, who are under the new moral and spiritual order, created by the Gospel, do not see the danger which to St John seemed so near and pressing; we can scarcely even conceive it. We live in the security achieved by a battle which has been won along the whole line, and relax in peace some of the precautions which were necessary in days of warfare. Our toleration may often have intermingled with it a selfish love of a quiet life. (3) The honour of Jesus was dear to His apostle. In the estimate of him who wrote—"the Word was God"—to deny that Jesus was the God-Man was to question His legitimacy and impugn His truth. If this Epistle is supposed to be addressed to a Church, the verse before us would leave a somewhat different impression. See Introduction.

If...any...bring not this doctrine...and good speed bid him not. The liturgical practice of repeating "the Lord be with you" after the Creed, as "a symbol and bond of peace," has been traced to this verse. "St John (2 Epist. vv. 10, 11) forbids us to salute any that cleave not to the right faith. But, when the and bring not this doctrine, receive him not into your house, neither bid him God speed :

11 For he that biddeth him God speed is partaker of his evil deeds.

12 Having many things to write unto you, I would not write with paper and ink : but I trust to come unto you, and speak ^{† Gr. mouth to mouth.} face to face, that our joy may be full.

13 The children of thy elect sister greet thee. Amen.

minister hath heard every one profess his faith in the same words with himself, then cheerfully and without scruple may he salute them as brethren, and they requite his affection with a like return." (Comber, 'The Temple,' i. 318.)

This dogmatic severity, this moral indignation against certain forms of heresy, breathes in the language of Ignatius to the Ephesians, 15 or 20 years later. "They who destroy the peace of families shall not inherit the Kingdom of God. If then they who do these things after the flesh died, how much more if any one destroy the faith of God by evil teaching." (Ignat. 'Epist. ad Ephes.' xvi.)

11. that biddeth him good speed] χαίρω, the Greek form of salutation (James i. 1; Acts xv. 23). The Hebrew salutation was a wish for the peace, the Latin for the health, the Greek for the happiness, of the person addressed.

The three salutations are eminently characteristic of the general view of life and its aim entertained by the three races. The Roman, to whom health and strength seemed all in all, said Salve. The Greek, whose existence aimed supremely at "light and sweetness," said Xaïpe, looking upon joy as the highest aim. The Hebrew, who had a revelation, and knew the blessedness of reconciliation with God and conscience, said Peace.

is partaker of those deeds of his, those evil deeds] Contradictions of the Creed are in some circumstances entirely evil deeds. (Gal. v. 20.) There are sins against faith as well as against morals. For the notion of a common partaking in evil, cf. Ps. l. 18; 1 Tim. v. 22.

12. I would not write] οὐκ ἐβουλήθη, the principle of the "epistolary aorist" (Winer).

"Paul sent Tychicus to give information by word of mouth upon his position—details which he did not consider it prudent to commit to paper. These sorts of precautions may be remarked in several Epistles, cf. 2 John v. 13" (Renan, 'L'Antechrist,' p. 90).

with paper and ink] "Faith was all in all—each bore it in his heart, and cared little for loose sheets of paper (χαρτης), 2 John v. 12. The passage, 2 Tim. iv. 13, does not prove that the Epistles were written on parchment. Parchment was peculiarly used for books." (Renan, 'Saint Paul,' p. 134.) See Additional Note.

trust] Rather, hope.

face to face] lit. "mouth to mouth." Cf. Gal. iv. 19, 20, and Bengel's note. "He writes gently, but would speak more gently again. The voice can be inflected, as the turn of discussion requires. Speaking in this respect is best, writing vicarious and subsidiary, 2 John v. 12; 3 John v. 13" (Bengel).

that our joy may be fulfilled] This expression links the present Epistle with the Gospel (iii. 29, xv. 11, xvii. 13), and with the First Epistle (i. 4). The high associations with which it is connected lead us to suppose that it would scarcely have been applied by St John to any meeting but one of peculiar solemnity after a cruel and prolonged separation which had threatened to be eternal. See Introd. to this Epistle, supra, p. 359. "Habet nescio quod latentis energiae vivæ vocis actus, et in aures discipulorum de auctoris ore transfusa fortius sonant." (S. Hieron. 'Ad Paulin.' quoted by à Lapide.)

13. The children of thy sister, that excellent sister] See Additional Note on v. 1. Nephews of Kyria were with St John at this time.

ADDITIONAL NOTES ON 2 ST JOHN 1, 9, 12; 3 ST JOHN 13.

2 St John 1.

The word ἐκλεκτός here is, probably, not used in the sense in which baptized Christians are generally so termed (Col. iii. 12; 1 Pet. i. 1). If so, we should, in the case of an individual, expect an addition (as in the case of Rufus, the only individual so designated, outside this Epistle, in the N. T.—ἀσπάσασθε Ροῦφον τὸν ἐκλεκτὸν ἐν Κυρίῳ, Rom. xvi. 13). It rather signifies that which as most choice of its kind is chosen out—singular, as in the old English phrase "my singular good friend"—precious—so gems are spoken of in the apocryphal Book of Henoch as λίθοι ἐκλεκτοί. Cf. 1 Pet. ii. 3, 6. (See Bretschn. 'Lex. Man. N. T.' s. v.)

2 St John 9.

πᾶς ὁ προάγων is not exactly equivalent to πᾶς προάγων. The latter simply means "every one that leads forward." But the ὁ joined to a participle has the force of ὅστις and signifies

"every one of the class who is such as to 'lead forward.'" On πρό in a bad sense, see Tholuck 'On St John's Gospel,' p. 260.

It seems, on the whole, wise to retain here the old word doctrine, rather than to substitute teaching. Of the original term (διδασχῆ) it has been said by a lamented writer:—"For example, the very word 'doctrine,' perhaps not from the fault of the translators, but from the change of meaning which has taken place in the lapse of time, has undergone a transformation which converted a perfectly general expression into one synonymous with dogmatic teaching. This error, if so we may call it, has been removed almost uniformly in the present Revision, which renders the word διδασχῆ, not by 'doctrine,' but by 'teaching.'" ('Revised Version of N.T.' in the 'Times,' July 20, 1881.) But no one can doubt that if the word is sometimes merely "act of teaching" (Mark xii. 38), and sometimes "a mode of public instruction" (1 Cor. xiv. 6), it came to be used for the body of faithful doctrine which followed the received norm accepted by the Church. (Cf. τοῦ κατὰ τὴν διδ. πιστοῦ λόγου, Titus i. 9; Rom. vi. 17, with the text before us.) Thus the term passes over from the act or mode of teaching to its subject-matter, whether dogmatic or preceptive. (Cf. also Acts xvii. 19; Matt. xvi. 12; Acts v. 28; Heb. xiii. 9.) The word doctrine therefore, is to be retained (not only in the single text, Rom. xvi. 17), but in this place, in John vii. 16, 17; Rom. vi. 17; Titus i. 9, and some other passages, just because the perfectly general expression "underwent a transformation which converted it into one synonymous with dogmatic teaching" in the hands of the sacred writers themselves.

2 St John 12; 3 St John 13.

διὰ χάρτου καὶ μέλανος (2 St John 12);
διὰ μέλανος καὶ καλάμου (3 St John 13).

The three materials for writing here spoken of require some notice. (1) Paper (χάρτης, Lat. charta), properly a leaf of paper made from the separated layers of the papyrus. We find this material, with pen and a black pigment, in constant use in the times of Cicero and Horace. (Cic. 'de Nat. Deorum,' II. 50; Opp. XIV. 3028; 'Epp. ad Quint. Frat.' II. 15; Ibid. XII. 2102. Horat. 'Satir.' II. 3. 7. 'Ars Poet.' 447.) A very full and interesting account of this "paper," its varieties and manufacture, is given by Pliny. "Before we leave Egypt, it will be well to speak of the papyrus; since by the use of leaves of paper the culture of human life, and the memory of events, is established and preserved. Varro is our authority for saying that we owe this to the victory of Alexander the Great, at the time of the foundation of Alexandria in Egypt. Before this paper was not employed, but the leaves of palm, and the inner bark of other trees. Then public records were inscribed upon sheets of lead, and at a later period private documents on cloth or waxed tablets. In remote antiquity, before the Trojan War, we find from Homer that sheets or tablets of wood were used."

[Pliny refers to πόρεν δ' ὄγε σήματα λυγρὰ, γράφας ἐν πίνακι πτυκτῷ θυμοφθόρα πολλά.

'Iliad' VI. 168, 169.]

After tracing historically how paper came into universal use, and describing the Egyptian papyrus-plant in the marshes (cf. Isaiah xix. 7, LXX.), Pliny gives an account of the preparation of the sheets of paper from the plant. The manufactory was transferred to Rome, where it was improved by the sagacious industry of the great house of Fannius [Fannii sagax officina]. (Plin. 'Nat. Hist.' XIII. 21—26, Tom. v. pp. 2283—2293, edit. Brotier.) One of the most elegant and playful of the Epistles of St Jerome, however, connects Asia Minor with another and more permanent writing material, of which St John probably speaks: "I complain of the shortness of your letter. I cannot suppose that paper (charta) was wanting, while Egypt continues her commerce. Even if Ptolemy, a new enemy, had closed the seas against that trade, yet King Attalus would have sent parchments from Pergamos, that the want of paper might be made up by skins; whence the name of Pergamene is given to parchments to this very day¹." (An allusion to a jealousy on the subject of his library, which made Ptolemy Philometor suppress the foreign Egyptian paper-trade. Plin. 'N. H.' XIII. 21; S. Hieron. 'Epist.' VII. Tom. I. 339, edit. Migne. Cf. 2 Tim. iv. 13.)

It thus appears that the making of paper (περγαμηνή) in the peculiar form of that industry in Asia Minor was stimulated in the highest degree by Ptolemy Philometor cutting off the Egyptian supply. The incident is another illustration of the violent rivalry between Alexandria and Pergamos, which in a different department issued in the opposition of "the Pergamene school of grammar against the Alexandrine, and the system of anomaly (ἀνωμαλία) against that of analogy (ἀναλογία)." This Asiatic paper was made of skin—not only in the thicker form for books—but in thin sheets for ordinary use. And the latter was popularly termed χάρτης. ('Dict. of Greek and Roman Biog.' s. v. Crates, Vol. I. 884.) Between Eumenes II. of Pergamos and his successor and Ptolemy Philometor there was a furious jealousy upon the subject of their respective libraries. And Crates, the grammarian, is specially connected with the development of the trade in Pergamene paper.

(See Plin. 'N. H.' ut supra.) It is, therefore, scarcely probable that much foreign-made paper would have found its way to Asia Minor; and this incidental mention of paper (probably Pergamene) may be one other indication of the general Asiatic surroundings of St John at the time of writing these Epistles. It is not without interest to turn to the curious manuscript preserved in the Convent of Patmos, and attributed to Prochorus, a disciple of St John (Αἱ περίοδοι τοῦ θεολόγου συγγραφεῖσαι παρὰ Πρωχόρου). This manuscript of an apocryphal writing, composed probably in the 5th or 6th century, and overloaded with poor legendary stories, bears, notwithstanding, ample witness to local and geographical knowledge. While the piece curiously makes no mention whatever of the Apocalypse, it contains an account of the alleged composition of the Gospel upon one of the mountains of Patmos, which seems to be of a finer stamp and more primitive materials than the rest of the works. Singularly enough the writer incidentally assumes that paper and ink were easily to be procured in Patmos. (τέκνον Πρωχόρε, εἰσέλθε ἐν τῇ πόλει καὶ λαβὲ μέλαν καὶ χάρτην καὶ ἀγαγέ μοι ὧδε...καὶ λαβὼν χάρτας καὶ μέλαν ἐπορεύθην πρὸς αὐτὸν...καὶ εἶπε μοι τέκνον Πρωχόρε, ἃ ἀκούεις ἀπὸ τοῦ στοματός μου γράφε ἐπὶ τοὺς χάρτας.) (See M. Guérin's analysis of the Manuscript ascribed to Prochorus.

'Description de l'Ile de Patmos,' Chap. III. pp. 20—42.)

(2) Ink (μέλαν) in the form of some kind of coloured pigment, was in use from a very early period. A colour for writing, used, according to Josephus ('Antiq.' XII. 2, 10), in different kinds, like the German tinte from tinctor, is spoken of in the O. T. (Jerem. xxxvi. 18). Cicero and Horace speak repeatedly of it as black (atramentum) in their day. So St Paul, 2 Cor. iii. 3, and St John here.

(3) The reed pen (κάλαμος) appears sometimes in the LXX. as the translation of the Hebrew (קטף—properly stilus—graving-pen. Psalm xlv. (xlv.) 1; Jerem. viii. 8); it never signifies a quill pen, as with us. It appears probable that alphabetical writing was employed generally by the Ionian earlier than by the European Greeks, and that special attention was devoted by them to the manufacture of the chief material for writing. The best paper (the charta Pergamena) was prepared at Pergamos, some two days journey from Smyrna. This, it may fairly be inferred, St John used, and not the Alexandrian or Roman papyrus—the charta of Pergamos, not of the Egyptian marshes. (See for the early Ionian knowledge and use of alphabetical writing, Heyne, 'Homer,' VIII. pp. 814, 815.) Paper of the modern kind is said to be first mentioned in a letter of Joinville to S. Louis of France. (Brotier's note, Plin. 'Nat. Hist.' v. 2293.)

I. ANALYSIS.

I. Salutation (v. 1).

St John's pleasure at the favourable account of Caius brought back to Ephesus (vv. 2, 3, 4).

II. The main subject of the Epistle

(a) The hospitality of Caius gratefully acknowledged by the Ephesian brethren on their return to Ephesus (v. 5).

Exhortation and encouragement to the grace of hospitality (vv. 6, 7, 8).

(b) The rejection of St John's letter of communion and the bearers of it by Diotrephes (vv. 9, 10).

Transitional precept and maxim (v. 11).

III. Contrast to Diotrephes.

Demetrius—threefold witness to him; (1) the World, (2) the Truth, (3) the Church (v. 12).

Allusion to the Gospel which would be recognized by Caius (φωνᾶντα συνετοῖσι)—the great painter's mark at the corner of the little picture (καὶ ἡμεῖς δὲ μαρτυροῦμεν, καὶ οἴδατε ὅτι ἡ μαρτυρία ἡμῶν ἀληθὴς ἐστίν, 3 John 12. οὗτός ἐστιν ὁ μαθητὴς ὁ μαρτυρῶν περὶ τούτων, καὶ γράψας ταῦτα· καὶ οἴδαμεν ὅτι ἀληθὴς αὐτοῦ ἡ μαρτυρία ἐστίν, John xxi. 24).

IV. Close—hope of meeting—salutation and message (vv. 13—15).

It is believed that this analysis suggests a consistent and intelligible account of verses which have often appeared to be confused and almost inexplicable. It would seem that St John (probably after his return from Patmos to Ephesus) had sent certain members of the Ephesian Church for the purpose of missionary labour, or of constituting the inter-communion of the churches, to the Church over which Caius presided, or in which he exercised considerable influence, possibly at Corinth. (See *infra*¹.) In that Church, or in one of its neighbouring communities, a man of jealous and haughty spirit (probably in an official ministerial position), by name Diotrephes, watched for an opportunity of gratifying his ambition by rejecting the authority of an Apostle. When the brethren delegated by St John were insultingly rejected by Diotrephes, who threatened with excommunication any members of his Church who should receive them, they were welcomed by Caius with the affection which became a true Christian heart. To him they turned in their need, because in such circumstances it seemed highly inexpedient to apply for a loan or for other assistance to unbelievers with whom they might be acquainted¹. On the return of these brethren, after a reception so Christian and hospitable, they witnessed to the goodness of Caius before the Church (v. 6), i.e. the Ephesian Church. These brethren, when they presented themselves to Caius, were "strangers," and hence the expression in v. 5 is strictly appropriate according to the explanation.

¹ The chief objection lies in the ἐὰν ἔλθω (v. 10). It is, of course, very difficult to imagine that St John could have projected a voyage to Corinth. The note on v. 10, however, will shew that the supposition in ἐὰν ἔλθω is one of faint probability. The hoped for meeting in v. 14 may refer to an expected visit of Caius to St John.

II.

This Epistle is addressed to Gaius. The name, which represents the Latin Caius, was, it is needless to say, a very common one. Three persons of the name are mentioned as disciples in connection with the earliest records of Apostolic Christianity. One is spoken of together with Aristarchus, as a Macedonian². A second belonged to Derbe³. A third is honourably commemorated in St Paul's Epistle to the Romans⁴. The same Caius is spoken of as a Corinthian⁵. The name of Caius also stands in v. 1 of this Third Epistle of St John.

Making all due allowance for the precariousness imparted to any hypothesis by a name so common as Caius, there would seem to be something, at least, to say for the opinion of those who identify the Caius of this Epistle with the Corinthian Caius. (a) The trait of character indicated (3 John vv. 5—8) is,

² "Caius and Aristarchus, of Macedonia," Acts xix. 29.

³ "Caius of Derbe," Acts xx. 4.

⁴ "Caius mine host, and of the whole church," Rom. xvi. 23. (For the curious and improbable tradition that this Caius was the son of Caius Oppius—the centurion who stood by the Cross (Matt. xxvii. 54), and who first preached the Gospel in Spain,—and that he became Bishop of Milan, see quotations in à Lap. 'Comment. in Scrip. S.' xx. 639, 640.)

as far as it goes, exactly of a piece with the generous and noble character indicated in Rom. xvi. 23. The house of Caius, the Corinthian, was a shrine of worship, and a centre of hospitality for missionaries¹. (b) But this is not the only thread of connection which conceivably links the Caius of St John's third Epistle with Caius the Corinthian. St John mentions with pain certain schismatic troubles which disturbed some portion of the Church—not more precisely indicated—perhaps caused by some haughty priest or prelate who brought his mean and selfish ambition within the same sphere where Caius exercised his gentle virtues. This man, whose very name may indicate high birth, or possibly even an arrogant self-assumption of a quasi-royal rank², rose in unholy rebellion against the authority of the Apostle. His wicked and mischievous words did not refrain from defaming a soul so pure, and a life so beautiful, as that of the old man whose holy presence made Ephesus at that time the true centre of Catholic Christendom (3 John 10). This Diotrophes tried to cut off from the Church's communion those whose only offence was that they did not belong to his party, and would not yield to his unjust sentences of exclusion (v. 10). Now, if the Caius of this Epistle be Caius of Corinth, then absent from Ephesus at his former home, we have indubitable evidence of a state of things in the Church of Corinth which singularly illustrates this Epistle—a coincidence of time, place, and circumstances. The Third Epistle of St John most probably belongs to the close of the first century, towards the end of the Apostle's life.

² Διοτρεφής (3 John v. 9) "trained, or cherished by Zeus." In Homer especially, a frequent epithet of kings and nobles.

The style and turn of thought and expression confirm the impression that it is the production of a very old man. It was about the same time, somewhere close to the year 95, that St Clement wrote his Epistle to the Corinthians. The painful picture drawn by Clement of the feuds in the Corinthian Church¹ would quite agree with the expressions of St John to Caius (3 John vv. 9, 10). (3) The author of the singularly learned and acute 'Synopsis of Scripture' attributed to Athanasius, who must have had the use of materials to which we have no access, not only identifies the Caius of our Epistle with Caius the Corinthian of whom St Paul speaks (Rom. xvi. 23), but connects him with St John, with Ephesus, and with the publication of St John's Gospel². We have, indeed, no means of deciding who Diotrephes was. If the language of the Epistle (v. 10) absolutely precludes us from supposing that Diotrephes was directly and locally connected with Corinth, we are unable to shew exactly how the schismatic spirit which unquestionably prevailed at Corinth just at the time extended itself to Ephesus. Certain it is that in the Epistle of Clement we see, very much as in St Paul's time, the excitable nature of the Corinthian Christians, and the further development of ecclesiastical democracy, invading the Presbyterate, if not the Episcopate. The Roman Church—more tranquil and solid in the presence of her livelier but less practical sister—offers the latter her haughty advice, and establishes the austere order of ecclesiastical discipline¹. The picture of feud and insubordination drawn by St Clement is of the darkest kind; and the schismatic spirit among people of the same blood and language is intensely contagious. Communication between Ephesus and Corinth was constant and easy, and the Corinthian origin of Caius would give him especial interest in a schism which it was possibly attempted to extend from Corinth to Ephesus. The supposition, then, that the Caius of St John's Epistle is the Corinthian Caius, is at least not improbable.

The external authority for the Third Epistle of St John has been incidentally stated in the examination of the similar evidence for the Second². The instinct of the Church after deliberate thought and examination—the brevity of the letters—and the entire want of conceivable purpose in drawing up Epistles so free from doctrinal peculiarity, and so completely Johannic in thought and style, are amply sufficient to entitle the two Epistles to their place in the Canon.

III.

The Second and Third Epistles of St John occupy their own place in the sacred Canon, and contribute their own peculiar element to the stock of Christian truth and practice. They lead us from the region of miracle and prophecy, out of an atmosphere charged with the supernatural, to the more average everyday life of Christendom, with its regular paths and unexciting air. There is no hint in these short notes of extraordinary charismata. The tone of their Christianity is deep, earnest, severe, devout, but has the quiet of the Christian Church and home very much as at present constituted. The religion which

¹ See the striking passage of Hilgenfeldt, quoted in the first edition of the entire Epistle of St Clement to the Corinthians by Bishop Bryennius, "Προλεγόμενα ρκθ'. ΚΛΗΜ. ΕΠΙΣΚ. ΡΩΜ. ΕΠΙΣΤ."—Constantinople, 1873.

² The subject is discussed by Dr Routh. 'Reliq. Sac.' I. 423; cf. III. 208. It may be added that 3 John 7 seems to be quoted in Ignat. 'Ad Ephes.' VII.

pervades them is simple, unexaggerated, and practical. The writer is grave and reserved. Evidently in possession of the fulness of the Christian faith (2 John 3, 7, 9), he is content to rest upon it with a calm consciousness of strength. The sword of controversy strikes one down-right blow, and is returned to its scabbard (v. 7). In the Second Epistle the loftiest region of dogmatic theology stands out for a moment from among the clouds (2 John 3). The Incarnation of Jesus is indicated, not only, as in the First Epistle, as a past fact with consequences lasting on into the present (Ἰησ. Χριστ. ἐν σαρκὶ ἐληλυθότα, 1 John iv. 2), but as a permanent continuous principle in a living Personal embodiment (Ἰησ. Χριστ. ἐρχόμενον ἐν σαρκί, 2 John 7). In the Third Epistle God occurs twice (v. 11), the word Jesus or Christ is not mentioned. Yet how much is implied in "for the sake of The Name" (ὑπὲρ γὰρ τοῦ ὀνόματος, v. 7). These two letters also add their own special contribution to Christian thought—or at least accentuate and underline thoughts before written. In the Second Epistle, the idea of a fixed norm of Christian faith is embodied in The Doctrine by which every teacher was to be tested (2 John 9, 10). Heresy, at least under certain conditions and in some of its developments, was boldly stated to involve moral guilt (ibid. v. 11). There was a delimitation of the region progress beyond which is loss of Christ and of God (v. 9). In the Third Epistle, a solemn hint was given—how much needed, and for a time how much neglected, events too clearly proved—of the dangers to which the Church might be exposed by ambitious aspirants after ecclesiastical primacy (ὁ φιλοπρωτεύων αὐτῶν Διοτρεφής, 3 John 9). The moral guilt of schismatic resistance to Apostolic authority was boldly and bluntly stated (λόγοις πονηροῖς φλυαρῶν ἡμᾶς, ibid. v. 10). By the conception of the Incarnate Lord, the Creator and Light of all men, and of the universality of Redemption, which the Gospel and the First Epistle did so much to bring home to all who received Christ (John i. 3, 4, 9; 1 John ii. 2), germs were deposited in the soil of Christianity which necessarily grew from an abstract idea into the great reality of the Catholic Church. In these two short occasional letters St John provided two safeguards for that great institution. Heresy and schism are the dangers to which it is perpetually exposed. St John's condemnation of the spirit of heresy is recorded in the Second Epistle; his condemnation of the spirit of schism is written in the Third Epistle. Every age of Christendom up to the present has rather exaggerated than dwarfed the significance of this condemnation.

IV.

The view which has been taken throughout the Introductions to these Epistles of the connection of St John's later life with Ephesus and Asia Minor may, it is hoped, add to the interest with which the letters will be read by some. Ephesus may seem to rise once more, as it was seen by St John, in the valley between Mount Preon and Mount Coressus. The now green and marshy plain, bounded by the blue line of the sea, may exchange its "majestic sadness" for life and animation. "Christian recollections are the greatest recollections of Ephesus; they suit well with the majesty and the melancholy of these spots. According to the tradition of the first ages, St John, 'the great light of Asia,' as the bishop Polycrates called him, lived for years and died in this city¹." Whilst Ephesus rises before us as it was in St John's time, the Apostle and some of those with whom he must have been familiar become more life-like. Aquila and Priscilla appear at Ephesus during St Paul's visit to that city² (A.D. 56). The Bishop of Ephesus salutes them by St Paul's desire (A.D. 66) about ten years later³. Thirty years have passed, but it is possible that St John may enter the house of the aged tent-maker. Alexander, the bronze-worker⁴, may have learned the lesson which St Paul designed to teach him⁵. may still be there, with his indelible memories of the teaching of St Paul. From time to time St John may enter the house of the saintly widow, Kyria; or meet the missionaries of the cross under the roof of his beloved Caius. Demetrius may, perhaps, come to visit him. If we suppose the Third Epistle to have been written after the Apostle's return from Patmos, one dearer and more venerable still—Timothy, the Bishop of Ephesus—had almost certainly gone to his rest. There is no impossibility in the conjecture that the apocalyptic message to the Angel of the Church of Ephesus was addressed to Timothy, and its praise and blame are alike consistent with all that we gather of the character of Timothy in the Acts of the Apostles and in the two Pastoral Epistles written to him by St Paul¹. One tradition of the Church at least represents Timothy as having died a martyr's death at Ephesus, just about the period of St John's return from Patmos, at the close of his two years' exile—beaten to death with clubs by the fanatical devotees of Artemis, against whose excesses he protested at the καταγωγή of the goddess². If we might follow the tradition as given by a Greek author of the ninth century, we should see the Apostle from day to day—"not startling the minds of the citizens by the splendour of his public preaching, but walking in wisdom and redeeming the time; of tender mind, of quiet manner, of unpretending garb, of gentle speech, allowing easy access to all who approached him. But in all the order of life, in varied and perfect goodness, he was unapproached and venerated³." Possibly too we shall find him occasionally at the port⁴. For St John's Gospel shews us the hand and eye of the son of Zebedee. He has the practised ken, which can calculate distances on the water, whether in the darkness of a wild night or in the golden haze of an April morning⁵. A thoughtful study of the writings of St John will enable us to understand in some measure how the son of Zebedee and Salome, the fisherman of Galilee, the disciple of the Baptist, became the Apostle of Jesus, the herald of the Word, the Plato of the Evangelists, the prophet of Patmos, the inheritor of the work of Paul and Timothy at Ephesus, the missionary of Ionia—may we not almost add, the Primate of Christendom?

THE THIRD EPISTLE OF JOHN.

He commendeth Gaius for his piety, 5 and hospitality 7 to true preachers: 9 complaining of the unkind dealing of ambitious Diotrephes on the contrary side, 11 whose evil example is not to be followed: 12 and giveth special testimony to the good report of Demetrius.

THE elder unto the wellbeloved Gaius, whom I love ¹in the truth.
2 Beloved, I ¹wish above all things
¹Or, pray. that thou mayest prosper and be in health, even as thy soul prospereth.

3 For I rejoiced greatly, when the brethren came and testified of the truth that is in thee, even as thou walkest in the truth.

4 I have no greater joy than to hear that my children walk in truth.

5 Beloved, thou doest faithfully whatsoever thou doest to the brethren, and to strangers;

6 Which have borne witness of thy charity before the church: whom

1. beloved, as in vv. 2, 5, 11. The word occurs four times in this short letter. It is characteristic of St John (1 John ii 7, iii. 21, iv. 1, 7, 11).

2. in or concerning all things I pray] (εύχομαι). This prayer of St John for a dear friend (possibly in bad health) may act as a corrective to the unnatural mysticism of a certain form of pseudo-spirituality. "Sickness," said Pascal, "is the natural state of a Christian." Some have pushed this saying with its measure of undoubted truth so far as to pray for sickness—a contradiction surely to the meek spirit of the petition "lead us not into temptation." We may turn with profit to the wholesome Christian common sense of the beloved disciple, who knew so well the mind of Christ, the Healer. St John here prays that the promise to the godly man in Ps. i. 3 (πάντα ὅσα ἂν ποιῇ κατενοδωθήσεται, LXX.) may be fulfilled to his friend.

that thou mayest prosper (εὐδοῦσθαι—the rendering of צלח and הצלח, to be prosperous)—and be in health (ὑγιαίνειν, cf. for this meaning of the word Luke v. 31, "they that be whole," A. V.). Cf. also for the first of these two words, "laying by him in store whatever he prosperously obtains" 1 Cor. xvi. 2). In this verse Hooker finds the justification of our Prayer-Book in containing prayers for temporal blessing. ('E. P.' v. 35.) In Naples the comprehensive new year's salutation is buon capo d' anno, con buona salute, santa e vecchia, "a happy new year, with good health, and a holy old age." The closing formula of the Papal Epistles in Latin is, "omnem tibi à Domino cupit et adprecatur tum animi tum corporis prosperitatem."

3. witnessing to thy truth] The order of the words here is very emphatic, and seems to point to an implied contrast with even as thou truly walkest] i.e. sincerely, without deception (ἐν ἀληθείᾳ).

4. "Greater joy than these (joys) I have [not], viz. that I should hear of my children walking truly," i.e. sincerely, as at the close of the last verse—each child so walking is, as it were, a separate joy. The occasion of St John's joy may be compared with that of St Paul on hearing of Philemon's faith and love. (Philem. v. 4.)

The older commentators quote a passage beautifully illustrative of this from Seneca, in which he describes his delight in the mental and moral progress of a favourite pupil. 'Epist.' xxxiv.

5. thou doest faithfully whatsoever thou workest (πιστὸν ποιεῖς ὃ ἐὰν ἐργάζῃ). The neuter is used adverbially, i.e. suitably to Christian faith, and as is worthy of a Christian believer. Thou doest...whosoever thou workest. Note the different words, the second signifying toilful work (Matt. xxi. 28, &c.), "thou art doing well in all thy toilful work." (Fideliter facis quicquid operaris.) Some commentators hold (improbably) that the phrase is equivalent to the classical "giving a pledge," i.e. here of character and conduct. (So πιστὰ ποιεῖσθαι, Herod. iii. 8.)

to the brethren, and to strangers] A various reading here has a large amount of support—"to the brethren, and that (i.e. "who besides." Alford) are strangers." (So A, B, C, &c.) Reiche, however, supposes this to be a gloss. St John seems to refer to brethren from the Ephesian Church, received by Caius though strangers. [On the hospitality of Caius, see supra, Introd.]

6. witnessed to thy charity before the church] Like witnessed to thy truth, v. 3. The before the church] i.e. the Church from which they had been sent forth—the Ephesian Church to which they had now returned. This is the first occurrence of the word church in St John's writings—without the article here. This singular fact may, it is submitted, be accounted for in one way and one only. Our Lord never used the word Church in His public addresses. Before the multitudes He could not at this stage of His work make intelligible the disruption of Judaism, and the establishment of a spiritual Kingdom as wide as the world. Only before His disciples, far on in His Ministry, did He ever use the word Church, and that only three times. (Matt. xvi. 18, and twice in xviii. 17.) But it did not fall within the purpose of St John's Gospel to record these words of Jesus. And it was a fixed principle with him in his First Epistle not to use any great term of the spiritual order which was not employed in the Gospel. Hence the word Church is absent from the Epistle, because it is absent from the Gospel. But the reason for abstaining from the use of the word ceased with the First Epistle. And we find it three times in the Third Epistle.

speed forward on their journey] (προσπέμψας) helping them on their journey. In the O. T. this is sometimes the translation of לָחַץ (Piel of לָחַץ), and signifies to accompany one departing, to send him on his way (συμπροσπέμπεω, Gen. xviii. 16, LXX.). When valued and beloved guests took their departure, the hosts accompanied them some way, in token that they clung to their society to the last moment. This was often accompanied with presents and provisions for the way. (Kalisch, 'Histor. and Crit. Comm.' Genesis, 404, 556. Gen. xviii. 16; xxxi. 27.) The curious academic word in the Oxford language of the last century, "to propemp any one," i.e. to provide with a ceremonious escort on public occasions, preserved very little of the original force. The word is Pauline (Rom. xv. 24; 1 Cor. xvi. 6—11; Titus iii. 12. Cf. also Acts xv. 3, xxi. 5.) after a godly sort] lit. "worthily of God"—"he who honours such faithful servants of God, honours Christ, our God, who sends them."

worthily of God (cf. Col. i. 10; 1 Thess. ii. 12). The Apostle exhorts Christians to do this action worthily of God. He implies then that it is the standard by which every action is to be measured—to make it, as far as possible, worthy of God in every part. The gift which we intend to lay before a king is rendered complete as far as loyalty and reverence can ensure. The gift which is presented by love and gratitude is made as perfect as gratitude and love can make it. The old builders finished details of architecture high out of sight on roof and spire with exquisite exactitude, because they would be seen by the angels. So every action of the regenerate life should be finished in every detail, and made as complete as it can be made by loyalty and reverence, by love and gratitude, for the eyes of the Lord of men and angels. What an ideal of life to say to oneself in this or that action, "do this worthily of God!"

7. "for the sake of the Name" (His name's sake, A.V.). The pronoun is wanting in all the Uncials. (It may have been brought in from a reminiscence of Rom. i. 5.) Just as the Name in the Old Testament is put absolutely for Jehovah (Deut. xxviii. 58; 1 Chron. xiii. 6), so in the New Testament it is used for Christ (Acts iii. 16, iv. 12, v. 41. Cf. "that beautiful Name," James ii. 7). The same use passed on to the earliest Christian writers (see Ignat. 'ad Ephes.' III. VII.; 'ad Philipp.' x.). The argument for our Lord's Divinity, deducible from this, is excellently put by Ammon; in the Catena on Acts v. 41. "For the Name." "By using the general expression he indicates that Jesus is God. For, just as a man solemnly using the word, 'He has said,' means 'God has said,' so he who uses the name indefinitely equally declares the Divinity of Jesus" (quoted in Tischend. 'Nov. Test. Græce,' edit. VII. Tom. II. pp. 29, 30). Note too that name implies a true personality lying behind it. It is never used of qualities, only of persons (see Matt. xxviii. 20).

taking nothing of] See Additional Note.

8. We] The pronoun here standing markedly at the beginning of the sentence is full of significance. It is beautifully like St John's humility to include himself in a confession of sinfulness, or in an obligation to perform a duty. This verse is morally quite of a piece with 1 John ii. 1.

preeminence among them, receiveth us not.

neither doth he himself receive the brethren, and forbiddeth them that would, and casteth them out of the church.

11 Beloved, follow not that which is evil, but that which is good. He

[for the truth] Fellowworker is a Pauline word (Philem. 24; Philipp. iv. 3; 1 Thess. iii. 2). This clause is not however parallel with Philipp. iv. 3 or 1 Thess. iii. 2. For though The Truth may here run into a personal meaning and may signify Him who said "I am the Truth" (John xiv. 6), yet we are here called upon to become fellow-workers to or for, not with, The Truth.

9. There are several readings here, of which the most important is—"Thou wrotest somewhat" (ἐγραψάς τι, B). This reading has been supposed to be of a very subtle character, introduced by a copyist, to whom it seemed a double unsuitability (1) that a writing of an inspired Apostle should have perished, and (2) that Diotrephes should have had the power to reject it, both of which are involved in the T. R. I wrote somewhat. The common reading, however, seems to give a satisfactory sense. St John informs Caius that he had written to the Church, of which that gentle and hospitable Christian was a valued member, but he has reason to know that Diotrephes would not receive or obey his Apostolic bidding. He, therefore, implicitly warns Caius to be careful that the contents of this letter, at least, should be made known to the Church. Rothe supposes—and the supposition has internal probability—that Diotrephes was a bishop. (See supra, Introd.) The temptation of young and haughty bishops to excommunicate hastily and unjustly is vividly illustrated by Augustine's remonstrance with the youthful Auxilius and his sympathetic note to Classicianus, who had suffered this wrong. 'Epist.' ccl.

Diotrephes, who loveth to have pre-eminence over them] (ὁ φιλοπρωτεύων αὐτῶν). The word might almost be rendered, "who affects primacy over them." Ecclesiastical ambition would seem to St John in particular against the mind of Christ (Matt. xx. 28), especially the words ὁς ἐὰν θέλῃ ἐν ὑμῖν εἶναι πρῶτος, v. 27, to which we may refer.

them] i.e. the individuals comprised in the collective word "the Church."

receiveth us not] "Our apostleship, our authority, our brethren, our letters, our injunctions," (à Lap.) "Hence so many Churches are, in a sense, all first, all apostolic, while all cling to one unity. They have communion of peace, the mutual address of brotherhood, the common watchword of hospitality ("contesseratio hospitalitatis"). (Tertullian, 'De Præscript.' xx.)

10. if I come] (ἐὰν ἔλθω). This expresses uncertainty with some small amount of probability—if I shall come, which is not quite impossible (Donaldson, 'Gr. Gr.' pt. v. ch. 11. § ii. p. 501, 'Conditional Propositions'). In sentiment this verse is a softened echo of 1 Cor. iv. 21; 2 Cor. x. 11, xiii. 1, 2, 3.

I will remember] bring to remembrance—the same word as in Joh. xiv. 26. To "bring evil deeds to remembrance" is practically to reproach, bring to shame. Hence ὑπομνήσκω is sometimes used in this sense. (See Demosth. quoted by Bretsch. in loc.) prating against us with wicked words] (λόγοις πονηροῖς φλυαρῶν ἡμᾶς). Diotrephes is habitually a doer of works, whose character is defined by the character of his words; nay, those words are works. The words are light and reckless, bubbles, yet wicked. The sketch, short, and touched with an old man's trembling pen, reminds us of the dramatic element so marked in the fourth Gospel.

and not contented hereupon, neither doth he himself receive the brethren, and forbiddeth them that would] The very unusual construction in this verse is quite Johannic. Cf. St John's Gospel, iv. 11. The construction must be thus understood. St John mentions the schismatic exclusion of Diotrephes—"He receiveth us not." Then the Apostle interposes a brief indignant parenthesis ("For this cause, if I come, I will, &c."). Then he resumes his account of Diotrephes—"and further, not contented,"—Diotrephes was schismatical, not heretical.

casteth them out] (ἐκβάλλω). A Johannic word for excommunication (Gospel, ix. 34, 35).

11. Beloved, follow not that which is evil] Imitate not. The verb is applied in New Testament both (a) to persons (2 Thess. iii. 7, 9), and (b) to things (Heb. xiii. 7). See Bretsch. 'Lex. Man. N. T.' s. v. and cf. Reiche, 'Comment. Crit.' on 1 Pet. iii. 13, where he argues in favour of "imitators" as the true reading (Tom. III. p. 263). The words imitate that which is good are the motto and principle of Saints' Days in the Church's calendar, and of religious biography. See a vivid instance of "imitation of that which is good" brought about by reading the life of Antonius. (St Augustine, 'Confess.'

that doeth good is of God: but he that doeth evil hath not seen God.

12 Demetrius hath good report of all men, and of the truth itself: yea, and we also bear record; and ye know that our record is true.

13 I had many things to write, but I will not with ink and pen write unto thee:

14 But I trust I shall shortly see thee, and we shall speak [†]face to [†]Gr. ^{mouth to mouth.} face. Peace be to thee. Our friends salute thee. Greet the friends by name.

VIII. 6.) The relation of Caius to the Gospel of St John (p. 371) makes me refer the imitation of that which is good to the example of Jesus. We have here a treatise De Imitatione Christi in three words. The link of connection is "Do not imitate Diotrephes, rather make Demetrius your type of Christian life."

He that doeth good] The article with present participle. He whose general principle of life and conduct is doing good. The word, and its kindred substantives, are favourites with St Peter, to whom active benevolence was so conspicuous an aspect of Christianity (cf. 1 Pet. ii. 14, 15, 20, iii. 6, 17, iv. 19), and who summed up Christ's character as manifested in His passage through life in one word (ἐνεργῶν, Acts x. 38).

hath not seen God] A truly Johannic thought and expression (1 John iii. 6).

12. To Demetrius witness is borne. The pft. is used in strict accordance with its proper import, viz. the past is expressed in relation to the present. The witness has been given and now stands. (See Winer, pt. III. § xi. p. 287.)

and by the truth itself] "The testimony even of all men may be deceived; the testimony of the Truth cannot be deceived. The testimony of the truth itself is the testimony of God, who is the highest Truth, of Christ who says, 'I am the Truth' (John xiv. 6). Blessed be who has this testimony!" (à Lap.).

and we also are bearing witness] The Truth here may, however, not impossibly signify Christ Himself. Can it be that St John is referring to the opening chapters of the Apocalypse, and that Demetrius may have been one of the angels of the Seven Churches to whom Jesus, the Truth, bore witness, in one of the Apocalyptic Epistles? The passage is intensely Johannic. (1) The Johannic correlatives, witness and the Truth, are found together. (2) The Johannic idea of threefold witness pervades the passage. It is another application of one thought in 1 John v. 6—10 on a lower range and more contracted scale. Demetrius has three witnesses (a) the world (ὑπὸ πάντων), (b) Jesus (ἡ ἀληθεία), (c) the Church, specially including St John himself (καὶ ἡμεῖς μαρτυροῦμεν, κ.τ.λ.; cf. John xxi. 24). (The comparatively modern conjecture that Demetrius is "the silversmith" of Acts xix.

24 may or may not be true. The name certainly belongs to the Ephesian surroundings. See Additional Note.)

and ye know] There is high authority for thou knowest (A, B, C, N and the Coptic version). But the reading seems suspiciously like a copyist's gloss or correction, to whom the idea occurred that the Epistle was addressed to Caius alone, and that, therefore, ye know was out of place. But the Epistle was evidently not intended to be kept strictly private by Caius (vv. 10, 11). "The plural embraces Caius' companions, faithful rulers of the Church, and the whole assembly, for whose use the letter was intended" (Reiche, 'Comm. Crit.' in loc.).

that our witness is true] A sort of mark of St John (xix. 35). See Introd. to this Epistle, p. 373, note 2.

13. I had many things to have written, but I am not willing to be writing] The Epistolary aorist in the first clause, and the present in the second clause, are alike appropriate.

with ink and pen] The original signifies black pigment and reed. "The prep. διὰ denotes through the medium of; that through which the result passes; which lies between the will to do the act and the completion of the act" (Winer, pt. II. § xlvii. p. 396).

ink] Three times mentioned in Scripture, 2 Cor. iii. 3; 2 John v. 12, and in this verse.

14. I am hoping straightway to see thee.

15. The friends...Greet the friends] The word and idea are not common in the New Testament. The beautiful exceptions are Luke xii. 4; John xi. 11, xv. 14, above all xv. 15. Friendship is transfigured and elevated into something better—fraternity. The friends here (οἱ φίλοι, τοὺς φίλους) must not be taken out of the Johannic context. "The friends," in St John's mind, are not only mutual friends, but the friends of Jesus. That which was said of Abraham as the friend of God (2 Chro. xx. 7; Isai. xli. 8), or of Moses to whom the Lord spake "as a man speaketh unto his friend" (Exod. xxviii. 11), is more deeply true of the friends of Jesus (John xv. 15). See the exquisitely beautiful sermon in which South draws out the privileges of friendship, and shews their consummation in the friendship of our Lord for His people: (1) freedom of access, (2) favourable construction, (3) sympathy in sorrow, (4) communication of thought, (5) counsel in difficulty, (6) constancy and perpetuity. ('Sermons,' XIV. Vol. I. 291—308.) "The friends," then, are those who in the new relation of Christian fraternity do not lose the fine natural humanity of friendship, but rather have it elevated and purified. But these are also within the circle of St John's thought those whom Jesus calls friends. (Gospel, xv. 15.)

by name] May we not see a beautiful allusion to the Good Shepherd "calling His own sheep by name?" (John x. 8.) These simple words are the last which we can trace up to the heart and pen of St John. Their quiet tender individualism forms a fitting transition from the superhuman dignity of the Apostolate, to the more ordinary pastoral office. Something of the Apostle's mind may yet breathe in some of the Liturgies, but what and how much is absolutely uncertain. ("Liturgia Hispanica minimè a Romanâ, probabilius a Gallicanâ...et inde ab Epbesinâ Ecclesiâ originem duxisse." See Neale, 'Tetral. Liturg.' Prefat. XXVIII., and his reference to Lesl. 'de Liturg. Goth.' v. vi.) A hush as of evening rests upon the close of the note.

ADDITIONAL NOTES on vv. 3, 4, 7, 8, 12.

3. 'Αληθής, ἀλήθεια (connected with λήθω λαθεῖν) in classical Greek signifies that which is unconcealed, and therefore true, real as opposed to false or apparent. Looking back over the writings of St John from this point, we conclude that the various meanings of the word ἀλήθεια may be classed as follows.

I. Truth objective.

1. Living and embodied.

(a) IN THE SON.

Ἐγώ εἰμι ἡ ὁδὸς καὶ ἡ ἀλήθεια καὶ ἡ ζωὴ¹, John xiv. 6. To this there may be special (but not exclusive) reference, when our Lord speaks of the Holy Ghost as The Spirit (not of truth, but of) THE TRUTH. (τὸ Πνεῦμα τῆς ἀληθείας, xiv. 17, xv. 26, xvi. 13), i.e. not merely the Spirit to whom specially belongs the revelation of absolute Truth, but the Spirit of Christ who is The Truth.

(b) IN THE HOLY SPIRIT.

The Spirit of The Truth is also THE TRUTH. (τὸ μαρτυροῦν ὅτι τὸ π. ἐστὶν ἡ ἀλήθεια, "that the Spirit is THE TRUTH." 1 John v. 6.)

2. Embodied in the sum-total of the revelation of Jesus, as the reflection of the mind of God, and therefore the absolute truth (John i. 17, viii. 32, 40, 45, xvi. 13, xvii. 17, xviii. 37; 1 John ii. 21; 2 John 1).

[In many passages the meanings (1 a) and (2) run into each other, in the same way as the Personal Word and the word spoken or written, e.g. John v. 33; 1 John ii. 19; 2 John 2; 3 John 12.]

II. The Truth received passes subjectively into The Truth in us (1 John i. 8, ii. 4; 2 John 2; μαρτυρούντων σου τῇ ἀληθείᾳ, 3 John 3). Hence:

¹ The root of this great utterance of the Son of God is in the words יְהוָה אֱלֹהֵינוּ יְהוָה אֱלֹהֵינוּ "The Lord God is Truth; He, even God, is Life" (Jer. x. 10).

(a) Truth in thought, consisting in the accord of thought with being, conformity of our conceptions to that Truth which is the ideal and unerring standard¹ (1 John ii. 21; 2 John 1).

(b) Truth in action. As The Truth covers the whole extent of human nature, right action is that Truth made visible and projected outwardly in conduct (ὁ δὲ ποιῶν τὴν ἀλήθειαν, John iiii. 21; οὐ ποιοῦμέν τὴν ἀλήθειαν, 1 John i. 6).

(c) Truth in speech—opposed not to the logical falsity which is a mistake, but to the ethical falsity which is a lie (anarthrous in viii. 44—46).

(d) Truth in actuality as opposed to appearance—the fact as opposed to the show (anarthrous in 1 John iii. 18. ἐν ἀληθείᾳ, really, with true love, 2 John 1; 3 John 1; cf. vv. 3, 4).

4. greater] μείζονα (cf. for form ελαχιστοτέρω, Ephes. iii. 8), a poetical comparative formed from a comparative (cf. "Now that I am more better than Prospero," 'Tempest,' Act II. scene 1). Note in the μείζονα...ἵνα ἀκούω an almost peculiarly Johannic use of ἵνα; cf. 1 John iv. 17 (Winer, Pt. III. § xlv. p. 255).

7. of the Gentiles] ἀπὸ τῶν ἐθνῶν. Text. Recept. Ἑθνικῶν is read in A, B, C, &, and received into the text by Tischend. But it has the air of a gloss. For ἔθνη is a very ambiguous word. (a) It stands for non-Judæan races generally, with no religious allusion; (b) for persons geographically outside Palestine, including Jews of the dispersion; (c) for the nations as idolatrous; (d) for non-Judæan Christians (Rom. xi. 13, xv. 27, xvi. 4; Gal. ii. 12—14). But, as its more solemn use included idolatry (Matt. vi. 32, x. 18; Acts iii. 45; 1 Cor. v. 1), and as it is so used here, it seemed that ἔθνη might express the thought with less ambiguity (Matt. v. 47, vi. 7, xviii. 17). See this point very fully in Reiche, 'Comm. Crit.

taking nothing of the Gentiles. "After verbs of receiving, borrowing, &c., ἀπὸ has merely the general meaning of absence. (Matt. xvii. 25.) In the expression λαμβάνει παρὰ τίνος the τις denotes the person actually tendering or delivering. In 3 John 7 the Apostle would have used παρὰ and not ἀπὸ (τῶν ἔθνων) if the meaning had been that the Gentiles had actually tendered a present." Winer, Part III. § xlvii. 388, note 1.

8. therefore] οὖν occurs with special frequency in the Gospel of St John. (About 220 times, against 50 in St Matthew, 11 in St Mark, 45 in St Luke, 68 in Acts.) The word is probably a contraction from εἰς οὖν, quod quum ita sit (Kühner's 'Gr. Gr.' by Jelf, § 737), and thus in some measure illustrates the old English argumentative use of being (e.g. "being the object of faith is supposed infallibly true; being it is the nature of truth not to hide itself." 'Exposition of Creed,' Bp Pearson, Art. 1.) It is scarcely accurate to speak of it as the most properly syllogistic of the inferential particles with Winer (cf. 'Gr. of N. T. Diction,' Part III. § lxiii. 8 a. with what is said of the ἀπα conclusivum of logical inference and other particles of consequence. Donaldson, 'Gr. Gr.' 571, 31; Kühner's 'Gr. Gr.' by Jelf, §§ 787—791). In St John's Gospel οὖν is seldom merely resumptive or continuative. The instances given by Winer of the continuative οὖν appear to be somewhat questionable. This frequent recurrence of οὖν is the natural and spontaneous tribute of St John's mind to the divine connection of all things in the Redeemer's life to the reasonable, religious, necessary consequence of every part and incident of that History which is not "a maze without a plan," but the highest manifestation of law in the region of human history. The narrative of the human development of the life of the Word made Flesh is interlinked throughout by causes more essentially connected with their effects than "the sound of the bell with going to chapel." Hence οὖν is naturally frequent in St John's Gospel to express not merely continuity of narrative, but inter-volution of events—not logical but historical inference. But the same habit of thought which views sacred history in this light is precisely that which in the region of theology is essentially dogmatic. And an inspired dogmatic theologian will write oracularly, not inferentially like a schoolman. The inferential οὖν of the regular treatise is, therefore, naturally absent from St John's Epistles, until we come at last to an historical statement in 3 John v. 7, where he draws a moral inference from it in v. 8 (ἡμεῖς οὖν ὀφείλομεν). This is probably the sole instance of οὖν in these Epistles. (In 1 John ii. 24 it has no authority—some however in iv. 19.)

12. Demetrius was an Ephesian name (Acts xix. 24). An architect called Demetrius is also mentioned by Vitruvius (see Introd. to 1 John). The idea that the silversmith, Demetrius, the agitator of his guild, may have been the very Demetrius, so honourably mentioned in this place, is of comparatively modern origin (Comm. à Lap. 'Comment. in Scrip. S.' xx. p. 646). But the conjecture has nothing in the least improbable. The accurate version of the addresses of the silversmith, Demetrius, to his fellow-craftsmen (Acts xix. 25—28), and of the "town-clerk" to the people of Ephesus (ibid. 35—41), would seem to imply the possession of documents or of private information by St Luke, which had been afforded by one or other of the speakers in a spirit friendly to Christianity. The very vehemence of the language of Demetrius against St Paul (v. 26) betrays an uneasy sense of the fascinating power of his teaching. And the record of these expressions of Demetrius would be deeply interesting to those readers of the Acts who knew that the maker of the "silver shrines of Diana" had resigned all hope of gaining wealth by his old occupation, and became convinced of St Paul's great principle, "that they be no gods which are made with hands."

ADDITIONAL NOTE on 1 JOHN II. 11.

Since this note was in type, the writer has met with the following sentences in a remarkable paper on the application of the laws of Degeneration and Reversion to Type in the Spiritual world, by Professor H. Drummond, F.R.S.E.

"There are certain burrowing animals—"like the mole for instance—which have taken "to spend their lives beneath the surface of the "ground. And nature has taken her revenge
"upon them in this thoroughly natural way—
"by closing up their eyes. If they mean to "live in darkness, she argues, eyes are clearly

"a superfluous function. By neglecting them,
"these animals make it clear they do not want "them. And as one of Nature's fixed prin"ciples is that nothing shall exist in vain, the "eyes are presently taken away or reduced to "a rudimentary state. Similarly, there are "fishes which have had to pay the same forfeit
"by taking up their abode in dark caverns,
"where eyes are never required. And in "exactly the same way the spiritual eye must "die and lose its power by purely natural "law if the soul choose to walk in darkness
"rather than in light."

ADDITIONAL NOTE on 1 JOHN III. 2.

The writer has been favoured by a correspondent with the following careful note.

"The following may be given as arguments
"in favour of an amended rendering. 'It "never yet was manifested what we shall be,
"but we know if it were manifested.'

"i. The marked antithesis in the Greek
"οὐπω ἐφανερώθη...ἐὰν φανερωθῇ.

"ii. The more evident sense in the English.

"iii. If 'when He shall appear' were in"tended, should we not expect ὅταν φανε-
"ρωθῇ, as in v. 28 of the preceding chapter?

"iv. ἐὰν is used about 15 times in St John's
"Epistles, and about 30 times in his Gospel,

THIS Epistle though brief has been the subject of much controversy. In treating of the points which have come under debate it will be convenient to adopt the following order :

I. THE WRITER.

The writer calls himself (v. 1) "Jude the brother of James." Now in the primitive Christian times, and among the Judæo-Christians for whom this Epistle, from the character of its contents, must have been intended, there was only one person, after the martyrdom of James the brother of John by the order of Herod Agrippa I. (Acts xii. 2), who could have been spoken of simply as "James" without further description, and whom all men from such brief mention might be expected to recognize. This was the James who presided over the Church in Jerusalem (Acts xii. 17, xv. 13, xxi. 18; 1 Cor. xv. 7; Gal. ii. 9, 12), who is usually spoken of as bishop there, and who in Gal. i. 19 is called "the Lord's brother." Thus the writer of the present Epistle claims to be the Judas named among the brethren of the Lord in Matt. xiii. 55; Mark vi. 3. He seems (v. 17) to state by implication that he was not an Apostle, "Remember ye the words which have been spoken before by the Apostles of our Lord Jesus Christ, how that they said to you," &c. But that we cannot base a positive conclusion on such language is evident from Acts v. 29, where it is said, "Then Peter and the Apostles answered," &c., an expression which no one would interpret as excluding Peter from the Apostolic band.

But there are some further considerations which appear to confirm the construction which may be put on the writer's own words. If St Jude was not an Apostle neither would St James be one. Now in St James' Epistle (which is by all admitted to be the writing of the Bishop of Jerusalem) there is the same absence of any claim to be of the number of the Apostles as we find in St Jude. He calls himself merely "James a servant of God and of the Lord Jesus Christ," words which bear a marked resemblance to the form which St Jude employs. If they were both Apostles it is very remarkable that in neither Epistle do we discover anything that gives an intimation thereof, while in one we have words which may fairly be taken to imply that St Jude was not an Apostle. Again, the statement (John vii. 5) that, at a time not long before the Crucifixion, the brethren of Jesus did not believe on Him, points in the same direction. It is true that the "brethren of the Lord" are mentioned (Acts i. 14) as assembled at Jerusalem with the rest to wait for the outpouring of the Spirit on the day of Pentecost. But the way in which they are there spoken of severs them from the Apostolic body rather than includes them in its number. After the mention of the eleven by name we are told, "These all continued with one accord in prayer and supplication with the women and Mary the mother of Jesus, and with his brethren." A sentence could hardly be framed which should emphasize more pointedly the distinction between "Apostles" and "the Lord's brethren." The latter are also placed last in the enumeration, as if they had most recently been included among the believers. The change in their feeling towards Jesus since His death and resurrection has been thought to be sufficiently explained by the words of St Paul (1 Cor. xv. 7), that the Lord had been "seen of James" on one special occasion after he was risen from the dead. It has been argued from this verse, and from the language of Gal. i. 19, that St Paul includes this James among the Apostles. But the term Apostle was not restricted by St Paul to the twelve, but is applied in the New Testament to Paul himself, to Barnabas, and apparently (Rom. xvi. 7) to Andronicus and Junias. It seems therefore more in accordance with the evidence which we possess to conclude (1) that the writer of the Epistle of St Jude was a different person from the Apostle Jude, who appears also to have had the names Lebbæus and Thaddæus (cf. Matt. x. 3; Mark iii. 18, with Luke vi. 15; Acts i. 13), and about whom St John (xiv. 22), when he wants to distinguish him, uses the words "not Iscariot;" (2) that he was the brother of James, known in the early Church as the Just, and who presided over the Church at Jerusalem during the period embraced in the latter portion of the Acts of the Apostles, and who was one of the "brethren of the Lord." That neither James nor Jude allude to this close connexion with Jesus may be explained from a natural desire not to seem to lay stress on a position in respect of the Founder of Christianity to which none of the other Disciples or Apostles could have a claim, and this feeling would be the stronger in them because they had so long rejected the teaching of Him to whom in humility they now both alike call themselves (δοῦλοι) band-servants.

2. PERSONS FOR WHOM THE EPISTLE WAS WRITTEN.

The Epistle is addressed to Christians who had been Jews. This is the reason why the writer calls himself "brother of James." For we learn from Eusebius ('H. E.' ii. 23) that all the Jewish people, not the Christians only, held James the Bishop of Jerusalem in high regard. Moreover all the illustrations that are used in the letter are those of a Jew writing for Jews. The deliverance from Egypt, the fallen angels, the cities of the plain, the legend of Michael's contention with Satan, the references to Cain, Balaam, and Korah, as well as the prophecy ascribed to Enoch, are all found in a very brief space, and are touched upon in such a manner as could be edifying to none save those who were familiar not only with Old Testament Scripture, but also with Jewish traditions.

3. ITS AUTHENTICITY.

When we consider the brevity of St Jude's Epistle, and that it was, though now called Catholic, addressed in the first instance only to a small section of the Christian Church, we need not be surprised that it did not receive great recognition from the early Christian writers. It is mentioned in the Muratorian Canon, which may be taken as representing the opinion of the Western Church soon after the middle of the second century. Clement of Alexandria (A.D. 165—200) quotes from the Epistle ('Strom.' iii. 2. 11), and in a summary of the works of that Father, given by Eusebius ('H. E.' vi. 14), it is said that St Jude was included among the books on which Clement wrote short explanations. Origen (A.D. 186—253) speaks of the Epistle in one place ('Comm. in Matth.' T. x. 17) in terms of high praise, as being "short indeed, but filled with language powerful with heavenly grace," though elsewhere (T. xvii. 30) he seems to have doubts as to its authority. Tertullian (A.D. 200) speaks of the Epistle of St Jude (De cultu feminarum, 3) as a portion of accepted Scripture. For he is desirous to uphold the authority of the Book of Enoch, and after several arguments he closes the chapter, "Moreover Enoch is testified unto by Jude the Apostle." As he calls the Epistle the work of an Apostle, we may be sure that it was held as a portion of the New Testament in Northern Africa in his day. And that this was so is further shewn by a passage in a treatise¹ generally included among the works of Cyprian, Bishop of Carthage (A.D. 200—258), where Jude 14, 15 is directly quoted.

Again in Eusebius ('H. E.' vii. 30) we have preserved a letter of Malchion, a presbyter at Antioch, written to the bishops of Alexandria and Rome concerning the heretical teaching of Paul of Samosata, and therefore of the date A.D. 260—270, in which he uses the words of Jude 3, 4 in describing the errors against which his letter is directed.

Nevertheless Eusebius (A.D. 325) himself ('H. E.' iii. 24) classes the Epistle of St Jude among the ἀντιλεγόμενα, by which he means those books about which, though well known and recognized by most, there has been some controversy, and it is not quoted or alluded to by Irenæus, nor included in the Syriac versions of the New Testament, which last fact shews us that in one branch of the Christian Church it was either not known or not received for Canonical in the second century, to the middle of which the Peshito version may be most fairly assigned. But that we may estimate rightly the value of evidence concerning the omission of any quotation from St Jude in the writings of one of the Fathers, even though his works be voluminous, it should be observed that we have no notice of our Epistle in the whole of the writings of St Chrysostom, who died A.D. 407, but yet in a dialogue² composed at Rome by Palladius a friend of Chrysostom concerning that Father's life, we have a direct quotation from St Jude. So that in the case of such brief composition the argument from the silence of any of the Fathers ought not to be too closely pressed. The conclusion, which we can draw from such evidence as has come down to us, is that in the Western Church the Epistle won its way to acceptance at an earlier date than in the East. It was known in Italy and the Churches of Northern Africa, and in Alexandria, by the middle or latter part of the second century, while at the commencement of the fourth century its acceptance in the East was not general. Whether any inference can be drawn from these data as to place where it was first circulated, or the Churches to which it was addressed, is not easy to decide. But Jerome writing in the fourth century gives a reason for the non-acceptance of the Epistle which probably had weight with many of the early Christians. He says ('Catal. Scr. Eccl.' 4), "Because in it Jude derives a testimony from the book of Enoch, which is apocryphal, it is rejected by most." But at the Council of Laodiceæ (A.D. 363) when the canon of the New Testament was first settled authoritatively, and when there would be more evidence for and against the Epistle accessible than we now possess, it was received among the Canonical Books, as also at the Council of Carthage (A.D. 397), and there seems no reason, in spite of the objections raised against it in early times, for questioning its authenticity.

4. DATE AND PLACE OF WRITING.

Concerning the time when the Epistle was written there is not much to guide us, nor in reference to the place where it was composed. From the notice of the descendants of Jude the brother of the Lord preserved by Eusebius ('H. E.' iii. 19, 20) from Hegesippus, we should conclude that they were resident in Palestine and had always lived there. It seems natural therefore to suppose that the Epistle was written somewhere in that country for the Jewish converts to Christianity. If, as seems to be intimated by Hegesippus in the passage just alluded to, St Jude was dead in the time of Domitian, we shall perhaps not be far wrong in assigning the composition to about A.D. 80. The arguments which have been put forward for an earlier date, because it is assumed that in a letter of such a character the writer would not have failed to mention the destruction of Jerusalem as an illustration, had that event already taken place, must not be looked upon as conclusive. For the brevity of the letter is such as to deprive them of their force, and the very recentness of the overthrow of the Holy City would prevent its destruction from entering as yet into such history as might be used for pointing a moral.

Yet there are words in the Epistle which bear somewhat on the question of date. The writer exhorts his readers to remember the words which have been spoken by the Apostles. Now ῥῆμα is specially used of that which is pronounced and heard. We should conclude therefore from its use here, that the writer is addressing those who had listened to the oral teaching of the Apostles. He must therefore have been a contemporary of the Apostles himself. And for it to be possible for him to assume the earnest tone of admonition which he here employs, he must have been a person to whom mature age had given weight of character. It may be also, as the words were spoken, that he himself had been present at such preaching as that to which he alludes. Indeed that the writer had heard such lessons given to those to whom he writes is made very probable by his language in the following verse, "Remember...how that they said to you." There is hardly any natural construction to be put on such a reminder except that he who gives it had himself listened to the teaching, the memory of which he desires to revive in his readers. All this is consistent with St Jude being a fellow-labourer with the Apostles in the cities of Palestine, with his living on even past the destruction of Jerusalem, and taking a warm interest in all the Churches which were established in that country. It cannot lead us to any precise date, but it suits only those early days when a generation was alive to whom the Apostles had given oral teaching on the life of Christ and its lessons. As we place the Epistle from grammatical and other considerations after 2nd Peter, its composition must be assigned to the period between A. D. 65—80.

5. RELATION TO SECOND PETER.

The relation of St Jude's Epistle to the second Epistle of St Peter has been already discussed at length in the Introduction to the latter Epistle. But it may be added here that if St Peter's Epistle be the later composition and the work of some very clever imitator of that Apostle's style, it is very strange that he drew his material so largely from St Jude, an Epistle which, as we have seen, was among the controverted portion of the early Christian writings. There are beside some portions of St Jude's Epistle which seem to put St Peter's language into an objective form, and so demonstrate that St Jude was the later writer. For example St Peter (ii. 1) speaks of those who deny the Lord that bought them, and bring upon themselves swift destruction. St Jude having this, as we believe, before him gives an instance of the destruction at which St Peter had only hinted. For immediately after the mention of those "who deny our Lord God and Jesus Christ" he does not continue as St Peter did, but adds "I will put you in remembrance how that the Lord having saved the people out of the land of Egypt, afterwards destroyed them that believed not," thus emphasizing by an illustration the destruction of the ungodly.

It should be noted too that from the exigency under which (as he tells us) he wrote, St Jude was the more likely to adapt materials which lay ready to his hand. He had purposed (verse 3) to write a general Epistle concerning "the common salvation," but learning that there was need for a special and immediate letter of warning, he writes that at once. What more natural than, if he knew St Peter's predictive letter written in anticipation of what was now become an actual fact, that he should take that and use all in it which suited his purpose, only giving to the language such modifications as to fit it to the graver character of the times?

It should also be noticed that there are some passages in St Jude which look like an elaboration of what St Peter had previously written, but can scarcely be understood if the contrary order of composition be maintained. Thus St Peter (ii. 4) speaks merely of the angels when they sinned, as cast down and kept (τηρημένους, A. V. reserved) unto judgment. St Jude elaborates this and by employing the same verb twice over in his sentence, plays upon the sense in a way which, with a knowledge of the Jewish fondness for such antithesis, we cannot believe that a copyist (as some suppose St Peter to have been) would have failed to reproduce. The words of St Jude (6) are "The angels which kept not (μὴ τηρήσαντες) their first estate, but left their proper habitation, he hath kept (τετήρηκεν) in everlasting bonds under darkness unto the judgment of the great day."

And in like manner in another passage (2 Pet. ii. 12) St Peter's words seem the simple statement in extension of which St Jude has afterwards made a most pointed distinction. What seems to be naturally the earlier sentence speaks of the false teachers as "creatures without reason, mere animal natures, things to be taken and destroyed, railing in matters whereof they are ignorant." On this St Jude dwells and brings into strong contrast the sense which as animals they have by nature, and their want of knowledge in those things about which they speak evil. He writes (as St Peter had written), "These rail at whatsoever things they know not," but St Jude alone continues "and what they understand naturally like the creatures without reason in these things are they corrupted." It appears in the highest degree improbable that if St Peter had been the later writer he would, in his imitation, have failed to reproduce a passage which is far more pointed than the sentence which we have in his own Epistle.

These are points which are specially noticeable in St Jude's Epistle, and which combined with what has been said in the Introduction to 2 Peter, make it far more likely that St Jude knew and used St Peter's work, than that the opposite was the order in which the Epistles were written.

Examples are not wanting in the Old Testament where writers have copied either from one another or from some common source. Cf. Is. ii. 2—4 with Mic. iv. 1—3, also Joel iii. 16—21 with Amos i. 2 and ix. 11—15, &c.

6. CONTENTS OF THE EPISTLE.

The Epistle opens with the salutation and an invocation of a blessing on those to whom it is addressed (1, 2).

The writer was minded to have sent a letter dealing with the general doctrines of Christ's religion, but he is constrained to write at once a special Epistle, for false teachers are risen up against whom they must be warned (3, 4).

He would put his readers in mind that among the people brought up from Egypt faithless men were found whom God destroyed; even angels that sinned God has kept in bonds for judgment; and has left the overthrow of the cities of the plain as a warning for after times lest they should sin in like manner. But the false teachers of whom he speaks do commit like gross sins, and despise all authorities, giving free rein to their mere animal nature (5, 10).

Continuing his description he classes these offenders with sinners like Cain and Balaam and Korah. They are the blemishes on the Christian community, self-seeking, making large promises but with no prospect of performance, disappointing all hope, and shamelessly publishing their own disgrace. Of these and of their judgment Enoch has prophesied (11—16). He turns now to exhortation, and bids his readers remember that such mockers had been foretold by the Apostles, and now they have appeared. But let the faithful hold firm to the end, praying and watching for the mercy of Christ, 17—21.

He then teaches how to act towards the offenders (22, 23), and with a solemn ascription concludes his brief letter (24, 25).

7. THE BOOK OF ENOCH, &c.

We know the Book of Enoch now only from the Æthiopic versions, copies of which were brought from Abyssinia towards the end of last century by the traveller, Bruce. An edition of this translation, which had been made from a Greek version, was published by Archbishop Lawrence in 1838, and the same editor had previously published three editions of a translation of the Book into English. A most complete edition of the Æthiopic text and also a German translation thereof have been since published at Leipzig (1851 and 1853) by Dr A. Dillmann, and this leaves little to be desired so far as the Æthiopic version is concerned.

But the book was known in the early centuries of Christianity, and passages are quoted from it in the Chronography of Georgius Syncellus, a monkish historian who lived at Constantinople at the end of the eighth and beginning of the ninth century. His extracts were no doubt made from a copy of the work in Greek, as were those which appear to indicate a knowledge of the book in Justin Martyr and Anatolius, and the quotations in Clemens Alexandrinus and Origen, and in the Testaments of the twelve Patriarchs. It may also with most probability be assumed that it was from a Greek version that Tertullian and Augustine drew their knowledge. It is, however, most likely that the original was in some dialect of Hebrew, judging from the names given to the angels and the winds, and we have evidence that a work known as the Book of Enoch was in use among the Jews down to a late date in the Christian era, though it is not now to be found. The Book of Enoch is frequently alluded to in the Zohar, and if what Tertullian says (De cultu fem. 3), concerning its rejection by the Jews because it spake of Christ, be admitted, the absence of all notice of it in earlier Jewish literature seems to be accounted for. The style of the whole book however is that of the Jewish writings of a date about the time of the Christian era.

From whatever quarters the writer gathered his materials they are all hung on one string, and this stamps the book, even as we have it, with unity in its composition, and the opinion of students now most generally inclines to place its date some short time previous to the Christian era. So that St Jude's words may very well have been a quotation proper.

For a full account of the book the reader must consult Dillmann's 'Liber Henoch,' 1850, and 'das Buch Henoch,' 1853. Much further information may be gathered concerning the whole contents of the book from Dr Westcott's article in the 'Dictionary of the Bible.'

In the notes on this Epistle and 2nd Peter mention has also been made of the Zohar and Jalkut as authorities in Jewish literature, it seems therefore desirable to add a few words about the character and date of these works¹.

¹ I should have felt unable to speak of these important books as they deserve, had I not been aided in my enquiries by the learning and kindness of my friend the Rev. Dr Schiller-Szinessy, Reader in Rabbinic and Talmudic in the Uni-

Although the Zohar became first known in Europe through the Jews in Spain in the 13th century, yet with the exceptions of (a) some portions by which the main work is surrounded, and which can without difficulty be distinguished and severed from the original composition, and (b) some interpolations by which it is here and there disfigured and damaged, it is a work, at the latest, of the sixth or seventh century of our era. This is proved (1) by the character of the language of the older portion, and (2) by the contents which were current in Palestine and Babylonia before and at the date just mentioned. The language shews that the work was composed in Palestine, and such being the case we can understand why it was not brought to Europe at an earlier date, from the statement (T. J. 'Synhedrin,' III. 9 [ed. princeps III. 10]) where it is forbidden to carry books belonging to Palestine unto places "without the land." The Zohar was no doubt sent by Nachmanides (flor. 1267) to his son and to his disciples in Spain on the principle (oft mentioned in Jewish literature in explanation of Ps. cxix. 126), that one may on certain occasions break the Law, when the non-observance thereof is its best support. (Cf. T. B. 'Menachoth,' 99 a, last line, and 'Berachoth,' 63 a.) Rabbi Shimeon ben Jochai was the author of the Zohar, in the same sense that Rabbi Jochanan was the author of the Talmud Jerushalmi, i.e. he gave the first impulse to the composition of the book, though it was no doubt not finished for some hundreds of years after his time. Except by some Jews the Zohar has not been much studied or circulated because to translate it merely (however correctly that may be done) is to succeed in grasping only a very dry morsel; but to read the book with the comments of a teacher who has possession of the traditional explanations is a study which opens up questions of philosophy, and poetical thoughts of the grandest character.

The Jalkut (which as its name implies is a collection made from previously existing materials, and which is not the only versity of Cambridge, my obligations to whom in this and many other matters it gives me much pleasure here to acknowledge.

collection which bears this name) was for a long time looked upon as the work of a German Rabbi of the 14th or 15th century. It is now known to have been completed in the north of France in the 11th century, and the greater portion of its contents (as separate parts of earlier literature) has been traced back to the sixth century A.D. at the very latest, while some pieces reach back to a date before the Christian era.

With regard to the question whether the Epistle was written originally in Hebrew, what has been said in the Introduction to 2nd Peter applies equally to the present Epistle.

THE GENERAL EPISTLE

JUDE.

He exhorteth them to be constant in the profession of the faith. 4 False teachers are crept in to seduce them: for whose damnable doctrine and manners horrible punishment is prepared: 20 whereas the godly, by the assistance of the Holy Spirit, and prayers to God, may persevere, and grow in grace, and keep themselves, and recover others out of the snares of those deceivers.

JUDE, the servant of Jesus Christ, and brother of James, to them that are sanctified by God the Father, and preserved in Jesus Christ, and called:

2 Mercy unto you, and peace, and love, be multiplied.

1. Judas. This is the Greek form of the name which anciently belonged to Judah the son of Jacob. It was written in Hebrew יהודה, in which form are found all the four letters of the sacred name of God יהוה. Jewish commentators state that this was a prophetic intimation of the future glory of the tribe of Judah. In later times the Jewish reverence for the Tetragrammaton caused them to modify the original orthography of the name Judah, and they wrote it (1) יהודא, (2) they dropped the first ה, writing יודא, of which the Greek 'Ιούδας is the representative. It was naturally very common, and is borne by six other persons in the N. T. beside the writer of this Epistle.

a servant of Jesus Christ. The word servant (more exactly bondservant) has sometimes a restricted, sometimes a wider sense, in the New Testament. In the wider sense all the faithful may be called servants of Christ (cf. 1 Cor. vii. 22; Eph. vi. 6, &c.), but on the other hand those are specially so called who devoted their lives to the preaching of the Gospel and the spread of Christ's Church. The latter is the meaning of the word here (cf. Rom. i. 1; Phil. i. 1; James i. 1).

to them that are called, beloved in God the Father, and kept for Jesus Christ. The Christians for whom the Epistle was written were no doubt those to whom the description of the writer as "brother of James" was sufficient for his identification. They were therefore, in all likelihood, the Christians in Palestine among whom the bishop of Jerusalem would be well known, and whose name would be the weightiest introduction with which an Epistle could commence. These converts are called in the same manner as St Paul speaks of the Roman Christians (Rom. i. 7) as "called to be saints," and also to the Corinthians (1 Cor. i. 2) in like terms, though in the latter case he immediately proceeds to rebuke them for their unholy division. They are members of the visible Church of Christ, in that they have accepted the calling of God, and so are added unto those that are in the way of salvation (Acts ii. 47). As an expansion of the meaning of "called" the writer adds the defining clause which follows: beloved in God, &c.

The reading beloved is to be preferred, having most support from MSS., while sanctified (as A.V.) seems to have been adopted because less difficult to connect with the preposition in. Beloved in God when in connection with called implies most naturally those to whom God's love has been shewn in their call unto the kingdom of His Son. So, but with a different preposition (2 Thess. ii. 13), "Brethren beloved of the Lord." Here love towards His called ones is spoken of as a feeling which dwells in God the Father, and so the preposition has the force of "in respect of." In their relation to God they are beloved, and by God also are they kept for Jesus Christ. This keeping the Lord Himself performed for His disciples while on earth, and when the time of His departure drew nigh he committed them by His prayer to be kept by the Father (John xvii. 11, 12), and their keeping is to be from evil. Of such St Paul prays (1 Thess. v. 23), "May your whole spirit and soul and body be preserved blameless unto the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ." Whence we conclude that the dative of our text is not used of Christ as the agent in the preservation, but is best rendered for Jesus Christ. The A.V. has carried on the preposition in from the previous clause.

2. The prayer with which the salutation closes is much like those in the two Epistles of St Peter. The use of the verb be multiplied

3 Beloved, when I gave all diligence to write unto you of the common salvation, it was needful for me to write unto you, and exhort you that ye should earnestly contend for the faith which was once delivered unto the saints.

4 For there are certain men crept in unawares, who were before of old ordained to this condemnation, un-is rather Aramaic than Greek (cf. Dan. iv. 1; and the note on 1 Pet. i. 2). As in the somewhat similar forms (1 Tim. i. 2; 2 Tim. i. 2; Tit. i. 4), the prayer is not that mercy and peace and love may be more abundant among themselves toward one another, but that God may abundantly bestow upon them these gifts from Himself. In the Pastoral Epistles the words "from God the Father" are added in each prayer.

3. Beloved, while I was giving all diligence to write unto you of our common salvation, I was constrained to write unto you, and exhort you to contend earnestly for the faith which was once for all delivered to the saints. From these words we gather that St Jude had in mind some larger and more general address on the salvation wrought for all men by Christ's death, but circumstances forced him to lay aside that first purpose and to send a brief letter relative to those matters on which warning seemed at the moment to be most needed. What circumstances compelled him to this course we can gather from the contents of his letter. He sees that the prophetic words spoken by St Peter about false teachers and their heretical lessons (2 Pet. ii. 1) have received their fulfilment, and not only so, but heretical teachings have resulted in corrupt practice, and this calls forth his impassioned letter. His language is all directed against the sinful doings of those against whom he gives his warnings. They are licentious, insubordinate, rebellious, sinners like Cain and Balaam and Korah, they follow their own lusts and have not the Spirit. It may well have been under such circumstances that the more general work of an Epistle which dealt with the great truths and principles of the Christian religion should have been laid aside, and perhaps never again resumed, when the writer saw an immediate need presented to him, and one which called for present advice and exhortation. The words giving all diligence do not of necessity imply that the work of writing such a letter was already commenced, but only that this had been the writer's chief care, until his mind was diverted from it by a more pressing occasion for writing.

our common salvation. The insertion of the pronoun is on the authority of the earliest MSS. Salvation is called common in the same way as St Paul (Tit. i. 4) calls Titus his son "after the common faith;" that which has been offered to us all, and which we have all embraced. The constraint laid upon the writer was that which resulted from the sight and knowledge of the corruptions which had flowed forth from false teaching. So it is for pure teaching that he is urgent on his readers to contend. Faith (πίστις) here, as always in the New Testament, has no sense of any objective confession of faith already in existence, but means the lessons of Christ as published by His Apostles. But this teaching having once been given by the Apostles, there was to be no addition made thereto, no innovations introduced, as had been done by the teachers of whom St Peter wrote. The pernicious results of such perversions of the faith were now making themselves felt, and so it is not without reason that the writer of this Epistle places in the forefront of his letter that the faith has once for all been delivered to the saints, the belief in Christ which the new teachers had cast off.

Nothing could be more natural under the circumstances than that the writer of such a letter as this is intended to be, a letter of hortatory warning against existing and rampant evils of practice, should turn to a composition already set forth to the Christian world, and which spake with a prophetic insight concerning such evils before they were so glaringly apparent, and that he should ground his exhortations on the words of so eminent a forerunner as St Peter. Accordingly we find that in many parts of the remainder of the Epistle there is much resemblance to that part of the second Epistle of St Peter, in which the rise of false teachers had been foretold. Such repetition of another's words is not without numerous parallels in the writings of the Old Testament (see Introduction, § 5, ad fin.), and few things could be more impressive than to point out, as St Jude's Epistle does, the fulfilment of all that had been previously foreseen by a brother Apostle.

4. For there are certain men crept in unawares, even they who were of old set forth in Scripture unto this sentence, ungodly men, turning the grace of our God into lasciviousness, and denying our only Master and Lord, Jesus Christ.

The language of St Peter (ii. 1) is, "They shall bring in privily destructive heresies, denying even the Master, that bought them." And the whole character of that Apostle's exhortation points to a time before the evil teaching, against which he writes, had culminated in the evil living which ultimately ensued from it. Besides this he deals almost entirely with teaching: "the way of truth shall be evil spoken of:" "with feigned words shall they make merchandise of you:" while St Jude's language is all directed against the corrupt deeds from which he would protect his readers. His fear is of those who turn the grace of God into lasciviousness, defile the flesh, feed themselves without fear, who walk after their own lusts and are sensual. Of the stealthy introduction of adversaries into the ranks of Christians, who feigning a partial accord, should use their fellowship as means of working overthrow to the Church, St Paul speaks in similar language (Gal. ii. 4). The liberty which those traitors intended to spy out and abuse is that grace which in the present Epistle the writer declares to have been perverted unto sin. The action is very like that of the heretic Simon Magus (Acts viii. 9 seqq.), whose profession of faith can hardly have been sincere at first or his after conduct would have been different.

In the verb "set forth in Scripture" (προ-γεγραμμένοι) we are shewn that the previous publication of the judgment upon such men had been made in the Scriptures (γραφαί) of the Old Testament. Their turning back from their first profession was like the faithless conduct of Israel in the wilderness: their fall into sinful lusts like the ways of the fallen angels and the people of Sodom: their self-seeking, greed, and insubordinate lives, like those of Cain and Balaam and Korah. St Paul (Gal. iii. 1) uses the same word of the prophetic declarations which had been made concerning the crucifixion of Jesus.

The words this sentence refer to all the various forms of condemnation or punishment set forth in the examples which are afterwards noticed. The want of reverence implied in the word rendered ungodly is exactly the characteristic of the Gnostic teachers, who having begun, as it were, to weigh and measure the Divinity, allowed nothing to check their irreverent speculations, but proceeded till they had formed a system which was a caricature of the Christian revelation. But by the time when St Jude's Epistle was written the seeds of irreverence were bringing forth a crop of corruption. These men had turned the grace of God into lasciviousness. The first steps in this perversion arose from a misuse of the freedom of which so much is said in the Apostolic writings, "the glorious liberty of the children of God" (Rom. viii. 21). St Paul had found it needful to speak to the Galatian converts (Gal. v. 13) in warning against the Antinomian tendencies which a false conception of Christian liberty was in danger of engendering. "Use not your liberty for an occasion to the flesh." And St Peter (1 Pet. ii. 16) had given like caution: "Free, and not using your liberty for a cloke of wickedness." And that an unbridled license was the proffer of these heretical teachers we learn from 2 Pet. ii. 19. What they offered was what they themselves practised, and while promising their followers liberty, "they themselves were the bondservants of corruption." In the writings of the earliest Fathers (Justin Martyr, 'Dial. with Trypho,' chap. xxxv.; Irenæus, 'Against Heresies,' I. 6. 3) we find to what corrupt manners the lessons of these early heretics led the way. Some taught that they were superior to the world at large and could not perish owing to the very property of their being. They might therefore indulge in all impurities without restraint, being like gold which is none the worse though it be plunged into the mire (Iren. I. 6. 2). Then some maintained that the soul passed from body to body till its knowledge of all things should be completed. To reduce the number of such migrations as much as possible they taught that the soul must be familiarized during this life with every act of which man is capable, including the basest and most degrading. The consequence of such a teaching was that those who put it to the proof became entangled in the attractions of grovelling vices (Iren. I. 25. 4, II. 32). Another tenet was that good and bad were merely matters of opinion (Just. Martyr, 'Apol.' I. 28), and we can see what the result of acting on such a doctrine must be. Again, matter was evil in its nature and not fit to be propagated, therefore marriage was to be repudiated, and such repudiation brought in its train the grossest corruption in life and conversation. The Christian writers who lived nearest to the Apostolic age refer these words of the Epistle to such teachers as these. Thus Clemens Alexandrinus says they were true of the followers of Carpocrates ('Stromata,' III. 2, p. 575), whose teachings cast aside all social traditions and convention, and pointed to a life according to nature as the way to attain true knowledge.

We cannot wonder at the words which follow next in this description of these teachers of error, and followers of unbridled excess, that they denied our only Master and Lord, Jesus Christ. Holding such opinions on the corruption of the flesh, none of these sects could accept the teaching that the "Word was made flesh," and so they were led in one way or another to deny, some the Divinity, some the Humanity, and all consequently the Atonement of Christ. The first in the list of these teachers of error were the followers of Simon Magus, who, holding their founder to be

5 I will therefore put you in remembrance, though ye once knew this, how that the Lord, having saved the people out of the land of Egypt, afterward destroyed them that believed not.

as he taught "the power of God, that is called great" (Acts viii. 10), denied Christ as Lord and Master. From them sprung the Docetæ, whose teachings subverted the true humanity of Jesus, and opposed to them were the Ebionites, whose doctrines went to destroy His divinity. Of the former, Jerome says "that even whilst the Apostles were living, and the blood of Christ had been recently shed in Judæa, his body was asserted to have been a phantom;" and of the latter, he says "that John the Apostle, the last of the Evangelists, was requested by the Bishops of Asia to write his Gospel against Cerinthus and other heretics (of whom Carpocrates already mentioned was an adherent) and the dogmas of the Ebionites, who maintain that Christ did not exist before Mary." These false teachings of the first century are exactly such as would be described by the language of St Jude in this verse, "denying our only Master and Lord, Jesus Christ."

5. The Apostle now begins his enumeration of those characters in Holy Scripture to whom in the last verse he had alluded as prototypes of these later heretics. And in his descriptions he imputes to them seven forms of offence. First they are ungrateful and renegades, like the Israelites when they were brought out from Egypt; they are rebellious and proud like the angels who fell from their glory; they corrupt themselves with fleshly excesses like the sinful inhabitants of the cities of the Plain; they respect no authority but rail against dignities, conduct which is even worse than Satanic; by their teachings they destroy their brethren, and so are murderers in a darker sense than Cain, for they conspire against men's souls; they are slaves of covetousness, the sin of Balaam; and by their self-seeking they are fosterers of division where all should be unity, and in this Korah and his companions are their fitting representations in the older Scriptures. These examples are cited exactly in the way in which comparisons are made in the Jewish writings, and are of themselves a very strong evidence of the Apostolic date of the Epistle. They also help us to understand in what a very free sense the writers in the Gospels employ such expressions as "Thus was fulfilled what was spoken by the prophet." For to a Jewish writer it would have been quite in harmony with what he was constantly hearing, had the Apostle written, instead of the words "they perished in the gainsaying of Korah," "thus was fulfilled what was spoken by the prophet, Ye shall understand that these men have provoked the Lord." One example from Jewish writings will suffice, though they might be multiplied to a very great extent. Two children of Zadok the priest, one a boy and the other a girl, were put as prisoners in the charge of two officers. One of these gave his prisoner to a harlot, the other his to a merchant for wine, and so was fulfilled what is said, Joel iii. 3 (Midrash on 'Echa,' 986). In this sense does St Jude say that these heretical teachers and their corrupt lives were "prefigured" (προϋεγραμμένοι). The first prefiguration of them is taken from the history of the journey from Egypt. Now I desire to put you in remembrance, knowing as ye do all things once for all, that the Lord, having saved the people out of the land of Egypt, afterwards destroyed them that believed not. The first clause of this sentence is no mere expression of a coming action as the A.V. "I will, &c." represents it. The verb signifies an anxious wish on the part of the writer, generated by the sight of those evils against which his admonitions are to be directed. The authoritative readings of the original in the second clause are in some respects different from the received text. (For τοῦτο we must read πάντα, and the best MSS. omit ὑμᾶς.) The sense conveyed is not that former lessons had been in any way forgotten (as A.V., "though ye once knew them"), but merely a reminding that no new lessons are to be bestowed, only the old recalled vividly to mind, for those who are addressed had been fully instructed before in the faith which was once for all delivered to the saints.

Some copies read Jesus instead of the Lord in this verse, and the statement is thus brought into parallelism with the language of St Paul (1 Cor. x. 4), where he speaks of the rock which followed the Israelites in the wilderness, saying, "that Rock was Christ." And so St Peter (1 Pet. i. 11) calls the spirit which dwelt in the old prophets "the Spirit of Christ."

The people seems the best rendering here, though the original has no article. There could however be no doubt of the definite meaning of the word, as referring only to Israel. It is however possible to take the words "a people" as closely connected with saved, with the sense, the Lord saved a people, i.e. Israel as a whole people, but though he first did so, yet his second act (τὸ δεύτερον) was to destroy the unbelieving part of them. That it was unbelief which led to the more gross sins of Israel is the teaching of the Psalmist (cvi. 12—21).

Instead of this example of the Israelites, we have in 2 Pet. ii. 5 the destruction of the antediluvian world by the Flood.

6 And the angels which kept not their ¹first estate, but left their own habitation, he hath reserved in everlasting chains under darkness unto the judgment of the great day.

7 Even as Sodom and Gomorrha, and the cities about them in like manner, giving themselves over to fornication, and going after [†]strange [†]Gr. ^{other.} flesh, are set forth for an example, suffering the vengeance of eternal fire.

6. And angels which kept not their own dignity, but forsook their proper habitation, he hath kept in everlasting bonds under darkness unto the judgment of the great day. Another instance of like unfaithfulness ending in licentiousness. The conjunction gives the force of "Yea and angels too did God punish." The reference is to the explanation current among the Jews of Genesis vi. 2. There "the sons of God" is interpreted to mean angels. That fallen angels were held to be capable of entertaining amatory desire we can see from the story of Asmodeus (Tobit vi. 14). Their own dignity, the position of authority or rule which God had assigned to them. It is clear from such passages as Eph. i. 21 that the celestial world was conceived and spoken of by the Apostles as ranged according to the dignity of its various inhabitants. Of such half-Gnostic speculations of later Judaism concerning the nature and order of the angelic world we have another specimen Col. ii. 18, and it is the knowledge that such speculations were in men's minds that leads the writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews to insist on Christ's superiority to all the angels.

The proper habitation which the angels forsook was the position assigned to them in heaven. Of the latter portion of the tradition to which the writer of the Epistle here alludes we have but little trace in the Scriptures. We read in Matt. xxv. 41 and the parallel passages of "everlasting fire prepared for the devil and his angels," but we cannot conclude from such passages that these are the angels to whom reference is here made. The rebellion of Satan is not connected with the history in Gen. vi. 2, but is implied as having occurred before by the history of the Temptation and Fall of our first parents. Also by St John we are told (1 John iii. 8) "the devil sinneth from the beginning." In Josephus ('Ant.' I. 3. 1), where the history of Gen. vi. 2 is described as a sin committed by angels cohabiting with mortal women, there is nothing stated concerning the punishment of the angels. But in the Book of Enoch (and in that portion of it which bears traces of greater antiquity than the rest, cc. 1—36) allusions to their doom are numerous. The offenders are called at first angels, sons of heaven (vii. 2), and after their transgression Azazel one of their leaders is described as bound hand and foot and cast into darkness (x. 6): there shall he remain for ever; cover his face that he may not see the light, and in the great day of judgment let him be cast into the fire. And of the others who were with him it is afterwards said (x. 15), "Bind them for seventy generations underneath the earth even to the day of judgement." And similar mention is made (xxi. 6) of "the prison of the angels." And the same story is referred to, no doubt, by St Peter (1 Pet. iii. 19), where he mentions the spirits in prison. In the Midrasch Ruth (quoted as a marginal note in Zohar, ed. Cremona, 1559, col. 184) it is said, "After the sons of God had begotten children, God took them and led them to a mountain of darkness, and bound them in iron chains which stretch to the middle of the great abyss."

In all these notices and also here in the Epistle there seems to be a contrast between the former position of the angels, beings of authority and dwelling in the light which is before God's throne, and now enslaved and cast into the deepest darkness. And though the punishment for which they are reserved is yet to come, the vast difference between their present state and their former exaltation makes their lot a fitting illustration of what shall come upon those who seduce the peoples into sin.

7. Even as Sodom and Gomorrah, and the cities about them having in like manner with these given themselves over to fornication, and gone after strange flesh, are set forth as an example of eternal fire, suffering punishment. In this verse these must, from the position of the Greek pronoun in the sentence, refer to the fallen angels mentioned in the previous verse. The offence of the Sodomites was of the same character as that of the angels to whom the human wives were as σάρξ ἐρέπα, and the same idea is kept up in the participle ἀπελθοῦσαι, which indicates a wandering from the natural laws. In the latter part of the verse it seems necessary to translate an example of eternal fire. The rendering of A.V. "suffering the vengeance of eternal fire" cannot be correctly said of Sodom and Gomorrah, though the order of the Greek words may favour such a construction. But the fate of these cities of the plain may with truth be called "an example of eternal fire." A destruction so utter, and so permanent as theirs has been, is the nearest approach that can be found in this world to the destruction which awaits those who are kept under darkness to the judgment of the great day.

8 Likewise also these filthy dreamers defile the flesh, despise dominion, and speak evil of dignities.

9 Yet Michael the archangel, when contending with the devil he disputed about the body of Moses, durst

In the Old Testament no figure is more common than the use of words indicative of unchastity of life to indicate the unfaithfulness of men toward God. When this Epistle was written the opposite order of expression was required. Unbelief had led to bodily impurities, and the writer seems to have set before his readers three degrees or kinds of such sins, and the punishments inflicted on them. First, an offence exactly like their own, a disbelief among the Israelites which led to their union with the worshippers of Baal-peor and to other foul excesses of like nature, and the offenders wherein were punished by death before the land of promise was reached. The second example speaks of those who are already in enjoyment of a blessed home appointed for them by God, but who by yielding to unlawful desires were expelled, and are still awaiting in darkness their final punishment. The last illustration is of a fouler nature still, and its punishment in consequence is more prompt and more terrible and is still an example to the eyes of all the world. This is expressed by "they lie forth" (προκείμεναι), for all to behold and to be warned by. The cities destroyed with Sodom and Gomorrah were Admah and Zeboim (Deut. xxix. 23; Hos. xi. 8).

8. Yet in like manner these dreamers also defile the flesh, and set at naught dominion, and rail at dignities. The A.V. gives no rendering of the conjunction μέντοι, which expresses that in spite of all these examples and the last-named close at hand, yet they too were guilty of like offences. Such men are fitly called dreamers, who by their sinful excess have been cast into a stupor, and so are most completely enslaved. The Scriptures constantly speak of such men as sunk in sleep and so helpless, cf. Rom. xiii. 11, 12; Eph. v. 14, in both which passages this state of sleep is spoken of in close connexion with "the unfruitful works of darkness." In a like condition are these men, but dream that they are free and independent. So with false thoughts concerning freedom they give rein to their carnal appetites, and thus defile the flesh, which we are taught by Christ's assumption thereof is to be elevated and purified, and not degraded. We have already intimated that the excesses to which the Apostle is here alluding arose from a perversion of those principles of Christianity which were represented by the community of goods, but which these men perverted into a doctrine of other kinds of community which resulted in carnal debauchery. The other offences here mentioned, the setting at naught of dominion, and railing at dignities, might have had their origin from the same source. Where all was to be freely shared with one another, the reprobate mind would soon see its way to disregard all rule and all government in the new society, and when this was done, there would soon follow a rejection of Him in whose name those set over the new-formed society spake. For we can hardly doubt that the writer is in this verse looking back to v. 4, in which he describes by other words these ungodly men who had worked their way into the new community. And as there in the first class are placed those "who turn the grace of our God into lasciviousness," a description which in the present verse is represented by those "who defile the flesh," so the setting at naught of dominion, and the railing at dignities, though its first exhibition might be made against the Apostles and those set in authority in the Church, yet went further and resulted in the denial of our only Master, God himself, whose dominion these sinners were disregarding, and our Lord Jesus Christ, whose glory these men speak evil of or rail at, in the words which they employ concerning the corrupt nature of the flesh which He has glorified and taken into heaven. We can discern that this was in the writer's mind if we look on to the use which he makes in verse 15 of the prophecy of Enoch. The original says nothing about hard speeches, yet St Jude not only explains or enlarges and applies the passage which he is quoting to these railers, but specially says that the harsh utterances were against Him.

9. The conduct of Michael the archangel himself is brought forward as rebuke to these sinners who rail at dignities. The devil was only a fallen dignity, but yet the prince of the angels did not rail at him in his accusation. The only passage in which this connection of the Archangel with the burial of Moses is mentioned is Targum Jonathan on Deut. xxxiv. 6, where Michael is said to have been made guardian of the grave of Moses. What the circumstances of the dispute were we cannot gather from ancient sources. It has been suggested that Satan wished to secure the body of Moses, that he might make its existence known to the Israelites and tempt them to pay idolatrous worship to it, as they did to the brazen serpent which had been made by him. It is also said (Æcumenius h. l.) that the devil, in his character of the adversary, was charging Moses with the murder of the Egyptian, and desiring to deprive him of the honoured burial which was conferred on him by God. Of neither not bring against him a railing accusation, but said, "The Lord rebuke thee."

10 But these speak evil of those things which they know not: but what they know naturally, as brute beasts, in those things they corrupt themselves.

of these statements have we any ancient Jewish record. But it is quite manifest that to the writer of the Epistle the story was a part of some accepted history. This is plain from the historic character of his language. But we can see from other parts of the New Testament how traditional explanations of earlier history had grown round the Old Testament narrative. It will suffice to mention the tradition alluded to by St Paul of the names of Egyptian magicians mentioned 2 Tim. iii. 8, but not specified in the earlier history of the deliverance from Egypt. The speech of St Stephen (Acts vii.) also affords several instances of variation from, or expansion of, the Mosaic records. Of some of these, explanations are to be found in extant Jewish literature of ancient date, but for others we have no such solutions. We ought however to bear in mind that of the Jerusalem Talmud two entire Sedarim are lost and also various tracts of the fourth Seder, and we cannot know what literature was contained in them. It is not unreasonable to suppose, in the case of St Jude's Epistle, that we have an instance where the traditional expansion of the Mosaic narrative has not come down to us. The statement of Holy Writ is that Moses was mysteriously buried. The Targum adds to this that the place of sepulture was put into the charge of Michael. Here we have the basis on which a development was no doubt erected, and of which perhaps we have a trace in the expositions preserved to us by the Fathers. The manner in which the example is cited by the Apostle leaves no doubt that the contest to which allusion is made, was a matter of general knowledge among the Jews and Christians for whom the Epistle was intended, and though time has destroyed all trace of the links which intervened between the statement of Jonathan and the allusion of St Jude, yet such links undoubtedly existed in the Apostolic age, and were accepted as a part of the traditional exposition of Holy Writ, and therefore suitable to be quoted in such a solemn exhortation as St Jude is here giving.

The passage in Zechariah (iii. 1—5) where Satan is described by the prophet as resisting Joshua the high-priest when God was commanding that the filthy garments should be taken away from him, and a change of fair raiment be given unto him, may have furnished the basis on which a similar contest was pictured as having taken place concerning Moses. He had left the robe of the flesh, which might be likened to the filthy garments of Joshua, and the Devil might well be represented as an opponent, striving to hinder his admission to that glorious condition in which he appeared at the Transfiguration. Some accepted development of this kind there was, as on many other Scriptures, and though such writings were excluded very properly from the volume of Holy Writ, yet for purposes of "example of life and instruction of manners" they were employed by the Apostles with as much freedom as we now use the books of the Apocrypha.

10. But these men rail at whatsoever things they know not, and what they understand naturally, like the brute beasts, in these things they are corrupted. The A. V. has omitted to make any distinction in this verse between the two verbs which it renders know. The first of these is applied in its earliest sense to the knowledge which is gained by seeing; and as the sight is that one among the senses which most readily and most correctly communicates impressions to the mind, the derived senses of the verb are applied to mental comprehension and knowledge. This word is therefore fitly used for such knowledge as can be gained concerning the dominion and dignities at which these men rail. The other verb is first used in reference to skill in handicraft, and the knowledge expressed thereby is such as would have regard to things palpable, and matters of outward sense. The distinction is observed by the writer in his application of this word to that knowledge wherein these men are corrupted. Milton has put words into the mouth of Satan when describing himself ('P. L.' ix. 571), which distinguish the two varieties of knowledge here spoken of, "nor aught but food discerned or sex, and apprehended nothing high." The reference in both cases is to the description of these offenders given in v. 8, and their degradation sinks them to the level of the animal creation from which the Serpent assures Eve that he has risen to higher apprehensions. By the expression "in these things" the writer appears to intend more than "by means of these things," and to intimate that they have sunk deep in the slough of their excesses. It seems better to translate the final verb as a passive rather than middle, "they corrupt themselves." For it is not themselves alone to whom their corruption extends, but they corrupt others. The same word is used of a like corruption (Rev. xix. 2).

11 Woe unto them! for they have gone in the way of Cain, and ran greedily after the error of Balaam for reward, and perished in the gainsaying of Core.

12 These are spots in your feasts

11. Woe unto them! for they have gone in the way of Cain, and run riotously in the error of Balaam for hire, and have perished in the gainsaying of Korah. The denunciation of woe with which this verse begins, so common in our Lord's addresses, and occurring several times in the Revelation, is found only here in the Apostolic writings, the use of the word by St Paul (1 Cor. ix. 16) being of a different character. For an example of the word ways, used for works, cf. 1 Cor. iv. 17, "my ways which be in Christ." The Apostle seems to have intended the words way, error, and gainsaying to form an ascending scale descriptive of the increasing perverseness of these offenders. The verbs employed are also marked by an increasing degree of intensity. At first their conduct is walking in a way, then a riotous running on in error, then a destruction in their determined opposition to truth and holiness. There is a like climax of nouns and verbs in Ps. i. 1. Of the characters chosen by the writer in this verse as examples of the sins against which he gives warning, two were according to Jewish writers closely connected with the Spirits of Evil. Of Cain it is said by them that he was not a son of Adam, but born by Eve to the serpent, and so the representative or incarnation of evil, and Balaam is represented as gaining the knowledge of future events which he possessed from his interviews with the fallen angels. For this reason, they say, it is always related of him that he heard the words of God (Numb. xxiv. 4, 16) and not the voice, because his knowledge was only derived from the reports of the doomed angels. The gainsaying of Korah is a fitting picture of the position of the teachers against whom this Epistle is directed, for they were setting up an authority of their own as equal if not superior to that of the Apostles, and knowledge was their boast.

In adducing individual examples the writer becomes more precise in the character of his accusations. These new teachers were envious of men and perverse towards God, like Cain; they were teachers of error, and willing to work evil and lead others into it, for gain's sake, as was Balaam; and their ambitious self-seeking led them to resist all authority, after the manner of Korah. We can observe through the whole of these charges, how we have nothing more than the natural fruits of such conduct as we see, in the germ, in the accounts of Ananias and Sapphira, and Simon Magus in the Acts.

The verbs here deserve notice; the tense implies that the conduct described has become habitual with these sinners, and in the last of them is implied not that they are destroyed absolutely, and without hope, but that their destruction is the sure result of persistence in their evil life. The same word with the same shade of meaning is used where Christ speaks of the lost sheep of the house of Israel, to preach and recover whom he was just sending forth his messengers (Matt. x. 6).

To walk in the way of is a translation of a common Hebrew expression (1 K. xvi. 26), and very frequently, as here, used in a bad sense. The word rendered run riotously implies a complete spending of the energies on any object, and is an apt expression for the licence which marked the conduct of these heretics.

12. These are they who are hidden rocks in your love-feasts, feasting with you without fear, feeding themselves; clouds without water borne along by winds, trees of late autumn, without fruit, twice dead, plucked up by the roots. The reading which inserts a relative in the first clause is supported by most authority. In the A.V. bidden rocks (σπίλαδες) is, on the strength of a gloss in Hesychius and some patristic authorities, taken to be a cognate of σπιλοι = spots, which occurs in St Peter's description (2 Pet. ii. 13) of these offenders. But the former word is nowhere found in any sense except that of a shoal or reef. And the stronger word is very fitly employed by St Jude, if he wrote, as we believe, after St Peter, for now these erring professors were no longer mere blots and blemishes, but were become a source of danger and threatened the overthrow of the infant Church, very fitly therefore are they likened to rocks on which there is danger of making shipwreck. Feasting with you without fear is the better connection of the adverb, and not to join it with the succeeding clause. The dread which had prevailed when the first sinners in this matter, Ananias and his wife, were struck dead had passed away; and now it was no longer the case that "of the rest durst no man join himself" to the Apostles, but greedy men feasted themselves at the common board without dread. The love-feasts (agape) were the outward sign of that principle of brotherly love and that holding of all things as common which united the early Christians so closely, but which at the same time offered such a temptation to the covetous to profess a faith in which they were not sincere. The love-feasts were in early times joined on to the Lord's Supper, and we can see from 1 Cor. xi. 20 how the eagerness with which those of charity, when they feast with you, feeding themselves without fear: clouds they are without water, carried about of winds; trees whose fruit withereth, without fruit, twice dead, plucked up by the roots;

13 Raging waves of the sea, foaming out their own shame; wandering whom St Paul there rebukes for seizing on the provisions made ready for the agape, robbed the commemorative and sacramental service, which preceded it, of all its solemnity. Every one took before another his own supper, and while one, who revered the breaking of bread, was hungry, another, who had no scruples about beginning the more substantial meal at once, was drunken. When we read, as here, ἀγᾶπαις, in 2 Pet. ii. 13, which we ought to do, the text affords us another indication that St Jude's Epistle was written after St Peter's. For the latter writer calls the love-feasts theirs, as though this profanation of a sacred meal by gluttony had not when he wrote become so common. He speaks of them as "revelling in their love-feasts." But when St Jude wrote they had succeeded in throwing the stain and defilement of their greedy desires over the Christian love-feasts in general, and the writer now has to say, "they are hidden rocks in your love-feasts." They have introduced themselves and their evil practices so thoroughly that they are like to work ruin to the whole society.

Feasting with you without fear. This implies a very changed condition from that in which it was said (Acts iv. 34), "there was none among them that lacked," the care was not now for this, but these men were become shepherds, not to the flock, but to themselves, and made the love-feast for themselves a scene of revelry, and were so hardened as to do this without fear. How deceptive was the promise given by such members in their lives is seen by the similes which the writer now employs to describe them. No doubt they had been counted as acquisitions to the Church, but now they are found to be men of promise but no performance. This the Apostle first illustrates by calling them clouds without water, which shew as though they were charged with showers of blessing, but disappoint the expectation of the thirsty land and are borne past by winds. Then he changes his figure and calls them trees of late autumn, those which do not shew signs of becoming productive until the season is well-nigh ended, and when there is no hope that fruit can be brought to perfection. They come into leaf, but bring no fruit, and so may well be called doubly dead, for not only have they nothing to shew as fruit this year, but their habit is such that there is no hope of better things another year. They have no crop now, and no chance of a crop hereafter, and so their doom is pronounced. It may not come at once, but it is sure to come, and they will be, and so in prophetic tone may be even now said to be, plucked up by the roots.

It is likely that in the word without fear (ἀφόβως) there is contained a degree of rebuke to the Christian congregations for having allowed the evil practices to creep so far and get so bold a front. It is as though the writer said, "Such impunity ought not to have been permitted, the mischief should have been checked at its earlier stages." No doubt also in the comparisons which he employs he has an eye to the original intention of the love-feast. It was to be a token of universal love, and was to have the blessing of the rain from heaven; it was meant to be a cause of much fruit in the whole Christian community, that so they might be known as Christ's disciples. But self-seeking and greed had dried up the refreshment and cut off all hope of growth. We shall presently see (v. 16) that these men were of no true Christian spirit, but "loved only those who loved them."

13. Here the writer turns from the disappointment and consequent weakening which the Church experienced by reason of these insincere members, and looks at them in their own character and coming doom. He has in his thought the words of Isaiah (lvii. 20), where the wicked are compared to the troubled sea, and he says of these men that they cast forth to public view the mire and dirt of their excesses, just as the churning waters of a restless surge never allow the sand to sink down to the bottom. So these men foam out their own acts of shame, and cast them forth for all men to see, and so to blame the Church for the ill-deeds of these professors. And this is the thought which seems to have suggested the next comparison. These men have some share of light, they have some degree of knowledge, but they have cast off all regard for the regulation of the Christian brotherhood, and so, though they may be called stars, yet they belong not to the system, they stray at random and without law, and must at last be severed from the lights which rule while they are ruled. Then follows their fate, separated from the source of illumination they shall share the darkness (and at this point the thought of the writer seems to have escaped from the simile and to be fixed on the men) which is spoken of before (v. 6) as the abode of the fallen angels. Our Lord's mention of this darkness as prepared for them, and that sinners were only condemned thereto for their persistence in evil, suggest the close connection in the writer's mind between the one doom stars, to whom is reserved the blackness of darkness for ever.

14 And Enoch also, the seventh from Adam, prophesied of these, saying, Behold, the Lord cometh with ten thousands of his saints,

15 To execute judgment upon all, and to convince all that are ungodly among them of all their ungodly deeds which they have ungodly committed, and of all their hard speeches which ungodly sinners have spoken against him.

16 These are murmurers, com-and the other. God reserves the angels under darkness, and for the wandering stars the darkness has been reserved.

14. From the Book of Enoch, as we have seen, is taken the substance of what is said (v. 6) concerning the angels that fell. And now there is another quotation from the same authority. The mysterious mention of Enoch (Gen. v. 24) and his translation, coupled with the double notice of his walk with God, make him a fitting centre round which prophetic utterances should cluster. To the Jew there was a sacredness in the number seven, and therefore Enoch is noticed as seventh from Adam. In the book of Enoch he is represented as saying of himself (xcii. 4), "I have been born the seventh in the first week," from which we can see that his name was connected with the blessing of the Sabbath. The passage from the book of Enoch here quoted as translated by Dr Laurence runs thus (ch. ii.): "Behold he comes with ten thousands of his saints, to execute judgment upon them and to destroy the wicked, and reprove all the carnal for everything which the sinful and ungodly have done and committed against him." The form of this prophecy is that of the Old Testament Scriptures, and parallels may be found for the language in Mal. iii. 1, iv. 1; Deut. xxxii. 2.

The expressions used in this verse leave it uncertain whether St Jude derived his quotation from a tradition or from writing existing in his time. But the wide extent to which "the book of Enoch" was known in the second century seems to be conclusive in favour of its existence in St Jude's day. As we have it, there can be no question that it exhibits interpolations of a later time, but cc. 1—36 as well as some other portions may be taken as closely representing the earliest form and that of a date at least a century before the birth of Christ.

Of these also implies that not only did the words of Enoch refer to the sinners among whom he lived, but were applicable also to the generation in which St Jude was.

15. To execute judgment upon all and to convict all the ungodly of all their works of ungodliness which they have ungodly wrought, and of all the hard words which ungodly sinners have spoken against him. The phrases in this passage are quite Hebrew in their form and justify a belief that the source from which they are quoted was known to St Jude in that language. The writer of the Epistle seems to have rather paraphrased than translated the latter part of the prophecy, and to have been guided in the language he employs by the circumstances under which he was writing. In the form in which the original has come down to us we have no mention of the hard words which were spoken against God. This ought to be noticed in deciding upon the value of this reference to "the Book" of Enoch. If the passage which we find there had been, as some hold, an insertion made in the present text of the Book to give credit to a late post-Christian fiction, the words quoted from St Jude would almost certainly have been given in the full form in which they stand in the Epistle.

To the mind of St Jude there is evidently present, while he employs the passage from the Book of Enoch, the offences of which he had spoken in vv. 8, 10, 11. So he fashions his paraphrase here to apply not only to the defilers of the flesh, but also to those who set at naught dominion and rail at dignities, and who are perishing in the gainsaying of Korah, and so the passage is made to refer both to the deeds and words before spoken of. And how the irreverent godless spirit of these men's actions was conspicuous we may see from the emphatic manner in which he four times over employs the same word in this verse. It was the outcome of that profane and vain babbling of which St Paul had spoken (2 Tim. ii. 16) to Timothy, and the word is of constant use in the Epistles of St Peter and St Jude (1 Pet. iv. 18; 2 Pet. ii. 5, 6, iii. 7; Jude 4, 15).

The A. V. translates, "All that are ungodly among them," but the best MSS. omit the pronoun.

The last two words in the original are those rendered ungodly sinners, and they seem to be placed out of their proper order so much that it has been suggested that they belong to the next verse. It appears however more likely that they were placed where they are in order to lay that marked emphasis upon the irreverence which the writer is evidently desirous to express. He has mentioned their offence thrice already, but with his mind full of it, he closes the quotation—sinners, ungodly. The contrast is brought out in this way plainers, walking after their own lusts; and their mouth speaketh great swelling words, having men's persons in admiration because of advantage.

17 But, beloved, remember ye the words which were spoken before of the apostles of our Lord Jesus Christ;

18 How that they told you there between Him against whom they speak and the ungodly irreverent character of what they say.

16. The next words seem to be an expansion of the last thought in v. 15 and a description of the hard words there alluded to. These, he continues, are murmurers, as were those who (John vi. 43) were displeased at Christ when he spake of His heavenly origin, and who saw in Him only the Son of Joseph. They are complainers too, ever blaming their own lot, and grasping after what they fancy to be better; for it is according to their own lusts they guide their life, and they are dissatisfied with all things but themselves. Neither God's revelation nor Christ's teaching, nor their condition among their brethren contents them, but they seek to be a law unto themselves. Their self-confidence furnishes pride in their speech, and the great swelling words are the outward sign of their inward character. And when they do depart from their rule and defer to others, such conduct is only dictated by hope of advantage. The expression "having men's persons in admiration" is of the same kind as the more common "respecters of persons," but of a rather stronger character. There is a degree of open admiration of all the external surroundings of those to whom these self-seekers pay their court. The two expressions are found together in the LXX. (Lev. xix. 15), and the shade of difference in sense is fairly given in the A.V., "Thou shalt not respect the person of the poor, nor honour the person of the mighty."

17. In the Greek the pronoun stands emphatically at the opening of the sentence, and shews by its position that the writer designed to contrast those to whom he wrote, with the offenders against whom they had been warned. And he enforces his own warning by a reminder of the teaching which they had received from others. These previous teachers he calls "the Apostles of our Lord Jesus Christ," and the question arises out of these words whether the writer of the Epistle thereby intends to intimate that he himself was not an Apostle. On this point see Introduction, § 1.

18. How that they said unto you that at the end of the time there shall be mockers walking after their own ungodly lusts. The use of the imperfect tense in the original points to such lessons as having formed a frequent portion of the Apostolic preaching.

And the similarity of the phrase "at the end of the time" (for which we have the most authority in MSS.) to the words of St Peter (2 Pet. iii. 3), which are literally "at the end of the days," points to a form of exhortation which had become common in the mouths of the early Christian teachers, as does also the substantial agreement of much in the other language of that verse with this. The Apostles expounded the warnings of Jesus by the events in which they were living.

By the words "at the end of the time," and many similar phrases found in the New Testament, there is not a doubt that the early Christians generally understood that some mighty visitation of God, the end of the age, and the coming of Jesus to judge the world was not far distant. And the words of Christ in that discourse (Matt. xxiv.—xxv.) on which most of these phrases are founded lend themselves easily to such an interpretation. But it is evident from St Paul's language to Timothy (2 Tim. iii. 1), "In the last days perilous times shall come," followed as those words are by a list of offences not unlike those described as rife in the days of St Peter and St Jude; but concluding with the assertion that "they shall proceed no further, but their folly shall be manifest unto all men;" that St Paul, while anticipating the rise of heretics and wicked men in the Church, yet expected that the cause of Christ would prosper in the end, and did not therefore view the coming troubles, as many did, in the light of signs that the end of all things was near. St John, who had lived till the evil days were come, says (1 John ii. 18), "It is the last time.....now are there many antichrists; whereby we know that it is the last time." With the advance of the first century the mixed character of Christ's sermon which foretold these evil days was becoming unravelled. St Paul lived at the beginning, St Peter and St Jude in the development, and St John at the completion of the period which Jesus had spoken of as typical of the times when the end of all things should come. And the last of them, though he might depart with an impression that the antitype was soon about to follow the type, yet lets that impression supply no word of a paralyzing sort, such as had startled the Thessalonians in the language of St Paul, but closes his exhortation, "Abide in him, that when he shall appear we may have confidence." And so with St Jude. The last times may be near, but their approach is not to lessen Christian activity, but his exhortation is "build up should be mockers in the last time, who should walk after their own ungodly lusts.

19 These be they who separate themselves, sensual, having not the Spirit.

yourselves on your most holy faith," and on the erring have compassion and labour for their recovery. The literal translation of the last clause is "walking after their own lusts of ungodliness;" and the addition of this word "ungodlinesses," which is not found in the parallel passage of St Peter, as well as its emphatic position at the end of the verse, where but for the stress which we believe the writer intended this marked position to convey it stands very awkwardly, shew how this characteristic of irreverent godlessness was stamped upon the deeds of these false teachers. The occurrence of this addition to the words of St Peter's Epistle bespeaks a later stage of the evil, when this characteristic feature had made itself most prominently visible, and contributes another indication that St Jude's composition was the later in date.

19. These be they who make separations, sensual, having not the Spirit. In some MSS. the pronoun is expressed after the first verb, and this would justify the rendering of A.V., but the best authorities omit it, and the sense thus obtained accords excellently with the tenor of the whole Epistle, which rather relates to those who, while unworthy, have crept into the Church, than to men who separate themselves. It is true, we might understand it of those who by their corrupt ways sever themselves from the congregation of Christ; but it is far more likely that the reference is to men who cause divisions within the Church. The verb occurs nowhere else in the New Testament.

Sensual (ψυχικός) is here as everywhere else in the New Testament opposed to spiritual (πνευματικός). Its first sense is "that which pertains to the life," and so it might be rendered "natural." But the nature which is dealt with in the New Testament is human nature, and this we are taught is ever "inclined to evil," ready to yield to animal appetite, and so hostile to that which is spiritual. Hence comes the opposition between two words which at the outset were as closely related in meaning as are life and breath. The word is used James iii. 15 of "a wisdom that cometh not down from above, but which is earthly, sensual, devilish." And the context in that passage supports the explanation of the first clause in this verse as referring to those who cause divisions within the Church. For the men to whom such wisdom belongs are called by St James those who "have bitter jealousy and faction in their hearts."

20 But ye, beloved, building up yourselves on your most holy faith, praying in the Holy Ghost, 21 Keep yourselves in the love of God, looking for the mercy of our Lord Jesus Christ unto eternal life.

If we would see how the true possession of the Spirit promotes unity, we have but to consider the narrative (Acts iv. 31—32) of the primitive Church, where "all were filled with the Spirit," and as a natural consequence it is added, "and the multitude of them that believed were of one heart and of one soul."

The word Spirit (πνεῦμα) is without the article, but we need not on that account take it as referring to what is spiritual in man rather than to the Holy Spirit. Cf. Gal. v. 16, and the New Testament usage of the word, when opposed as here to ψυχή. But there is no doubt a reference to the language of the Gnostic taunts against the early Christians. They called themselves spiritual (πνευματικοί) and asserted that because of their superior degree of knowledge, they had no need to care for the observance of a virtuous life, while the Christians they named mere natural men (ψυχικοί), without the exaltation which knowledge (γνώσις) imparted, and therefore bound to live strict lives, or forfeit their hopes of the world to come. St Jude uses their phraseology, but with a slight difference of sense, and says these are the really natural men, men who follow the dictates of nature only, and have no share of the Spirit of God.

20. But ye, beloved, &c. They of whom the Apostle has just spoken by their spirit of division break down the Church of Christ, therefore he urges on his readers a contrary course, that they should build up instead of destroying. And just as St Peter (2 Pet. i. 5—7) urged that on the foundation of faith should be raised a superstructure of the Christian virtues, till they reached the very highest, so here St Jude exhorts to lay the same foundation, "Building up yourselves on your most holy faith." And he gives to faith this preeminent title, because its fruits were so different from those which were exhibited in the lives of the men who boasted of their superior knowledge, and lived in consequence in unboly freedom.

The building up the edifice of a life of virtue is one of a course of means whereby Christians are to keep themselves in the love of God, but they cannot build without help, and so St Jude adds to his exhortation, praying in the Holy Ghost. The expression is parallel to that of St Paul (Eph. vi. 18), 22 And of some have compassion, making a difference :

23 And others save with fear, pulling them out of the fire ; hating even the garment spotted by the flesh.

"praying always with all prayer and supplication in the Spirit," and its meaning is seen from what the same Apostle says (Rom. viii. 26) of the help which the Spirit gives to our prayers, "for we know not what we should pray for as we ought." So "to pray in the Holy Ghost" is to pray with His aid in our intercessions, that they may be effectual.

21. And the end of this working and prayer is given in the next words, "Keep yourselves thereby in the love of God." These words do not mean "continue in your love towards God, and cease not from it," but as we may see from the next clause, "Take heed that by your life and prayers you continue to be of those whom God loves." For the end of this watchful keeping in the love of God is to be that they may receive "the mercy of our Lord Jesus Christ." But this is given to men not because they have loved God, but because He has loved them.

And this mercy (not so often spoken of as the mercy of Christ but as the mercy of God) is constantly to be looked for as something yet to come. It may be shewn from time to time as men live here, but God keeps the good wine to the end, and the full fruition of Christ's mercy will not be known till through it we attain at length unto eternal life.

These last words are therefore closely connected both with mercy (ἐλεος) and looking for (προσδεχόμενοι). Men are to look ever for more and more proof of mercy till eternal life is given, and the mercy itself never fails, but lasts on till that life is gained.

So by his lesson that men should pray in the Spirit, continue in God's love, and look for Christ's mercy, the Apostle gives a view of that faith on which he was moved (v. 3) to write, the faith in the Trinity in Unity "which was once delivered to the saints."

22. And on some have mercy, who are in doubt. In this verse and the next there is great uncertainty about the correct text.

But here all the MSS. of greatest authority read διακρινομένους as the object, and not διακρινόμενοι agreeing with the subject of the sentence. Moreover if the nominative were read the rendering of the A.V. could not stand, for διακρίνεσθαι does not mean "to make a difference." But "to hesitate" or "to be in doubt" is its meaning, Matt. xxi. 21; Mark xi. 23; Rom. iv. 20, xiv. 23; James i. 6, and in every instance with reference to weakness in faith. For such, then, as are weak in the faith St Jude claims mercy from their brethren, and thus is in harmony with the language of St Paul in Rom. xiv. 1—4, where he asks, "who art thou that judgest another man's servant?"

Another reading, οὓς μὲν ἐλέγχετε διακρινομένους has good MS. support, and has been adopted by some editors. This would signify "some who are contentious reprove ye," and for this meaning of διακρινομένους may be quoted v. 9 of this Epistle, and also Acts xi. 2. But this exhortation does not seem to join on with the verse which follows so well as the exhortation to have mercy. The Apostle is not urging on his readers to play the part of rebukers or reprovers, so much as that by love and labour they should endeavour to rescue from erroneous teaching and its sinful consequences all whom they may be able.

23. And some save, snatching them out of the fire; and on some have mercy with fear, bating even the garment spotted by the flesh. This is the translation of the text which is best supported, and which is adopted by Lachmann, Tischendorf and Tregelles. But the variations in the MSS. are so numerous that there must ever be some doubt about what were the exact words of St Jude.

By the readings adopted in these two verses, those who are to engage the love and labours of the Christians for their salvation are divided into three classes, each in worse plight than the one mentioned before them. First come those who are waverers, second those who are all but in the fire of sin, and lastly, those who are so far gone in their evil course that there is some danger in the attempt to save them, and it is only the great love for souls that will prompt men to the labour, for all that surrounds and envelops such sinners must be hateful.

Bishop Wordsworth has pointed out that, as in v. 9, so here the Apostle has in his mind the account of Joshua the High-priest, spoken of in Zech. iii. 2. There, in opposition to the buffetings of Satan, Joshua is called "a brand plucked out of the fire," and afterwards (v. 4) it is added, "Take away the filthy garments from him. And unto Joshua he said, Behold, I have caused thine iniquity to pass from thee, and I will clothe thee with festival robes."

The two classes of sinners referred to in this verse are in more desperate condition than the doubters of the former clause. These are being consumed by the evil of their ways, and there is peril in the attempt to rescue them. But the Christian is not to shrink from the endeavour, though he will need to be watchful lest he fall into harm by what he does. The first danger is compared to that of a close

24 Now unto him that is able to keep you from falling, and to present you faultless before the presence of his glory with exceeding joy,

25 To the only wise God our Saviour, be glory and majesty, dominion and power, both now and ever. Amen.

approach to fire. They who strive to save these men will be likely to come off with some burning for themselves, but this is not so serious as the next danger, which is, lest in attempting to save others, men should become entangled in their evil ways, and stained with their defilements. The rescue of such sinners can only be secured, if the whole of their surroundings, even down as it were to their innermost robe, be cast away as hateful, and only the men sought after, while their errors are unrelentingly attacked and cast away as things abominable.

24. The Epistle concludes with a solemn doxology.

Now unto him that is able to guard you from stumbling. The commencement of this ascription of praise is like that in Rom. xvi. 25. But the 'Text. Rec.' reads for ὑμᾶς αὐτοῖς as though the persons meant were the sinners spoken of in the previous verse. But of them free from stumbling (ἀνταρστος) could not be used, for they had stumbled already and some of them grievously. So that ὑμᾶς is the preferable reading, and having good authority has been universally adopted. And it is a very fitting commendation of his hearers after he has been urging on them a course in which there was danger, unless they were safely protected, that they too might fall, to commit them to the guardianship of Him who alone can save.

The A. V. renders "to keep you." The αὐτοῖς of the 'Text. Rec.' is taken, therefore, as though the Apostle had before his mind those whom he was addressing at a distance, and so could say of them, αὐτοῖς, though meaning ὑμᾶς. But this is harsh, and the great preponderance of MS. authority is in favour of ὑμᾶς in the text.

ἀνταρστος is found nowhere else in New Testament.

and to set you before the presence of his glory, i.e. at the last day when Christ shall appear in His glory to judge the world. The thought is the same as that of St Paul (Col. i. 21, 22), "And you hath He [Christ] reconciled...to present you holy and without blemish...before Him."

without blemish in exceeding joy. Without blemish (ἁμωμος). This Greek word is constantly used by the LXX. for the victim without blemish of the Levitical offerings, and Christ is consequently called (1 Pet. i. 19) a lamb without blemish (ἁμὸς ἁμωμος). And being such Himself, He is able to bring His people to the same purity. As such He presents the Church unto Himself (Eph. v. 27) "as a glorious Church...holy and without blemish," "having given Himself for it that He might sanctify it."

In exceeding joy. Not the joy of Christ, but the joy of the ransomed and purified believer. So in is better than with of the A. V.

25. To the only God our Saviour. All the best MSS. and editors omit the word wise, which is found in A. V. The word is due to some marginal annotation which has crept into the text of later MS. from Rom. xvi. 27, to which doxology, as has already been remarked, this of St Jude's Epistle bears a strong resemblance in form. It is to be noticed that here, as in 1 Tim. i. 1, the word Saviour is applied to God the Father. All such interchanges of epithet have their doctrinal lesson. Compare the way in which Paraclete (παράκλητος), so constantly employed in reference to the Holy Ghost, is applied to Christ in 1 John ii. 1.

Here the MSS. N, A, B add after "our Saviour" the words "through Jesus Christ our Lord," which brings this verse into still closer likeness to the concluding verse of the Epistle to the Romans. There is so strong authority for the words that they are adopted by all the latest editors.

be glory, majesty, dominion and power] The conjunction between the two first nouns (expressed in A. V.) is not well supported, and has probably been added, in such MSS. as have it, that the words might go in pairs.

both now and for ever. Amen.] Here a great consensus of authority reads before all time, and now, and for evermore. Amen.

Instead of the imperative be in this ascription of praise, it is perhaps better, from a comparison with 1 Pet. iv. 11, to supply the indicative is. It is somewhat harsh to say, "let all glory be to God before all time." If these last three words were omitted the imperative might stand correctly enough.

§ 1. The Authorship of the Revelation.

Two questions are involved in the inquiry as to the authorship of the Apocalypse:—(1) Was the writer of this Book the Apostle St. John? (2) Were the Apocalypse and the Fourth Gospel, together with the three Epistles which bear St. John's name, written by one and the same author?

The second of these questions, with which the authenticity of the Apocalypse itself is but indirectly concerned, will be touched upon hereafter, and answered in the affirmative. The discussion of the first question—following the course which the controversy respecting it has taken in recent times—turns, in a great measure, upon the personal history of the Apostle; especially as regards the date of the great prophetic Book of the New Testament.

When entering upon this inquiry it is natural, in the first instance, to ask what does the Book itself tell us of its author?

The author of the Apocalypse describes himself as "the servant" of Jesus Christ (ch. i. 1),—as one "who bare witness of the Word of God, and of the testimony of Jesus Christ" (ch. i. 2),—expressions which seem designed to identify him with the writer of John i. 14; xix. 35; 1 John i. 2. He is the "brother" of those whom he addresses, "and partaker with them in the tribulation and kingdom and patience which are in Jesus" (ch. i. 9). An Angel tells him, "I am a fellow servant with thee, and with thy brethren the prophets" (ch. xxii. 9);—or "with thy brethren that hold the testimony of Jesus" (ch. xix. 10). The writer also names himself John¹ (ch. i. 1, 4, 9; xxii. 8),—a name which often occurs in the Old Testament and in the Apocrypha. In the New Testament it is found twice in our Lord's Genealogy (Luke iii. 27, 30); it is borne by the Baptist; it was the name of St. Peter's father (see the true reading in John i. 43; xxi. 15–17); it was the name of a ruler of the Jews (Acts iv. 6); and "John, whose surname was Mark" (Acts xii. 12), has been forced into the present controversy. In the index to Bekker's edition of Josephus, thirteen persons are enumerated who bore the name of John. Among the bearers of a name so common, there could have been as little doubt in the Church² as to who was the "John" of Rev. i. 9, as there was respecting the "John" of Acts xii. 2, where "James the brother of John" is specified. When we ask, therefore, Who is this John?—with one voice the earliest ecclesiastical tradition answers, "The Apostle, the son of Zebedee."³ The same answer is given by ¹ The English form John represents the Greek Ἰωάννης or Ἰωάννης. The Hebrew form is יְהוֹנָתָן (or יְהוֹנָתָן, 1 Chron. xii. 4, 12), i.e., "quem Jehovah donavit" (Gesen.), or "the grace of Jehovah,"—which the LXX renders Ἰωάν (2 Kings xxv. 23); Ἰωάν (Neh. vi. 18; cf. Ἰωάν, Luke iii. 30) [and thus the υἱὸς Ἰωάννου of St. John (i. 42) is equivalent to the Βαριθαῖ of St. Matthew (xvi. 17)]; Ἰωάν (Jer. xl. 8, 13); most frequently Ἰωάν (2 Chron. xvii. 15; cf. Luke iii. 27); once in the genitive, Ἰωάνου (2 Chron. xxviii. 12); Ἰωάν (1 Macc. ii. 2), or Ἰωάννης (1 Macc. xvi. 9; 2 Macc. xi. 17), of which the genitive Ἰωάννου is found in 1 Macc. ii. 1; 2 Macc. iv. 11. the orthodoxy of Joseph Mede (A.D. 1632), and by the extreme rationalism, in our own day, of the school of Tübingen. It is the verdict of Mede that "the Apocalypse hath more Humane (not to speak of Divine) authority than any other Book of the New Test. besides, even from the time it was first delivered" (Works, ed. 1672, p. 602); while Zeller decides that the Apocalypse is "the proper, normal, writing of primitive Christianity; and, among all the parts of the N. T., the only one which can, with any right, claim to have been composed by an Apostle who was an immediate Disciple of Christ."¹ It is important to state in full the evidence which has led to an agreement so remarkable.

THE EASTERN CHURCH:

The earliest connected commentary on the Apocalypse which we possess, was the work of Andreas, Bishop of Cæsarea towards the close of the fifth century. In proof of the inspiration of the Book, Andreas appeals to "Gregory the divine [of Nazianzus], and Cyril [of Alexandria], as well as to the more ancient writers Papias, Irenæus, Methodius, and Hippolytus."²

Arethas, the successor of Andreas in the see of Cæsarea (circa A.D. 470–500),³ Jahrb.*, 1842, s. 654 ff. The Apocalypse, says Baur, has evidence so ancient and undoubted for its Apostolic origin as few writings of the N. T. can claim:—see his Krit. Untersuch. üb. die kan. Evang., s. 345.

—in the preface to his commentary on the Apocalypse which, as he implies, was based upon that of Andreas,—repeats the names in the preceding list, and adds to them the name of St. Basil.¹

We are here introduced to the name of Papias² which fills so important a place in the present controversy. It is not stated what work of his is referred to; but Arethas (l. c., p. 360) quotes Andreas on Rev. xii. 7 [l. c., p. 67] with the remark, that Papias was “a successor of the Evangelist John, whose Revelation lay before him.”³ These words assert distinctly⁴ that Papias was acquainted with the Apocalypse; but the only work of his of which we have any knowledge, is the treatise, in five books, entitled, “Narratives of the Lord’s Oracles” (λογίων κυριακῶν ἐξηγήσεις),—see below, p. 408, note², No. (6). Eusebius has preserved fragments of this work, and tells us (H. E., iii. 39) that Papias there adds other things as “received by him from unwritten tradition; certain strange parables, too, of the Saviour; and some other things of a rather fabulous character, among which he also mentions a corporeal reign of Christ on this earth, which is to last for a thousand years after the Resurrection from the dead.”¹ The doctrine of the Millennium is plainly referred to here; but whether Rev. xx. is to be regarded as the source of what Papias has transmitted, may be considered more than doubtful:—see Ceriani’s account of the “Apocalypse of Baruch” quoted below, § 9; and the Excursus on Rev. xx.

Eusebius was an ardent anti-chiliasm; and he writes strongly against the Millenarianism of Papias: he was, therefore, not indisposed to undervalue the Apocalypse, on which Papias might have founded his teaching. Having described him as of mean understanding, and yet, on account of his great antiquity, as being followed by Irenæus and others in his opinions as to the Millennium, Eusebius proceeds (l. c.):—“He [Papias] has also handed down in his Books other accounts which Aristion has given of the Lord’s words; and also traditions of the Presbyter John.”²

This mention of “John the Presbyter”—whose name is so often quoted in the controversy as to the authenticity of the Apocalypse—renders it necessary to give in full the locus classicus on this subject, in the words of Papias himself:—

“I shall not hesitate to set in order for thee whatsoever things I learned at any time from the Elders, and which I have faithfully retained in my memory But if I chanced also to meet with any one who had been a follower of the Elders, I was always wont to inquire respecting the sayings of the Elders,—what Andrew or what Peter had spoken; or what Philip; or what Thomas or James; or what John or Matthew or any other of the Disciples of the Lord; what things, too, Aristion and the Presbyter John, the Lord’s disciples, say. For I did not think that I could profit so much from

It may be noted here that Arethas on Rev. i. 9 (l. c., p. 192) repeats the account of Eusebius (Chron., sub an. 96; H. E. iii. 18) that St. John was exiled to Patmos by Domitian, —ἐν Πάτμῳ τῇ νήσῳ ὑπὸ Δομετιανοῦ.

For the title ὁ ἐπιστήθιος Χριστοῦ,—frequently given to St. John, and even as early as Cent. ii., see Routh, l. c., p. 42; and cf., below, p. 412, together with the words of Polycrates, No. (14), p. 414, note¹.

books as from the living voice which still survived.”¹

On the former of the two “Johns” in this passage, Hilgenfeld (Einkl. in das N. T., Leipzig, 1875) notes: “Evidently the Apostle John” (s. 57); and on the latter: “Not the ‘older’ John, that is, the Apostle, as Krenkel would have it” (s. 58):—see below, p. 441.

On this quotation it is sufficient, for the moment, to observe, that it is warmly discussed whether Papias had, or had not, himself seen and heard the Apostles, as well as collected and preserved their sayings. Dr. Routh (l. c., p. 23) seems to give the plain and natural meaning of the passage: “In which words [viz. ‘But if I chanced also’ &c. (εἰ δέ ποτε καί)] Papias seems to indicate that it was his custom to inquire of the disciples of the Apostles, just as it had been his custom to inquire of the Apostles themselves.” St. Irenæus—who as the disciple of Polycarp (Ep. ad Florin., ap. Euseb., v. 20) must have known the fact—expressly states that Papias was “a hearer of John, and a companion of Polycarp.”²

Hær.*, v. 33, 34. This is the passage which, as Ceriani states, Papias borrowed from the “Apocalypse of Baruch,”—see below, § 9, p. 62.

Polycarp, whose life unites the age of the Apostles with that of Irenæus, was Bishop of Smyrna, the second of the Seven Churches (Rev. ii. 8),—placed too over that church, as many writers mention, by the Apostles, and by St. John himself (e.g. Tertullian: “Sicut Smyrnæorum ecclesia Polycarpum ab Joanne conlocatum refert.”—De Præscr. c. 32; Iren. iii. 3, 4; Euseb. iv. 14, v. 20; Hieron., De Vir. Ill. 17). He was, as Archbishop Ussher argues, no other than “the Angel of the church of Smyrna” (Rev. ii. 8):—“Who,” writes Ussher, “can better inform us than Irenæus? who did not only know those who succeeded Polycarpus in his See” (οἱ μέχρι νῦν διαδεδεγμένοι τὸν Πολύκαρπον,—Hær. iii. 4, p. 177), “but also was present when he Irenæus is here quoting from Papias an “unwritten saying” of our Lord respecting the Millennium; and in what he thus says the absence of any title indicates the well-known “John.” Eusebius (iii. 39) also speaks of Papias as “a man of old time” (ἀρχαῖος ἀνὴρ).

In the second part of his Chronicle Eusebius, mentioning facts which marked the 220th Olympiad (A.D. 101), writes:—“It is recorded by Irenæus that the Apostle John survived down to the times of Trajan. After whom Papias of Hierapolis and Polycarp bishop of Smyrna were acknowledged to be the Apostle’s hearers.”¹ Here the words which follow “After whom” (“Post quem”) express the belief of Eusebius himself;² and Eusebius, in the version of this passage given in his Chronicle as printed among the works of St. Jerome (ed. Vallars., t. viii.), adds to that of Polycarp the name of Ignatius as a “hearer” of St. John. Thus we see that both Irenæus and Eusebius,³ having mentioned that St. John lived under Trajan (A.D. 96–117), also state that Papias was his contemporary,—“a hearer of John,” “a companion of Polycarp.” The Paschal Chronicle, too, himself did discourse of his conversation with St. John.”—The Original of Bishops, Works, Elrington’s ed., vol. vii. p. 50. See below, p. 412.

To this passage may be added: “Secundus post Neronem Domitianus Christianos persequitur; et sub eo Apostolus Joannes ad Patmum insulam relegatus Apocalypsin vidit, quam Irenæus interpretatur.”—Eusebius, Chron. ad an. 14 Domitiani. It will be found useful to keep in view the duration of Domitian’s reign,—viz., from the year 81 to the year 96.

² See, in proof of this statement, Zahn, “Papias von Hierapolis,” Studien u. Krit., 1866, s. 649.

³ Eusebius, however, elsewhere (iii. 39) attempts to set aside the statement of Irenæus that Papias was “a hearer of John,” on the grounds that Papias tells us, No. (5), that he is recording what he had heard from others about the sayings of the Apostles,—among whom he names St. John. But may not Papias have both heard that Apostle, and also collected what others reported concerning him? It is impossible to suppose that Irenæus could have been mistaken as to this.

records the martyrdom of Polycarp (ed. Dindorf, i. 480, &c.), and adds that Papias suffered in the same persecution (καὶ ἐν Περγᾷ δὲ ἕτεροι ἐν οἷς ἦν καὶ Παπίας, κ.τ.λ.);—showing that in death as in life Papias was Polycarp's companion.

At what time Papias lived, may be approximately determined by the date of Polycarp's death:—In the Epistle of the Church of Smyrna (Euseb. iv. 15), which contains the narrative of Polycarp's sufferings, Polycarp's death is placed (Patr. Apost., ed. Hefele, p. 294) in the proconsulship of Statius Quadratus, and on a day which is specified; while Polycarp's well-known words, "Fourscore and six years have I served Christ," &c.—a statement which at all events is to be counted from his baptism—make him to have been, at least, eighty-six years old. M. Waddington¹ has proved from the language of this narrative that Polycarp was put to death on Feb. 23, A.D. 155, under Antoninus Pius; and he points out how Eusebius and others have been mistaken in placing this event some ten years later, under M. Aurelius, when Ummidius Quadratus was consul. Polycarp's birth, or more probably his baptism, would, accordingly, fall in the year 69; and thus the chronological difficulty, as to the fact of his companion Papias having been a contemporary of St. John, who lived till the end of the century, altogether disappears. Bishop Lightfoot (Contemp. Review, August 1875, p. 383) considers "that Papias was probably born about A.D. 60–70, and that his work was published about A.D. 130–140." Accordingly, the first direct evidence which we possess for the authenticity of the Apocalypse is given by one who was a contemporary of the Apostle John; who had seen and heard him; and who was bishop of Hierapolis, a city but a few miles distant from Laodicea (Rev. iii. 14) which was one of the Seven Churches.

Other evidence for the authenticity of the Apocalypse which is sometimes adduced from the age of the Apostolic Fathers, may not, perhaps, be deemed equally conclusive. Thus Hengstenberg (The Rev. of St. John, vol. ii. p. 393, Eng. transl.) thinks that the Divine title "Almighty" (παντοκράτωρ) used by Polycarp in his Epistle to the Philippians (c. 1) was taken by him from the Apocalypse, where it is found nine times, but elsewhere only in 2 Cor. vi. 18: and he also sees in the words "Let us be imitators of His patience" (μιμηταὶ γενώμεθα τῆς ὑπομονῆς αὐτοῦ, ib., c. 8), a reference to Rev. i. 9; iii. 10. In the "Shepherd of Hermas," which is "of the same date as Montanism" (circa A.D. 140), the symbolism of the Apocalypse reappears:—"The Church is represented under the figure of a woman (Apoc. xii. 1; Vis. ii. 4); a bride (Apoc. xxi. 2; Vis. iv. 2); her enemy is a great beast (Apoc. xii. 4; Vis. iv. 2)."—Westcott, The Canon of the N. T., p. 181.

The age of the Apostolic Fathers is followed, according to Lücke's division (s. 516), by the age of apologetic literature;—an age which is closed by Eusebius of Cæsarea, and which begins with St. Justin Martyr¹ of whose testimony Lücke (s. 550) pronounces: "Nothing is clearer than what Eusebius (iv. 18) long ago remarked, that Justin in this passage [see below] employs the Apocalypse of the New Test. as a sacred, authentic, Christian writing, and expressly declares it to be the work of the Apostle John";—and he adds (s. 561): "On this point there can be no doubt."

¹ Dr. Hort (Journ. Class. and Sac. Philology, iii. 139), concludes that "we may set down Justin's first Apology to 145, or better still to 146, and his death to 148. The second Apology will then fall in 146 or 147, and the Dial. with Tryphon about the same time."

¹ See his Mémoire on the life of Ælius Aristides, in the Mém. de l'Institut, t. xxvi., 1867, p. 235, &c.; and also Renan's summary of the argument, L'Antechrist, p. 566. Scholten (Der Ap. Johannes in Kleinasien, s. 65) rejects the account of Polycarp's journey to Rome during the Paschal controversy,—when (A.D. 154) he met Anicetus (Iren. iii. 3, 4; cf. Ep. ad Victor., ap. Eus., H. E. v. 24; iv. 16; Chron. ad ann. 155),—on the ground that he must have then been too old to have undertaken such a journey: to which Renan justly replies that the voyage from Smyrna to Rome was one of the easiest in that age; and he quotes the case of a merchant whose epitaph states that he had made in his lifetime seventy-two voyages from Hierapolis to Rome:—see Boeckh, Corp. Inscr. Gr., t. iii., No. 3920. Cf. also Gibbon, ch. ii.

In his famous Dialogue Justin M., having explained the words of Isaiah, ch. lxxv. 17-25, as applicable to the Millennium, proceeds:—"Among us also a certain man named John, one of the Apostles of Christ, prophesied, in a Revelation given to him, that they who believe in our Christ shall spend a thousand years in Jerusalem; and after this that there shall be, with one accord, at the same time, the universal and (to speak concisely) eternal Resurrection of all men, and the Judgment."¹

When we recollect that these words form part of a dialogue with the Jew Tryphon, the qualification, "a certain man named John," with which it begins, need cause no surprise.

In the passage from Eusebius which Lücke refers to, the historian further states that the dialogue with Tryphon was held at Ephesus,—the chief of the Seven Churches (Rev. ii. 1),—the city where St. John resided until his death [διάλογον . . . ἐπὶ τῆς Ἐφεσίων πόλεως πρὸς Τρύφωνα τῶν τότε Ἑβραίων ἐπιστημότατον πεποιήται . . . μέμνηται δὲ καὶ τῆς Ἰωάννου ἀποκαλύψεως, σαφῶς τοῦ Ἀποστόλου αὐτὴν εἶναι λέγων]. It may be added that in the expression "Among us" (παρ' ἡμῶν, note ¹), Justin M. clearly implies the residence of St. John at Ephesus, and in Asia Minor.²

St. Jerome expressly states (De Vir. Ill., c. 9) that Justin M., as well as Irenæus, had interpreted the Apocalypse, see p. 20, No. (26): and it is to be noted that this is the only Book of the New Testament to which Justin M. refers by name, and St. John the only writer.³

² In his first Apology (i. 28), Justin refers to Rev. xx. 2 (ὁ ἀρχηγέτης τῶν κακῶν δαιμόνων ὕφης καλεῖται καὶ σατανᾶς καὶ διάβολος). Otto (in his notes) compares c. 45 of the Dial. c. Tryph. (ὁ θάνατος καταφρονηθῆ κ. τ. λ.) with Rev. xxi. 4. We may also compare c. 113 and its references to "the new Heaven and the new Earth," as well as its allusion to Christ being the Lamp of the New Jerusalem, with Rev. xxi. 1, 23:—see Hengstenberg, l. c., p. 409.

³ Tatian, a contemporary of Justin M., in his Melito (circa A.D. 169) was Bishop of Sardis, one of the Seven Churches (Rev. iii. 1). Melito, as we know, was most zealous in the investigation of the Canon of the Old Test.; and he is stated by Eusebius (iv. 26) and by St. Jerome (De Vir. Ill., c. 24) to have written "concerning the Apocalypse of John, and concerning the Devil," who is so often named in the Book of the Revelation—καὶ τὰ περὶ τοῦ διαβόλου, καὶ τῆς ἀποκαλύψεως Ἰωάννου:—"de diabolo librum unum, de Apocalypsi Joannis librum unum". This mention of "John" without any distinguishing title clearly points (see below) to a pre-eminent person of that name; and had Eusebius known that Melito entertained any doubt as to the apostolical origin of the Book, he would not have failed to notice it. This work of Melito is not extant. The authenticity of a treatise ascribed to him, which is styled by Eusebius The Key (ἡ Κλῆις), by St. Jerome Clavis, and which has been given to the world in a Latin version by Dom Pitra (Spicileg. Solesmense, vol. ii.),—is perhaps doubtful.¹ In this translation the Apocalypse is constantly quoted.²

Apollonius was Bishop (or Presbyter)

"Oration to the Greeks" (c. 20), may also be taken to allude to Rev. xxi. Dionysius, who suffered as a martyr, A.D. 176 (Routh, i. p. 177), appears to have been bishop of Corinth at the time of Justin's death (Westcott, p. 173)—see Euseb. iv. 23: of the three allusions to the New Test. to be found in the fragment of his works preserved by Eusebius, one is an allusion to Rev. xxii. 18,—“When brethren urged me to write letters, I wrote them; and these the apostles of the Devil have filled with tares, taking away some things, and adding others, for whom the Woe is appointed—ἃ μὲν ἐξαιρουντες, ἃ δὲ προστιθέντες, οἷς τὸ οὖαι κεῖται:” see Westcott, l. c., p. 166.

¹ Labbe (De Scriptor. Eccl., ii. 87) had mentioned a MS. of this work as extant in the College of Clermont at Paris, and of this Dom Pitra has discovered eight copies. Of the copy in the Bodleian Library, the writer in Smith's Biogr. Dict., art. Melito, says, "it appears to be much interpolated, if indeed any part of it is genuine. . . . It is possible that the fourth extract given by Routh (l. c., t. i. p. 124) from the Catena is from the original Clavis of Melito."

of Ephesus (see Routh, l. c., i. 465). It was here, where St. John lived and taught, that opposition must have at once arisen to any work ascribed to the Apostle which had not proceeded from his pen. Apollonius wrote circ. A.D. 170–180; and this date, as bearing upon recent objections, is of importance. Apollonius (see Euseb., v. 18) composed a treatise against Montanism about forty years after Montanus appeared; and his reference in this work to the public archives of Asia Minor which were preserved at Ephesus, illustrates his familiarity with the affairs of the Ephesian Church [οὐχ ἡμᾶς δεῖ λέγειν, ἀλλὰ ὁ ὀπισθόδομος ἔχει,—see the note of Valesius in loc.]. He wrote, therefore, not only before Irenæus (A.D. 190), and independently of him, but also at a time when no one questioned the identity of the author of the Apocalypse with the Apostle John.¹

Apollonius mentions, “as if from tradition” [ὡς ἐκ παραδόσεως] that the Saviour had commanded the Apostles not to leave Jerusalem for twelve years; and he also testifies that St. John wrote the Apocalypse,—that he resided at Ephesus,—and that he there restored a dead man to life.²

This testimony, as Lücke (l. c., s. 567) notes, is also important as proving that the acceptance of the Apocalypse, at this date, was not restricted (as some argue) to Montanists³ and Millennarians.

³ Thus, not to speak of Tertullian (see below, p. 17), a Montanist prophetess, referred to by Epiphanius (Hæc. 49, 1), says: Χριστὸς ἀπελάληξέ μοι τουτονὶ τὸν τόπον εἶναι ἅγιον καὶ ὁδε

Theophilus of Antioch († A.D. 168), the sixth in descent from the Apostles (Euseb., iv. 24), was engaged in controversy with one Hermogenes. His work is lost; but Eusebius, who had read it, assures us that Theophilus there adduced “proofs” (μαρτυρίαι) from “the Apocalypse of John,”—evidently as a New Testament authority, and one recognized in the church of Antioch. In his extant treatise Ad Autolycum (ii. c. 28), we meet an allusion to Rev. xii. 3, to the effect that Satan is called “a demon and a dragon” [δαίμων καὶ δράκων καλεῖται].

The most valuable testimony, however, from the second century which we possess is that of St. Irenæus, Bishop of Lyons, whose activity extends from A.D. 130 to A.D. 202; and who wrote his great work against the Gnostics, at Rome, during the episcopate of Eleutherus (A.D. 177–199). Irenæus was a Greek of Asia Minor, and subsequently a presbyter of the Gallican Church. He there succeeded, as bishop, Pothinus who was already ninety years of age, and who had associated, like Polycarp, with the generation of St. John.¹ Irenæus tells us of himself, in his treatise on the Ogdoad (as we read in Euseb., v. 20), that “he had reached to the first succession of the Apostles.” In his well-known “Epistle to Florinus” (ap. Euseb.

τὴν Ἱερουσαλήμ ἐκ τοῦ οὐρανοῦ κατιέναι (Rev. xxi. 2). And on the opposite side:—

Agreeing with Apollonius, among other anti-Montanists, the author of the fragment Adv. Cataphrygas (Eus., v. 16; Routh, ii., p. 183) says that he was not inclined to accept certain opinions, “fearing lest he should seem to add a new article to the word of the New Covenant of the Gospel,—ὃ μήτε προσθεῖναι μήτ’ ἀφελεῖν δυνατόν (Rev. xxii. 18, 19).” Clemens Alex. and Origen (see below, p. 415) were decided anti-Millennarians.

ib.; compare note ¹, p. 431), Irenæus relates that he had met Polycarp (see above, p. 408), whom he had come to know at Smyrna; and that he was wont, when a boy, to hear from his lips concerning "his converse with John and the rest who had seen the Lord." He had not merely, he tells us, seen Polycarp occasionally, but had lived in his society and profited by his instruction; and of this he now writes to another pupil of Polycarp, Florinus, who must have known the fact, and whom he was opposing on a grave matter of doctrine:—see note ², p. 431. In the passage from which No. (11)—see below—is taken, important details are given respecting St. John and his relation to the succeeding generation. We are told in that passage how Polycarp had been appointed by the Apostles Bishop of Smyrna; and that certain persons had heard from him how St. John on one occasion rushed with horror from the baths at Ephesus, because he had chanced to meet there the heretic Cerinthus. In the Epistle of Irenæus to Victor Bishop of Rome (ap. Euseb., v. 24), we also read that Polycarp, when he visited Rome, was not persuaded by Anicetus to give up his practice of keeping Easter on the fourteenth day of the month, as he had been wont to keep it after the manner of "John the Disciple of the Lord," and the other Apostles with whom he (Polycarp) had associated. Indeed the intimate connexion with Polycarp which is manifested throughout his writings, renders the testimony of Irenæus as to St. John virtually that of a contemporary.

Perhaps the most important passage out of many in the writings of this Father is the following (Hæc., v. 30, 31; for the Greek text see Euseb., v. 8):—In opposition to the erroneous reading 616, in Rev. xiii. 18, Irenæus supports the true reading 666: this, he observes, is found "in all the correct and ancient copies;" and it has also in its favour "the testimony of those who had seen John face to face"¹ [τῶν κατ'

¹ The author of Supernatural Religion (vol. ii. p. 393) offers the following characteristic criticism: "We do not attribute any value to his [Irenæus'] testimony. . . . Although he appeals to those 'who saw John face to face'

ὄψιν τὸν Ἰωάννην ἑωρακότων]. Having given his own conjectures as to the meaning of the mystic number ("for were it right that it should be proclaimed openly at the present time, this name of Antichrist would have been uttered by him who beheld the Apocalypse"), Irenæus concludes with the statement, that St. John beheld the Vision "almost in our own generation, towards the end of the reign of Domitian."¹

This statement as to the late period down to which St. John lived, is incidentally referred to again and again:—e.g. (Hæc., ii. 22, 5; Euseb., iii. 23) appealing to "all the presbyters who had associated in Asia with John the Disciple of the Lord" [τῷ τοῦ Κυρίου μαθητῇ], and who testify of what he had handed down to them, Irenæus adds that John "remained among them until the time of Trajan; . . . and some among them have seen not John only, but also other Apostles." And once more (Hæc., iii. 3, 4; Euseb., ibid.) he writes:—

"Moreover, the Church of Ephesus, which Paul had founded, and where John abode until the times of Trajan, is a true witness of the tradition of the Apostles."²

In none of his writings does Irenæus betray the least consciousness that any doubts had ever been entertained as to the authorship of the Apocalypse. He does not, indeed, expressly call the author "an Apostle,"—continually speaking of him as "the Disciple of the Lord" (see above); as "he that leaned on His bosom" (see John xiii. 23; and cf. Euseb. v. 24, as well as p. 407, note ²); or simply as "John" (No. (6), note ², with regard to the number of the Beast, his own utter ignorance of the interpretation shows how little information he can have derived from Polycarp."

p. 408): but that "John" is the Apostle and Evangelist is clear from the words in which he states that "John the Lord's Disciple, he that leaned on His bosom, published the Gospel at Ephesus during his abode in Asia."¹

The references to the Apocalypse are in the following forms: "Sed et Johannes Domini discipulus, in Apocalypsi" (Adv. Her. iv. 20, 11); "significavit Johannes Domini discipulus in Apocalypsi" (ib. v. 26, 1); "in Apocalypsi vidit Joannes," (ib. v. 35, 2); "Joannes in Apoc. ait" (ib. iv. 21, 3).

Akin to the testimony of Irenæus is that which is supplied by the Epistle in which the churches of Lyons, and Vienne inform the churches in Asia and Phrygia of the persecution which they had endured under Antoninus Verus, A.D. 177 (ap. Euseb., v. 1, 2). We there learn how deeply the imagery and the language of the Apocalypse had penetrated the thoughts of Christians at that early period:—The martyr Vettius "is a genuine disciple of Christ, 'following the Lamb whithersoever He goeth'" (Ἰσχυρὸς Χριστοῦ μαθητὴς ἀκολουθῶν τῷ ἀρνίῳ ὅπου ἂν ὑπάγῃ [Rev. xiv. 4]);—Christ is described as "the faithful and true Witness and First Born of the dead" (Rev. i. 5; iii. 14);—and the fury of the persecutors as compared with the patience of the Martyrs, is represented in the words of Rev. xxii. 11, freely quoted with the preface, "that the Scripture might be fulfilled."²

Polycrates, a later bishop of Ephesus († A.D. 196), writing, during the second Paschal controversy, to Victor Bishop of Rome (ap. Euseb. iii. 31; v. 24), appeals to the great lights of the Church in Asia, —to Polycarp of Smyrna, and Thraseus of Eumenia; to Sagaris, Papirius, Melito of Sardis; and to seven other bishops of his own family. Of the Twelve Apostles, he appeals to "Philip who with two of his daughters (who had remained virgins) was buried at Hierapolis,"³ —a third daughter, who was inspired by the Holy Spirit, being buried at Ephesus;" and to St. John. Polycrates thus describes the latter Apostle:—

"And moreover John, he who leaned on the Lord's bosom, who came to be a Priest that wore the Golden Plate [or Mitre, or Frontlet,—LXX. πέταλον, see himself bishop of Hierapolis, refers to Philip as one of "the disciples of the Lord," whose sayings he had collected. This Philip can be no other than the Apostle, residing with his daughters at Hierapolis, as Eusebius (iii. 39) understood Papias who, the historian tells us, had heard from Philip's daughters a certain wonderful narration. Philip is mentioned by Papias next to Andrew and Peter; and one who turns to St. John's Gospel will see that what related to these three Apostles had a special interest not only for St. John, but also for his hearers (John i. 40, 43-46; vi. 5-8; xii. 20-22; xiv. 8, 9). Papias does not refer at all to Philip the Evangelist. Polycrates, as quoted in the text, mentions—Φίλιππον [τὸν] τῶν δώδεκα ἀποστόλων, ὃς κεκοίμηται ἐν Ἱεραπόλει καὶ δύο θυγατέρες αὐτοῦ γενηρακῦναι παρθένοι καὶ ἡ ἑτέρα αὐτοῦ θυγάτηρ ἐν ἁγίῳ πνεύματι πολιτευσαμένη, ἥ ἐν Ἐφέσῳ ἀναπαύεται (ap. Euseb., iii. 31; v. 24);—this third daughter, who had the gift of prophecy, being evidently married. This statement is confirmed by Clemens Al. (Strom. iii. 6, 25; Euseb., iii. 30) as to the third daughter, although he loosely uses the plural number when he says that Philip gave his "daughters" in marriage. On the other hand, the "Dialogue of Caius and Proclus" (Euseb., iii. 31) represents Philip the Evangelist as residing at Hierapolis, and with him four daughters who had the gift of prophecy (μετὰ τούτου δὲ προφῆτιδες τέσσαρες αἱ Φιλίππου γεγεννηται); all five being buried in that city. Here the mention of four daughters prophesying recalls the person spoken of in Acts xxi. 8, 9. Now although the statement of Polycrates as to the Apostle Philip is confirmed by Papias, as we have seen, and by Clemens Al.,—yet, because another later writer, the author of this Dialogue, refers to Philip the Evangelist as having also resided at Hierapolis, we are told that the evidence of Polycrates is discredited by the confusion into which he has here fallen; and therefore that his testimony as to St. John is of little worth. It is clear, however, that St. Luke carefully distinguishes between the two Philips:—cf. Acts vi. 2-5; viii. 5-17; xxi. 8, where the "Deacon," or "Evangelist," is evidently contrasted with the members of the Twelve. Can any one, then,—on the sole evidence of a writer (A.D. 212) so much later in time than Papias (born A.D. 60-70, see p. 5), and so much inferior in authority to Polycrates and Clemens Al.,—admit the existence of such a blunder on the part of Polycrates? When Papias, as Eusebius tells us, received information from "the daughters of Philip," are we not to understand that the "Philip" intended was the Apostle whom

³ In the passage No. (5), Papias, who was below], and a witness, and a teacher, he too has fallen asleep at Ephesus."¹

And thus, at the end of the second century, we have evidence from Ephesus itself as to the fact of the residence and death of the Evangelist John in that city.

Dean Alford rejects without sufficient cause this testimony to the Apocalypse (Prolegg., p. 207). Hengstenberg justly insists upon this proof. Even Keim (l. c., i. 165), although he pronounces the statement of Polycrates to be "a fantastic picture," nevertheless admits that the language of the passage just quoted is gleaned from the Gospel, and the Apocalypse.² Scholten also (s. 75) allows that St. John is here described in words borrowed from the Gospel (John xiii. 23; xxi. 20), and that he is called "a witness" in accordance with Rev. i. 9.

The terms "Priest" and "Plate" of gold, which occur in the passage cited from Polycrates, have been much discussed. The "Plate" of gold [πέταλον, the equivalent of פָּתֵל, (Ex. xxviii. 32 (36); Lev. viii. 9, LXX.), and of נֶזֶן (Ex. xxix. 6), "the Frontlet" inscribed "Holiness to the Lord,"—see the note on Ex. xxviii. 36] was the token by which Eusebius had just mentioned?—although Eusebius himself seems to have confounded the Apostle with the Evangelist. It may be added that The Acts of Philip in like manner place the Apostle at Hierapolis,—see Tischendorf, Act. Apost. Apocr., p. 75. Those critics who, like Keim (l. c.), insist upon charging Polycrates with error, attribute his describing Philip as "an Apostle" to the desire of the Asiatic churches to trace their spiritual descent directly from the Twelve;—on which Bishop Lightfoot well observes: "This solution of the phenomenon might have been accepted if the authorities in favour of Philip the Evangelist had been prior in time and superior in quality."—Comm. on Coloss., p. 46. It is hard to see why two persons named Philip could not have been married and had daughters; even though the daughters of both had the gift of prophecy which, we know, was not then unusual,—see Eusebius (iii. 37; v. 17) on Quadratus, and Ammias; as also the notes of Routh, l. c., vol. ii. pp. 24–26. On this whole subject cf. the note of Bishop Lightfoot, l. c., p. 45.

the High Priest was distinguished from the other priests. Neander (Pflanzung, ii. 32) sees in these two terms a reference to the rank which St. John held in the Church. We know how continually St. John, throughout the Apocalypse, uses the symbolism of the Old Covenant: may we not then, see in the πέταλον an emblem of the dignity, whether moral or ecclesiastical, ascribed in the Church to the Apostles? May not Polycrates have thus referred to the Apostles as "High Priests," distinguished from the ordinary members of the Church who receive in the Apocalypse itself the title of "priests" (Rev. i. 6; v. 10; xx. 6)?¹ May we not see here, on the part of the primitive Church, a belief in the connexion of the Old and the New Dispensations, and in the maintenance of the Apostolic office in the second, continuing the High Priestly office in the first?² Hilgenfeld observes: "Polycrates of Ephesus represents him [John] as a Christian High Priest, or as one of exalted Episcopal dignity . . . A similar statement respecting James, the Lord's brother, is to be found in Epiphanius."—Einl., s. 392.³ Godet, to the same effect, concludes from this statement of Polycrates that "John, the last survivor of the Apostolate, had left on the Church of Asia the impression of a Pontiff from whose forehead shone the spiritual splendour of the holiness of Christ."—Comm. on St. John's Gospel (Engl. transl., vol. i. p. 60).

² To this effect Vallarsius notes on St. Jerome (De Vir. Ill. c. 45, vol. ii. p. 872):—"Figurate hoc dici eo sensu quo Horatius de virtute prædicat, 'Nec sumit aut ponit secures, Arbitrio popularis aura.' Ut perinde sit auream laminam inter Christianos gestare, ac pontificis dignitatem, cujus illud insigne est, obtinere."

³ See Epiphanius (Hær. 29, 4; 78, 14) and also Hegesippus (ap. Euseb., ii. 23), who refer to the fact of James "the Just" wearing the πέταλον. The Martyrium Marci Evangeliste (see Valesius on Eus. v. 24) states that St. Mark wore "pontificalis apicis petalum inter Judæos." Ewald argues from the use of the word γυνεστός, in John xviii. 15, that the beloved Apostle was "a kinsman" of the High Priest, and therefore of sacerdotal race (Die Joh. Schr., i. s. 400); and he seeks support for this theory in these words of Polycrates (see, on the other hand, Bleek, Einleit. in das N. T., § 60).

And thus, already, from the region of the Seven Churches, we have Apollonius and Polycrates in Ephesus, Papias in Hierapolis, Polycarp in Smyrna, and Melito in Sardis, all bearing witness to the Apocalypse as the authentic work of the Apostle John. We are now at the threshold of the third century.

Clemens Alexandrinus flourished A.D. 165–220. He was trained in the school of Pantænus whom Photius (Cod. 118) represents as "a hearer of the Apostles" (see Routh, I. c., i. p. 377). Clemens, who had for one of his earliest instructors an Ionian Greek, thus describes his teachers before he met with Pantænus: "Moreover they who preserve the true tradition of the blessed doctrine directly from Peter and James, from John and Paul, the holy Apostles,—son receiving from father,—came with God's help to us also, to deposit that ancestral and Apostolic seed."¹

Clemens had thus every opportunity of learning the facts bearing upon the life of St. John; and what he narrates is full of interest. He expressly states that, "after the death of the tyrant,"—who could be no other than Domitian,²—St. John changed his abode from Patmos to Ephesus.³ Eusebius (see note ²) quotes

² Eusebius (iii. 23) clearly applies these words of Clemens to Domitian (see ib., c. 21, 22). How well the title "tyrant" suits that Emperor, appears from his character as given by Pliny (Panegy., c. 48) who calls him "immanissima bellua:"—cf. also Tacitus, Agricola, 45. Indeed, Eusebius himself appeals to a heathen writer, Bruttius, in proof of Domitian's cruel persecution of the Christians:—ἱστορεῖ δὲ Βρούτιος πολλοὺς χριστιανοὺς κατὰ τὸ ἰδ' ἔτος Δομετιανοῦ μεμαρτυρηκέναι.—Chron. Pasch., i. p. 468, ed. Dindorf. Scaliger in his notes (p. 205) conjectures that this Bruttius was Bruttius Præsens, father of the wife of the Emperor Commodus.

³ (15) ἀκουσον μῦθον, οὐ μῦθον ἀλλ' ὄντα λόγον, περὶ Ἰωάννου τοῦ ἀποστόλου παραδεδομένον . . . ἵπτιδὴ γὰρ τοῦ τυράννου τελευτήσαντος ἀπὸ τῆς Πάτμου τῆς νήσου μετήλθεν ἐπὶ τὴν Ἐφεσον.—Quis dices salu. c. 42, I. c., p. 959.

this passage (in which Clemens tells the story of the aged St. John and the young robber), introducing it by saying that "the Apostle and Evangelist John organized the churches that were in Asia when he returned from his exile in the island after the death of Domitian;"¹ and it is in proof of this fact,—namely, that the banishment to Patmos was under Domitian,—that he cites Clemens and Irenæus.

As to the Apocalypse itself, Clemens refers to the description of "Jerusalem which is above," with its foundations of precious stones; and he quotes ch. xxi. 18, as "the utterance of the Apostolic voice" [καὶ τὰς δώδεκα τῆς οὐρανοπόλεως πύλας, τιμίους ἀπεικασμένας λίθοις, τὸ περίοπτον τῆς ἀποστολικῆς φωνῆς αἰνίττεσθαι χάριτος ἐκδεχόμεθα.—Pædag. ii. 12, I. c., p. 242]. Identifying "the Apostolic voice" with that of St. John, he writes of "the faithful Elder" that "he is seated among the four and twenty thrones, judging the people, as John says in the Apocalypse" [ἐν τοῖς εἴκοσι καὶ τέσσαρσι καθεδεῖται θρόνοις, τὸν λαὸν κρίνων, ὡς φησιν ἐν τῇ ἀποκαλύψει Ἰωάννης (Rev. iv. 4; xi. 16). Strom. vi. 13, p. 793].²

Origen (A.D. 186–253), the pupil of Clemens Al., made the Canon of the New Testament a subject of special inquiry: and when the authority of any of its Books was assailed, he never fails to state the fact. It is noteworthy, therefore, that Origen is ignorant of any doubts entertained as to the Apocalypse, which he quotes as the recognized composition of the Apostle and Evangelist John:³ e.g.—with the usual formula of quotation—"the Apostle and Evangelist in the Revelation"

³ Lücke writes (s. 591): "Origen appears to have known nothing of any important opposition to the Apocalypse"; nor "did he find any valid reason for doubting the apostolical, Joannean authenticity of it, either in the Alexandrian tradition or in the course of his own numerous theological journeys."

[ἐν τῇ ἀποκαλύψει ὁ ἀπόστολος καὶ εὐαγγελιστής—Comm. in Ev. Joann., i. 1, 6]. In his Series in Matth. (t. iii. p. 867), quoting Rev. xii. 3, Origen promises that he will write an exposition of the Book at some future time ["exponetur autem tempore suo in Revelatione Joannis" ¹]. In his Comm. in Matth. (preserved by Eusebius, vi. 25), speaking of "John, who leaned on Jesus' bosom," "who wrote a Gospel, and said that the world itself could not contain the books which tell of the Lord's acts" (John xxi. 25), he adds: "And he wrote the Apocalypse also, commanded to keep silence and not to write the voices of the Seven Thunders" (ch. x. 3, 4) [ἔγραψε δὲ καὶ τὴν ἀποκάλυψιν, κελευσθεὶς σιωπῆσαι καὶ μὴ γράφειν τὰς τῶν ἑπτὰ βροντῶν φωνάς.]. (Note that in this place Origen refers to the doubts as to the 2nd and 3rd Epistles of St. John). Again, Comm. in Joann. i. 16 (t. iv. p. 16): "John the son of Zebedee, therefore, says in the Apocalypse 'and I saw an Angel flying,'" &c. [φησὶν οὖν ἐν τῇ ἀποκαλύψει ὁ τοῦ Ζεβεδαίου Ἰωάννης· "καὶ εἶδον ἄγγελον πετόμενον," κ.τ.λ.] (Rev. xiv. 6, 7). In fine, —chief passage of all,— "And the sons of Zebedee were baptized with that baptism; for Herod slew James the brother of John with the sword; and the king of the Romans—as tradition teaches—condemned John, bearing witness for the word of truth, to the island of Patmos. And John informs us of the things concerning this witness of his, not telling who condemned him, but saying in the Apocalypse 'I John was in the isle that is called Patmos' (ch. i. 9) . . . And he appears to have seen the Revelation in the island." ²

² (16) καὶ τὸ βάπτισμα ἐβαπτίσθησαν οἱ τοῦ Ζεβεδαίου υἱοί, ἐπεὶ περ Ἡρώδης μὲν ἀπέκτεινεν Ἰάκωβον τὸν Ἰωάννου μαχαίρᾳ, ὁ δὲ Ῥωμαίων βασιλεὺς, ὡς ἡ παράδοσις διδάσκει, κατεδίκασε τὸν Ἰωάννην μαρτυροῦντα διὰ τὸν τῆς ἀληθείας λόγον εἰς Πάτμον τὴν νῆσον διδάσκει δὲ τὰ περὶ τοῦ μαρτυρίου αὐτοῦ Ἰωάννης, μὴ λέγων τίς αὐτὸν κατεδίκασε, φάσκων ἐν τῇ ἀποκαλύψει ταῦτα, Ἐγὼ Ἰωάννης . . . καὶ ἔοικε τὴν ἀποκάλυψιν ἐν τῇ νήσῳ τεθεωρηκέναι.—Comm. in Matth., § xvi. 6 (t. v. p. 719).

The name of the Emperor who condemned St. John is not given here,—the reason being Eusebius (iii. 1) refers to Origen for the statement that, in the distribution of their different spheres of duty among the Apostles, St. John was assigned Asia Minor, and Ephesus.¹

Origen, as we know, was a decided anti-chiliasm; but he did not, like Dionysius of Alexandria, allow his doctrinal tendencies to influence his judgment as to historical facts. The same may be said of Clemens Alexandrinus.

St. Hippolytus lived early in Cent. iii.² (A.D. 220). He was the disciple of Irenæus (see Photius, Cod. 48, 121, 202), to whose writings (Har. i. 263) he evidently refers. In his Refutatio omnium Hæresium (vii. 36, ed. Dunker, p. 408), occurs a reference to Rev. ii. 6, Hippolytus observing that "the Holy Ghost by the Apocalypse of John convicted the Nicolaitans."³ This is one of the few passages in which the name of any Book of the New Testament is introduced in the Refutatio. In the well-known inscrip-stated, viz. because St. John himself has not given it; for Origen is simply commenting on the fulfilment of Christ's words in Matt. xx. 23. The king of the Jews (Herod, who is named here because he is named in Acts xii.) had slain one of the sons of Zebedee; "the king of the Romans" condemned the other. This latter fact "tradition," not Scripture, records; and Origen thus contrasts (as well as by the last words, καὶ ἔοικε) the information imparted by the inspired volume and that imparted by history.

² Hippolytus Thebanus (called "the younger Hippolytus") was a writer of Cent. x. or xi. Fabricius, in his edition of the works of St. Hippolytus, partly in the appendix to vol. i. and partly in vol. ii., has given fragments of the chronicle erroneously ascribed to the earlier writer. These fragments are collected by Gallandius (Bibl. Vet. Patr., t. xiv. p. 106), and assigned to Hippolytus of Thebes, who seems to have drawn much of his information from Symeon Metaphrastes, a Byzantine writer, circa A.D. 900. We there read:—

(b) Ἰωάννης δὲ ἐν Ἀσίᾳ ὑπὸ Δομετιανοῦ τοῦ βασιλέως ἐξορισθεὶς ἐν Πάτμῳ τῇ νήσῳ, ἐν ᾗ καὶ τὸ εὐαγγέλιον συνεγράψατο, καὶ τὴν ἀποκάλυψιν ἐθεόσατο, ἐπὶ Τραϊανοῦ ἐκοιμήθη ἐν Ἐφέσῳ.—De xii. Apostolis, l. c., p. 117. See below, p. 433, note ³.

³ οὗ [scil. Nicolai] τοὺς μαθητὰς ἐνυβρίζον [so the Paris MS. reads] τὸ ἅγιον πνεῦμα διὰ τῆς ἀποκαλύψεως Ἰωάννου ἡλεγχε.

tion on his statue, we read that Hippolytus wrote "concerning the Gospel according to John and the Apocalypse" [ὑπὲρ τοῦ κατὰ Ἰωάννην εὐαγγελίου καὶ ἀποκαλύψεως (St. Jerome, De Vir. Ill. 61, says only de Apocalypsi)] : see above (p. 406) the testimony of Andreas.¹ In his treatise also on Antichrist he repeatedly cites the Apocalypse as the work of St. John, "who when in the island of Patmos saw the Revelation" [οὗτος γὰρ ἐν Πάτμῳ τῇ νήσῳ ὡν ὁρᾷ ἀποκάλυψιν (c. 34)] ; and he thus apostrophizes the author :—"O blessed John, Apostle and Disciple of the Lord, what sawest thou and heardest thou concerning Babylon" [μακάριε Ἰωάννη ἀπόστολε καὶ μαθητὰ τοῦ Κυρίου, τί εἶδες καὶ ἤκουσας περὶ Βαβυλῶνος (c. 36, p. 18 ; c. 48, p. 23 ; c. 49, ib., ed. Fabric.)]. In the remarks of Hippolytus on Daniel's Fourth Beast, Rev. xiii. 1 is distinctly referred to (see Mai, Scriptt. Vett. Nova Coll., t. i., pars ii., p. 206, No. 19).

Methodius († A.D. 311), also mentioned by Andreas (see No. (1), note², p. 406), brings us to the fourth century. He was Bishop of Lycia, and afterwards of Tyre. Quoting Rev. xx. 13, he speaks of the writer as the "blessed John" (De Resurrect., ed. Combefis. 1644, p. 326), and in his treatise Convivium decem Virginum (ap. Galland., t. iii. 677) he refers in a striking manner to Rev. xiv. 1-4, as written by "the Christ-inspired John."²

The last authorities appealed to by Andreas (see No. (1), note², p. 406), in addition to Papias, Irenæus, Methodius, and Hippolytus, are Gregory [Naz.] and Cyril [Alex.].

St. Gregory († 390) applies to Christ, as being "assuredly spoken concerning the Son" [σαφῶς περὶ τοῦ Υἱοῦ λεγόμενα],

² ὅτι δὲ καὶ Ἀρχιεπισκοπὸς . . . γέγονεν ὁ λόγος ἐνανθρωπήσας . . . ὁ χριστόληπτος ἡμῶν παρέστησεν ἐν βιβλίῳ τῆς Ἀποκαλύψεως Ἰωάννη, λέγων· Καὶ εἶδον, καὶ ἰδοὺ τὸ Ἀρνίον, κ. τ. λ. He also refers to Rev. xii. 1-6, "καὶ ἔφθην μέγα σημεῖον ἐν τῇ οὐρανῷ" τὴν Ἀποκάλυψιν ὁ Ἰωάννης ἐγγεγμένον λέγει (ib., p. 716).

the words of Rev. i. 8, "Which is and which was, and which is to come, the Almighty" [καὶ ὁ ὢν καὶ ὁ ἦν, καὶ ὁ ἐρχόμενος, καὶ ὁ παντοκράτωρ.—Orat. xxix. 17, t. i. p. 536, ed. Par. 1778] ; and he also quotes the Apocalypse, as being an authority of decisive weight, where he is speaking of "the Angels" who preside over churches.¹ These statements, added to the testimony of Andreas and of Arethas (see No. (2), note¹, p. 407), are sufficient to set aside the inference which has been deduced from the two poetical catalogues of the Canon of Scripture contained in the published editions of Gregory's works (of which catalogues the second is, perhaps wrongly, ascribed to Amphilochius of Iconium—see Smith's Dict. of Christ. Biogr. art. Gregory Naz.),—viz. that he did not receive the Apocalypse as inspired Scripture.²

St. Cyril Alex. († A.D. 444) accepts the Apocalypse without any question.³ We may also compare the writings of St. Cyril's contemporaries, Isidore of Pelusium (Ep. ii. 175, p. 208,—λέων κέκληται ὁ Χριστός : see also Ep. i. 13, 188, pp. 4, 56) ; and Nilus (de Orat. 75, 76, p. 494).

In his list of writers who maintain the inspiration of the Apocalypse, Arethas has added to the list of Andreas the name of St. Basil († 378), Bishop of Cæsarea, and, therefore, another witness from Asia Minor. "The Holy Spirit," writes St. Basil, "has spoken to us

² Note the bearing of this fact on the practice of the church in Asia Minor (see below, p. 425). A similar instance has been pointed out in the writings of St. Cyril of Jerusalem († 386). In his Catechesis iv., 35, 36, he seems to exclude the Apocalypse from the Canon ; and yet he is familiar with its language, which he uses for the purpose of spiritual instruction (although he does not name the Book itself), and which he quotes as prophetic. E.g. in baptism, he tells the catechumen, καταφυτεύη εἰς τὸν νοητὸν παράδεισον· λαμβάνεις ὄνομα καινόν (Rev. ii. 7, 17),—Catech. i. 4, p. 18 ; and he connects with Daniel's prediction of Antichrist the words of Rev. xvii. 11,—ἀπὸ δὲ τῶν δέκα τούτων τοὺς τρεῖς ταπεινῶν πάντως ὅτι αὐτὸς ἔγδοος βασιλεύσει,—Catech. xv. 13, p. 230 (see Lücke, s. 630).

³ He writes : τὸ τῆς ἀποκαλύψεως βιβλίον ἡμῶν συντιθεῖς ὁ σοφὸς Ἰωάννης, ὁ καὶ ταῖς τῶν πατέρων τετιμηται ψήφοις.—De Ador., vi., t. i. p. 188.

by the blessed John that 'In the beginning WAS the Word,'"; and then he adds: "But the Evangelist himself has shown us what is signified by such an expression as WAS, by saying 'Which is and which WAS, and the Almighty'""¹ (Rev. i. 8; xvi. 5).

St. Ephræm Syrus—the chief Father of the Syrian Church, styled "Propheta Syrorum"—wrote circ. A.D. 370. Although Ephræm specially made use of the Peschito version (Lengerke, de Ephr. Syri arte hermen. p. 8; Wiseman, Hor. Syr., p. 107) calling it "our translation;" and although the Peschito omits the Apocalypse, he nevertheless refers to the Apocalypse itself as he refers to any other part of Scripture, ascribing it to the Apostle John. Thus, in the Greek translation of his works (Opp. Græc., ed. Assem., Romæ, 1743), Rev. xxi. 4, 5 is thus quoted: "As we hear the Apostle saying" [καθὼς ἀκούομεν τοῦ ἀποστόλου λέγοντος, De sec. Adventu (t. ii., p. 248)];—a reference to Rev. xx. 11 is thus prefaced: "As John shewed before" [καθὼς Ἰωάννης προεδήλωσε, ib., p. 252; cf. p. 214];—and of Rev. i. 7 we read: "As also John the Divine preached, saying, 'Behold he cometh'"" [καθὼς καὶ Ἰωάννης ὁ θεολόγος ἐκήρυξε λέγων· ἰδοὺ ἔρχεται, ib., p. 194]. In the original Syriac (Bibl. Orient., t. i. p. 141) we read, as Assemani renders:—"In his Apocalypse John saw a great and wonderful Book written by God, sealed with Seven Seals" (Rev. v. 1); on which Assemani notes: "In this discourse the holy Doctor cites the Apocalypse of John as a canonical portion of Scripture which I have noted for this reason, that the judgment of the most ancient Syrians concerning the authority of this Book might be manifest" (cf. t. ii. p. 332 c).

Lücke corrects an error of Wetstein and Michaelis as to a passage in the works of Basil's brother, Gregory of Nyssa († 395), who quotes for a hortatory purpose Rev. iii. 15. Gregory writes:—ἤκουσα τοῦ εὐαγγελιστοῦ Ἰωάννου ἐν ἀποκρύφοις πρὸς τοὺς τοιοῦτους δι' αἰνίγματος λέγοντος, κ. τ. λ. Lücke points out that ἀπόκρυφα here is equivalent to μυστικά or προφητικά (cf. Dion. Areop., De Eccl. Hier. iii. 4), and by no means implies that Gregory regarded the Apocalypse, in the modern sense of the word, as an "apocryphal" book.

Ephræm seems to have used an early Syriac translation of the New Testament which contained the Apocalypse. The Apocalypse is not contained in the Peschito,—the "simple" Syriac version of the New Testament, "of the most remote Christian antiquity" (Westcott, l. c., p. 204).¹ The inference, accordingly, is plain that Ephræm did not consider this omission any reason for not regarding the Book as inspired Scripture: and we are also to bear in mind, that, as has been already shown, the earliest teachers of the Church of Syria in the second century—Justin M. and Theophilus of Antioch—acknowledged the Divine character of the Apocalypse. Although absent, however, from the recognized Syriac versions, a Syriac translation of the Book was published in 1627 by Ludovicus de Dieu,² which scholars generally assign to the sixth century, and of which the superscription runs thus:—

"The Revelation which was given

¹ Neither, apparently, was it contained in the Philoxenian version (A.D. 485–518), nor in the recension of this latter by Thomas of Harkel (A.D. 616). If, as Hug (Einl. i. s. 307) maintains, Ephræm did not understand Greek, his references to the Apocalypse prove that there must have been an early Syriac translation of that Book, see Smith's Christ. Biogr., art. Ephræm Syr. Hug quotes Sozomen (H.E., iii. 16); Theodoret (H.E., iv. 29).

² Apocalypsis S. Johannis, ex Manuscripto exemplari e Bibliotheca clariss. viri Jos. Scaligeri deprompta, caractere Syro et Ebraeo, cum versione Latina et notis, Lugd. Bat. 1627. As to the omission of the Apocalypse from the earlier Syriac versions, Hug conjectures (Einl., i. s. 306) that it may have been originally omitted owing to the Millennarian controversy, or have been afterwards left out in Cent. iv. Walton would assign the Peschito to a period before the Apocalypse was written. Hengstenberg makes the date to be the close of Cent. iii. Lücke concludes that the Apocalypse was not received as canonical till after the Peschito version was made,—i.e., at the end of Cent. ii.; but this, we have seen, is opposed to the whole current of early evidence. From the fact that Manes, who died A.D. 277, acknowledged the Apocalypse (Lardner, Cred. of the Gosp. Hist., Works, iii. p. 404), it has been fairly concluded that the lacuna in the Peschito must have been filled up at a very early date. As to the edition of De Dieu, Dr. Tregelles (The Greek Text of the Book of Rev., p. xxviii), thinks that this Syriac version of the Revelation "may perhaps be assigned to the sixth century."

by God to the Evangelist John on the island of Patmos, upon which he was cast by Nero Cæsar."¹ See below, p. 433.

This very distinct testimony of the leading Father of the Church in Asia Minor at the close of the fourth century, is to be set, as Dr. Westcott remarks, against any doubts which may then have existed in that region as to the canonicity of the Apocalypse (see also the cases of Gregory Naz. and Cyril Hieros., above, p. 417). And Dr. Westcott concludes, as to Asia Minor, that "the Apocalypse was recognized from the first as the work of the Apostle in the districts most intimately interested in its contents" (l. c., p. 340).

Epiphanius, Bishop of Salamis in Cyprus († A.D. 403), has no doubt whatever as to the Apocalypse (although his confused statements give rise to certain questions—see below, p. 432). Writing of the gifts of the Holy Spirit, he adds: "Of the number of the holy prophets and the holy Apostles, the holy John also, through his Gospel and Epistles and Apocalypse, imparted from the same gift of the Holy One."²

The following statements, however, of this writer which place the banishment of the Apostle to Patmos in the reign of the Emperor Claudius (A.D. 41–54), are remarkable:—St. John wrote his Gospel "after the ninetieth year of his age, after his return from Patmos, which took place in the reign of Claudius Cæsar;" and then, referring to Rev. ii. 20, he adds that the Apostle prophesied "in the times of Claudius Cæsar, when he was in the island of Patmos."³ This statement of Epiphanius will be examined in a future page.

St. Chrysostom's life unites the fourth and fifth centuries. His incidental reference to Rev. xxi. 19–21—to the foundations of the heavenly Jerusalem; to her gates of sapphire and of pearls [καταμάθωμεν οὖν αὐτῆς τὰ θεμέλια, τὰς πύλας τὰς ἀπὸ σαπφείρου καὶ μαργαριτῶν συγκεκλιμένας, Proem. in Matt., Hom. i.]—proves his familiarity with the Book; a fact which Suidas¹ confirms in his article on the word John: "Chrysostom moreover receives both his three Epistles, and the Apocalypse."

The evidence of the Eastern Church may be fitly summed up by that of Eusebius:—

Eusebius, to whom we are chiefly indebted for our knowledge of the leading facts as to the Canon of the New Testament, had collected from all quarters, and has preserved for us in his History, the tradition of the Church from the earliest period respecting the Apocalypse. Although an ardent anti-chilist, he records, with his usual fidelity, the evidence for the Apostolic authorship of the Book. At the same time he is careful to bring together every doubt, and every suggestion of doubt, which had been put forward from the first (see below, § 5, p. 438), promising to submit the whole question afterwards to a final criticism—a promise which he has not kept.²

Eusebius, writes Hengstenberg (l. c., vol. ii. 434), "clearly and distinctly recognizes the fact that the Book had the unanimous approval of antiquity, and that the external grounds were entirely on its side. He makes no attempt whatever to invalidate the importance of

² Thus, having noticed (H. E., iii. 24), that the sentiments of many were in suspense (περιέλκεται) as to the Apocalypse, he adds,—ὅμως γε μὴν ἐκ τῆς τῶν ἀρχαίων μαρτυρίας ἐν οἰκείῳ καιρῷ τὴν ἐπίκρισιν δέξεται καὶ αὐτή. And again (iii. 25), when enumerating "the Scriptures confessedly Divine" (ὁμολογούμεναι θεῖαι γραφαί), he adds,—ἐπὶ τούτοις τακτέον, εἴ γε φανεῖται, τὴν ἀποκάλυψιν Ἰωάννου περὶ ἧς τὰ δόξαντα κατὰ καιρὸν ἐκθησόμεθα. And a little further on, he thus contrasts the two opposite opinions:—ἔτι τε, ὡς ἔφην, ἡ Ἰωάννου ἀποκάλυψις, εἴ φανεῖται, ἦν τινες, ὡς ἔφην, ἀθετοῦσιν, ἕτεροι δὲ ἐγκρίνουσι τοῖς ὁμολογουμένοις.

this testimony. . . He does not endeavour by an authoritative declaration of his own to set aside what he cannot disprove. So long as the doubts based on internal grounds could not be successfully disposed of . . . it was right to keep the question still open." The conjecture of Dionysius Alex. (see below, § 5) is all that he can adduce against the Apostolic authorship of the Book; and, even when doing so, he shows how little weight he can have attached to that conjecture. In his comment on the words of Papias already cited (see No. (5), note ¹, p. 408), Eusebius dissents from Irenæus by doubting whether Papias was "a hearer of John" the Apostle; and he also argues that Papias speaks of "two Johns,"—the former of whom he [Papias] classes with Peter, James, Matthew, and the rest of the Apostles, clearly indicating the Evangelist [σαφῶς δηλῶν τὸν εὐαγγελιστήν]; while he places the other outside the number of the Apostles, ranking Aristion above him, and distinctly calling him a "presbyter" [σαφῶς τε αὐτὸν πρεσβύτερον ὀνομάζει]. Then, following Dionysius of Alexandria, Eusebius refers to the account of "the two graves" at Ephesus, "each of which is still said to be that of 'John;'" and he concludes that it was the second John—"unless, indeed, one should prefer the first,"—who beheld the Vision "which bears the name of the Apocalypse of John":¹—see below, p. 441.

Dean Alford's remarks on this question (Prolegg., p. 215) are perfectly just: "Certainly," he writes, "Lücke is wrong in his very strong denunciations of Hengstenberg for describing Eusebius as studiously leaving the question open. For what else is it when he numbers the Book on one side among the undoubted Scriptures with an εἰ φανείη ["if it should seem so"], and then on the other among the spurious writings with an εἰ φανείη also: while at the very moment of endorsing Dionysius's conjecture that the second John saw its Visions, he interposes εἰ μὴ τις ἐθέλοι τὸν πρῶτον" ["unless one should prefer the first"].

That a writer of the anti-chilastic leanings of Eusebius should have gone no farther than this, and should have withheld the criticism which he promised, is of itself no slight intimation as to his real opinion: but what places the matter beyond question is the unhesitating manner in which, in his other writings, he cites the Apocalypse as Holy Scripture, and places it among the "Homologumena." Thus, in his Demonstr. Evangelica (viii. 2, ed. Gaisford, t. ii. p. 769), he quotes Rev. v. 5, and there finds proof that the Lord had not come to seal up the prophetic Visions, inasmuch as He had unveiled for His disciples the darkest predictions:¹—"Whence he saith," Behold the Lion of the Tribe of Judah hath conquered, according to the Revelation of John" [ὅθεν ἰδοὺ φησιν "ἐνίκησεν ὁ λέων ἐκ φυλῆς Ἰούδα" κατὰ τὴν ἀποκάλυψιν Ἰωάννου].¹

Dr. S. Davidson, too, has written with equal justice of Eusebius: "We cannot believe with Lücke that the reason of his hesitation lay in the want of sure historical grounds; it was mainly founded on doctrinal views."—Introd., 1848, vol. iii. p. 547.

THE WESTERN CHURCH:—

The well known document known as "The Muratorian Fragment," claiming to have been written by a contemporary of Pius, bishop of Rome, cannot be assigned to a date much later than the year 170;—for the episcopate of Pius is variously placed A.D. 127–142, and A.D. 142–157 (see Credner, Zur Gesch. des Kanons, s. 84). It may be regarded as a summary of the decision of the Western

Church as to the Canon, shortly after the middle of the second century. Its testimony to the Apocalypse is as follows:—"The blessed Apostle Paul himself following the order of his predecessor¹ John, writes to seven churches only by name in this order For John also, in the Apocalypse, though he writes to Seven Churches, nevertheless speaks to all."²

It may be added that, according to this document, the church of Rome, in the second century, while accepting the "Revelation of John," refused to read "the revelation according to Peter."³

If the "Muratorian Fragment" was written, as Bunsen (Analecta Ante-Nicæna, i. p. 126) conjectured, by Hegesippus (A.D. 170), an important name is added to our list of witnesses, and one of the doubts to be considered below is set aside (see § 6, p. 446).⁴

Evidence of a similar nature is supplied by the celebrated Codex Claromontanus (D), a Græco-Latin copy of the Pauline Epistles, which, immediately before the Epistle to the Hebrews, gives a Latin catalogue of the Books of the New Testament, and of the number of their στίχοι, or versus. We there read, that "John's Revelation contains 1200 verses," "johannis revelatio ICC" [1200]. According to Dr. Westcott (l. c., p. 25) this catalogue is of African origin, and of about the third century ("certe sæculo quarto antiquiorem") :—see also the Prolegomena to Tischendorf's edition of this Codex (Lipsiæ, 1852); Scrivener, Intr. to New Test. Criticism, 2nd ed., p. 151. This manuscript (D), which is to be dated from Cent. vi., "is of great value as a Western witness" (Bleek, Introd., ii. p. 324).

Dr. Westcott has brought forward from a still earlier period evidence of much weight. The history of the Old Latin Version (Vetus Latina), he observes, cannot be traced before the time of Tertullian. Lachmann shows that in the Latin translation of Irenæus the scriptural quotations were taken from the recension of the Vetus Latina (Nov. Test., Pref. p. x) :—"In other words, the Vetus Latina is recognized in the first Latin literature of the Church. . . . The beginning of Tertullian's literary activity cannot be placed later than circ. 190 A.D.; and we shall thus obtain [we cannot allow less than twenty years for its publication and spread] the date A.D. 170, as that before which the Version must have been made. . . Tertullian and the translator of Irenæus (see v. 35, 2) represent respectively, I believe, the original African and Gallic recensions of the Vetus Latina" (l. c., p. 233). "The Canon of the old Latin Version coincided, I believe, exactly with that of the Muratorian Fragment" (ib. p. 234).

There is no doubt, observes Lücke (s. 577), that the Apocalypse was regarded by the Montanists (A.D. 140) as the work of the Apostle John (see p. 411, note ³); and Tertullian (A.D. 160–240), who may be taken as their representative, quotes or alludes to almost every chapter of the Book :—e. g. comparing St. Paul (1 Cor. v. 9–13) and St. John (Rev. ii. 18–22), he calls them both Apostles who enjoy "an equal share of the Holy Spirit" ["æqualitatem Spiritus Sancti," De Pudic. 19];—and again: "The Apostle John in the Apocalypse describes the two-edged sword proceeding out of the mouth of God" ["Nam et Apostolus Joannes in Apocalypsi ensem describit ex ore Dei prodeuntem, bis acutum," &c. Adv. Marc. iii. 14];—"Ezekiel knew, and the Apostle John saw the Heavenly City" [Cœlestem civitatem et Ezekiel novit, et Apostolus

Joannes vidit," ib. c. 24]. See the numerous citations in Rönsch, Das Neue Testament Tertullians, p. 530, &c.

There is no trace, however, of Tertullian having first learned to know or value the Apocalypse through his association with the Montanists; his testimony is the testimony of his church, "an inheritance, not a deduction" (Westcott, p. 233). If, he writes (Adv. Marc. iv. 5), "that is acknowledged to be more true which is more ancient, that more ancient which is even from the beginning, that from the beginning which is from the Apostles; it will in like manner assuredly be acknowledged that that has been derived by tradition from the Apostles which has been preserved inviolate in the churches of the Apostles." And having referred to the churches founded by St. Peter and St. Paul, he adds: "We have also the churches nurtured by John: for although Marcion rejects his Apocalypse, nevertheless the Succession of bishops, if traced to its source, will rest on the authority of John."¹ As to St. John's personal history, we have the well-known statement:—

"If you are able to proceed to Asia, you have Ephesus: if you are in the neighbourhood of Italy, you have Rome, . . . where the Apostle John, after he came forth without hurt from the caldron of burning oil, was banished to the island."² And further, having spoken of the persecution under Nero,³ he tells

² (21) "Si potes in Asiam tendere, habes Ephesum: si autem Italiæ adjaces, habes Romam, . . . ubi Apostolus Joannes, posteaquam in oleum igneum demersus nihil passus est, in insulam relegatur."—De Præscr. Hæc. 36.

Renan (l.c., p. 198) is disposed to accept this statement of Tertullian.

³ (22) "Reperietis primum Neronem in hanc sectam tum maxime Romæ orientem, Cæsariano gladio ferocisse . . . "Temptaverat et Domitianus, portio Neronis de crudelitate, sed qua et homo, facile coëptum repressit, restitutis etiam quos relegaverat." Apol.,—c. 5. Here Oehler notes that the words "et homo" signify that, in comparison with Nero ("bellua"), Domitian had some feelings of humanity. On the other hand Valesius notes on this passage: "Ait Tertullianus, post Neronem qui primus sæviit in Christianos, Domitianum quoque, how the persecution of Domitian¹ came to an end; on which, as other writers state, St. John returned to Ephesus.

St. Cyprian (A.D. 250) knows no distinction between the canonical authority of the Gospels and of the Apocalypse:—e.g. "The Lord awakens us by the trumpet of His Gospel, saying 'He that loveth father or mother more than Me,' &c.; and 'To him that overcometh will I give to sit upon My throne'" (Matt. x. 37; Rev. iii. 21).²

Victorinus, bishop of Pettau in Pannonia (who suffered as a martyr under Diocletian, A.D. 303), wrote, towards the close of the third century, his commentary on the Apocalypse—the earliest now extant.³ He naturally paid attention to the leading facts in the life of the author of the Book on which he commented; and accordingly (writing on Rev. x. 11) he gives the information which we might expect:—

"This he says, because, when John saw these things, he was in the island of Pathmos, condemned to the mines by the upote alterum Neronem, idem tentavisse: sed ut homines levi ac mobili sunt ingenio, cito ab incepto destitisse."

Here there are various readings for the word "portio," viz. "prænomine,"—"pro nomine,"—"præmonitu;" portio, however, is supported by the μέρος ἐν τῇς τοῦ Νέρωνος ἐμόνητος of the version of these words given by Eusebius (iii. 20). See below, p. 431.

² "Tuba Evangelii sui nos excitat Dominus dicens, 'Qui plus diligit patrem,' &c. . . . et 'Vincenti dabo sedere super thronum meum'—Ep. xxvi. 4. On Rev. xii. 9 he writes: "Et in Apocalypsi angelus Joanni volenti adorare, se resistit et dicit, 'Vide ne feceris, quia conservus,' &c."—De Bono Patientiæ, c. 25. Again, on ch. xvii. 15: "Aguas namque populos significare in Apocalypsi Scriptura Divina declarat dicens, &c."—Ep. lxiii. 12. Enumerating the places where the number seven occurs, St. Cyprian writes: "Et in Apocalypsi Dominus mandata sua Divina et præcepta Cœlestia ad Septem Ecclesias et eorum Angelis scribit."—Ib., c. 11.

³ The commentary of Victorinus, as is well known, has been interpolated to a considerable extent; but there is no reason whatever for not accepting the passages here quoted as genuine.

Cæsar Domitian. There, accordingly, he beheld the Apocalypse. And when now, an older man, he supposed that he, by reason of his suffering (?), would receive his recall—Domitian being put to death, all his [Domitian's] judicial sentences were cancelled. And John, released from the mines, afterwards handed down as follows this same Apocalypse which he had received from God."¹

And, again, commenting on Rev. xvii. 9, 10:—

"It is proper that the time should be understood at which the written Apocalypse was put forth: since Domitian was then Cæsar; but before him there had been his brother Titus, and Vespasian, Otho, Vitellius, and Galba. These are the 'five' who have 'fallen.' 'The one is,' under whom the Apocalypse was written, namely Domitian. 'The other [who] is not yet come,' means Nerva: 'and when he cometh, he must continue a little while,' for he has not completed the space of two years."²

This latter passage has manifestly suggested the rationalistic exposition of the Apocalypse. See the note on Rev. xvii. 10.

Victorinus elsewhere, when referring to the mention of the twenty-four Elders (Rev. iv. 4), thus names the author: "They are called Elders in the Apocalypse of the Apostle and Evangelist John" ["Quos in Apocalypsi Joannis Apostoli et Evangelistæ Seniores vocat," &c.],—De Fabricâ Mundi, l. c., p. 51: see also Routh, l. c., iii. p. 455, &c., for the numerous references to the Apocalypse in this same treatise.

Dom Pitra (Spicilegium Solesmense, vol. i.) would assign to A.D. 220–250 an African bishop, Commodianus, of whom mention is first made by Gennadius of Marseilles, A.D. 495 (ap. Hieron., Opp. ii. 949). In a work by Commodianus entitled "Instructiones adv. Gentium Deos"¹ (ap. Galland., t. iii. p. 621), as well as in his "Carmen Apologeticum," first published by Dom Pitra (l. c., p. 20), the Apocalypse is frequently referred to, and Nero is taken to be Antichrist. The references, however, in this latter treatise, to the capture of Rome by the Goths, render it necessary to place the date of the writer after the year 410.² The value of this Commodianus, therefore, as a witness is inconsiderable; if we except this early (whatever be the date) identification of Nero with Antichrist.

Lactantius (A.D. 320) quotes no Book of the New Testament by name, with the exception of St. John's Gospel and the Apocalypse. E.g.: "As John teaches in the Revelation" ["sicut docet Joannes in Revelatione."],—Ep. 42.

The evidence of St. Hilary of Poitiers († 368), of St. Didymus († 394), of St. Ambrose († 397), and of St. Augustine († 430) is to the same effect:—"The Apocalypse is the genuine composition of the Apostle and Evangelist St. John." Dr. S. Davidson justly observes: "The historical tradition relative to the Apoca-(See Galland., l. c. p. 635, vv. 620–625).

The word "Latinus" refers to the interpretation given by Irenæus (v. 25) of the number 666, Rev. xiii. 18.

² E.g. He thus refers to Rev. ix. 11; xi. 13; xvii. 10, 11:

... "Gothis inrumpentibus amnem,

Et diu servatus, cum pristino corpore notus.

lypse seems to have been interrupted by doctrinal views alone; "had no Montanism or Millennarianism appeared, we should have heard of no voice raised against John's authorship." (Introd. to the Study of the N. T., 1868, vol. i. p. 319.)

From every quarter, indeed, the testimony of the early Latin Fathers to the Apostolic authority of the Apocalypse is decided and unanimous,—testimony which may be summed up in the following statements of St. Jerome (A.D. 330–420):—

"And yet John, one of the Disciples, who is said to have been the youngest among the Apostles, and whom the faith of Christ had found a virgin, remained a virgin. . . . But that we may know that John was then a boy, the ecclesiastical histories most clearly inform us that he lived until the reign of Trajan, that is, that the Prophet fell asleep in the sixty-eighth year after the Lord's Passion; for in the island of Pathmos, in which he had been banished for the testimony of the Lord, by the Emperor Domitian, he beheld the Apocalypse containing the infinite mysteries of future things."¹

And more expressly still:—

"In the fourteenth year, when Domitian stirred up a second persecution after Nero, [John], banished to the island of Patmos, wrote the Apocalypse which Justin Martyr and Irenæus interpret. But when Domitian was put to death, and his acts were rescinded by the Senate on account of their too great cruelty, under the reign of Nerva [John] returned to Ephesus, and abiding there until the reign of Trajan, he founded and governed all the churches of Asia; and dying in the sixty-eighth year after the Lord's Passion exhausted by old age, he is buried near the same city."¹

And thus, St. Jerome, whose researches as to the text of Scripture, and labours in correcting its translation had been undertaken at the desire of Pope Damasus,—speaks for the whole Western Church; and his conclusion as to the Apocalypse is supported by the independent testimony of St. Augustine.² Wherever Latin was spoken, the authority of the Apocalypse was recognized.

§ 3. The Canon of the New Testament.

When we proceed to combine the external evidence which all parts of the primitive Church have contributed to the Apocalypse, it is to be borne in mind that, as in the case of the other Scriptures, the fact of the acceptance of any Book of the New Testament as canonical is to be determined rather by the consentient testimony of different writers to its authorship, and divine character,—and the consequent assent to both of the whole Christian community,—than by any formal decision of the Church on the subject. The Apocalypse, it has been already pointed out, is contained in the "Muratorian Fragment," and in the Version known as the "Vetus Itala," as well as in the catalogue inserted in the Codex Claromontanus (see above, p. 421). We have also seen that the evidence of St. Ephræm Syrus, who represents Asia Minor in the fourth century, counterbalances any unfavourable inference from the absence of the Book from the Peschito. We have likewise seen that at Alexandria, Origen, at the beginning of the third century, was ignorant of any question or doubt raised, before his time, as to the Apocalypse; and, after doubts had been raised during the course of the century (see below), we are nevertheless given in the famous catalogue set forth by St. Athanasius († 373), the ancient Canon of the Alexandrine Church. In the authoritative document known as his Festal Epistle (Opp., t. i. p. 767, ed. Ben.), to his enumeration of the four Gospels, the Acts, fourteen Pauline, and seven Catholic Epistles, Athanasius adds: "And, again, the Apocalypse of John. These are the fountains of salvation" [καὶ πάλιν Ἰωάννου ἀποκάλυψις ταῦτα πηγαὶ τοῦ σωτηρίου].¹

² Dr. Westcott (On the Canon, 3rd ed., p. 423) notes that St. Augustine "alludes only once, as far as I know, to the doubts about the Apocalypse":—"Et si forte tu qui ista [Pelagii] sapientiam hanc scripturam [Apoc. xi. 3–12] non accepisti; aut si accipis contemnisti. . . ." (Serm. 299).

If it be objected that the synod of Laodicea (circa 350) does not include the Apocalypse in its catalogue of the Books of the Old and New Testaments, the reply is obvious,—even were this catalogue authentic,²—that those Books only are there set forth which were publicly read during Divine worship [ὅσα δεῖ βιβλία ἀναγνώσκεισθαι,—Can. 59 (60); see Hefele, Concilien-Gesch., i. s. 749]. It is well known that it was not unusual to abstain from the public reading of the Apocalypse,¹ partly on account of its mysterious obscurity, as in the case of the Book of Ezekiel,—and partly from the use made of the Book in the chiliastic controversy. That anti-chiliasts (e.g. Origen and Clemens Al.; see above, note ³, p. 411) should have upheld the Apocalypse as warmly as decided chiliasts (e.g. Tertullian),—is one of the clearest proofs of the strength of the evidence in its favour. The conclusions of Eusebius in his History illustrate this result:—see above, p. 420.

Coming down to the sixth century, Junilius, an African bishop (A.D. 550, ap. Galland., xii. 79, &c.), had heard from Paulus, a Persian of the School of Nisibis, that doubts had now begun to be entertained in the East on the subject of the Apocalypse ["De Joannis Apocalypsi apud Orientales admodum dubitatur"]. At this very period, however, in the West, his friend Primasius as well as Cassiodorus expound the Book as Apostolic and Canonical. In the seventh century St. Isidore² of Seville († 636), who mentions the doubts entertained in his day as to other Books of the New Testament, says not a word of any doubts as to the Apocalypse. The fourth Council of Toledo, too, at this same period (A.D. 633), in its seventeenth canon, directs that the Apocalypse, in consequence of certain doubts as to the authority of the Book, should be preached on in the Church between Easter and Pentecost; pointing, as Dean Alford thinks (Prolegg., p. 217), to the modern Orientals only, as Junilius had done.

It has been mentioned above that the catalogue ascribed to the synod of Laodicea does not place the Apocalypse among the Books publicly read in the ¹ St. Athanasius repeatedly quotes the Apocalypse:—e.g. καὶ ἐν ἀποκαλύψει τάδε λέγει, ὁ ἐν καὶ ὁ ἦν, καὶ ὁ ἐρχόμενος (ch. i. 8).—Orat. i. c. Arian., i. 11, t. i. p. 327; cf. ib., iv. 28, p. 506; Ep. ii. ad Serap., c. 2, p. 547.

² Canon 60, in the printed editions of the canons of this Council, consists of a catalogue of nearly all the Books of Scripture. Canon 59 forbids the public reading in churches of "psalms composed by private persons or of uncanonical books. The canonical Books only of the Old and New Testaments are to be read." There are very cogent reasons for believing that the catalogue of canon 60 was subsequently added, by an unknown hand, as the natural sequel of canon 59. This catalogue does not appear in the early Greek MSS. The printed editions which contain it are based, as Dr. Westcott points out, on MSS., with commentators' scholia, not earlier than the latter part of Cent. xii.; while the earliest MS. which gives the mere text, and which is dated early in Cent. xi., omits the canon. The evidence of the Latin versions of the Laodicean canons is nearly balanced; but the Syriac MSS., in the British Museum, of Cent. vi. or vii., contain canon 59, but without any catalogue added:—"On the whole," writes Dr. Westcott, "it cannot be doubted that external evidence is decidedly against the authenticity of the catalogue as an integral part of the text of the canons of Laodicea."—On the Canon, 3rd ed., p. 405; cf. Hefele, l. c., s. 749 ff.

services of the Church; and to this it should be added that neither does the last of the "Apostolical Canons" (which includes the Gospel and the three Epistles of St. John) enumerate the Apocalypse among the Books to be counted sacred. Nevertheless the "Quinisext Council" ("In Trullo," A.D. 692), which accepts both the "Apostolical Canons" and the canons of Laodicea, accepts at the same time in its second canon the decisions of the African synods (Concil. Carthag., A.D. 398, and A.D. 419) which distinctly include the Apocalypse as the composition of the Apostle John.¹

§ 4. When and where was the Revelation written?

The evidence which has been already given exhibits how clearly the Church, from the very first, has recognized in the person who wrote "I John was in the isle that is called Patmos" (Rev. i. 9), the Apostle who in his Gospel describes himself as "one of His disciples whom Jesus loved" (John xiii. 23; cf. xix. 26; xxi. 7, 20).² We have next to inquire when and where the Apocalypse was written; and how far the intimations of the New Testament as to St. John's career correspond with what history tells ¹ Thus we read (Can. xxiv.): "Sunt autem canonicæ Scripturæ, id est, Genesis . . . Judæ Apostoli, liber i.; Apocalypsis Joannis Apostoli, liber i."; and in the Greek text adopted by the Trullan Council,—εἰσὶ δὲ αἱ κανονικαὶ γραφαὶ τοῦτ' ἔστιν γένεσις . . . Ἰουδα ἀποστόλου μία ἀποκάλυψις Ἰωάννου βίβλος μία (ap. Justell. Bibl. Jur. Can., i. p. 343). See Mansi, iii. 891; and cf. Lücke, l. c., s. 648.

² The author of Supernatural Religion writes: "We have no reason whatever, except the assurance of the author himself, to believe that Jesus especially loved any disciple, and much less John the son of Zebedee."—vol. ii. p. 431. This allegation seems to be borrowed from Scholten (Der Ap. Johannes in Kleinasien, s. 89 ff.), who, relying altogether on the fact that St. John does not name himself in his Gospel, attempts to prove that "the disciple whom Jesus loved" was not the Apostle John, but "an ideal personage" ("eine ideale Persönlichkeit," s. 110),—"no definite historical person;" and that the fourth Gospel, which is to be distinguished from the Jewish Gospel of Matthew, the Petrine of Mark, the Pauline of Luke, is elevated above all the tendencies of the time. On this conjecture, Renan (L'Antchrist, p. 568) observes: "Il m'est tout à fait impossible d'admettre cette opinion."

us as to the time and the place. The latter of these inquiries comes first in order.

I. In three of the passages just cited from St. John's Gospel, St. John's name is connected with that of St. Peter. He is also St. Peter's companion wherever he is spoken of in the Acts (ch. iii., iv., viii.); and from the Acts we infer that he continued at Jerusalem for some time after the Lord's Ascension. He seems to have remained there for several years after his return from his mission to Samaria (Acts viii. 25), engaged in visiting, in like manner, the neighbouring churches. Thus, when St. Paul, three years after his Conversion, came back to Jerusalem, St. John is not there (Gal. i. 18, 19),—he is, doubtless, absent on one of these visits. We do not find any further mention of his name until St. Paul "fourteen years after went up again to Jerusalem" (Gal. ii. 1), when we read of the assembling of the Apostles in Council (Acts xv.), where James "the Just" presided as Bishop of Jerusalem (see Hege-sippus, ap. Euseb., ii. 23). Even here, had we not the incidental mention of St. John's name in Gal. ii. 9, we should not have suspected that, together with "Cephas" and James "the Lord's brother," he occupied a position of personal authority in the Church. Hence, it is by no means certain that he was not still in Jerusalem at the time of St. Paul's last journey thither, A.D. 58 (Acts xxi. 17, &c.): indeed, it is probable that, as long as Jerusalem was the centre of the Judæo-Christian Church, it was the rule that some one, at least, of the Apostles—doubtless one of "the pillars" (Gal. ii. 9)—should remain there;¹ and that St. John continued so to reside until the alarm of the Roman war reached Judæa, shortly before the year 66, and the defeat of Cestius who first besieged Jerusalem (cf. John xxi. 22). Eusebius (iii. 5) tells us that a divine warning now directed the Christians to depart from Jerusalem (cf. St. Luke xxi. 20, 21) to a city of Peræa called Pella, where St. John seems to have organized the church under the Bishop Symeon, who, as Hegesippus records (ap. Eus., iii. 32), was put to death by the Proconsul Atticus. And thus Pella may have been the starting-point of the Apostle on his road from Jerusalem to Ephesus.¹

Renan (L'Antechrist, pp. 27, 183), having noticed that "the Apostle John appears in general to have accompanied Peter," remarks—and there is no improbability in the remark, although there is no evidence whatever in support of it—"we believe that the author of the Apocalypse has been at Rome" (see on Rev. xiv. 11). He arrives at this conclusion by assuming (which is also quite possible) that the author has left in chapters xiii. and xvii. traces of the impression which the horrors of the persecution of the year 64 had stamped upon his mind:—"On est porté à croire que l'auteur de ce livre s'était trouvé mêlé aux dits événements, ou du moins qu'il avait vu Rome." "If," continues Renan, "as it is permissible to believe, John accompanied Peter to Rome, we can here find a plausible foundation for the old tradition according to which John was plunged in a vessel of boiling oil near the place where at a later date (A.D. 271) the Porta Latina existed" (p. 198).² Renan (p. 207) also suggests that it was on the occasion of this his miraculous preservation (cf. Mark xvi. 18; Acts xiv. 20; xxviii. 5) and after St. Peter had suffered, that St. John made choice of Asia Minor for his future residence. Whatever may be thought of this suggestion, it is clear that it was not until after the death of St. Paul that St. John settled at Ephesus.¹

Ephesus was the first of the Seven Churches addressed in the Apocalypse (ch. ii. 1): it had been founded by St. Paul, who also addressed to it one of his Epistles, written A.D. 61, or 62 (see Wieseler, Chron. Synops., s. 455). That St. John had not taught there during St. Paul's lifetime follows from the express statements of the latter that, had another Apostle laboured in any church before him, he would not have included it in the circle of his ministrations (see Rom. xv. 20; 2 Cor. x. 16; cf. Gal. ii. 7, 8). From the Epistle to the Ephesians, too, as well as from Col. iv. 15-17, it appears that St. John had not yet been in Asia Minor; and in both 1 Tim. i. 3 and 2 Tim. i. 18 Ephesus is referred to without any reference to St. John's name. St. John's residence in Ephesus, therefore, is to be placed at a date subsequent to St. Paul's death in the year 64. The dispersion of the Apostles may naturally have occurred during the siege of Jerusalem, circ. A.D. 68; and thus St. John would be found, about this time, at Ephesus, and in the valley of the Mæander (see above, p. 424).

It was from Ephesus accordingly as a centre, as ancient writers unanimously attest, that St. John thenceforward governed the churches of Asia:—and this office, as the sole survivor of those ¹ Niermeyer also places St. John's residence in Asia Minor about A.D. 65, shortly after St. Paul's death: the news of that event seems to Niermeyer to be a motive for leaving Palestine more natural than the prevision of the national catastrophe:—see Revue de Théologie, Sept. 1856, p. 172.

The conclusion of so calm and learned a writer as Bishop Lightfoot is worth recording:—"When, after the destruction of Jerusalem, St. John fixed his abode at Ephesus, it would appear that not a few of the oldest surviving members of the Palestinian church accompanied him into 'Asia,' which henceforward became the headquarters of Apostolic authority. In the body of emigrants, Andrew and Philip, among the Twelve, Aristion and John the Presbyter, among other personal disciples of the Lord, are specially mentioned."—Comm. on Coloss., p. 45.

² Nicephorus (circ. 800, H. E., ii. 42) mentions the report (ιστορεῖται) that St. John remained in Jerusalem until the death of the Blessed Virgin (cf. John xix. 27). The statement made at the Council of Ephesus (Labbe, t. iii. 547), that she accompanied St. John to Ephesus, and that she died and was buried there, is first referred to in Epiphanius (Her. 78, 11):—this bears upon the question of St. John's residence in Asia Minor (see below).

³ See above No. (21), note ², p. 422; cf. St. Jerome in Matth. xx. 23; adv. Jovinian., i. 26, quoted in No. (25), note ¹, p. 424; see also Platner and Bunsen, Beschreib. der Stadt Rom, iii. part i. s. 604.

"who were reputed to be pillars" (Gal. ii. 9), he naturally filled. This is the express testimony of Justin M. Jovin.* i. 26; in Ep. ad Gal. vi.; and Epiphanius, Har. 78, 11);—of Eusebius,² who writes (iii. 18), in the passage where he quotes the words of Irenæus (No. (10), p. 412, note ¹) that in the persecution under Domitian, "as is reported, John, at once Apostle and Evangelist, while still continuing in life, was condemned to dwell in the island of Patmos, on account of the testimony which he bore to the Divine Word;"³ to which Eusebius adds that, after Domitian's death, "the Apostle John coming back from his exile in the island, resumed his residence at Ephesus." For these facts the historian appeals to "the report of those of old time among us:"—by which words, we may note, Eusebius clearly intimates that he had other sources of information, in addition to Irenæus, respecting the fact of which he testifies, viz., the fact of St. John's return from Patmos to Ephesus:—e. g. see his words quoted p. 416, No. (17). Elsewhere he also records of the Apostles how Peter was crucified with his head downwards, and how Paul was beheaded, and how John was banished to an island [καὶ Πέτρος ἐπὶ Ῥώμης κατὰ κεφαλῆς σταυροῦται, Παῦλός τε ἀνατέμνεται, Ἰωάννης τε νῆσῳ παραδίδεται]—Dem. Ev., iii. 5.

In further proof of the Apostle's residence at Ephesus, one may adduce the statement said to have been made at the Council of Ephesus (see note ¹, p. 427),—not to mention the incidental proofs afforded by the reference of Tertullian to Polycarp (de Præscr. c. 32¹); by the accounts of the Paschal controversy; and by the various narratives of events during the Apostle's abode at Ephesus.² This fact, therefore, being established, a considerable interval in all probability elapsed between St. John's first settlement at Ephesus and his exile to Patmos:—see the Paschal Chronicle, quoted No. (7), note ¹, p. 408.

No less decisive is the testimony of early writers that the Visions of the Apocalypse were seen by St. John "in the isle that is called Patmos," to which he had been banished (whether from Ephesus or before his abode there) "for the word of God and the testimony of Jesus" (Rev. i. 9; on Patmos, see the note in loc.). This sentence of banishment was in all respects conformable to the general usage of the Roman Empire, according to which the islands of the Mediterranean were employed as places of exile.³ Eusebius quotes the testimony

² E. g. St. John's composing his Gospel to refute Cerinthus (who, as we should note, came into prominence under Domitian, see Tillemont, ii. 54);—his rushing from the building where he happened to meet Cerinthus (Irenæus, Har. iii. 3);—the story of the young robber (Clemens Alex., Quis dives salu. 42);—his raising a dead man to life (Apollonius, ap. Eus., v. 18);—his constant use of the exhortation, "Little children, love one another" (St. Jerome, Ep. ad Gal. vi. 10);—the fact of his burial;—and the account of the two graves (Polycrates, ap. Euseb., v. 24; Dionys. Al., ap. Eus., vii. 25);—events which all occurred at Ephesus, as already pointed out. Cf. too the statement of Tertullian, No. (21), p. 422.

to this effect of Clemens Alexandrinus, and of Origen (H. E. iii. 18, 23,—see above, Nos. (15), (16). Passages likewise reciting the fact have been also given from St. Hippolytus (p. 417);—Tertullian, No. (21);—Victorinus, No. (23);—Jerome, Nos. (25) and (26);—Epiphanius, No. (19);—the superscription of the Syriac version of the Apocalypse, No. (18);—and from Arethas (p. 407, note ¹):—see also below Dorotheus, p. 431, note ¹. Victorinus, it will have been seen, has added, to the other accounts, that St. John had been condemned to the mines in Patmos; and further, that, after his release, he committed to the Church the record of the Visions which he had received (“de metallo dimissus, postea tradidit hanc eandem quam acceperat”);—see p. 423. ¹

The past tenses in Rev. i. 2 (ἐμαρτύρησα) and in Rev. i. 9 (ἐγενόμην) have been adduced in proof that the Revelation was not committed to writing until after the Apostle's return from exile; although the style of the Epistles to the Seven Churches has been urged on the other side. At all events, whether written in Patmos, or at Ephesus after he was restored to liberty, we can trace, in the imagery and in the allusions of the Apocalypse, strong internal confirmation of what history tells us both as to the region in which St. John resided, and as to the scene where he beheld his Visions. “The Revelation,” writes Dean Stanley, “is of the same nature as the prophetic Visions and lyrical Psalms of the Old Testament, where the mountains, valleys, trees, storms, earthquakes, of Palestine occupy the foreground of the picture, of which the horizon extends to the unseen world and the remote future. . . . The stern rugged barrenness of its [Patmos] broken promontories well suits the historical fact of the relegation of the condemned Christian to its shores as of a convict to his prison. . . . He stood on the heights of Patmos in the centre of a world of his own. . . . The view from the topmost peak, or indeed from any lofty elevation in the island, unfolds an unusual sweep, such as well became the ‘Apocalypse,’ the ‘unveiling’ of the future to the eyes of the solitary Seer. . . . Above, there was always the broad heaven of a Grecian sky; sometimes bright with its ‘white cloud’ (Rev. xiv. 14), sometimes torn with ‘lightnings and thunderings,’ and darkened by ‘great hail,’ or cheered with ‘a rainbow like unto an emerald’ (Rev. iv. 3; viii. 7; xi. 19; xvi. 21). Over the high tops of Icaria, Samos, and Naxos rise the mountains of Asia Minor; amongst which would lie, to the north, the circle of the Seven Churches to which his addresses were to be sent. Around him stood the mountains and islands of the archipelago—‘every mountain and island shall be moved out of their places’; ‘every island fled away, and the mountains were not found’ (Rev. vi. 14; xvi. 20). . . . When he looked around, above or below, ‘the sea’ would always occupy the foremost place. He saw ‘the things that are in the heavens, and in the earth, and in the sea’ (Rev. v. 13; x. 6; xiv. 7); . . . the voices of heaven were like the sound of the waves beating on the shore, as ‘the sound of many waters’ (Rev. xiv. 2; xix. 6); the millstone was ‘cast into the sea’ (Rev. xviii. 21); ‘the sea was to give up the dead which were in it’ (Rev. xx. 13; cf. vii. 1, 2, 3; x. 2, 5, 8; xvi. 3).”—Sermons in the East, 1862, p. 230.

Mai, Scriptt. Vett. Nov. Coll., t. i. 2, p. 16. (According to other accounts, he was banished to the African Oasis, A.D. 485; see Smith's Dict. of Christian Biogr., art. Calandio). St. John, as Renan supposes (l. c., p. 374), retired to Patmos of his own accord, in order to compose his work;—or perhaps he wrote it on his return from Rome to Asia, full of reminiscences of the persecution which he had escaped;—or an accident, or stress of weather may have compelled him to take refuge in the little port: and for this last conjecture a hint is afforded by the ἐγενόμην of Rev. i. 9.

From Patmos St. John proceeded to Ephesus, where he seems to have resided until his death (Polycrates, No. (14), p. 414; Origen, No. (17), p. 416), engaged in the organization and government of the surrounding churches (see p. 408, note ²; and Eusebius, p. 415, note ¹), until the reign of Trajan, A.D. 98–117. This date we learn from Irenæus (No. (11), p. 412); and from what Eusebius records on the evidence of Irenæus and of "the ancients" (No. (7), p. 408; No. (27), p. 428) Eusebius is followed by Jerome (No. (26), p. 424), in fixing the date of the exile in the fourteenth year of Domitian (see the Chronicle quoted, p. 408, in note ¹). St. Jerome adds that the Apostle returned from Patmos under Nerva (A.D. 96):—he returned, according to Clemens Al. (No. (15), p. 415), "after the death of the tyrant." St. Jerome further states that St. John died in the sixty-eighth year after the Lord's Passion, and was buried at Ephesus: and although Tertullian and Hegesippus (p. 422) seem to place the return from Patmos before the death of Domitian, a passage has been adduced from Dion Cassius (lxviii. 1) to the effect that Nerva, on succeeding to the empire, set at liberty those who had been exiled by Domitian.¹ See on Victorinus, p. 423.

The result, then, of the evidence amounts to this,—that shortly before, or shortly after Domitian's death, A.D. 96, St. John was released from exile, and returned to Ephesus. There he resided until his death in the reign of Trajan, and there his tomb was famous for many years (Eus. iii. 31, 39; v. 24; vii. 25; Jerome, de Vir. Ill. c. 9; see No. (20), p. 420). The date of St. John's death would thus be some time about the year 98.²

² For this result we have, as stated in the text, the authority of Irenæus, Har. ii. 22, 5; iii. 3, 4; of Jerome, de Vir. Ill. 9; adv. Jovin. i. 14; Comm. in Dan. ix.; of Isidore Hispal., De Vita et Obitu SS. c. 73. Isidore, adopting the words of St. Jerome, No. (26), makes St. John's age to be 89. Pseudo-Chrysost. (Hom. de S. Joann. theol., ap. Opp. Chrysost., ed. Ben. t. vii.); Dorotheus (see below, p. 431, note ¹); and Suidas make the Apostle's age to be 120. The chronicle ascribed to "the younger" Hippolytus (see p. 416, note ²) makes it 110. The Paschal Chronicle (ed. Dindorf, p. 470) makes it 100,—noting (see p. 461) that after St. John had spent nine years at Ephesus, he was banished to Patmos for fifteen years; and that, his exile being ended, he lived twenty-six years in Ephesus. This would place St. John's death in the seventh year of Trajan's reign.

The Abbé Nolte first published (Theol. Quartalschr., Tübing., 1862, iii. p. 406) a fragment of the chronicle of Georgius Hamartôlus

II. Such being the facts as to the life of the Apostle John, to determine the time when the Apocalypse was written is a problem of the utmost importance,—whether we consider the authorship, the interpretation, or the Divine inspiration of the Book. The date to be fixed upon, while it must evidently suit the circumstances of the writer and must not contradict admitted facts, should, at the same time, be sought for without reference to any arbitrary hypothesis such as modern critics lay down, namely, that the Book must be regarded as an ordinary human composition, containing neither prophetic utterance nor trace of Divine knowledge:—for the "higher criticism" of recent days assumes, as a first principle, that any alleged prediction must be a vaticinium post eventum.

a.—The External evidence on this matter of the date is as follows:¹—

The statement which might seem to set all controversy at rest is that of Irenæus, No. (10), who expressly asserts (Cent. ix.), where it is stated that, after the death of Domitian, Nerva recalled St. John from "the island," and permitted him to reside at Ephesus. Being now sole survivor of the Twelve Apostles, and having composed his Gospel, he was counted worthy of martyrdom; for Papias of Hierapolis, being an eye-witness (αὐτόπτης τούτου γενόμενος), relates in the second book of "The Lord's Discourses" (No. (6), p. 408) that John was put to death by the Jews (ἐν ὑπὸ Ἰουδαίων ἀνηρέθη). On this statement Keim (l. c., 3rd Ausg., i. s. 42) founds one of his proofs (see below, p. 445) that the Apostle never resided in Asia Minor, because the Jews are spoken of, and therefore the scene of the alleged martyrdom must have been in Palestine. Here, writes Keim, is "a newly discovered witness, which puts an end to all illusions." As if Jews were not to be found at Ephesus, where the very fragment relied upon asserts that Nerva allowed St. John to reside! (see Godet, l. c., i. p. 63; Krenkel, l. c., s. 31). Renan (l. c., p. 562) rejects the notion that Papias could have accepted this tradition. He notes:—"Georges Hamartôlus ajoute qu'Origène était également de cet avis; ce qui est tout à fait faux. Voir Origène, In Matth., t. xvi. 6. Héracléon met aussi Jean parmi les apôtres martyrs; Clém. d'Alex., Strom. iv. 9. Des faits comme le miracle de l'huile bouillante et le passage Apoc., i. 9, suffisaient pour justifier de telles assertions."

that "the Revelation was seen no long time since, but almost in our own generation towards the end of the reign of Domitian" (A.D. 81-96). When we bear in mind what has been already proved (see p. 411, note ¹),—viz. that Irenæus was the intimate associate of Polycarp who suffered martyrdom in the year 155, in the 86th year of his age (see above, p. 409);—when we remember, too, that in his Epistle to Florinus¹ (see above, p. 412) Irenæus does not appeal, as he sometimes does, to the information which he had received from others, but recalls to Florinus the reminiscences of their boyhood concerning their common master Polycarp,² of which reminiscences one was that Polycarp was wont often to speak of his personal knowledge of the Apostle John;—in a word, when we perceive that Irenæus had every opportunity of knowing the facts, and no intelligible motive for misstating them, the force of his evidence can hardly be disputed.

Clemens Al., in the passage No. (15), merely speaks of the "death of the tyrant"; but it has been shown (p. 415, note ²) that Eusebius understood by "the tyrant" no other than Domitian. Tertullian, also, like Clemens Al., does not name the Emperor who banished St. John to "the island"—see No. (21); but his language in the passage No. (22) shows that he intended Domitian. At all events, the latter passage proves that it was the practice of Domitian, imitating the cruelties of Nero, to punish the Christians with exile.³

² Irenæus writes (ap. Eus. v. 20): ὅστε με δύνασθαι εἰπεῖν καὶ τὸν τόπον ἐν ᾧ καθιζόμενος διελέγετο ὁ μακάριος Πολύκαρπος . . . καὶ τὴν τοῦ σώματος ἰδέαν καὶ τὰς διαλέξεις ἃς ἐποιεῖτο πρὸς τὸ πλῆθος, καὶ τὴν μετὰ Ἰωάννου συναστροφὴν ὡς ἀπήγγειλε, καὶ τὴν μετὰ τῶν λοιπῶν τῶν ἱερακότων τὸν Κύριον καὶ ὡς ἀπεμνημόνευε τοὺς λόγους αὐτῶν, κ. τ. λ.

³ That exile was a usual punishment under Domitian is shown by the story of Flavia Domitilla banished by him to Pandateria (Dion Cassius, lxxvii. 14; lxxviii. 1); and Eusebius (iii. 18), in continuation of his reference to the words of Irenæus, No. (10), mentions Pontia as the place

Origen, No. (16) considers that the Revelation was received "in the island," and he is one of the witnesses quoted by Eusebius for the Apostle's death at Ephesus, No. (17). Victorinus, No. (24), as we have seen, is still more explicit as to the time when the Apocalypse was written for the Church,—namely, when Domitian was the Cæsar ("quoniam tunc erat Cæsar Domitianus").

St. Jerome, No. (25), is no less clear as to the fact that the Revelation was given to St. John under the same Emperor; and so, too, the later writers generally (e.g. Sulpicius Severus, Sacr. Hist. ii. 31; and Orosius): Eusebius also having three times stated that St. John was banished under Domitian,—(1) in H. E. iii. 18 (No. (10); cf. v. 8), where, he quotes Irenæus; (2) in iii. 20, No. (27), where, by referring to "the ancients" (ὁ τῶν παρ' ἡμῶν ἀρχαίων λόγος), he removes any imagination that Irenæus was the only source from which he knew the fact; and (3) in iii. 23, where he quotes Clemens Alex., No. (15),—nowhere suggests that any other opinion existed in the Church either as to the Emperor who sent St. John into exile or as to the date of the Apocalypse. There must, therefore, have been perfect unanimity at the beginning of the fourth century¹ as to both these facts, of her exile "in the fifteenth year of Domitian,"—τῆς εἰς Χριστὸν μαρτυρίας ἕνεκεν. We read in Juvenal (i. 73): "Aude aliquid brevibus Gyaris, et carcere dignum;" and Lampe (on St. John i.) quotes Modestius (Legē xxx., Digest. de poenis): "Si quis aliquid fecerit quo leves hominum animi superstitione numinis terrentur, Divus Marcus hujusmodi homines in insulam relegare rescripsit" (cf. on Rev. ii. 13):—see p. 428, note ¹.

¹ The evidence which would place the exile at a later date need not be considered. Thus in a fragment ascribed to Dorotheus, Bishop of Tyre at the end of the third century, it is stated that "John, the brother of James," "who also wrote the Gospel," after he had preached Christ at Ephesus, was banished to Patmos by Trajan on account of his confession of the Christian faith:—see Selecta ad illustr. Chron. Pasch., ed. Dindorf, ii., p. 136; Cave, Hist. Lit., vol. i. p. 169. In the Latin version of this fragment of Dorotheus (ap. Bibl. Patr. Lugd., ed. De la Bigne, t. iii. p. 426) it is added that St. John wrote his Gospel while in Patmos; and that, when recalled to Ephesus after the death of Trajan, he published it through "his host and deacon" Gaius (see Rom. xvi. 23; 3 John 1), the Apostle surviving to the age of 120. "But," although a subjective theory as to the authorship of the Book had been put forward in the interest of the anti-chiliasts,—a theory to be considered presently.

The case then stands thus. Before Cent. iv. there is no variation in the historical accounts. All statements support the conclusion that St. John was banished to Patmos by Domitian (A.D. 81–96),—some writers placing the exile in the fourteenth year of his reign,¹—and all agree that the Visions of which the Revelation is the record were received in Patmos. Clemens Al. and Tertullian, indeed, do not mention in express terms the name of the Emperor by whom St. John was sent into exile (see No. (15), and No. (21):—but compare No. (22), p. 422); and Origen, No. (16), states as the reason for his own silence as to “the King of the Romans,” that St. John has not himself given the name of the person who passed sentence on him;—but nothing that is said, not even the remark of Dorotheus (see p. 431, note ¹), is at variance with the general belief as summed up by Eusebius. If external evidence is of any value at all, it is of value here: no amount of “subjective” conjecture, or arbitrary interpretation, can set aside the verdict of history.

At a later period, indeed, some statements meet us which, at most, are instances of eccentric speculation.² Thus Epiphanius mentions Claudius as the Emperor who banished St. John (see No. (19), this version proceeds, “Sunt tamen qui dicunt eum non sub Trajano in insulam Pathmon relegatum esse, sed sub Domitiano Vespasiani filio.” Theophylact (on St. Matt. xx. 23, t. i. p. 107) also says: ‘Ιδωβον μὲν Ἡρώδης ἀπέκτεινεν, Ἰωάννην δὲ Τραϊανὸς κατεδίκασε μαρτυροῦντα τῇ λόγῳ τῆς ἀληθείας.

¹ Godet (Comm. on St. John's Gospel, Clarke's transl. i. p. 244) writes: “We fix the composition of the Apocalypse about the year 95.”

² E.g. Andreas, on Rev. vi. 12; vii. 1, mentions that “some” persons understood these texts of the Jewish war; and Arethas, on Rev. vii. 1–8, would seem to place the date of the Apocalypse before the Jewish war, although on Rev. i. 9, he places the date under Domitian. On Rev. iii. 10, he further writes: ἡ τὸν ἐπὶ Δομετιανοῦ διαγμὸν λέγει, δεύτερον ὅντα μετὰ Νέρωνα ὡς Εὐσεβίου ιστορεῖ [H. E. iii. 17], ὅτε καὶ αὐτοῦς ὁ εὐαγγελιστὴς εἰς τὴν Πάτμον ὅπ' αὐτοῦ τοῦ Δομετιανοῦ κατεκρίθη, κ. τ. λ. (ap. Cramer, Catena, p. 227). See also Züllig, on ch. xvii. 10.

p. 419),—a statement which few ancient or modern writers deem worthy of acceptance.¹ In fact, according to this statement, St. John returned from his exile “in extreme old age,” and when his life had lasted about ninety years; and therefore, seeing that Claudius reigned from the year 41 to the year 54, were we to assign “the return from exile to the last of these dates, we should have St. John aged ninety in the year 54: in other words, thirty-three years older than our Lord, and sixty-three at least when called to be an Apostle: a result which is at variance with all ancient tradition whatever.”—Alford, Prolegg., p. 232. Bishop Wordsworth, in his Commentary (Introd., p. 158), suggests—but the suggestion is more ingenious than conclusive—the possibility of a false reading in the passage, viz. ΚΛΑΥΔΙΟΥ, for ΦΛΑΒΙΟΥ, the copyist forgetting that Domitian was sometimes called Flavius.²

¹ Of the moderns Grotius (followed by Hammond), on Rev. i. 9, takes up the account of Epiphanius, and appeals to Acts xviii. 2, and to Suetonius (Claudius, 25); arguing that St. John was exiled to Patmos as being a Jew;—that, when the persecution of the Christians ceased under Vespasian, he was recalled from the island;—and that he was again banished there by Domitian.

² E.g. :—
(28) “Cum jam semianimum laceraret Flavius orbem Ultimus, et calvo serviret Roma Neroni.”

Juven., iv. 37.

Bishop Wordsworth, by quoting the words of Epiphanius in the context of this statement, supplies proof that Epiphanius could not have meant Domitian:—Epiphanius “says that St. John, in the Apocalypse, writing to the Seven Churches of Asia, predicts the rise of heresies which did not then exist, and foretells that a woman would appear at Thyatira, who would call herself a prophetess; and he adds that these things came to pass long after the death of John, inasmuch as he prophesied in the times of Claudius Cæsar, when he was at Patmos.”—l. c., p. 157. But it is clear that in Rev. ii. 20 St. John is not predicting future errors; he is censuring errors already committed. In matters of history, indeed, Epiphanius is no authority whatsoever;—thus, as Bishop Lightfoot has pointed out (Cont. Rev., Aug. 1876, p. 412): “Epiphanius states that Antoninus Pius was succeeded by Caracalla, who also bore the names of Geta and M. Aurelius Verus, and who reigned seven years; that L. Aurelius Commodus likewise reigned these same seven years; that Pertinax succeeded next, and was followed by Severus”; and so on.—See De Fend. et Mens., c. 16.

Still less weight is to be attached to the external evidence for placing the composition of the Apocalypse under Nero. The two solitary witnesses to this effect are the superscription of the Syriac version published by Lud. de Dieu, No. (18), ascribed to the sixth century; and Theophylact († A.D. 1107). As to the former of these two witnesses, it was long ago remarked by Stephen Le Moyne (Varia Sacra, Lugd. Bat., 1694) that the Syriac translator probably intended not the first Nero,¹ but a second Nero, viz. Domitian, who was also a persecutor; and he quotes the verses just cited from Juvenal, No. (28), in proof that Domitian was sometimes called Nero.² Indeed, that Domitian was popularly known as a second "Nero," was notorious; as may be inferred from the words of Tertullian, No. (22), p. 422.

That the Syriac translator may have meant by "Nero" "Domitian" (compare the various reading "prænomine Neronis" in No. (22) p. 422) is by no means impossible; and it should be remembered that both Nero and Domitian are specially referred to as persecutors and enemies of the Christian faith:—e.g. by Melito of Sardis (ap. Euseb., iv. 26), in his Apology addressed to M. Antoninus.³ See also St. Jerome, No. (26).

Theophylact is the other witness for the alleged fact that St. John wrote in Patmos during the reign of Nero (A.D. 54–68). In the preface to his Comm.

The full name of the Emperor Claudius (A.D. 41–54) was Tiberius Claudius Drusus Nero Germanicus. After his adoption by Claudius (A.D. 50), Nero was called, Nero Claudius Cæsar Drusus Germanicus. Domitian (A.D. 81–96) was called, Titus Flavius Domitianus Augustus.

² In further proof of this fact, we may also compare the verses of Ausonius:—

(29) "His decimus, fatoque accitus Vespasianus:

Et Titus imperii felix brevitæ: secutus Frater, quem calvum dixit sua Roma Neronem."—De xii. Cæsaribus.

³ Melito writes:—μόνοι πάντων, ἀνακείσθentes υπό των βασκάνων ανθρώπων, τὸν καθ' ἡμᾶς ἐν διαβολῇ καταστήσαι λόγον ἠθέλησαν Νέρων καὶ Δομετιανός (ap. Routh, Rel. Sacr., t. i. p. 117).

in Joann. (t. i. p. 504), Theophylact states that St. John wrote his Gospel (not the Apocalypse) in the island of Patmos, thirty-two years after the Ascension,—thus placing the exile of the Apostle under Nero.¹ And yet the same Theophylact, as we have already seen (p. 432, note), asserts that St. John was condemned by Trajan.² Theophylact, therefore, is either entirely in error in what he states in his preface to the Gospel of St. John,—as is most probable in so late a writer,—or we do not understand the passage.

It has been necessary to dwell upon this evidence—the only evidence which Christian antiquity offers—in support of the opinion that the banishment of St.

² It may be well to notice in like manner the two statements of "the younger" Hippolytus in note ², p. 416; especially the word Δομετίου in the former of the passages. If by this he intended Domitius Nero, the mention of Trajan in the second passage is exactly parallel to the confusion in Theophylact. Guericke (Einleit., s. 285) attempts to prove that the different ancient writers who record that the exile to Patmos took place under Domitian really intended Domitius, i. e., Domitius Nero. Thus, he understands from the words of Irenæus, as given in No. (10)—πρὸς τῷ τέλει τῆς Δομετιανοῦ ἀρχῆς—that Δομετιανῶς (because the article is wanting) is an adjective formed from Δομέτιος, and that the sense is "the reign of Domitius." To urge no other objection, we can point to more than one passage in Eusebius which decides the matter; e.g. iii. 23,—μετὰ τὴν Δομετιανοῦ τελευτήν:—iii. 18, ἐν ἔτει πεντεκαίδεκάτῳ Δομετιανοῦ μετὰ πλείστων ἐτέρων τὴν Φλαβίαν Δομετίλλαν κ. τ. λ. Would Guericke understand here "the 15th year of Nero"? Niermeyer, who assumes that Domitian means Nero, and who makes St. John arrive in Asia Minor about the year 65, argues thus:—Tertullian, if we may trust Jerome (?) ascribes the banishment of St. John to Nero; Irenæus to Domitian; Epiphanius to Claudius. In the want of positive data, Christian tradition has attached itself to these three names in turn, without seeing that Nero, Domitian, and Claudius are one and the same person. Nero was also called Claudius; and he was a Domitian, being of the gens Domitia (Revue de Théologie, Sept. 1856, p. 172).

Niermeyer, however, cannot show that Nero was ever popularly known as "Claudius;" and Tertullian, as we have seen, in a pointed manner distinguishes Nero from Domitian. St. Jerome makes no such statement as to Tertullian as Niermeyer ascribes to him.
